logy, that in the 26th Olympiad (u. c. 676) music contests were first introduced at the feast of Apollo Carneius [at Sparta], and at their first celebration Terpander was crowned victor." (Hist.

Lit. Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 150, vol. i. p. 268 of the German; comp. Dor. b. iv. c. 6 § 1; and Mr. Grote echo the statement, that "this is one of the best ascertained points among the obscure chronology of the seventh century" (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 103); and in the two great chronological works of Clinton and Fischer (u. a. 676), the date is laid down as certain.) The ancient authorities for this statement are Hellanicus (Athen. xiv. p. 635, l., Fr. 122, ed. Car. Müller; Fra. Hist. vol. i. p. 927, in Didot's Bibliothèque), and Sosibius the Lacedae-monian (Ath. i. e., Fr. 3, ed. Müller, ibid. vol. ii. p. 623); of whom the former gives us only the fact, that Terpander was the first victor at the Carnea, without the date; and the latter gives us only the date of the institution of the Carnea, without mentioning the victory of Terpander: the combination of the two statements, on which the force of the chronological argument rests, is made by Athenaeus, whose only object, however, in making it is to prove that Terpander was older than Anacreon; and who, in the very same sentence, quotes the statement of Hieronymus (de Poetis), that Terpander was contemporary with Lycurgus. Mr. Grote says (p. 103, note), "That Terpander was victor at the Spartan festival of the Kairnia, in 676, b. c., may well have been derived by Hellanicus from the Spartan registers;" and a similar meaning has been put upon the phrase used by Athenaeus, οὗ Ἑλλανικοῦ ἑτορεί, ἐν τῷ τῶν ἡμέραν Καρνησίαν, κῶν τῶν κατα-cρυπτάς: but, granting this supposition its full force, Hellanicus does not say that Terpander was victor "in 676, b. c.;" but he does give us, in another fragment, a date irreconcilable with this, namely, that Terpander flourished in the time of Midas. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 398, Potter; Fr. 123, ed. Müller. l. c.) The date 676, b. c., for the institution of the Carnea, therefore, rests alone on the testimony of Sosibius, for it can hardly be doubted that the same date, as given by Africanus (Euseb. Chron. pars i. Ol. 26, p. 144, ed. Mai, vol. i. p. 263, ed. Archer) was copied from the χρήσων ἡμεραί of Sosibius. Still Sosibius alone would undoubtedly be a very high authority; but, in addition to the caution which is required in dealing with indirect evidence, and in addition to the testimonies which assign a different date to Terpander, it may be questioned whether the date of Sosibius for the institution of the Carneia is to be understood literally, or whether it was not derived from some other epoch by a computation which, on a different chronological system, would have given a different result. There can be little doubt that the records of Sparta, which Sosibius "may well have" followed were kept, not by Olympiads, but by the reigns of the kings, and that, in turning the dates of those early kings into Olympiads, some interpolation, which he assumed for the Trojan War, namely B. c. 1180; and that, if he had taken a different date for the Trojan War, c. g. that of B. c. 1217, he would, by the same computation, have placed the institution of the Carneia at Ol. 16, a date which would agree well enough with that really given by Hellanicus. (See Car. Müller, Frag. Hist. vol. ii. p. 626.) On the whole, then, it seems probable that the date of B. c. 676 is not quite so certain as it has been represented.

With respect to the other testimonies, that of Hellanicus, already referred to, is rendered somewhat indefinite by the, at least partly, mythological character of Midas; but, if the date has any historical value at all, it would place Terpander at least as high as Ol. 20, B. c. 700, the date of the death of Midas, according to Eusebius, confirmed by Herodotus (i. 14), who makes Midas' little older than Gyges. To the same effect is the testimony of the Celsian scholar Xanthippus, that, when he was before Hellanicus, and who placed Terpander at Ol. 18, B. c. 708 (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 398, Potter). Glaucus of Rhgium also, who lived not long after Hellanicus, states that Terpander was older than Archilocho, and that he came next after those who first composed nystalic music, meaning perhaps Olympia and Clonias; and Plutarch, who quotes this statement (de Mus. iv. p. 1132, e.) introduces it with the remark, καὶ τοῖς χρόνοις δὲ σφόδρα παλαιός ἄρτι, and presently afterwards (5, p. 1153, a) he adds, as a general historical tradition (παραδίδοται) that Archilocho flourished after Terpander and Clonias. Mr. Grote accepts these testimonies; but draws from them the inference, that Archilocho should be placed lower than he usually is, about B. c. 670 instead of 700. The statement of Hermynus (Ath. l.c.) that Terpander was contemporary with Lycurgus, is perhaps only another form of the tradition that the laws of Lycurgus were aided by the music and poetry of Terpander and Tyrtaeus, which has evidently no chronological significance. On the other hand, Phanias made Terpander later than Archilocho (Clem. Alex. l.c.), and the chronologers place his musical reform at Ol. 33, 2, B. c. 647 (Euseb.) or Ol. 34, 1, B. c. 644. (Marm. Par. Ep. 34). Lastly, we are told that Terpander was victorious in the musical contest at four successive Pythian festivals; but there is abundance of evidence to prove that these Pythian musical contests were not those established by the Amphictyons in Ol. 48. 3, but some which had existed long before, and which were celebrated, according to Müller, every eight years, a circumstance which throws doubt on the number of Terpander's victories. (See Müller, Dor. b. iv. c. 6. § 2; Grote, Hist. of Greece. vol. iv. pp. 103, note). These discrepancies will show the great uncertainty attending the chronology of so early a period, and the danger of resting even upon an apparently definite date; although in the present case, the general comparison of the testimonies makes it far from improbable that the date first assigned is about the right one. All that can be said, with any approach to certainty, is that Terpander flourished somewhere between B. c. 700 and 650, and that his career may possibly have extended either a little above the higher, or, less probably, a little below the lower, of those dates.

Fortunately, we have clearer information respecting the scene and the nature of his artistic labours. From motives which were variously stated by tradition, he removed from Lesbos to Sparta, and there introduced his new system of music, and established the first musical school or system (κοινωνία) which existed in Greece. (Plut. de Mus. 9, p. 1134, c.: the other authorities respecting the migration of Terpander, the powerful effect of his music on the Spartans, and the honour in which they held him, during his life and after his death, are collected by Plehn, Lesbicae, p. 147.)

In order to explain fully the musical improvements introduced by Terpander, it would be necessary to enter into the subject of Greek music at a greater length than is consistent with the limits of this article, or the plan of the work. A full account of the subject will be found in the Dictionary of Antiquities, art. Music, in Müller's History of the Literature of Ancient Greece, c. 12, and in Böckh (De Mtr. Pind. iii. 7). It will be enough here to state that Terpander enlarged the compass of the lyre from a tetrachord to an octave; but in a peculiar manner. The old lyre had four strings, which were so tuned that the extreme notes had to one another the relation called by the Greeks διὰ παραλλαγήν, the fourth, and the two intermediate notes were such, according to the most ancient genus of music, namely, the diatonic, and the prevailing mode, the Dorian, that the intervals were (ascending) semitone, tone, tone, that is:—

To this tetrachord Terpander added another, the lowest note of which was one tone above the highest of the other, and the intervals of which the same as those of the former, that is:—

But, in combining these two tetrachords, he omitted the third string, reckoning from the highest, so that the intervals (ascending) were 2, 1, 1, 1 ½, 1*, that is:—

* In Müller, two of these figures are transposed, p. 152, n. He gives the intervals (descending) 1, 1 ½, 1, 1, ½; they should be 1, 1 ½, 1, 1, ½; also in the l. 4, the deficient string is said to have been in the lower tetrachord; it should be the upper.
The interval between the extreme notes is an octave, or, as the Greeks called it, διὰ πασῶν. Pitarch (De Mus. 19) adduces arguments to prove that the omission of the third string was intentional; but whether the reason was, the opinion that it could be dispensed with, or some theoretical preference for the number 7, we are not informed. It was afterwards restored, so that the lyre had eight strings. The following table (from Plehn) shows the names of the strings, and the intervals between them, in the descending order, for each lyre: —

The invention of the seven-stringed lyre, or heptachord, is not only ascribed to Terpander by several ancient writers, but it is also referred to in two verses of his own still extant (Enul. Introduct. Hist. p. 19; Strab. xii. p. 618): —

Σολ 8 ἰμεῖς τετράγμηαν ἀποστερήσαντες αὐτῶν ἑπτάτην φόρμαν νέον κελαθοῦσαν βήμας.

It remained in use even as late as the time of Pindar (Pyth. i. 70, Nem. v. 22). The invention of the barbarion or megadion, an instrument of greater compass than an octave, is ascribed to Terpander by Pindar, but probably erroneously (Pind. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 633, d; Plehn, Lesb. p. 153). It is impossible here to enter on the question whether the lyre of Terpander could be adapted, by tuning its strings differently, to the different modes and genera of Greek music; and whether his own compositions were in any other mode than the Dorian. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Musica.)

While Terpander thus enlarged the compass of the lyre, he appears to have been the first who regularly set poetry to music. (Clem. Alex. Strom. vol. i. p. 364, b.) Pitarch (De Mus. 3) tells us that he set his own verses and those of Homer to certain citharode nomes, and sang them in the musical contests; and that he was the first who gave names to the various citharode nomes. These nomes were simple tunes, from which others could be derived by slight variations; and these latter were called μέση. That the names of Terpander were entirely of his own composition, is not very probable, and indeed there is evidence to prove that some of them were derived from old tunes, ascribed to the ancient bards, and others from national melodies. Neither were they all adapted to the rhythm of the heroic hexameter; for among them we find mention made of Trochaic nomes and of Orthian nomes, which consisted in a great extension of certain feet; and there is still extant a fragment of Terpander, which affords a good specimen of those Spondaic hymns which were sung at festivals of peculiar solemnity, and the music of which would of course be in keeping with the gravity of the rhythm and of the meaning (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 784):

Ζεύς, πάντων ἀρχή, πάντων ἅγιοι ταρ,
Zeuv, ois nymo xatavn ymwn orxan.

The question, whether any of Terpander's names were aulodic, cannot be decided with absolute certainty. Nearly all that we know of him is any connection with citharode music; and the arguments adduced to prove that he also used the flute are by no means conclusive; while, on the other hand, the improvement of that species of music is expressly ascribed to other composers, as Olympus and Clonas, who stand in much the same relation to aulodic music as Terpander does to that of the lyre. It is also uncertain whether his names were embodied in any written system of musical notation, or whether they were handed down by tradition in the school which he founded. Be this as it may, they remained for a very long period the standard melodies used at religious festivals, and the school of Terpander flourished for many generations at Sparta, and in Lesbos, and throughout Greece. At the festival of the Carneia, where Terpander had been the first to obtain a victory, the prize for lyre music was retained in regular succession by members of his school down to Pericleitus, about b. c. 550. Respecting the improvements in citharode music after the time of Terpander, see Thalitas.

The remains of Terpander's poetry, which no doubt consisted entirely of religious hymns, are comprised in the two fragments already quoted, and in two others, the one of one hexameter verse (Schol. Arist. Nub. 591), and the other of one and a half (Plut. Lyco. 21), and one reference. (Böckh, Plehn, and Müller, as above quoted; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Heilen Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 341, foll.; Bode, vol. ii. passim; Bergk, Poet. Lyr. Graec. pp. 537, 536.) [F. S.]

TERPNUS, was the most celebrated citharode of his time, and taught Nero to play and sing to the cithara. The master was wise enough to let his imperial pupil conquer him in the Grecian games. Terpnes continued to enjoy a great reputation under Vespasian. (Suet. Ner. 20; Dion Cass. xii. 8; Suet. Vesp. 19; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. v. 7.)

TERPSION (Terψίός), a Megarian, mentioned by Suidas, who was one of the disciples of Socrates. Plutarch also refers to him (de Gen.
TERTULLIANUS.

Sccr. p. 581, a.). It is doubtless this Terpion who is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Theaetetus.

Another person of this name is mentioned by Athenaeus (viii. p. 337) as the first author of a γαστρολογία, giving direction as to the viands from which it was advisable to abstain. A notable impromptu verse of his is recorded: "Ὣ χρή κελάδονς ἃ φαγεῖν ἢ μὴ φαγεῖν," which actually attained to the distinction of a various reading even in antiquity.

TERRA. [Tellus.]

T. TERRASIUS, his name appears in the best MSS. under the form Q. Septimius Florens Tertullianus, is the most ancient of the Latin fathers now extant. Notwithstanding the celebrity which he has always enjoyed, our knowledge of his personal history is extremely limited, and is derived almost exclusively from a succinct notice by St. Jerome.

From this we learn that Tertullian was a native of Carthage, the son of a proconsular centurion (an officer who appears to have acted as a sort of aide-de-camp to provincial governors); that he flourished chiefly during the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla; that he became a presbyter, and remained orthodox until he had reached the term of middle life, when, in consequence of the envy and ill-treatment which he experienced on the part of the Roman clergy, he went over to the Montanists, and wrote several books in defence of those heretics; that he lived to a great age, and was the author of many works.

Various editors and historians of ecclesiastical literature have endeavoured to extend or illustrate the scanty information conveyed in the above sketch.

1. Since the elevation of Septimius Severus took place in A.D. 193, and since Caracalla was slain in A.D. 217, if we suppose that Tertullian attained to the age of eighty, his birth would fall somewhere about A.D. 100, and his death about A.D. 240. Allix places his birth about 145 or 150, and his death about A.D. 220; but the period thus embraced would scarcely be sufficient to justify the statement of his biographer that he was believed to have attained to extreme old-age (usque ad decrepitum autatem vivisse fortur).

2. It has been inferred from certain expressions which occur in different treatises by Tertullian, that he was not born and educated in the true faith. Making every allowance for the rhetorical style to which he is so much addicted, the words in question seem upon the whole to warrant this interpretation, but nothing can be ascertained with regard to the period or the circumstances of his conversion. (Apolog. 18, de Poenit. 1, de Spectac. 19, de Resurrect. Carm. 59, de Fuga in Persec. 6, adv. Marc. iii. 21.)

3. There can be no doubt that he was married, for we find among his tracts an address to his wife, in two books, and it seems probable, from their tenor, that she was considerably younger than himself.

4. Some members of the Roman Church, disturbed by the example of a wedded priest, have maintained that he never was a presbyter, and appeal to two passages in which he certainly assumes the character of a layman (de Monag. 12, de Exhort. Cust. 7). But we are here again embarrassed by the abrupt transitions and bold personifications so common in this author, and it has been urged, with considerable force, that in the passages referred to he is led naturally, by the course of his argument, to speak as if he actually belonged to that class whose position he describes. It is perfectly true, on the other hand, that we might read through the works of Tertullian without discovering that he had ever been ordained; but neither this negative presumption nor the uncertain conclusions drawn from phrases of doubtful import can outweigh the positive testimony of Jerome, who had ample means of ascertaining the fact which he records, and no conceivable motive for suppressing or perverting the truth.

5. lt being admitted that he was a presbyter, another question arises as to the place where he exercised his functions, whether at Carthage or at Rome. Here we shall have much difficulty in forming a positive opinion. We should naturally conclude, in absence of all direct evidence to the contrary, that he remained in his native country, and we know that writers who flourished towards the close of the fourth century designate him as a Carthaginian presbyter (Optat. adv. Parmen. i.; Praseest. de Hoace. 36). On the other hand, it being certain that he visited Rome (de Cult. Fornam. 12, de Exhort. Cust. 7), we supposed that his clergy and the intimate knowledge which he frequently manifests with regard to the state of parties and the ecclesiastical proceedings in the metropolis, seem to indicate a lengthened residence and close personal observation. (Comp. Euseb. H. E. ii. 2.)

6. His defection from the Church, caused, according to Jerome, by the harsh and insulting conduct of the Roman clergy, has been ascribed by some persons in modern times to disappointment. They suppose that he had fixed his desires upon the bishopric of Rome or of Carthage, and that upon seeing others preferred to himself he seduced in disgust. It is unnecessary to enter into any lengthened investigation of this subject, for the views thus propounded are purely hypothetical, receiving no support or countenance from any trustworthy authority.

The classification of the works of this father is attended with much difficulty. Some have proposed to arrange them in regular chronological succession, but this scheme has proved altogether abortive; for very few of his writings offer any indications upon which we can even attempt to found a calculation, and in one case only can we determine the date with certainty. Others have thought it expedient to distribute them, according to the nature of the topics discussed, into Dogmatical, Pol. temical, and Moral, but many of the subjects are treated in such a manner as to render it impossible to assign them to any one of these divisions exclusively, and, when we consider that the opinions entertained by the author underwent material changes as he advanced in life, it is manifest that any arrangement which does not, to a certain extent, trace the gradual development of these new views, must be imperfect and unsatisfactory. Hence, theologians have now for the most part agreed merely to separate those tracts which were composed while Tertullian was still a member of the Church, from those which were composed after he became a Montanist. But even this plan, simple as it may appear, cannot be completely executed, for the doctrines of Montanus were, upon many points, strictly orthodox, and it was only when speaking of himself and the nature of his own mission that he became subject to the charge of extravagance and heresy. Thus, after we have set aside a few pieces which are stamped with broad and well-defined marks of heterodoxy, we shall find a considerable number in which the characteristics are faint and doubtful, and many more in which they are altogether wanting. Still the attempt ought to be made; and accordingly we shall pursue the method followed by the Bishop of Lincoln, the best, perhaps, which the circumstances of the case permit us to adopt. We shall place together:—I. Works probably written while he was yet a member of the Church. II. Works certainly written after he became a Montanist. III. Works probably written after he became a Montanist. IV. Works respecting which nothing certain can be pronounced. I. Works probably written while he was yet a member of the Church.—1. De Poenitentia. Chiefly remarkable because the author here advocates a doctrine which at a subsequent period, after he had embraced the errors of Montanus, he sternly impugned, namely, that those who committed heinous sins after baptism might, notwithstanding their guilt, obtain absolution from the Church, if sincerely penitent. In the first chapter, when defining penitence and pointing out the erroneous ideas entertained by the gentiles, he makes use of an expression which has been regarded as an avowal that he had at one time been a heathen, "Poenientiam, hoc genus hominum, quod et ipsi retro fuimus, caeci sine Domini lumine, natura tenus norunt," &c. Erasmus, in consequence of the elegance by which the style of this tract is distinguished, was led to doubt whether it really belonged to Tertullian, but it is quoted as his by Pacianus, a writer of the fourth century, and is now generally received as genuine.

2. De Oratiana. Consists of two parts:—a. An exposition of the Lord's Prayer, which is represented as containing an epitome of the whole Gospel. b. Instructions with respect to certain forms to be observed by Christians in their devotions. The latter portion terminates abruptly in the MSS., but some additional chapters were supplied by Muratori, by whom they were discovered in the Ambrosian library, and published in his Analecta. These are rejected by some critics, but admitted by others, among whom we may specially mention Neander.

3. De Baptismo. A certain Quintilla had been propagating at Carthage the heresy that baptism was neither imperative nor beneficial. Tertullian, in confuting this error, takes occasion—a. To examine fully into the nature and efficacy of this sacrament. b. To discuss certain questions touching the time at which it ought to be administered, and the forms to be observed. He calls his opponent a Caisite; and if we suppose that he uses the term literally, and not as a mere epithet of reproach, she must have belonged to that wild sect who looked up with peculiar reverence to Cain and those other characters in the Bible who had fallen under the heavy displeasure of the Almighty.

4. Ad Usoram Libri II. Advice to his wife, with regard to her conduct in the event of his deceasing her. In the first book he earnestly dissuades her from contracting a second marriage, maintaining that all such alliances are wrong in principle and inexpedient in practice. In the second, supposing that, notwithstanding his arguments to the contrary, she may feel inclined again to enter into wedlock, he urges upon her the necessity of uniting herself to a Christian and not to a heathen, pointing out that it was contrary to the express commands of God, and in itself impure, unnatural, and dangerous to form so close a connection with an alien from the faith.

5. Ad Martyres. An earnest exhortation to the brethren who were suffering persecution on account of their faith, to remain steadfast, in defiance of imprisonment, torture, or death itself, looking forward with eager anticipations to the glories and privileges reserved for those who won the crown of martyrdom.

6. De Patientia. A moral essay on the importance and utility of this virtue, conceived in a truly Christian spirit, and expressed, especially towards the conclusion, in very dignified and picturesque language.

7. Adversus Judaeos Liber. A public debate had been held between a Jewish proselyte and a Christian, each supporting the claims of the creed which he professed. The discussion having been carried on irregularly, and frequently interrupted by the clamours of the partisans on either side, Tertullian deemed this a fitting opportunity for presenting in a written form a succinct view of the real merits of the question. He undertakes to demonstrate two propositions—a. That the Mosaic dispensation had been abrogated by Christ. b. That the Jews themselves had long looked for the arrival of a Messiah, that the Messiah looked for by them had actually arrived, and that Christ was that Messiah. In support of the first he argues that since God had the power to enact, so he had the power to repeal the ritual law, and that it was consonant both with reason and revelation to believe that in the fulness of time he would substitute for it a code applicable, not to one particular people, but to the whole of mankind, thus fulfilling the promise made to our first parents and to Abraham. The second he proves by pointing out how exactly the character and career of Jesus corresponded with the predictions contained in the divinely inspired books of the Old Testament.

Neander has written a dissertation to prove that Tertullian broke off this work at the beginning of the ninth chapter, and that what follows is by a later hand, being taken, with some slight alterations, from the remarks upon the same text of Isaiah, in the third book against Marcion, remarks altogether inapplicable to the debate with the Jew. But the Bishop of Lincoln insists that the argument is with a few changes, strictly applicable, and that the necessary changes have actually been made.

8. De Prœscriptione Haereticorum, i.e. on the rules to be observed by Catholics in dealing with heretics. The subject is introduced by pointing out that the existence of heresy ought not to prove a source of wonder or of scandal to the orthodox, inasmuch as the appearance of false teachers had been predicted in the plainest terms by Christ himself, and since false doctrines might be regarded as valuable touchstones to test the purity of true belief. It is then laid down that all disputes or doubts on matters of faith or practice must be decided or solved by the judgment of some one of the churches planted by the Apostles. Thus those who dwelt in Southern Greece might, when difficulties arose, repair to Corinth, those in Macedonia to Philippi or Thessalonica, those in Asia to Ephesus, those in Italy to Rome. And here it is to be observed, that while Rome is represented as singularly happy in having enjoyed the instructions, and witnessed the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, and in having beheld the tortures inflicted or attempted to be inflicted on St. John the Evangelist, it is neither asserted nor implied that she possessed superior privileges or authority. There is some curious logic in the sections where the orthodox are forbidden to appeal to Scripture not merely in their controversies with the Gnostics, who were charged with mutilating and interpolating the sacred volume in order to force it into conformity with their own tenets, but in their discussions with all heretics whatsoever. Heretics, it is argued (see cc. 37, 38), have no right to make use of the Scriptures, because they are not Christians, and the Scriptures being the property of the Christians, none others can be permitted to employ them. It follows from this that heretics can be proved to be heretics without reference to the Bible at all, in other words that the authority of the Church must be held as superseding all private judgment, and that whomsoever she pronounces unsound must be held as such without question or inquiry. No provision however is made for settling any difference which might arise between two Churches, both of which were apostolic, and perhaps, indeed, such a contingency was regarded as impossible. The best MSS. give nothing beyond the end of the forty-fifth chapter. What follows is either altogether wanting, or appears as a separate piece, and is generally regarded as the production of a later hand.

II. Works certainly written after he became a Montanist. — 9. Adversus Marcionem Libri V. The leading tenet of the Pontic heretic was that there were two great principles or deities, the one perfect, the other imperfect. The latter was the creator of the world, the God of the Jews, the author of the Mosaic dispensation. The former was the father of Christ, whose mission was to destroy the old law. Marcion also maintained that the vision he daily dreamt, and the passion of our Lord were illusory, that he never really assumed human flesh, and never really suffered on the cross. In the first book of this refutation Tertullian asserts the Unity of God, and proves that the hypothesis of two Gods is directly opposed to reason and to all Scripture; in the second, it is demonstrated that the God of the Jews is the one true God, the author of all good; in the third, that Christ is the son of the Creator of the world, that his coming was predicted in the Law and the Prophets, that he assumed real flesh, and became a man like unto ourselves; in the fourth and fifth, the contradictions between the old and New Testaments brought forward in the "Antitheses" of Marcion are shown to be only apparent, while in fact the utmost harmony subsists between the different portions of the Bible. The propositions advanced in the fourth are supported chiefly by quotations from the Gospel of St. Luke, which Marcion is accused of having corrupted, but in the fifth book the Epistles of St. Paul are employed for the same purpose. We gather from internal evidence that the first book was written in the fifteenth year of Septimius Severus, that is, in A.D. 207, and that the author was at this time undoubtedly a Montanist. (See cc. 15, 29.)

10. De Anima. An inquiry into the nature of the soul; its origin; its excellence; its powers; its immortality; the period at which it enters into combination with the body; its progressive development; its susceptibility of sin; its condition after death; together with a dissertation on dreams and ecstasies which occupied a prominent position in the system of Montanus. This dissertation possesses peculiar interest from containing a statement and examination of the views entertained by the most distinguished heathen philosophers upon these topics, but some of the views propounded by Tertullian himself would seem to lead directly to materialism.

11. De Carne Christi. Marcion, Valentinian, and other heretics, denied that the body of Christ was composed of real human flesh and blood. Tertullian here demonstrates from reason and revelation the double nature of Jesus, who, without ceasing to be God, was a perfect man, born of woman, with limbs formed of flesh in a literal, not in a spiritual or ideal, sense. In order to establish more fully the humanity of the Messiah, it is maintained that the Mother of God ceased to be a virgin in giving birth to the Saviour, a doctrine more recently assailed by St. Jerome and the later fathers, and formally repudiated by the third canon of the Lateran Council, held under Pope Martin I. This piece was written after the De Praescriptione Hereticorum, which is referred to in chapter second, and after the fourth book against Marcion, which is referred to in chapter seven.

12. De Resurrectione Carnis. A confutation of the heresy which denied the resurrection of the body. A. The doctrine does not imply an imposibility, because God is omnipotent, and, having created all things out of nothing, he may either reproduce the flesh from nothing, supposing it to have utterly perished, or he may recall and reunite the scattered elements if they have entered into new combinations: B. The doctrine is not even improbable, if we take into account the high dignity of the flesh, which is established by the following considerations: a. It is the work of God. b. It was assumed by the Saviour. c. It is intimately connected with the soul, which cannot be saved until it has formed this connection. d. It is the medium or instrument through which salvation is communicated to the soul in the sacraments and other holy ordinances of the Church. C. The doctrine must be true, because it is most clearly enunciated in many texts of Scripture. The tract concludes with various speculations as to the manner in which the resurrection will take place, the absence of mutilation, disease, and deformity in the body when raised, and similar topics.

13. Adversus Praxeum. Praxeus was a heretic who held that God the Father had been incarnate, had been born of the Virgin, and had been crucified — in other words, that God the Father and TERTULLIANUS.

God the Son were identical. In addition, however, to these errors, Præaxes had excited the wrath of Tertullian by stirring up one of the bishops of Rome to prosecute the Montanists, the prelate in question having been, we are here assured, previously disposed to regard with favour the views entertained by the members of that sect, and to recognise its founder as a prophet. Neander believes that the pope here alluded to was Eleutherus,—according to Allix it was Victor. In consequence of the close correspondence between this piece and the work of Hippolytus, Contra Noetum, Semler has, without success, called in question its authenticity. For an account of this work of Hippolytus, see Vol. II. p. 492, a.

14. Scorp. This is a Greek word (σκορπιον) signifying an antidote against the poison of scorpions. The present piece is a defence of martyrs, intended to neutralise the venom of the Gnostics and Cælinites, who denied the necessity and efficacy of such sacrifices, and even accounted them sinful. It was evidently composed during a period of persecution, and later than the second book against Marcion. (See cc. 1, 4, 5; comp. Hieron, c. Vigilant. 3.)

15. De Corona Militis. On a great public festival chaplets (coronae) had been distributed to the troops. A soldier was seen carrying the one which he had received in his hand instead of having placed it on his head, and when his officer demanded the reason of this proceeding, he replied that he was a Christian. He was placed under arrest, and was awaiting in prison the punishment of his insubordination, when, in consequence of a question having arisen among the Christian community with regard to the propriety of the man's conduct, Tertullian composed this tract, in which he eloquently defends, and loudly commends, the deed, declaring that this conscientious believer would receive the glorious crown of a martyr in exchange for the impure crown which he had rejected. Neander imagines that the largess alluded to was bestowed upon the army after the victory of Severus over the Parthians, in which case we may assign this piece to a.d. 204.

16. De Virginibus Velandis. It was the practice in Africa for married women only to wear veils, while maidens appeared in public uncovered. The latter custom is here denounced as contrary to nature, contrary to the will of God, and contrary to the discipline of the Church as observed in other places. The position thus assumed is supported by eight arguments, which are urged with a degree of vehemence and heat somewhat disproportionate to the subject. The essay is, however, very interesting to the student of Tertullian's life and opinions, since it contains a more clear exposition of his views with regard to the Paraclete than we find in any other portion of his writings.

17. De Fuga in Persecutione. The stern and uncompromising Montanists not only forbade his followers to flee from persecution, but encouraged them to defy the heathens, and brave their wrath by an open and ostentatious profession of their religion. The Catholics, on the other hand, did not consider it unbecoming, under certain circumstances, to disguise their faith, or to purchase toleration, or, in cases of imminent danger, to seek for safety in flight. We are here presented with an excellent exou'sion of the beauty and holiness which graced the one course, and of the renegade cowardice evinced by the other.

18. De Exhortatione Castitatis Liber. Three degrees of purity are here distinguished. The first and highest consists in absolute restraint during the whole period of life, the second in continence from the time of baptism, the third and lowest in refraining from contracting a second marriage.

19. De Monogamia. May be considered as a supplement to the foregoing. It is declared that second marriages are not only inexpedient, but absolutely sinful, and that the permission to marry at all can only be regarded in the light of a concession to human weakness. There can be no doubt that this essay was composed after Tertullian had embraced the extreme views of Montanus, and it has been thought possible to discover the exact time at which it was written, for we are told in the third chapter that 160 years had elapsed since St. Paul addressed his epistle to the Corinthians. But the precise date of that epistle itself is still open to controversy, and we may moreover conclude that in this, as in similar passages, Tertullian speaks in round numbers.

20. De Jecundia. A defence of certain fasts and ascetic observances, the necessity of which was insisted on by the Montanists, and denied by the Catholics. In the first chapter we find a reference to the De Monogamia.

21. De Pudicitia. A controversy had arisen between the Montanists and the Catholics as to the powers possessed by the Church to admit to her communion, and grant absolution to those who, after baptism, had been guilty of a flagrant breach of chastity. The rigid followers of the Phrygian closed the gates of forgiveness against even the repentant sinner, the orthodox advocated the milder doctrine. Although Tertullian had formerly supported the latter, to a certain extent at least (see de Poenit., 7, comp. ad Martyr. I.), he here sternly supports the opinions of his new friends.

III. WORKS PROBABLY WRITTEN AFTER HE BECAME A MONASTIst.—22. Adversus Valentianos. An attack upon the fantastic mysticism and reveries of Valentius and his disciples [VALENTINUS]. It has been remarked that there is a very close resemblance, amounting in some cases to an identity of thought, and even of expression, between this work and the first book of Ireneaus on the same subject.

23. Ad Scapulam. A remonstrance addressed to Scapula, governor of Africa, who was bitterly assailing the Christians, urging upon his attention the injustice and danger of the course which he was pursuing, because some of his attacks were the most harmless and most loyal adherents of the emperor—dangerous, because God had already on many occasions manifested his wrath by punishing in this world those who persecuted his people. In the last section he particularly alludes to a portentous darkening of the sun, which took place during a public assembly at Utica, and this is by some commentators believed to have been the great eclipse of a.d. 210. The capture of Byzantium also is spoken of, which took place in a.d. 196.

24. De Spectaculis. Preparations on a great scale were in progress at Carthage for celebrating with all pomp certain public games. This tract is a solemn denunciation, addressed to all true believers, against taking any part in such exhibitions, which were invented by devils, and were calculated, to awaken and cherish feelings and passions altogether inconsistent with the Christian profession. Neander supposes that this and the following piece were called forth by the rejoicings at the termination of the civil war by the death of Niger (A. D. 194) and of Albinus (A. D. 197). Others believe that the preparations referred to were for the Secular Games, which commemorated the completion of the eighth great century of Rome (A. D. 204). This diversity of opinion upon such a point is in itself sufficient to prove that the historical allusions are of a vague and general character.

23. De Idolatria. Composed for the purpose of warning Christians that not those only were guilty of idolatry who actually offered sacrifice to false gods, but all who contributed in any way, directly or indirectly, to the support and diffusion of the popular religion by fabricating images, by assisting in the construction and decoration of temples, by consulting soothsayers and astrologers, by being present at heathen solemnities or festivities. In conclusion, it is asserted that no true believer can lawfully accept any public office, nor even serve as a soldier in the armies of the state.

26. De Cultu Feminarum Libri II. On the folly and sin displayed by women in devoting much time and anxious care to the decoration of that body which they ought to be willing and eager to sacrifice, at any moment, in the service of Christ.

IV. WORKS CONCERNING WHICH NOTHING CERTAIN CAN BE PRONOUNCED. — 27. Apologia. A formal defence of Christianity. Much difference of opinion has been expressed by the earlier ecclesiastical historians as to the time when and the place where this work was composed, as well as with regard to the persons to whom the appeal is made. It is now, however, generally admitted that it was written at Carthage, and that the "Præsidês," "Impéri Romani Antiætities" ("vo-bis...in aperto et in ipso vertice civitatis presidenti-bus") addressed, must have been the chief magistrates of the African province. The precise epoch at which it was drawn up is still a question open to discussion. We find clearly indicated a period of persecution against the church, of intestine discord in the state, and of attacks upon the dominion of Rome by various barbarous tribes, especially the Parthians, a series of conditions all of which were fulfilled by events which occurred during the reign of Severus; but here, as elsewhere in Tertullian, the historical allusions are couched in such general and vague terms, that it is impossible to fix with confidence on any one known event.

The Christians at the close of the second century were compelled to maintain a perilous struggle both with the government and the populace. By the former their rapidly increasing numbers were viewed with jealous apprehension; for not only did the multitudes who professed the new faith openly avow their contempt and abhorrence of the gods revered by the constituted authorities, and refuse to participate in any of their rites, even in the sacrifices offered up for the safety of the emperors, but the close correspondence, union, and organization which existed among all the members of the different churches induced the rulers to suspect that religion was, in this case, merely a convenient cloak employed to hide the intrigues of

31. Adversus Hermogenem. Hermogenes was an African, a painter by profession, who at one time had been an orthodox believer, but having fallen away from the faith now maintained, that God had not created the universe out of nothing, and agreed with the Stoics in the dogma that matter had existed from all eternity.

The merits of Tertullian as an author are of a very chequered character. He evidently was deeply imbued with all the learning of the age to which he belonged, and was familiar with the most celebrated poets, historians, jurists, orators, and philosophers of Greece and Rome. Nor, indeed, does he manifest any inclination to dissemble these accomplishments, for he perpetually calls to his aid illustrations and technicalities borrowed from every department of literature and science, dazzling us with a pompous array of opinions and authorities. But while it is impossible to question his erudition, no one can defend his style, which exhibits in a most repulsive form the worst faults of an ill-cultivated taste. It is in the highest degree rough, abrupt, and absurd, aboundings in far-fetched metaphors and extravagant hyperboles, while the language of his writings is altogether opposite, so that the most indulgent critic feels inclined to turn away in disgust from pages where he is perpetually shocked, startled, and perplexed. On the other hand, the extreme liveliness and fertility of his imagination, the piercing sharpness of his wit, the trenchant edge of his sarcasm, the impetuous force of his arguments, which bewilders and stuns even when they fail to convince, and the torrent flood of brilliant declamation in which his glowing conceptions are poured forth, at once excite, amuse, and overwhelm the reader.

His authority as a theologian has been variously estimated by ecclesiastical writers. While some appeal with confidence to his decision in all matters of controversy, not immediately connected with his peculiar views, others branding him with the title of a perverse heretic reject his testimony, upon all points alike, as altogether worthless. It seems absolutely necessary in this matter, if we would arrive at a fair and practical conclusion, to separate opinions from facts. The opinions of Tertullian, even when expressed at a period when his orthodoxy was beyond suspicion, bear such evident marks of an excitable temperament, and of rash impetuosity, combined with harsh and gloomy asceticism, that they ought to have been received with distrust, even if he had never become the advocate of gross errors; but when we remember the absurdities into which he was, at a subsequent period, actually betrayed, we must consider his judgment as disabled. At the same time, since we have not the slightest reason to suspect that he was ever guilty of wilful deception or misrepresentation, we may accept, without hesitation, the facts which he records. How large a mass of most curious and valuable information on the doctrine and discipline of the church in the second and third centuries may be collected from his works, will be at once seen by consulting the very able and elaborate analysis by the Bishop of Lincoln. The conduct of Cyrian is at once characteristic and instructive. It is recorded that he never allowed a day to pass without reading a portion of Tertullian, and that he was wont frequently to exclaim to his confidential attendants, "give me my master." But although the cautious prelate doubtless derived tizens. He concludes by replying to some assailants who were content to disparage Christianity by representing it as merely a new form of philosophy, whose doctrines were either borrowed from the speculations of others, or, when original, were less brilliant and impressive than those enforced by the older theologians. It is urged against this, in the first place, that the effect produced by Christianity upon the lives and characters of its votaries was of a description very different from and very superior to that which resulted from the discipline of any philosophic sect, and, in the second place, that those who looked upon Christianity in this light were bound, at least, to extend to it the same toleration which they granted to all other schools.

28. Ad Nationes Libri II. The apology is addressed specially to the Roman magistrates: these books appear to be intended to prove, in like manner, to the satisfaction of the heathen public in general, that the prejudices cherished towards the Christians were altogether groundless, and that the charges of immorality, vice, and unnatural cruelty, preferred against them by their enemies were absolutely false and calumnious. The second book which is devoted to an exposition of the absurdity of the popular theology, of the gods whom the vulgar worshipped, and of the rites which they celebrated, is from the nature of the subject, and from the number of curious facts which it records, particularly interesting, but is unfortunately in a very mutilated condition. Indeed from the numerous blanks and imperfections which occur throughout, and from the circumstance that many of the arguments employed are identical, both in substance, and frequently in words, with those introduced in the Apology, it has been conjectured that the latter ought to be regarded as the finished performance of which this treatise is merely a rough draught, never intended to form a separate or complete work.

29. De Testimoniis Animae. A development of the argument for the unity of God and the reality of a future state, derived from the innate perceptions and feelings of the soul. We find in the fifth chapter a reference to the Apology.

30. De Pallio. Tertullian having exchanged the ordinary garment, which he had hitherto worn in common with his fellow-citizens, for the Pallium, and having been ridiculed in consequence, here defends himself, by arguing that there is nothing unnatural nor unprecedented in a change of dress, and that the garb in question was peculiarly convenient and suitable for those who desired to avoid all vain display in the decoration of their person. But to what class of persons the Pallium properly belonged, whether it was the habit assumed by philosophers in general, or by Christians as a body, or by presbyters only, or by those who laid claim to peculiar sanctity and austerity, are questions to which no one has yet been able to make a satisfactory reply. According to the views entertained upon this point the date of the piece has been variously determined. Some would refer it to the time when the author first embraced Christianity, others to the epoch of his ordination as a priest, others to the period of his conversion to Montanism. Neander supposes that he assumed the peculiar dress of the ascetics upon the death of his wife, and imagines that Severus, Cæcilius and Geta, are indicated by the words "Præsentis imperii triplex virtus," an expression which has been differently interpreted by others.

great pleasure and profit from these studies, and although his style bears evident marks of this familiar intercourse, on no single occasion does he ever name Tertullian, or give a quotation from his works, a sure indication that although he found him an agreeable companion, he considered him as no safe guide for himself or others, and was by no means desirous to proclaim his intimacy with a personage of such doubtful reputation.

In addition to the list given above Tertullian was the author of several works, some of which had been lost even in the time of Jerome. The titles only of the following have been preserved, and some of them are doubtfull. 1. De Vestibus Aaron. 2. Ad Amicum Philosophum. 3. De Censu Animae. 4. De Spe fidelitum. 5. De Paradiso. 6. De Ecstasy. 7. De Animae Summisione. 8. De Superstitione Sacculi. 9. De Carne et Anim. 10. Adversus Apeliacous. (See De Carne Christi, c. 9). 11. De Incognitiss Nuptiarum. The following have sometimes been erroneously ascribed to Tertullian. 2. De Chis Judaicis, both of which belong to Novatianus. 3. De Haeresibus, frequently appended to the tract De Praescriptione Hereticorum. 4. De Definitionibus Fidei, together with several poems — Sodoma; De Ligno Vitea; De Judicio Domini; Carmen ad Senatorum; Adversus Marcionem Libri V. &c.

The Apologia was printed before any other work by Tertullian, having been published at Venice by Bernardino Benalius, fol. 1483.

The best editions are those of Pamcolius, fol. Antv. 1579, and, in an improved form, revised by Franciscus Junius, Franck. 1597; of Rigaltius tol. Lutet. 1634, improved by Priorius, fol. Lutet. 1664, 1675, fol. Venet. 1744; and of Seimler, concluded by Schutz, 6 vols. 8vo. Hal. 1707. Of these the most desirable is the Venice edition of 1744, although it unfortunately abounds with typographical errors.

TESTA, C. TREBATIUS, a contemporary of Cicero and of the scholars of Servius Sulpicius, was a pupil of Q. Cornelius Maximus (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 8 and 17; and Dig. 39. tit. 7. s. 6. § 1.) Cicero recommended Testa to C. Julius Caesar (ad Fam. vi. 5), during his proconsulship of Gallia, and in his letter to Caesar he spoke of him as an honest man, and as possessing a great knowledge of the jus Civil. (As to the expression "familiam duicit" in Cicero's Letter to Caesar, see the note of Zimmern, p. 296, n. 7: "quod familia duicit," means "quod praeципium est"). Trebatius had little taste for military matters, but still he kept with Caesar, and he wrote to Cicero and received from Cicero various letters while he was in Gaul (Cic. Ep. ad Fam. lib. vii.). It appears that Caesar offered him the pay of a tribune without requiring the discharge of the duties, and that Trebatius declined it. He did not accompany Caesar in his second British expedition, but he probably got a little inured to military service at last. Trebatius followed Caesar's party after the civil war broke out; and he wrote to Cicero to tell him that Caesar thought Cicero ought to join Caesar's side, or, if he would not do that, he ought to go to Greece and stay out of the war (Plutarch, Cicero, c. 37). Suetonius (Caesar, c. 73) tells an anecdote, that when all the senate approached Caesar, who was sitting in front of the temple of Venus Genetrix, with the decrees which conferred extraordinary honours on him, Trebatius advised Caesar to rise up to receive the senate, for which advice Caesar by his countenances showed his disapproval. Cicero dedicated to Trebatius his
TETRICUS. 1013

TETRICUS, if we can believe the concurring testimony of Pollio, Victor, and Eutropius, harassed and alarmed by the insolence and factious spirit of his troops, privately invited the new sovereign to relieve him from a load which he found intolerable, and betrayed his army to defeat at the great battle of Chalona. [Aurelianus.] It is certain that although Tetricus, along with his son, in the guise of captives, graced the triumph of the conqueror, he was immediately afterwards treated with the greatest distinction, appointed corrector of the whole of Italy, and even addressed by Aurelian as comrade, colleague, and imperator. Retiring subsequently into private life, he died at a very advanced age.

(Every circumstance connected with the history of Tetricus has been collected and arranged, with great industry and learning, by De Boze, in a dissertation contained in the Mémoires de l’Académie de Sciences et Belles Lettres, vol. xxvi. p. 504; see Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xxiii.; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxxv., Epit. xxxv.; Entrop. ix. 9; Zonar. xii. 27.)

COIN OF TETRICUS SENIOR.

TETRICUS, C. PESUVIUS PIVESUS, twenty-fourth on the list of Pollio, son of the preceding, although a child at the time of his father’s elevation, was forthwith proclaimed Caesar. Whether he subsequently received the title of Augustus is a matter of doubt, since the evidence afforded by medals, our surest guide in such matters, is in the present instance indistinct and contradictory. He shared the favour displayed towards his father by Aurelian, was treated with distinction by the princes who followed, and passed with credit through all the grades of Senatorial rank, transmitting his patrimony, undiminished, to his heirs. The house of the Tetrici, on the Caelian hill, was still in existence when Pollio wrote, and contained a picture in which Aurelian was represented in the act of investing the father and son with senatorial robes, receiving from them, in return, a sceptre and civic crown.

We have given, above, the names of these two personages as exhibited by Eckhel. The family designation Pesuvius or Pesuvius seems established, beyond a question, by coins and inscriptions, but we cannot so readily admit Pivesus, which Eckhel supposes to have been derived by the son from a mother Pivesa. In the first place, Pesuvius and

Pivesus, or their contractions, are never found together upon the same piece. Secondly, Pivesus, Pivesi, Pives, and Piv, appear only in the silver and small brass coins, all of which are of rude and inferior workmanship, while the gold, which are executed with care and skill, present uniformly C. Pves. Tetrivus, Caeas, and hence we are inclined to conclude that Pivesus was a mispronunciation, by barbarous lips, of Peneus, and had no real existence as a distinct name. (W. K.)

P. Tettius, one of the witnesses against Verres. (Cic. Ver. i. 28.)

2. Tettius Damio, in whose house Cicero took refuge in order to avoid the mob of Clodius. (Cic. Ad Att. iv. 3.)

3. Tettius Julianus, in some passages of Tacitus is called Tivius, in others Tettius, but Tettius is probably the correct form. (ORELLI, Ad Tac. Hist. ii. 85.) He was the commander of one of the three legions stationed in Moesia, and along with his fellow-commanders received the consular insignia from Otho, in consequence of a victory which they gained over the Rhoxolani, a Sarmatian tribe. Shortly afterwards, Aponius Saturninus, the governor of Moesia, made an attempt upon the life of Tettius, who escaped across Mount Haemus. He took no part in the civil war, although the legion, which he commanded, espoused the cause of Vespasian, and pleaded various delays which prevented him from joining his troops. On the triumph of the party of Vespasian, he was, notwithstanding, appointed one of the praetors; but the senate would not allow him to enter upon the dignity, and conferred his office upon Plotius Griphus, on the 1st of January, A. D. 70. Demitian, however, almost immediately afterwards, restored him to the praetorship. (TAC. HIST. i. 79, ii. 85, iv. 39, 40.)

TEUCER (Téuκερ). 1. A son of the river-god Scamander by the nymph Idaea, was the first king of Troy, whence the Trojans are sometimes called Teuopolis. (HEROD. vii. 122.) Dardanus of Samothrace came to Teucer, received his daughter Dateia or Arisbe in marriage, and afterwards became his successor in the kingdom. (APOLLOD. iii. 12 § 1; DIOD. iv. 75.) According to others, Dardanus was a native prince of Troy, and Scamander and Teucer immigrated into Troas from Crete, bringing with them the worship of Apollo Smintheus. (STRAB. xiii. 604; SERV. AD AEN. iii. 108; TAC. AD LYCOPI. 29, 1302, 1306.)

2. A son of Telamon and Hesione, of Crete, was a step-brother of Ajax, and the best archer among the Greeks at Troy. (Hom. Il. viii. 281, &c., xiii. 170.) On his return from the Trojan war, Telamon refused to receive him in Salamis, because he had not avenged the death of his brother Ajax, or because he had not brought with him his remains, Tecnessa, or his son Eurybykes. Teucer, therefore, in consequence of a promise of Apollo, sailed away in search of a new home. This he found in the island of Cyprus, which was given to him by Belus, king of Sidon. (SERV. AD AEN. i. 619.) He there married Eune, the daughter of Cyprus, by whom he became the father of Asteria, and founded the town of Salamis. (TAC. AD LYCOPI. 447, 450; PIND. NEA. iv. 60; AESCHYL. PERS. 896; EURIP. HELEN. 97, &c., 146, &c.; PLAUT. II. 29 § 4; HORN. CARM. i. 7 § 21.)

TEUCER, artists. 1. A distinguished silversmith, in the last in Pliny's list of the coelatores who flourished at Rome in the last age of the republic. Pliny mentions him in the following terms, Habuit et Teucer crustatium famam. (H. N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55.)

2. A gem-engraver, three of whose works are extant, and, by their beautiful execution, are thought to prove that the artist could not have lived later than the time of Augustus. He may therefore, perhaps, be the same as the foregoing. (SILLIO, Cod. Art. s. n. R. ROCHEF. LETTRE À M. SCHOLU, p. 156, 2d ed.)

TEUSI'ALES, supposed artist. [ZEUXLADIES.]

TEUTA (Thē'ta), wife of Agron, king of the Illyrians, assumed the sovereign power on the death of her husband, A. C. 231. Elated by the successes recently obtained by the Illyrian arms [AGRON], she gave free scope to the piratical expeditions of her subjects, while she herself fitted out an armament which attacked the coast of Epeirus, with Scerdilai'das, with an army of 5000 men, invaded that country by land, and reduced the wealthy city of Phoenice. An invasion of the Dardanians soon compelled her to recall her forces; but she had meanwhile provoked a more dangerous enemy. The injuries inflicted by the Illyrian pirates upon the Italian merchants had at length attracted the attention of the Roman senate, who sent two ambassadors, C. and L. Cornelianus, to demand satisfaction. But the haggard language of these deputies gave such offence to the Illyrian queen, that she could not possibly be made to comply with their demands, but caused the younger of the two brothers to be assassinated on his way home. (POLYB. ii. 4, 6, 8; DION. CASS. FR. 151; ZONAE. viii. 19; PLIN. H. N. XXXIV. 6; LIV. EPIT. xx.) This fragrant breach of the law of nations led to an immediate declaration of war on the part of the Romans, who sent both the consuls, CN. Fulvius and A. Postumius, with a fleet and army, to punish the Illyrian queen. Meanwhile Teuta, who was herself engaged in the siege of Issa, had early in the spring (B. C. 229) sent out a large force under Demetrius the Pharian, who made himself master of the island of Corcyra, and laid siege to Epidamus. On the arrival of the Roman fleet, however, Demetrius treacherously surrendered Corcyra into their hands, and sent every assistance to the further operations of the two consuls. These were so rapid and decisive that the greater part of Illyria quickly fell into their hands, and Teuta herself was compelled to fly for refuge to the strong fortress of Rhizon. From hence she made overtures for peace, which she at length obtained from the Roman consul, A. Postumius, in the spring of B. C. 228, on condition of giving up the greater part of her dominions, and restraining her subjects from all voyages beyond the island of Lissus. By this treaty she appears to have retained the nominal sovereignty of a small territory, while her stepson Pinnes obtained the greater part of her kingdom; but we do not again meet with her name, and it is probable that she soon after abdicated this small remnant of power. (POLYB. ii. 9—12; DION. CASS. FR. 151; ZONAE. viii. 19; APPIAN. ILIIR. 7.)

TEUTOMALIUS.

Argyrespis in Cilicia, Antigens and Teutamus at first, in obedience to the orders of the regent and Olympia, placed themselves under his command, but they secretly regarded him with jealousy, and Teutamus even listened to the overtures of Ptolemy, and would have joined in a plot against the life of Eumenes, had he not been dissuaded by his more prudent colleague. (Diod. xviii. 59, 62; Plut. Eum. 13.) But though they continued to follow the guidance of Eumenes, and with the troops under their command, bore an important part in his campaigns against Antigonus, they took every opportunity of displaying their envy and jealousy of him, which continued throughout his life, by avoiding all appearance of the exercise of authority. [EUMENES, p. 89, a.] During the winter campaign in Gabiene (B. c. 316) the two leaders of the Argyrespis were the prime movers of a plot for the destruction of Eumenes; and after the final action, Teutamus was the first to open negotiations with Antigonus for the recovery of the baggage of the Argyrespis by the betrayal of his rival into his hands. (Plut. Eum. 13, 16, 17.) By this act of treachery he probably hoped to secure the favour of Antigonus, as well as to supplant his own colleague or leader, Antigens; but we find no further mention of his name, and it is probable that he was sent, with the greater part of the Argyrespis, to perish in Arachusia. (Diod. xiii. 48.)

TEUTAMIAS (Teuatulas), a king of Larissa in Thessalia, and father of the Pelasgic Lethes. (Apollod. ii. 4; Hom. ii. 845; Diod. lycop. 483.)

[LI. S.]

TEITAPARUS (Teitarops), the original owner of the bow which was used by Hercules. (Lycoph. Cass. 55; Tzet. lycop. 50, 455.)

[LI. S.]

TEUTHRAS (Teophras). 1. An ancient king of Mysia, who received Auge, the daughter of Alus, and brought up her son Telephus. From him the town of Teuthrania in Mysia was believed to have received its name. (Apollod. ii. 7, 4; Paus. viii. 4; Strab. xii. p. 571.) [TELEPHRAS].

2. A Greek of Magnesia, who was slain by Hector at Troy. (Hom. II. v. 705.)

3. An Athenian, who was believed to have founded Teuthrania in Lacedaemon. (Paus. ii. 25. § 3.)

[LI. S.]

TEUTIAPLUS (Teuianop), an Elean, was one of the leaders of the Peloponnesian fleet which was sent under Alcidas, the Laecademonian, as admiral, to support Mytilene in its revolt from Athens, in B. C. 427. The Mytilenaeans, however, had surrendered to Paches before the friendly armament reached the coast of Asia, and Teutiaplus then endeavoured, but without success, to persuade Alcidas to attempt the recovery of the island by a sudden attack. (Thuc. iii. 16, 29, 30.) [E. E.]

TEUTICUS, an Ilyrian nobleman, whom Gentius sent as ambassador to the Roman praetor, in B. C. 168, to beg for a truce. (Liv. xiv. 31.)

TEUTOBODUS, king of the Teutoni, when they were defeated by Marius at the great battle of Aquo Sextiae, in B. C. 102 [MARIUS, p. 935, b.]. According to some authorities Teutobodus was killed in the battle; according to others, he was taken prisoner and adorned the triumph of Marius. (Oros. v. 16; Eutrop. v. 1; Florus. iii. 3. § 10.)

TEUTOMA/LIUS, king of the Saluvii, took refuge among the Allobroges, after the conquest of his own people by the Romans, in B. C. 122. (Livy. Epit. 61.)

THAIS (Thais), a celebrated Athenian Hetaera, who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia, or at least was present on various occasions during that period. Her name is best known from the story of her having stimulated the conqueror during a great festival at Persepolis, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings; but this anecdote, immortalized as it has been by Dryden's famous ode, appears to rest on the sole authority of Cleitarchus, one of the least trustworthy of the historians of Alexander, and is, in all probability, a mere fabrication. (Cleit. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 576, e.; Diod. xvii. 72; Plut. Alex. 38; Curt. v. 7. §§ 3—7; Droysen, Gesch. Alex. p. 247, note.)

After the death of Alexander, Thais attached herself to Ptolemy Lagi, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Leoniscus and Lagus, and of a daughter, Eirene. The statement of Atheneaenus that she was actually married to the Egyptian king may be doubted, but he seems to have been warmly attached to her, and brought up their common children in almost princely style. (Athen. xiii. p. 576, e.) Many anecdotes are recorded of her wit and readiness in repartee, for which she seems to have been as distinguished as for her beauty. (Id. ò. p. 585.)

THA/LAMUS, P. LUCRINIUS, P. L., an artist, whose name appears on a Latin inscription, with the designation L. CORNITIUS FABER, which has been identified as the name of a sculptor of Corinthian vases. (Gruter. d. cexxix. 8; Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. cxxixii.; Oratti, Inscr. Lat. Sol. No. 4181; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 414, 2d ed.)

THALASSA (Thais), a personification of the Mediterranean, is described as a daughter of Aether and Hemera. (Hygin. Fab. Praef. p. 2; Lucian, Dial. D. Marin. 11.)

THALASSAI, TALA/SIUS, or TALA/SIO (Thais), a Roman senator of the time of Romulus. At the time of the rape of the Sabine women, when a maiden of surpassing beauty was led away for Thalassai, the persious conducting her, in order to protect her against any assaults from others, exclaimed "for Thalassai." Hence, it is said, arose the wedding shout with which a bride at Rome was conducted to the house of her bridegroom. (Liv. i. 9; Serv. ad Aen. l. 651; Catull. 61, 134.) Others connect the name with the Greek θαλασσα (spinning of wool), expressing the chief occupation of a newly married woman (Fest. p. 351, ed. Müller; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 31, Romul. 15) or regard it as the name of the god presiding over marriage. (Dionys. ii. 31; Martial, xii. 42. 4, iii. 93. 23.)

THAL/ASSIUS. 1. Praefectus Praetorio of the East, under Constantius II., possessed great influence with this emperor. He had previously enjoyed the title of Comes, and as such was sent by Constantius on an embassy to his brother Consants at Petobio in Pannonia, in a. d. 348 (Athanasius, Apol. ad Constant. initii.). As praefect of the East he did all in his power to excite the hatred of Atilius and Galla Placidia against his name Constantius against him. Thalassius died in a. d. 353, and was succeeded by Domitian (Amm. Marc. xiv. 1, 7; Zosim. ii. 48). Godefroy maintains that Thalassius could not have died earlier than a. d. 357.
THALELEAUS.

because he is said to have been at the conference at Sirnium, which is usually placed in this year, and because the name of Thallassius, praefectus praetorio, occurs in a law dated A.D. 357. But Tillemont has shown that the conference at Sirnium ought probably to be referred to the year 351; and as Ammianus expressly places the death of Thallassius in A.D. 353, the Thallassius mentioned in the law may have been praefectus praetorio of Illyricum. The matter is discussed by Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. note xxix. sur Constance.

This Thallassius appears to have written some work on the history of his own times, as Suidas (s. v. Θεοφιλας) quotes his testimony respecting his contemporary Theophilus.

2. A monk, lived in the deserts of Libya, about A.D. 662. There are extant four hecatontades of Thalassius addressed to the presbyter Paulus, and entitled Προ θιεν μνημείων καὶ εὐγενείων καὶ τίς καθ

De caritatis, vitae continens et mentis regimen, which are printed in all the Bibliothecae Patrum. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 113, 114.)

THALEIA or THALIA (Θαλεία, Θαλία). 1. One of the nine Muses, and, at least in later times, regarded as the Muse of Comedy. (Hes. Theog. 77.) She became the mother of the Corybantes by Apollo. (Apollod. i. 3. § 4; Plut. Sympos. ix. 14.)

3. A daughter of Hephaestus, and by Zeus, the mother of the Paliç. (Serv. ad Aen. ix. 584; Steph. Byz. s. v. παλίς.)

4. One of the Charities. (Hes. Theog. 909; Apollod. i. 1. § 3; Pau. xiii. 35. § 1.) [L. S.]

THALLEAUS (Θαλλεαος), a jurist, lived in the time of Justinian, and was a professor of law, and went by the name Constantinople, though there is no evidence for that. He is mentioned among the Antecessors, to whom the Constitution Osmun, &c. is addressed; but he was not employed by Tribonian and others upon the compilation of any of Justinian's law books. Thalleanus had a high reputation: he was called the "eye of jurisprudence," (τίς νομικής διάθηκαί), His great work was a Greek commentary on the Code of Justinian, which was divided into three parts. The first and most extensive part is a kind of introduction to a knowledge of the text of the Code, which is properly called το Πεποίθ, a name sometimes given, but perhaps incorrectly, to the whole commentary. The second part consisted of a literal Greek version (καθα πεποίθας) of the constitutions which existed in Latin in the Code, or of an extract only from those which had been copied in Greek into the same collection. The third part consists of observations on the Latin Constitution.

The commentary of Thalleanus is the most important of all that has been written upon the constitutions contained in the Code. He was not satisfied with taking the constitutions as they appear in the Code, but he consulted the texts of the original constitutions; for instance, he gives the constitution I. (Cod. 2. tit. 9) 10, De Errorre Advocat.) more complete than it is in the Corpus Juris; and upon Constit. I. (Cod. 2. tit. 9. De Advoc. Fisci), he quotes a text of Paulus, which is found nowhere else. This commentary was first published in Meerman's Thesaurus, iii. and v., and since by Heimbach, Basil. i. 322—424.

It is sometimes said that Thalleanus wrote a commentary on the Novellae, but this notion is only founded on a mistake of a copyist, who in a scholiom of the Basilica on Nov. 115. c. 5. § 1, has written Thalleanus for Theodorus. There appears also to be no ground for the opinion that Thalleanus translated the Pandect, or that he wrote a commentary on it. (Morteuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, vol. i.) [G. L.]

THALLEAUS (Θαλλεαος) or THALLEAUS (Θαλλεαος), Saint, a physician, who was born near Mount Lebanon in Phoenicia of Christian parents, and received his medical education from a physician named Macarius, who had attained the dignity of Archiater. He displayed on all occasions great zeal in favour of Christianity, and acquired considerable reputation by his medical skill, so that some of his cures were said to be miraculously performed. He attended on the heathen with as much care as on Christians, and was particularly charitable towards the poor. During the persecution carried on against the Christians in the short reign of the emperors Carinus and Numerianus, Thalleanus was seized by Tiberius the governor of Edessa in Mesopotamia, from whose hands he is said to have been miraculously delivered. He was afterwards taken before Theodorus, the governor of Aegae in Cilicia, by whom he was exposed to various tortures, and at last put to death, A.D. 284. His constancy and his wonderful deliverances converted several of the bystanders, and among the rest his former tutor Macarius. His memory is celebrated by the Romish Church on May 26. (Acta Sanctorum, May 20. vol. v. p. 178.) [W. A. G.]

THALES (Θαλής), the Ionian philosopher, was born at Miletus in the 35th Olympiad, according to Apollodorus (Diog. Laërt. i. 37). He is said (Herod. i. 74) to have predicted the eclipse of the sun, which happened in the reign of the Lydian king Alyattes (according to Oltmann's calculations, in the Abhandl. der Königl. Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin, 1812, 1813, in the year b. c. 609), and under Croesus to have managed the diversion of the course of the Halys (Herod. i. 75), and later, in order to unite and strengthen the Ionians when threatened by the Persians, to have instituted a federal council in Teos (1b. 170). These statements, and the mention of Thales in the books of Xenophon and Herocleitus (Diog. Laërt. i. 33) accord very well with the reckoning of Apollodorus, which may have been founded on the statement of Demetrius Phalerus, that Thales received the appellation of the Sage in the time of the Athenian archon Damasius (Diog. Laërt. i. 22). They confirm at the same time the statements respecting the long duration of his life, which extended to 78, or even 99 years (Diog. Laërt. i. 38). In the stories of the seven sages his name seems to have stood at the head (Diog. Laërt. i. 41, xc. 22; comp. Cic. Acad. i. 37), and, as his wisdom is said to have shown itself in political sagacity, so also it manifested itself in prudence in acquiring wealth (Arist. Eth. Nic. i. 1, comp. Diog. Laërt. i. 26). And, generally speaking, the above honourable designation which was given to those seven men, denoted, not scientific inquirers, but men of sound understanding, and famed for their legislative talents, as Diogenes Laërtius had already remarked (Diog. Laërt. i. 10; Cic. Nat. Deor. 2; Plin. Nat. 3). Nevertheless Thales has been attributed to Thales, who is also brought forward as the originator of philosophy and mathematics (ἦργασις τῆς φιλοσοφίας, Arist. Metaph. i. 3; Diog. Laërt. i. 28, &c.; Apul. Flor. c. iv. p. 38, Beroead), and with good reason, if he first conceived himself of the necessity of scientific proof, and attempted it in philosophy and mathematics. In the latter science we find attributed to him only proofs of propositions which belong to the first elements of geometry, and could not possibly have put him in a position to calculate the eclipses of the sun, and the course of the heavenly bodies. Nevertheless, that careful inquirer, Eudemus of Rhodes, had attributed to him both these calculations and those proofs (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Procl. in Euclid. i. p. x. 17, 19, 44, 67, 73, 92). It is possible that communications from the East, where greater progress had been made in astronomy, came to the help of the Milesian. The Periatic Hieraenous had already, according to Thales, who was devoted to mathematical pursuits (Diog. Laërt. i. 27; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 18). Others had contributed to his journeys to Crete and Asia (Diog. Laërt. i. 47. 24. ib. Menag.). In his dogma that water is the origin of things, that is, that it is that out of which every thing arises, and into which every thing resolves itself, Thales may have followed Orphic cosmogonies (Arist. l. c.; Justin Martyr, Coh. ad Gr. p. 7, Paris; Plut. Plaut. i. 3, &c.; comp. Ch. A. Brandis, Handbuch der griechisch-römischen Philosophie, l. p. 65, &c.), while, unlike them, he seems to have sought the truth of the assertion. Hence, Aristotle, immediately after he has called him the originator of philosophy, brings forward the reason why Thales was believed to have adduced in confirmation of that assertion; for that no written development of it, or indeed any book by Thales, was extant, is proved by the expressions which Aristotle uses when he brings forward the doctrines and proofs of the Milesian (Iowes, l. c., de Anim. i. 5; σοφία, de Caelo, ii. 13), nay, even in connection with the above-mentioned story (Polit. i. 11; comp. Plat. Theocrit. 174, λέγεται). In other ways, also, it is established that Thales left behind him nothing in a written form (Diog. Laërt. i. 23; Themist. Orat. xxvi. 317, Hard.; Simpl. in Arist. de An. l. 8); a metrical work on astronomy, attributed to him, was regarded even in antiquity as the production of a Samian of the name of Phocas (Diog. Laërt. i. 29). Verses in which Thaletic doctrines and expressions were embodied (Diog. Laërt. i. 24; Plut. de Pyth. Orat. p. 402, e) belonged to some other person, and so do the various attributing commentaries (ἀπομνημονεύεται) to him or his school, is an error into which Joannes Philoponus has been led merely by the words of Aristotle which he explains (ἐκ δὲ ἀπομνημονεύεσθαι, de Anim. i. 2). Still, we can as little assume that Aristotle attributed the doctrines and their proofs to Thales from mere conjecture; he attatches much too decided an importance to them for that. Besides, Theophrastus seems to have repeated and somewhat modified them; and Eudemus had distinctly stated the mathematical propositions, for which Thales adduced proofs. That the fruit and seeds of things are moist, and that warmth is developed out of moisture, are the reasons which Aristotle regards as those which may have led Thales to the assertion that water is the origin of things. Sim-plague, and composed the fictions of the citizens, who were at enmity with each other. (Paus. l. c.; Plut. Lycurg. 4; Sophocles, ap. Strab. x. p. 480, 482; Sext. Empir. adv. Rhet. ii. p. 292; Fabric.; Aelian. V. H. xii. 50.) At Sparta he became the head of a new school (κατάστασις) of music, which appears never afterwards to have been supplanted, and the influence of which was maintained also by Xenodamus of Cythera, Xenocritus of Locris, Polymnestus of Colophon, and Sacadas of Argos. (Plut. de Mus. l. c.) These matters will be examined more fully presently; but the brief outline just given is necessary for the understanding of the chronological investigation which follows.

In studying the history of Greek lyric poetry, nothing would be more desirable, if it were possible, than to fix the precise dates of the musicians and poets who contributed to its development; that so we might trace the steps of its progress, in relation to the time they occupied, the social state of the people amongst whom they were made, and the order in which they followed from one another. It must, however, be confessed that, after all the labour which scholars have bestowed on the subject, there is an uncertainty, generally to the extent of half a century, and in some cases more, respecting the dates of the earliest poets, while the more important point of their relative order of succession and their distance from each other in time is beset with great difficulties. These remarks apply most strongly to Thaletas, the various dates assigned to whom, by ancient and modern writers, range over a period from before the time of Homer down to the year B. C. 629.

Homer, it is well known, was the first of the ancient traditions followed by the generality of the ancient writers respecting the date of Thaletas, is manifest from the statements of Suidas, that he lived before the time of Homer, of Demetrius Magnes (ap. Diog. Laërt. i. 38), that he was "very ancient, about the time of Hesiod and Homer and Lycurgus," and of many other writers, who make him contemporary with Lycurgus, and even an elder contemporary. In nearly all the accounts, above referred to, of the removal of Thaletas to Sparta, he is said to have gone thither at the invitation of Lycurgus, who used his influence to prepare the minds of the people for his own laws; while some even speak of him as if he were a legislator, from whom Lycurgus derived some of his laws. (Sext. Empir. l. c.; Arist. Polit. ii. 9, § 5, ii. 12.) These accounts, which Aristotle (l. c.) condemns as anachronisms, can easily be explained. The influence of music upon character and manners was in the opinion of the ancients so great, that it was quite natural to speak of Terpander and Thaletas as fellow-workers with the great legislator of the Spartans in forming the character of the people; and then such statements were interpreted by later writers in a chronological sense; for similar traditions are recorded of Terpander as well as of Thaletas. [Terpander.]

Moreover, in the case of Thaletas, the supposed connection with Lycurgus would assume a more probable appearance on account of his coming from Crete, from whence also Lycurgus was supposed to have derived so many of his institutions; and this is, in fact, the specific form which the tradition assumed (Ephor. ap. Strab. x. p. 482; Plut. Lycurg. 4), namely, that Lycurgus, arriving at Crete in the course of his travels, there met with Thaletas, who was one of the men renowned in the island for wisdom and political abilities (ένα τῶν νομολογόμενων ἐκεί σοφῶν καὶ πολιτιστῶν), and who, while professing to be a lyric poet, used his art as a pretext, but in fact devoted himself to political science in the same way as the ablest of legislators (ποιητὴν μὲν δοκοῦσα λυρικῶν μελῶν καὶ πράσμα μή τίνες ταύτης πνευμόνων, ἐγὼ δὲ ἠδρί τῶν κρατοῦσι τῶν νομοθετῶν διαπράττομεν). Add to this the great probability that later writers mistook the sense of the word νόμος in the ancient accounts of Thaletas; and his association with Lycurgus is explained. It is not worth while to discuss the statement of Jerome (Chron. s. ch. 266, p. 750), who says that Thales of Miletos (probable meaning Thales of Crete, for the philosopher's age is well known) lived in the reign of Romulus. Perhaps this may only be another form of the tradition which made him contemporary with Lycurgus.

The strictly historical evidence respecting the date of Thaletas is contained in three testimonies. First, the statement of Glaucus, one of the highest authorities on the subject, that he was later than Archilochos. (Plut. de Mus. 10, p. 1134, d. e.) Secondly, the fact recorded by Pausanias (i. 14, § 4), that Polymnestus composed verses in his praise for the Lacedaemonians, whence it is probable that he was an elder contemporary of Polymnestus, and therefore older than Alcman, by whom Polymnestus was mentioned. (Plut. de Mus. 5, p. 1133, a.) Thirdly, in his account of the second school or system (κατάστασις) of music at Sparta, Plutarch tells us (de Mus. 9, p. 1134, c.) that the banishment of Terpander was of the second the following the bad claim to be considered as the leaders (μαλιστα αὐτίων ἔχον ἐνεργοῖς γένεσιν), Thaletas, Xenodamus, Xenocris, Polymnestus, and Sacadas; and that to them was ascribed the origin of the Gymnosophists in Lacedaemon, of the Apodeixis in Arcadia, and of the Eunymatia in Argos. This important testimony is very probably derived from the work of Glaucus. Lastly, Plutarch (de Mus. 10, p. 1134, e.) mentions a vague tradition, which is on the face of it improbable, and which is quite unworthy to be placed, and which is of the side of the other three, that Thaletas derived the rhythm called Maron and the Cretic rhythm from the music of the Phrygian flute-player Olympus (ἐκ τοῦ τοῦ Ολύμπου ἀνθρώπων ὀλυμπίου Θελίτων φαὶνει προς Γορών τύπως τοῦτο), the context shows that Plutarch here deserts his guide, Glaucus, and sets up against him the traditions of other writers, we know not whom.)

Now, from these Mus. 5, p. 1133, a., we obtain the results, that Thaletas was younger than Archilochos and Terpander, but older than Polymnestus and Alcman, that he was the first of the poets of the second Spartan school of music, by whose influence the great Dorian festivals which have been mentioned were either established, or, what is the more probable meaning, were systematically arranged in respect of the choruses which were performed at them.

These conditions would all be satisfied by supposing that Thaletas began to flourish early in the seventh century B. C., provided that we accept the argument for an earlier date of Terpander than that usually assigned to him [Terpander]. To escape from the difficulty as Clinton does (F. H. vol. 1. s. a. 644), by making Terpander later than THEALES.

Thales is altogether inadmissible; for, if we reject Plutarch’s account of the two musical schools at Sparta, the first founded by Terpander, and the second by Thales, the whole matter is thrown into hopeless confusion. Such a mistake, made by so eminent a chronicler, through following implicitly Eusebius and the Parian marble, is an excellent example of the danger of trusting to the positive statements of the chronographers in opposition to a connected chain of inference from more detailed testimonies. On the other hand, Müller, while pointing out Clinton’s error, appears to us to place Thales much too low, in consequence of accepting the tradition recorded by Plutarch respecting Olympus, whom also he places later than Terpander (Hist. Lit. vol. i. pp. 158, 159). The fact is that we have no sufficient data for the time of Olympus; and even if we had, the tradition recorded by Plutarch is much too doubtful to be set up against the evidence derived from the relations of Thales to Archilochus and Alcamen. When Müller says that Clinton “does not allow sufficient weight to the far more artificial character of the music and rhythms of Thales” (i.e. than those of Terpander), he seems to imply that a long time must necessarily have intervened between the two. Not only is there no ground for this idea, but it is opposed to analogy. There is no ground for it; for it is clear from all accounts that the second system of music was not gradually developed out of the first, by successive improvements, but was formed by the addition of new elements derived from other quarters, of which the first and chief were those introduced by Thales from Crete. It is also opposed to analogy, which teaches us that the period of most rapid improvement in any art is that in which it is first brought under the dominion of definite laws, by some great genius, whose first efforts are the signal for the appearance of a host of rivals, imitators, and pupils. Moreover, if there be any truth in the tradition, it would seem probable that Terpander and Thales were led to Sparta by very similar causes at no very distant period; and it seems most improbable that, after music had attained the degree of development to which Terpander brought it at Sparta, the important additional elements, which existed in the Cretan system, should not have been introduced for a period of forty years, which is the interval placed by Müller between Terpander and Thales. Müller’s mode of computing backwards the date of Thales from that of Socrates (b.c. 590) is altogether arbitrary; but if such a method were allowable at all, surely thirty years is far too short a time to assign as the period during which the second school of Spartan music chiefly flourished. On the whole, decidedly as Clinton is wrong as to Terpander, he is probably near the mark in fixing the period of Thales at b.c. 690 — 660; though it might be better to say that he seems to have flourished about b.c. 670 or 660, and how much before or after those dates cannot be determined. It appears not unlikely that he was already distinguished in Crete, while Terpander flourished at Sparta.

The improvement in effect, in music by Thales appears to have consisted in the introduction into Sparta of that species of music and poetry which was associated with the religious rites of his native country; in which the calm and solemn worship of Apollo prevailed side by side with the more animating songs and dances of the Curetes, which resembled the Phrygian worship of the Magna Mater (Müller, p. 160). His chief compositions were paeans and hyparchemis, which belonged respectively to these two kinds of worship. In connection with the paean he introduced the rhythm of the Cretic foot, with its resolutions in the Paeons; and the Pyrrhic dance, with its several variations of rhythm, is also ascribed to him. He seems to have used both the lyre and the flute. (See Müller, pp. 160, 161.)

Plutarch and other writers speak of him as a lyric poet, and Sicilian musician, a wise man, μάρτιος and την αρχαιαν μουσικήν, and it is proper certain that the musical compositions of his age and school were often combined with suitable original poems, though sometimes, as we are expressly told of many of the names of Terpander, they were adapted to the verses of Homer and others of the older poets. Be this as it may, we have now no remains of the poetry of Thales. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 295—297; Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Asia, Greece, vol. i. pp. 159—161; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 212, foll., a very valuable account of Thales; Bernhardy, Geschichte der Griech. Lit. vol. i. pp. 267, 270, vol. ii. pp. 420, 421, 427.) [P. S.]

THEALES (Thalēs) of Sicyon, a painter who is mentioned with the epithet μεγαλοφύς by Diogenes Laertius (i. 39), on the authority of Demetrius Magnes. In the same passage, Diogenes speaks of another Thales, as mentioned in the work of Duris on painting; and it may be presumed, therefore, that this Thales was a painter; but whether the two were different persons, or the same person differently mentioned by Demetrius and by Duris, cannot be determined.

A curious passage respecting an artist of this name has been discovered by Osann, in an edition of Theodorus Hyrracenus, published in Boissoneâde’s Anecdota Graeca, vol. i. p. 156:—Σκίτος ἐξ Φειδίων Ἀθηνῶν τοῦ Μέγαλος, τοῦ μὲν Λεοντιάκου, τοῦ δὲ αθλητικοῦ, Ἀσκλπιδῆς ἐφ’ ἀργυρίῳ κοίτας τῶν ἑαυτοῦ καὶ τῶν ἐκείνων χαρτίων εὐαίσθανοι. It is certainly remarkable to find a statuary, otherwise unknown (or, if he be the same person as the painter, little better than unknown), placed by a late Byzantine writer on a level with Phidias and Apelles. There is probably some error; but whether it rests with the author or the transcriber, and what is its correction, we have not the means of deciding. Perhaps Osann may have discussed the question, but we have no opportunity of referring to his paper in the Kunstblatt, which we mention on the authority of Raoul-Rochette, who only observes that “the difficulty is not serious, as there were many artists who practised at the same time statuary and painting,” as if they were the difficulty! (Osann, Kunstblatt, 1832, No. 74; Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 413, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THALES. [Thales.]

THALÉTIO or THALATİO, C. JU'NIUS, a freedman of Maecenas, is mentioned on an extant inscription as Flaturarius Sigillariu- nius, that is, a maker of small bronze figures. (Gruter, p. dxxvi. 6; Maratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. exli. 4; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 414, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

THALIA. [Thalia.]

THALLO. (Thallo), one of the Attic Horae, who was believed to grant prosperity to the young.
shoots of plants, and was also invoked in the political oath which the citizens of Athens had to take. (Paus. ix. 35. § 1; Pollux, Onom. viii. 106.)

THALLUS (Θαλλός), of Miletus, an epigrammatic poet, five of whose epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. Of these the first is in honour of the birthday of a Roman emperor, or one of the imperial family (Kaiwos), on which account Bovinus supposes the poet to be the same person who is mentioned in an extant inscription as a freedman of Germanicus (Mémo. de VAcad. des Insers. vol. iii. p. 361). The name is, however, very common and the second and fourth Θαλλός Μιλήτου, the fifth Θαλλός Μιλήτου, and the third Θησάλος, which is perhaps a corruption of Θυλλός. The form Θαλλός may be explained by considering Θαλλός and Θαλίς as mere variations of the same word, as in many similar double forms; or perhaps it may have arisen from a confusion between the poet and the celebrated philosopher, Thales of Miletus; but there is no ground for whatever supposing that the two epigrams are to be ascribed to the philosopher. The name Θαλλός occurs in Athenian inscriptions. (Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen; Brunck, Anu. vol. ii. p. 164; Jacoba, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 150, vol. xiii. p. 950; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 496.)

THALLUS, P. CORNELIUS, son of an architect of the same name, is designated Mag. Quing. i.e. Magistrist Quinquennalis, on a Latin inscription. The form of the family name, perhaps the son too, must be added to the lists of ancient artists. (Gruter, p. xxix. 9; Bracci, Memor. d' Incisiou, vol. ii. p. 265; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 415, 2d ed.)

THALNA or TALNA, JUVENTIUS. 1. T. JUVENTIUS THALNA, praetor b.c. 194. He is, perhaps, the same as the T. Juventius who was sent, with two other commissioners, in b.c. 172, to purchase corn in Apulia and Calabria, for the use of the army and fleet in the war against Perses. (Liv. xxxiv. 42, 43, xlii. 37.)

2. L. JUVENTIUS THALNA, served in Spain in b.c. 183, as legatus to the praetor Calpurnius Piso. (Liv. xxxiv. 31, 38.)

3. M. JUVENTIUS L. F. T. N. THALNA, son of No. 2, was tribune of the plebs b.c. 170, when, in conjunction with his colleague Cn. Afulius, he accused the praetor C. Lucretius, on account of his tyrannical and oppressive conduct in Greece. He was praetor in b.c. 167, and obtained the jurisdiccio inter peregrinos; and in this year he proposed to the people, without previously consulting the senate, that war should be declared against the Rhodians, in hopes of obtaining the command himself. His proposition was vehemently opposed by the tribunes M. Antonius and M. Pompeion. He was consul in b.c. 163, with Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, and carried on war against the Corsesians, whom he subdued. The senate in consequence voted him the honour of a thanksgiving; and he was so overjoyed with joy at the intelligence, which he received as he was offering a sacrifice, that he dropped down dead on the spot. (Liv. xiii. 8, xlv. 16, 21; Fasti Capitol.; Obseq. 73; Titulus Te-

THANATOS. THALNA.

4. (JUVENTIUS) THALNA, one of the judges at the trial of Clodius, in b.c. 61, was bribed by the latter. (Cic. ad Att. i. 16. § 6.)

5. (JUVENTIUS) THALNA, who appears to be a different person from No. 4, is mentioned by Cicero in his correspondence in b.c. 45, and again in b.c. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 29, xvi. 6.)

THA'LPIUS (Θάλπιος), a son of Eurytus, and one of the leaders of the Epeians in the Trojan war. (Hom. II. ii. 620; Paus. v. 3. § 4.)

THA'MYRUS (Θαμύρος), an ancient Thracian hero, who is said to have been the son of Argive and Argiope. He went so far in his conceit as to think that he could surpass the Muses in song; in consequence of which he was deprived of his sight and of the power of singing. (Hom. II. ii. 555, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 3; Paus. iv. 33. § 4, x. 7. § 2; Eurip. Rhes. 925.) He was represented with a broken lyre in his hand. (Paus. iv. 30. § 2.)

THA'MYRUS or THA'MYRAS (Θαμύρος, Θαμύρας), artists. 1. A gem-engraver, two of whose works are extant, one of which is a fine cameo, in the antique style, representing an infant seated, a subject which, from the numerous repetitions of it on ancient gems, is thought by R. Rochette to be copied from some celebrated work of art. (Stosch, pl. ixii.; Bracci, vol. ii. pl. e xxii.; Caylus, Recueil, pl. xiv. n. 2; Eckhel, Pierre. grav. de Vienne, pl. xxx.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 156.)

2. Thanatus, L. L., designated Vascalarius, that is, a maker of vases, on an extant Latin inscription. (Gruter, p. dxxiii.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 415, 2d ed.)

A discussion has been raised respecting the true form of this name. Köhler (Einleit. p. 13) blames Visconti for calling the gem-engraver Tha'myrus instead of Thamyrus. Of course OAMPTOY, on the gems, might be taken as the genitive of either; but Stosch and R. Rochette decide in favour of Thamyrus on the evidence of the inscription. The truth, however, seems to be that Thanatus is merely the Latin form of Θαμύρας, which is the genuine Greek, and which is only a variation of Θαμύρος. (Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.)

THA'NATOS (Θανάτος), Latin Mors, a personification of Death. In the Homeric poems Death does not appear as a distinct divinity, though he is described as the brother of Sleep, together with whom he carries the body of Sarpedon from the field of battle to the country of the Lycians. (Lli. 672, xiv. 231.) In Hesiod (Theog. 211, &c. 756) he is a son of Night and a brother of Ker and Sleep, and Death and Sleep reside in the lower world. (Comp. Virg. Aen. vi. 277.) In the Alcestis of Euripides, where Death comes upon the stage, he appears as an austere priest of Hades in a dark robe and with the sacrificial sword, with which he cuts off a lock of a dying person, and devotes it to the lower world. (Alocyt. 75, 843, 845.) On the whole, later poets describe Death as a sad or terrible being (Horat. Carm. i. 4. 13, Stat. i. 1. 58), but the best artists of the Greeks, avoiding any thing that might be displeasing, abandoned the ideas suggested to them by the poets, and represented Death under a more pleasing aspect. On the chest of Cypselus, Night was represented with two boys, one black and the other white (Pans. v. 18. § 1), and at Sparta there were statues of both Death and Sleep. (iii. 18. § 1.) Both were usually represented as slumbering youths, or as genii with torches turned upside down. There are traces of sacrifices having been offered to Death (Serv. ad Aen. xi. 197; Stat. Theb. ii. 528; Lucan, vi. 690; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. v. 4), but no temples are mentioned anywhere. Comp. the excellent Treatise of L ess, "Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet." [L. S.]

Thaerys or Thaerypas, (Θαρέυς, Θαρη- πας), king of the Molossians, is mentioned by Thucydides (ii. 60) as a minor in B. c. 429. He was the father of Alcetas I., and is said to have been the first to introduce Hellenic civilization among his subjects. (Paus. i. 11; Plut. Pyrrh. 1.) Plotarch (l. c.) calls him Tharrhytas. [E. E.]

Thasus (Θάσος), a son of Poseidon, or Cilix or Agenor, was one of those who set out from Phoenicia in search of Europa, and thus founded the town of Thasos. (Herod. ii. 44, vi. 47; Paus. v. 25. § 7; Apollod. iii. 1. § 1.) [L. S.]

Thaumacius (Θαυμακις), the father of Posa, from whom the town of Thauumacia in Magnesia was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Θαυμακις; compare Hom. ii. 716.) [L. S.]

Thaumas (Θαμας), a son of Pontus and Ge, and by the Oceanid Electra, the father of Iris and the Harpies. (Hes. Theog. 237, 263, &c.; Callim. Hymn. in Del. 67; Ov. Met. iv. 479, xv. 645.) There is also mention of a Centaur Thaumachus in Ov. Met. vii. 303. [L. S.]

Theaetetus (Θαετέτως), a Rhodian, was one of the leaders of the party in his native city favourable to the Roman cause. He is first mentioned as accompanying Philophron on an embassy to the ten Roman deputies, who after the defeat of Antiochus settled the affairs of Asia, B. c. 189. (Polyb. xxii. 3.) During the war between the Romans and Perseus, his name is again repeatedly associated with that of Philophron: their efforts to oppose all concessions to the Macedonian king and his partisans, have been already related. [Philophron.] Hence when the defeat of Perseus gave the decided preponderance to the Roman party, the Rhodians hastened to appoint Theaetetus their admiral, an office of the highest mark in that naval republic, and at the same time sent him as their ambassador to Rome, to intercede in favour of his native city. But the advanced age of their deputy frustrated their intentions: Theaetetus, who was above 80 years old, dying at Rome before the senate had come to a decision concerning his countrymen. (Polyb. xxvi. 11, xxviii. 2, 14, xxix. 5, xxx. 5, 19.) [E. H. B.]

2. An Athenian, the son of Euphronius of Sunium, is introduced as one of the speakers in Plato's Theaetetus and Sophistes, in which dialogues he is spoken of as a noble, courageous, and well-disposed youth; in person somewhat like Socrates; and ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, especially in the study of geometry. (Plut. Theaet. pp. 143, 144, et alii; Sophist, passim; Politi, pp. 257, 258, p. 266, a.) Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 29) mentions him as an example of the happy effects of the teaching of Socrates. Eusebius (Chron.) places "Theaetetus the mathematician" at Ol. 83, B. c. 440, a date which can only be accepted as referring, not to the time when he really flourished, but when, as a mere youth, he became the disciple of Socrates. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 78, note.)

4. Scholasticus, an epigrammatist of the time of Justinian, as is clearly proved by the references in his epigrams to Domninus, who was prefect of the city under Justin I. (Ep. 5), and to Julianus Antecessor (Ep. 6). Reiske confounded him with the former epigrammatist of the same name (No. 2). The Medicean library contains a MS. tract περὶ ἀρχώνων ἀνθρωπών under the name of Theaetetus Scholasticus (Bandini, Catal. vol. ii. p. 368); and Suidas (s. v. Οδόν πρὸς τὸν Διονυσίου) mentions a work on Proverbs (περὶ παρουσίων) by a certain Theaetetus. (Bruckn, Anat. vol. ii. p. 514; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 214, vol. xiii. p. 597; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 496.) [P. S.]

Theagenes (Θαεγένης), historical. 1. Tyrant of Megara. He obtained his power probably about B. c. 630, having espoused the part of the commonality against the nobles. He is said to have gained their confidence by violent aggressions on the wealthy proprietors, whose cattle he destroyed in their pastures. (Arist. Pol. v. 4. 5, Ihet. i. 2, 7.) Mr. Malden (Hist. of Rome, p. 153, "Library of Useful Knowledge," supposes that these were public lands. By these outrages, and other demagogic arts, he gained the enthusiastic attachment of the commonality, and by a vote of the people obtained a body of guards, by whose aid he overthrew the oligarchy, and made himself tyrant. He was, however, driven out before his death. He gave his daughter in marriage to Cylon. [Cvlon.] Pausanias (i. 40. § 1, i. 41. § 2) mentions some public works which he erected in Megara. Like most of the other tyrants, he, doubtless, found it expedient to foster industry and the arts. But from the picture which some time after Theognis gives of the state of the country, it does not seem that the people generally were permanently benefited by the reign of Theagenes. (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 428; Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 59.)

2. A Thasian, the son of Timosthenes, renowned for his extraordinary strength and swiftness. At the age of nine years he was said to have carried home a brazen statue of a god from the agora. As he grew up he became distinguished in every species of athletic contest, and gained numerous victories at the Olympic, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. Altogether he was said to have won 1300 crowns. (Paus. vi. 11. § 2, &c.; Plat. Reip. gerend. Praxep. p. 911.) He gained one victory at Olympia in the 75th Olympiad, B. c. 480. (Paus. v.) A popular story among the Thasians was, that Hercules was his father. A curious story is told by Pausanias (vi. 11. § 6, &c.) about a statue of Theagenes, which a man, who had a spite against him, scourged by way of revenge, till one night it fell upon, and killed him; upon which the statue was thrown into the sea, but was very fortunately fished up again by some fishermen, for barrenness had come upon the country, and the Delphic oracle had declared that it would not be removed till they restored Theagenes. Prausnitz mentions having seen many statues of Theagenes among both the Greeks and the Barbarians. (vi. 11, § 9.)

3. General of the Theban forces at the battle of Chaeronea (n.c. 338). Deinarchus (in Dem. § 75) brands him as a traitor, but according to Plutarch (Alc. 12), he fell in the battle.

4. An Athenian, a contemporary of the philosopher Marinus. He was distinguished for his liberality and his enormous wealth, which he employed in helping needy persons and restoring decayed towns. The philosophers and literary men of his day found in him a munificent, though rather imperious patron. (Suid. s. v. Θεαυ. ; Damasc. ap. Philot. p. 346, a. ed. Bekker.) [C. P. M.]

THEA'GENES (Θεαγήνη), literary. 1. A native of Rhegium, who was contemporary with Cambyses. (Tatianus, adv. Graec. p. 105; Euseb. Praep. Evang. x. 11.) He was one of the earliest writers on Homer and his works (l. c.; Suid. s. v. Θεαυ.; Fabr. Bibli. Gr. i. pp. 523, 21).

2. An historical writer, of uncertain date. Stephens of Byzantium frequently quotes from a work of his, entitled Μαρούβα (s. v. Ακτῶς, Βάλκα, &c), as also from another entitled Καπωδ (s. v. Καπωδαλλα). It is, perhaps, this same Theagenes, who wrote a work on Aegeis, quoted by Ταετες (ad Lycoph. 176); Schol. Pind. Nem. iii. 21; Clinton, Fasti Helv. vol. ii. p. 369, note 1).

3. A Greek grammarian, a native of Cnidus, who was one of the instructors of Herodes Atticus in criticism. (Philoz. Vit. Soph. 13, p. 243, ed. Kyner.) [C. P. M.]

THEAGES (Θέαγης). 1. A Pythagorean philosopher, the author of a work on virtue (Πρεπών ἄρετής), from which Stobaeus (Serim. i. 67—69) has preserved some extracts. Fabricius (vol. i. p. 876) identifies him with the Theages mentioned by Iamblichus (Pyth. Vit. 257). There is no evidence to decide the question.

2. The son of Demodocus, is introduced by Plato in the dialogue Theages which takes its name from him. [C. P. M.]

THEANO (Τήανη). 1. One of the Danaides. (Apollod. ii. 1, § 3.)

2. A daughter of Cيسseus, the wife of Antenor, and priestess of Athena at Ilion. (Hom. II. v. 70, vi. 290, xi. 224; Dict. Cret. v. 6.) She was painted by Polynotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Her. x. 27.)

3. The wife of Metapontus, king of Icaria. (Hygin. Fab. 186; comp. Akr.ous.) [L. S.]

THEANO (Τήανη). 1. The most celebrated of the female philosophers of the Pythagorean school, appears to have been the wife of Pythagoras, and the mother by him of Telauges, Mnesarchus, Myia, and Arignote; but the accounts respecting her were various. Some made her a daughter of Pythonax of Creté, others of Brintinus of Croton, while, according to others, she was the wife of Brintinus, and the disciple of Pythagoras. Her traditional fame for wisdom and virtue was of the highest order, and some interesting sayings are ascribed to her by Diogenes Laërtius, and by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. iv. p. 522). Diogenes also informs us that she left some writings, but he does not mention their titles. Suidas ascribes to her ύπομνήματα φιλοσφία καὶ ἀπόφθεγματα καὶ τοιμαι ἐν τι ἐπόν. Several interesting letters are still extant under her name; and, though it is now universally admitted that they cannot be genuine, they are valuable remainis of a period of considerable antiquity. They were first edited in the Aldine collection of Greek Epistles, Venet. 1499, 4to.; then in the similar collection of Cuicenus, Aurelio. Allob. 1606, fol.; then in Gale's Οπομνήματα Μυθικως, pp. 84, foll. Cantab. 1671, Amat. 1698; then, far more accurately in Wolf's Maiurium Graecorum Fragmenta, pp. 162, foll. 1739, 4to.; and lastly in Io. Conrad Orelli's Scurativi et Scriptorum Graecorum et Persicorum, quae supersunt Epistolae, pp. 55, foll. Lips. 1815, 8vo.; the Greek text is also printed with Wieland's admirable translation of the letters, Lips. 1791, 8vo. Wieland's translation is reprinted at the end of Orelli's work. (Diol. Laértr. viii. 42, foll.; Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 687, 884; Orelli, ut sup. cit. p. 307.)

Suidas mentions another Theano, of Metapontum or Thurium, also a Pythagorean, the wife of Carystus or Croton or Brintinus; who wrote works on Pythagoras, on Virtue addressed to Hippodamus of Thurium, παραίσθενε γυναικεῖα, καὶ ἀπόφθεγματα Πυθαγορέων. It is pretty clear, however, that this is only another account, somewhat more confused, of the celebrated Theano. (Comp. Fabric. vol. i. p. 683.)

THEARIDES (Θηαρίδας). 1. A citizen of Megapolis, who was taken prisoner by Cleomenes, when he surprised that city in b.c. 224. He united with Lyssandrides, another of the captives, in persuading the conqueror to offer favourable terms to their fellow-citizens who had escaped to Messene, to which Cleomenes had the magnanimity to consent: but the Megapolitans refused his overtures, and repulsed Lyssandrides and Thearides with indignation as traitors to their country. (Plut. Cleon. 24.)

2. An Achæan who was sent by his countrymen as ambassador to Rome in b.c. 159. (Polyb. xxxii. 17.) In b.c. 147, he was again placed at the head of an embassy which was designed to excite the insult offered to the Roman legate Aurelius Orsetes, but having on his way to Italy met with the Roman deputy Sex. Julius Caeser, who ordered him to investigate the supposed cause, he was compelled to return with him to Achæa. (Id. xxxvii. 2.) [E. H. B.]

THEARIDES (Θηαρίδης), a Syracusan, son of Hermocrates and brother of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He is first mentioned in b.c. 390, when he was appointed by Dionysius to succeed his brother Leptines in the command of the fleet. The next year he commanded an expedition to the Liparaean islands, where he captured ten ships belonging to the Rhigians. Again in b.c. 283 he was chosen by his brother to conduct the magnificent procession which Dionysius sent to the Olympic festival. (Diod. xiv. 192, 103, 109.) [E. H. B.] THEBE (Θηῆς). 1. A daughter of Prome-theus, from whom the Boeotian Thebes was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.)

2. A daughter of Asopus and Metope, the daughter of Ladon, became by Zeus the mother of Zethus. She, too, is said to have given her name to the city of Thebes. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Paus. ii. 5. § 22, v. § 5; Pind. Isthm. vii. 37; Diod. iv. 72.)

THEIA (Θεία). 1. A daughter of Uranus and Ge, one of the female Titans, became by Hyperion the mother of Helios, Eos, and Selene, that is, she was regarded as the deity from which all light proceeded. (Hes. Theog. 135, 571; Pind. Isthm. v. 1; Apollod. i. 1. § 3, 2. § 2; Catull. 66. 44.)

2. A daughter of Oceanus and mother of the Cercopes. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1864; Tzetz. ad Lycolph. 91.)

THEIAS (Θείας), a king of the Assyrians, and father of Smyrna, the mother of Adonis. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 4; Anton. Lib. 54; Tzetz. ad Lycolph. 829; comp. ADONIS.)

THEIÔ' DAMAS (Θειωδαμας), the father of Hylas, and king of the Dryopes. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7; Apollon. Rhod. i. 1213, and his Schol. on i. 1207; Propert. i. 20. 6; comp. HYLAS.)

THEIÔDAS. (Θειωδας.)

THEISOA (Θεισονα), one of the nymphs who brought up the infant Zeus, was worshipped at Theissa in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 38. §§ 3, 7, 47, § 2.)

THELXION (Θελξιον), in conjunction with Telchin, murdered Apis, when he attempted to subjugate Ptolbosponsus; but they themselves were slain in return by Argus Panoptes. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4, &c.) Pausanias (ii. 5. § 3) calls him the father of Apis and the father of Aegyptus. (L.S.)

THEMIS (Θημίς). 1. A daughter of Uranus (others say Helios, Tzetz. ad Lycolph. 129) and Ge, was married to Zeus, by whom she became the mother of the Horae, Eunomia, Dice (Astraea), Eirene, and the Moerae. (Hes. Theog. 135, 901, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 1.) In the Homeric poems, Themis is the personification of the order of things established by law, custom, and equity, whence she is described as reigning in the assemblies of men (Od. ii. 68, &c.), and as convening, by the command of Zeus, the assembly of the gods. (II. xx. 4.) She dwells in Olympus, and is on friendly terms with Hera. (xx. 87, &c.) This character of Themis was recognised in the fact that at Thebes she had a sanctuary in common with the Moerae and Zeus Agonaeus (Paus. ix. 25. § 4), and at Olynthus in Macedonia with the Horae. (Paus. v. 14. § 6, 17. § 1; comp. Diod. v. 67.) Besides this she is also described as an ancient prophetic divinity, and is said to have been in possession of the Delphic oracle as the successor of Ge, and previous to Apollo. (Ov. Met. i. 321, iv. 642; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 800; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 246; Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Paus. v. 5. § 3; Aeschyl. Eum. init.) The worship of Themis was established at Thebes, Olympia, Athens (Paus. ii. 22. § 1), at Tanagra (ix. 22. § 1), and at Troezen, where an altar was dedicated to the Themides. (ii. 31. § 8.) Nymphs believed to be daughters of Zeus and Themis lived in a cave on the river Eridanus (Apollod. ii. 6. § 11; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1396; Hesych. s. v. Θεμισίδες), and the Hesperides also are called daughters of Zeus and Themis. (Schol. ad Eurip. Hippeol. 737.) She is often represented on coins resembling the figure of Athena with a cornucopia and a pair of scales. (Gellius, xiv. 4; Hirt, Myth. Bilderb. p. 112; Müller, Anc. Art and its Rem. § 406.)

2. A daughter of Ilus and the wife of Capys, by whom she became the mother of Anchises. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 2)

THEMIS or THEOMIS, the name of a poet to whom some late Greek writers ascribe the invention of tragedy, is probably nothing more than a corruption of Theapis. (Bode, Gesch. d. Helzen. Dictkunst, vol. iii. pt. i. p. 34.)

THEMISON (Θεμίσων). 1. A merchant of the island of Thera, who, according to the Cyrenaeans, founded the city of their city, was the instrument made use of by Etecarchus, king of Aegyptus, for the destruction of his daughter Phenom. (Etearchus.) Themison, however, evaded the fulfilment of the oath by which he had involuntarily bound himself to drown Phronime, and carried her in safety to Thera. (Herod. iv. 154.)

2. A tyrant of Eretria who in B.C. 366 assisted the exiles of Oropus in recovering possession of their native city. They succeeded in occupying it by surprise, but the Athenians having marched against them with their whole force, Themison was unable to cope with their power, and called in the Thebans to his assistance, who received possession of the city as a deposit, but afterwards refused to give it up. (Diod. xv. 76; Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 13; Dem. de Cor. p. 259.)

3. Of Samos, a naval officer in the service of Antigonus, king of Asia. In B.C. 315 we find him joining that chief in Phoenicia, with a fleet of forty ships from the Hellespont, and again in 306 B.C. he is mentioned as commanding a part of the fleet of Demetrius, in the great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus. (Diod. xix. 62, xx. 50.)

4. A Cyprian, who enjoyed a high place in the favour of Antiochus II. king of Syria, which he had earned by the basest means as the minister and companion of his abandoned pleasures. The king is said to have committed to him and his brother Aristus, the whole administration of affairs, and not only presented Themison to the people on public occasions in the garb of Hercules, but caused sacrifices to be offered to him under that title. (Athen. vii. p. 289, x. p. 436, c; Aelian. V. H. ii. 41.)

5. An officer in the service of Antiochus the Great, who commanded the cavalry which formed the left wing of his army at the battle of Raphia, B.C. 217. (Polyb. v. 73, 83.) E.H.B. 2. THEMISON (Θεμίσων), the name of probably three physicians. 1. The founder of the ancient medical sect of the Methodici, and one of the most eminent physicians of his time, was a native of Laodiceia in Syria (Pseudo-Gal. Introdc. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 684). He was a pupil of Asclepiades of Bithynia (Pliny, H. N. xxix. 5), and must have lived, therefore, in the first century B.C. Augustin, in his Gesch. der Med. in tabellarischen Form, says he was born in B.C. 123, and died B.C. 43, which may possibly be quite correct, though he has not stated his reasons for giving such exact dates. Nothing more is known of the events of his life, except that he seems to have travelled a good deal; as he mentions Crete and Milan, apparently as an eye-witness (ap. Caes. Aureli. De Morb. Aenl. iii. 18, p. 259). Neither is it certain whether he ever visited Rome, though it is perhaps more probable that he did so. He differed from his tutor on several points in his old age, and became the founder of a new sect called the "Methodici," which long exercised an extensive influence on medical science. ([Cels. De Med. i. praeft. p. 5; Galen, De Med. Med. i. 4, 7, vol. x. pp. 35, 52; Cramer's Anecd. Graeca Paris, vol. i. p. 395, where he is called by an obvious mistake Methodos].) He wrote several medical works, but in what language is not mentioned; of these only the titles and a few fragments remain, preserved principally by Caelius Aurelianus; e. g.—1. "Libri Periodici." 2. "Epistoles," in at least nine* books. 3. "Celere Passiones," and 4. "Tardiae Passiones," each in at least two books. 5. "Liber Salutaris." 6. "De Plantagine." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 39; Macer Flor. De Vir. Herb. c. 6. v. 265.) To these works Fabricius adds one, "De Elephantiasis" ([Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 432, ed. vet.], but this is probably a mistake (see Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Chron. c. 1. p. 493). The account of the doctrines of the Methodici is given in the Dictionary of Antiquities, and his medical opinions on different subjects (so far as they can be ascertained) may be found in Haller's Biblioth. Medic. Pract. vol. i., or in Sprengel's Hist. de la Mèd. vol. ii. The only points worth noticing here, are, that he is perhaps the first physician who made use of leeches (Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Chron. i. 1. p. 286); and that he is said to have been himself attacked with hydrophobia, and to have recovered (id. De Morb. Aët. iii. 16. p. 232; Dioscor. De Venen. Anim. c. 1. vol. ii. p. 59). Eudemus and Proculus are said to have been followers ("sectatores") of Themison, but this probably only means that they belonged to the sect of the Methodici (Cael. Aurel. De Morb. Aët. ii. 30, De Morb. Chron. iii. 8. pp. 171, 459). Besides the passages in ancient authors relating to Themison that are referred to by Haller, Sprengel, and Fabricius (ibid. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 431, ed. vet.), he is also quoted by Suidas (De Arte Oeate. pp. 12, 21, 210, 212, 240, 290). 2. The physician mentioned by Juvenal in his well-known line is by many commentators (perhaps by most) considered to be the same person as the founder of the Methodici. However, it seems hardly probable that Juvenal would have cared for satirizing a physician who was not a contemporary; and therefore perhaps the old scholar on Juvenal is right in saying that he was "archiater illius temporis," i. e. in the first century after Christ.

3. A slave of Appuleius, the author of the "Golden Ass," who lived in the second century after Christ. (Appul. Apol. pp. 39, 46, 55, ed. 1635.) Haller mentions in his list of physicians "Themison Macedo, Antiocho carus," and refers to Athen. vii. (§ 35, p. 289), but this appears to be a mistake. [W. A. G.]

simply arises from his placing together, with his usual carelessness, two distinct facts in the life of Themistius. Shortly before the death of Julian, A.D. 363, Themistius delivered an oration in honour of him, which is no longer extant, but which is referred to at some length by Libanius, in a letter to Themistius (Ep. 1061). In A.D. 364 he went, as one of the deputies from the senate, to meet Jovian at Dadastana, on the confines of Galatia and Bithynia, and to confer the consulate upon him; and on this occasion he delivered an oration, which he afterwards repeated at Constantinople, in which he claims full liberty of conscience both for the Christians and the heathen. (Orat. v.; Socrat. H. E. iii. 28.) In the same year he delivered an oration at Constantinople, in honour of the accession of Valentinian and Valens, in the presence of the latter. His next oration is addressed to Valens, congratulating him on his victory over Procopius in June 366, and interceding for some of the rebels; it was delivered in A.D. 367. (Orat. vii.) In the next year he accompanied Valens to the Danube in the second campaign of the Gothic war, and delivered before the emperor, at Marciacopolis, a congratulatory oration upon his Quinquennalia, A.D. 368. (Orat. viii.) His next orations are to the young Valentinian upon his consulship, A.D. 369 (Orat. ix.), and to the senate of Constantinople, in the presence of Valens, in honour of the peace granted to the Goths, B. C. 370 (Orat. x.). On March 28, A.D. 375, he addressed to Valens, who was then in Syria, a congratulatory address upon the emperor's entrance on the tenth year of his reign (Orat. xi.). It was also while Valens was in Asia, that the emperor entrusted him, by which he persuaded him to cease from his persecution of the Catholic party. (Socrat. H. E. iv. 32; Sozom. H. E. vi. 36.) It is thought by the best critics that this oration is lost, and that the extant oration to Valens on behalf of religious liberty (Orat. xii.) was delivered at some other time, probably soon after the emperor's accession. (Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. vi. p. 797.) In addition to these numerous orations, which prove that the orator was in high favour with the emperor, we have the testimony of Themistius himself to his influence with Valens. (Orat. xxxi. where the words, ἡττήθης ὑπὸ τῶν ἑμῶν λόγων πολλάκις, seem to refer to such examples of the orator's power as those mentioned just above.)

In A.D. 377 we find him at Rome, whither he appears to have gone on an embassy to Gratian, to whom he there delivered his oration entitled Epitudes (Orat. xiii.). On the association of Theodosius in the empire by Gratian, at Sirmium, in A.D. 379, Themistius delivered an elegant oration, congratulating the new emperor on his elevation (Orat. xiv.). Of his remaining orations some are public and some private; but few of them demand special notice as connected with the events of his life. In A.D. 384, about the first of September, he was made prefect of Constantinople (Orat. xvii.), an office which had been offered to him, but declined, several times before (Orat. xxxiv. 13). He only held the prefecture a few months, as we learn from an oration delivered after he had laid down the office (Orat. xxxiv.), in which he mentions, as he had done some six years earlier, those days of more than one thousand and twenty-four (Or. xv. xvi.), his old age and ill-health. From the 34th oration we also learn that he had previously held the offices of princiōps senatus and praefectus annonae, besides his embassy to Rome; in another oration he mentions ten embassies on which he had been sent before his prefecture (Orat. xviii.); and in another, composed probably about A.D. 387, he says that he has been engaged for nearly forty years in public business and in embassies (Orat. xxi.). So great was the confidence reposed in him by Theodosius, that, though Themistius was a heathen, the emperor, when departing for the West to oppose Maximus, entrusted his son Arcadius to the tutorship of the philosopher, A.D. 387—388. (Socrat. H. E. iv. 32; Sozom. H. E. vi. 36; Niceph. H. E. xi. 46.) We have no particulars of the history of Themistius after this time; and it may therefore be inferred that his life did not extend much, if at all, beyond A.D. 390. Besides the emperors, to whom so many references have been made, he numbered among his friends the chief orators and philosophers of the age, Christian as well as heathen. Not only Libanius, but Gregory of Nazianzus also was his friend and correspondent, and the latter, in an epistle still extant, calls him the "king of arguments" (βασιλεύς λόγων, Greg. Naz. Epist. 140). The orations (πολιτικόν λόγον) of Themistius, extant in the time of Photius, were thirty-six in number (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 74), of which thirty-three have come down to us in the original Greek, and one in a Latin version. The other two were supposed to be lost, until one of them was discovered by Cardinal Mai, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in 1816. His philosophical works must have been very voluminous; for Photius (i. e.) tells us that he wrote commentaries (συντομματα) on all the books of Aristotle, besides a useful abstract (μεταφρασις) of the Analytics, the books on the Soul, and the Physics, and that there were exegetical labours of his on Plato; "and, in a word, he is a lover and eager student of philosophy" (ἐραστὴς ἐστὶ καὶ σπουδαστής φιλοσοφίας). Suidas mentions his Paraphrase of the Physics of Aristotle, in eight books; of the Analytics, in two books; of the Apodeictics, in two books; of the treatise on the Soul, in seven books; and of the Categories in one book. Of these, we have the Paraphrases of the Second Analytics, of the Physics, of the treatise on the Soul, and of the works on Memory and Recollection, on Sleeping and Waking, on Dreams, and on Divination in Sleep. Besides these, which are in the original Greek, we have two other commentaries in Latin, translated from Hebrew versions of the originals, namely, that on the work on Heaven, translated by Moses Alatius, and that on the twelve books of the Metaphysics, translated by Moses Finzius.

The earliest editions of Themistius contained only the philosophical works, in the Latin version of Hermolaus Barbarus, which was first published at Venice, 1481, fol., and reprinted, Venet. 1502, fol., 1520, fol., 1527, fol., Paris, 1528—1529, fol., Basel. 1530, fol., 1533, 4to., Venet. 1554, fol., 1559, fol., 1570, fol.: the last is the most complete of the old editions. The two commentaries which only exist in Latin were published at Venice in 1574 and 1576 respectively, both in folio.

Of the Greek text the Edito Princeps is that of Aldus, 1506, containing the Paraphrases and eight Orations, together with the treatises of Alexander Aphrodisianus on the Soul and on Fate. There has been no subsequent edition of the whole works, or of the Paraphrases; but the Orations

have been since published, by H. Stephanus, whose edition contains thirteen of them, Paris, 1562, 8vo.; by G. Remus, who, reprinted with a Latin version, only the six orations which Stephanus had published for the first time, and a seventh in Latin only, Amberg, 1605, 4to.; by Petavius, who printed sixteen, in Greek and Latin, fifteen of which had been hitherto ascribed to Synesius, besides a seventeenth, which is only extant in Latin, but of which Petaevius gives also a Greek version by himself, Paris, 1618, 8vo.; by P. Pantinus, who printed a few orations not before edited, 1614, 8vo.; by Petaevius again, who inserted in this second edition all the orations which had as yet appeared, to the number of nineteen, in Greek and Latin, several of the Latin versions being new, with fuller notes than in his first edition. Paris, 1618, 4to.; and by Harduin, who first published the whole thirty-three orations, with the versions and notes of Petavius and his own, Paris, 1684, fol. Besides these thirty-three orations, another, hitherto unknown, against certain persons who had attacked Themistocles for accepting the prefecture of the city, was discovered at Milan by Cardinal Mai, as mentioned above, and published by him, in Greek and Latin, in 1816, 8vo., together with a newly-discovered fragment of the second oration, and two supplements to the nineteenth and twenty-third. Dindorf also founded upon the Milan MS. a new edition, first of two of the orations, Lips. 1830, 8vo., and afterwards of them all, Lips. 1832, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 790, foll.; Clinton, Fasti Romani, under the several dates given in this article; Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliographicum, Script. Graec. s. c.)

The Greek Anthology contains one epigram ascribed to Themistocles, on the subject, according to the superscription in the Aldine edition, of his own appointment to the prefecture of the city by Julian. It would seem, however, that there is a mistake respecting both the author and the subject of this epigram. In the Palatine MS. it is ascribed to Paladius, and it is quite in his style. The subject is explained by Maio. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 404; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 112, vol. x. p. 191, vol. xii. p. 957; Maio, ed. Orat. xxxiv. p. 458, p. 471, ed. Dindorf.)

2. There was another Greek writer of this name, who lived much later, and was the founder of the sect of the Agnotae, who were so called from their asserting that Christ's knowledge was not perfect. The little that is known of him is not worth mentioning here. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 794.)

[Plut. Theist. 1, compar. Pericl. c. 37.] Themistocles was born about B.C. 514 as it is conjectured. In his youth he had an impetuous character; he displayed great intellectual power combined with a lofty ambition and desire of political distinction. In his hours of relaxation he did not join in the ordinary amusements of the boys, but he practised himself in making speeches on imaginary subjects. His master used to say to him "My boy, you will not be any thing little, but certainly something great, good or bad." He had not much taste for the usual branches of learning and for accomplishments, but he showed a decided liking for all studies which strengthened the understanding and had a practical object. There is a story that his father who saw his ambitious turn of mind, wishing to divert him from a political career, pointed out to him some old gallies thrown on the shore and neglected, and he told him that this was the way that "the many" treated popular leaders, when they were no longer of any use. The remark, though true, did not keep Themistocles from his course, nor will it keep others.

The ambition of Themistocles was to be the first man in Athens, and he began his career by setting himself in opposition to those who had most power, among whom Aristides was the chief. We cannot infer from the words of Plutarch (c. 3) whether Themistocles was in the battle of Marathon (B.C. 490) or not; but if he was born so early as B.C. 514, he must have been old enough for military service in B.C. 490. The fame which Mititeides acquired by his generalship at Marathon made a deep impression on Themistocles; he became thoughtful, and avoided his usual company; and in reply to the remarks of his friends on the change in his habits, he said, that the trophy of Mititeides would not let him sleep. Others thought that the victory of Marathon was due to Themistocles, who foresaw that it was only the beginning of a greater struggle, and it was his policy to prepare Athens for it.

His rival Aristides was ostracized in B.C. 483, to which event Themistocles contributed; and from this time he was the political leader in Athens. In B.C. 481 he was Archon Eponymus. The chronology of the early part of the life of Themistocles is uncertain. It was perhaps before his archonship, or it may have been in that year that he persuaded the Athenians to employ the produce of the silver mines of Laurium in building ships, instead of distributing it among the Athenian citizens. (Herod. vii. 144; Plut. Themist. c. 4.) The motive which he suggested was that the fleet of Athens should be made a match for that of Aegina, with which state Athens was then at war; but his real object was to prepare Athens against a future attack from the Persians. It was the policy of Themistocles to draw the Athenians to the sea, as he was convinced that it was only by their fleet that Athens could repel the Persians and obtain the supremacy in Greece. The number of ships which were built at the suggestion of Themistocles was two hundred, according to Herodotus; and they were not employed against Aegina, with which state Athens made peace, but against the Persians; and thus, as Plutarch remarks, the policy of Themistocles saved Greece. Either at this time or somewhat later he persuaded the Athenians to pass a decree that twenty new ships should be built every year.

When news arrived of the immense armament of Xerxes, the Athenians deliberated about choosing a commander. Themistocles had no rival at Athens except Epicydes, who was strong with his tongue, but weak in spirit. Themistocles, fearing that matters would go ill if this incompetent man was elected commander-in-chief, bought off his opposition and was elected himself (Plut. Themist. 6). There can be no doubt that Themistocles was ambitious to have the command, and his ambition was justified by his talents. A body of men was sent by sea to Alus in Achaia, whence they marched to the pass of Tempe, under the command of Themistocles and Euanecos, a Spartan, to make a stand against the army of Xerxes; but after a few days this force retreated to their ships in alarm before Xerxes had crossed over to Europe from Abydos (Herod. vii. 173; Plut. Themist. 7). The Thessalians being thus deserted, joined the Persians, and all Greece as far south as Boeotia also went over to them. Upon this the Greek confederates held a council at the isthmus of Corinth, in which it was resolved to make a stand against the Persians at Thermopylae, and to send the fleet to Artemisium in the north-west, where they were to watch the operations of the forces at Thermopylae. Themistocles showed his magnanimity by offering to serve under Eurybiades, the Spartan, though the Athenians furnished a greater number of ships than the Spartans. The Persian fleet sustained great loss on the coast of Thessaly from bad weather (Herod. vii. 190), but at last it reached Aphaeia. Eurybiades being alarmed at the approach of this great force meditated a retreat to Southern Greece (Herod. vii. 4; Plut. Themist. 7); but the Euboceans, who were afraid of being deserted at this critical time, before they should be able to put their women and children in a place of safety, gave Themistocles thirty talents, part of which he gave to Eurybiades and to Adimantus, the Corinthian commander, and thus induced them to stay and hazard a battle. The Greeks had the advantage in the naval engagements off Artemisium, and the Persian fleet was damaged by another storm; but the Greek fleet also suffered in the battle, and half of the Athenian ships were disabled (Herod. vii. 18). The fights off Artemisium took place on the same days on which Leonidas and his little band fought with the Persians at Thermopylae. The Greek fleet retired to Salamis opposite the south-western coast of Attica. Before leaving Artemisium Themistocles cut on the rocks and on pieces of stone an address to the Ionians, who were in the fleet of Xerxes, hoping that either the Ionians might be detached from the cause of Xerxes, if what he had written should not become known to the king, or that if the king should be informed of what was written, he might suspect the fidelity of the Ionians and not let them engage in the sea-fights. (Herod. vii. 22.)

It was the plan of the Peloponnesians to retire within the peninsula, and to build a wall across the isthmus and the fleet had withdrawn to Boeotia only at the entreaty of the Athenians to allow them time to remove their women and children from Attica. An answer of the oracle of Delphi had advised the Athenians to defend themselves with wooden walls, and Themistocles, who may have suggested the answer of the oracle, also gave it an interpretation, saying that they must take refuge in their fleet. Accordingly he recommended that Athens should be left to the care of its tutelary deity, and that the women, children, and infirm persons should be removed to Salamis, Aegina, and the region of Troezen, which was done. The people of Troezen received most hospitably the fugitives, and provided for their maintenance at the public expense. The united fleet of the Greeks was now assembled at Salamis, consisting both of ships from Artemisium and the navy which was stationed at Troezen; in all three hundred and seventy-eight ships, besides penteconters (Herod. viii. 48). In the mean time the Persian army advanced through Boeotia, and entered Attica, destroying all before them. Athens also was occupied by them, and the Acropolis was burnt. The Greek confederates assembled at Salamis were alarmed, and many of them were preparing to escape in their vessels. In this emergency Mnesiphius, a friend of Themistocles, hearing from him that the Greeks had resolved in council to withdraw to the Isthmus, and fight a naval battle there, urged him to prevent so fatal a step, and to induce Eurybiades to stay. Themistocles, who was of the same opinion as Mnesiphius, prevailed on Eurybiades to hold a fresh council of war, in which Themistocles showed the consequences of the intended movement. Adimantus the Corinthian insolently told Themistocles to be silent, and said that a man who had no city ought not to speak in the council. Themistocles rated him soundly and his countrymen of Corinth too; and added, that the Athenians had a larger country and city than the Corinthians, inasmuch as they had two hundred vessels, and that no Greek state could resist such a force if attacked by it. Then turning to Eurybiades, he told him that if he did not stay there, he would cause the ruin of Greece, for that all the power of the Greeks was in their fleet; and that if they would not fight at Salamis, the Athenians would sail off to Italy, and the Greeks being left alone would then remember what he had said. Eurybiades at last yielded, and it was determined to stay at Salamis.

On the arrival of the huge armament of Xerxes, consisting of twelve hundred vessels, in the Saronic gulf, the fears of the Greeks were renewed, and a fresh council was held, in which it was proposed by the rest of the Greeks to sail off to the Peloponnesus, while the Athenians, Aeginaeae, and people of Megarix, still urged that they should keep their position (Herod. viii. 74). Themistocles, however, frustrated the plan of the dissentient Greeks. He sent a faithful slave, named Sicinnus, in a boat to the Persian commanders, with a message to this effect: that the Athenian commander, without the knowledge of the other commanders, inasmuch as he wished success to the king's cause, had sent him to say that the Greeks were alarmed, and intended to make their escape, and that the Persians had now the opportunity of accomplishing a noble enterprise, if they would only cut off the retreat of the Greeks. The Persians believed what they were told, and took their measures accordingly. They landed a large force on Pyttaelae, and the little island in the channel which separates Salamis from the Attic coast, and about midnight the Persian fleet occupied the whole of the channel between Salamis and the mainland as far as Munychia, THEMISTOCLES.
and thus the Greeks were hemmed in. (Herod. viii. 76.)

The Greek commanders were disputing in council, not yet being aware that their retreat was cut off.
Aristides, who was still in exile, crossed over from Aegina to Salamis, and sending for Themistocles out of the council, told him that it was useless to discuss the matter of retreat any longer, for he had seen the enemy's fleet, and the Greeks were completely blockaded. Themistocles communicated to Aristides what he had done to bring this about, and asked him to inform the council of what he had seen. Though Aristides assured the council that retreat was now impossible, and urged them to prepare for battle, many of the commanders would not believe the intelligence until it was confirmed by a Tenian galley which had deserted from the Persians. In the morning the battle took place, in which the Greeks had the advantage of their position over the Persian fleet, which was crowded in too narrow a space. The battle was fought desperately for ten hours. The Greeks secured a signal victory, in which the Aeginetans distinguished themselves, and next to them the Athenians. Aristides did good service by landing on Pyattaleia with some soldiers from Salamis, and cutting to pieces the Persians who were on this islet. Xerxes, who watched the battle from the shore of the mainland, saw his mighty armament defeated and dispersed in the autumn of B. c. 480. The fleet of the Persians was pursued by the Greeks as far as Andros, and as they did not come up with it there, a council was held, in which Themistocles advised that they should pursue the enemy through the Aegean, and sail to the Hellespont to destroy the bridge of boats by which Xerxes had passed over. Eurybiades more prudently suggested that they should allow the immense army of Xerxes to move off as quick as they could, and should leave the bridge standing; and this advice was approved by the other Pelo-politans, through the eloquence of Aristides. (Herod. viii. 109; compare Plut. Arisid. 9, Themist. 16.)

Themistocles pacified the Athenians, who were more eager to follow the Persians, by urging plausible arguments against the pursuit at present, and saying that in the following spring they might sail to the Hellespont and to Ionia. Herodotus attributes to Themistocles a treacherous motive in the affair, and says that his object was to secure a retreat to Persia, if any thing should befall him at Athens (Herod. viii. 109); and accordingly he sent some confidential person to Xerxes, and among them the faithful Sicinmus, to tell him that Themistocles had prevented the Greeks from pursuing the Perg-sian fleet, and destroying the bridge over the Hellespont, and he advised the king to move off.
Xerxes retreated with his army, and left Mardonius with a large force behind him.

While the Greek fleet was among the islands of the Aegean, Themistocles attempted to levy contributions in the cities. The people of Andros were called upon to pay money in the name of two powerful deities, Persuasion and Necessity, but they answered, as other people may answer to the collector of imposts, that they possessed two invincible antagonist deities, Poverty and Want of means, whose powerlessness no power could vanquish. Themistocles, however, got money from the Caryatians and Parians (Herod. viii. 111, &c.); and probably he filled his own pockets. The victory of Salamis, however, which was due to Themistocles, established his reputation among the Greeks; and it was only jealousy among the commanders which caused him to receive at the Isthmus the second prize of merit instead of the first.

(Herod. viii. 123.) But on his visiting Sparta, he was received with extraordinary honours by the Spartans, who gave Eurybiades the palm of bravory, and to Themistocles the palm of wisdom and skill, with a crown of olive, and the best chariot that Sparta possessed. When he returned home, three hundred select Spartan horsemen accompanied him as far as the borders of Tegea. (Herod. viii.
124; Plut. Themist. 17.)

In the battle of Plataea, B. c. 479, in which Mardonius was defeated, Aristides, now no longer an exile, commanded the Athenians. (Herod. viii.
20; Plut. Arist. 11.) The name of Themistocles is not mentioned on this occasion by Herodotus or by Plutarch; nor on the occasion of the fight at Mycale, which took place on the same day. Neither were they afterwards at Athens. (Plut. Themist.
18.) It seems probable that his political influence declined very speedily after the affair which raised his reputation to the greatest height; and that his conduct to the Spartans on two several occasions contributed to his final downfall.

The Athenians began to restore their ruined city after the barbarians had left the country, and Themistocles advised them to rebuild the walls, and to make them stronger than before. The Spartans sent an embassy to Athens to dissuade them from fortifying their city, for which we can assign no motive, except a miserable jealousy. Themistocles, according to Theopompos, quoted by Plutarch, got over this opposition by bribing the Ephors, which is probable enough, and not inconsistent with the story told circumstantially by Thucydides of his deceiving the Spartans. He prevailed on the Athenians to dismiss the Spartan ambassadors, and to send him and others to Sparta on the matter of the fortifications. Themistocles went first, after adviseing the Athenians not to send his colleagues till the walls were far enough advanced to be in a state of defence. In the mean time he amused the Spartans with lies, and pretended that he was waiting for his colleagues in order to be enabled to enter on the business on which he was sent; and when the report of the progress of the walls was confirmed by fresh intelligence, Themistocles told the Spartans to send trusted persons to Athens to inquire, and not to trust to rumours. The Spartans despatched their agents, and Themistocles at the same time sent instructions to Athens, to detain the Spartans until he and his colleagues should return in safety, for his colleagues had now joined him. When he was informed that the walls of Athens were in a fit state for defence, he remained the Spartans, and told them that it was about Athens could not without protecting him. The Spartans dissembled their resentment, and the ambassadors respectively returned from Athens and Sparta.
(Thucyd. i. 90, &c.) It was also on the advice of Themistocles that the Athenians finished the fortifications of the port of Peiraeus, which they had commenced during his archonship (Thucyd. i. 93; Diod. xi. 41); the position was exceedingly favourable, possessing three natural harbours, and as the Athenians had been made a naval power, the improvement of their ports would contribute to the increase of it. For Themistocles was the first who declared that the Athenians must make the sea their element, and he took the first steps towards this object. His policy was not to let the fortune of the Athenians depend on the fate of their city Athens; but if they were ever hard pressed, his advice was that they should leave it for the Peiraeus, which he designed to make so strong that a few men could defend it, while the rest could embark in the fleet. The building of the walls which connected Athens with Peiraeus and Phalerum was later, and accomplished about B.C. 456. (Thucyd. i. 107.)

The influence of Themistocles does not appear to have survived the expulsion of the Persians from Greece and the fortification of the ports. He was probably justly accused of enriching himself by unfair means, for he had no scruples about the way of accomplishing an end. A story is told by Plutarch in his Lives of Aristides and Themistocles, that after the retreat of the fleet of Xerxes, when the Greek fleet was wintering at Pagasea, Themistocles told the Athenians in the public assembly that he had a scheme to propose which was beneficial to the state, but could not be expounded to the many. Aristides was named to receive the secret, and was supposed to report it. His report was that nothing could be more profitable than the scheme of Themistocles, but nothing more unjust; and the Athenians abided by the report of Aristides. His project was to burn the Greek fleet, and thus confirm the naval supremacy of Athens. Themistocles resisted the proposal of the Lacedaemonians to exclude from the Amphiptyonic assembly those states which had not aided the Greeks against Xerxes, for such a measure, he argued, would put the whole power of the Amphiptyonic federation in the hands of two or three of the chief states. He succeeded in defeating this scheme, and thus incurred the enmity of the Spartans, who supported his rival Cimon. (Plut. The- mist. 20.) If this affair took place soon after the battle of Salamis, it will help to account for the disappearance of Themistocles from the stage. In B.c. 471 he was ostracised from Athens, and retired to Argos. He had now leisure to think of the old gallies and his father's lessons.

Pausanias, being detected in a treacherous correspondence with the Persian king, lost his life, and the Lacedaemonians sent persons to Athens to accuse Themistocles of being privy to the designs of Pausanias. (Thucyd. i. 135; Plut. Themist. 23.) The Athenians, either convinced of his guilt or affecting to be convinced, sent off persons with the Lacedaemonians with instructions to arrest Themistocles wherever they should find him. (B.C. 466.) But Themistocles, hearing of what was designed against him, fled from Argos to Corycya, the inhabitants of which owed him some obligations; but as the Corcyreans were afraid to keep him for fear of incurring the hostility of Athens and Sparta, they took Themistocles across to the main land. Being followed by his pursuers, he took refuge in the house of Admetus, king of the Molossi, who happened to be from home. Admetus was no friend to Themistocles, but his wife, at the entreaty of the fugitive, told him that he would be protected if he would take their child in his arms, and sit on the hearth. The king soon came in, and respecting his supplicant attitude, raised him up, and refused to surrender him to the Lacedaemonian and Athenian agents. He also sent him to Pydna on the coast of the Aegean, where Themistocles found a merchant vessel bound for Ionia. The vessel was carried by the weather close to the Athenian armament, which was blockading Naxos, on which Themistocles discovered himself to the master, and told him, if that he did not carry him off safely, he would inform the Athenians that he was aiding him to escape for a sum of money. The master kept his vessel tossing off the island a whole day and night to avoid the risk of landing, and at last safely reached Ephesus. Themistocles, who received money from his friends at Athens, and from Argos, where he had money, rewarded the master for his pains.

Xerxes was now dead (B.C. 465), and Artaxerxes was on the throne. Themistocles went up to visit the king at his royal residence, in company with a Persian, and on his arrival he sent the king a letter, in which he told him that he had done the greatest damage to the cause of the king's father, when out of necessity he fought against him, but that he had done him still greater services, by which he meant his information as to the intended retreat of the Greeks from Salamis, and the not breaking down of the bridge over the Hellespont, of which he falsely claimed: he said that he could do the king good service, and that his life was sought by the Greeks on account of his friendship to the king; he prayed that he might be allowed to wait a year, and then to explain personally what brought him there. Themistocles was too cunning to entrust his business to an interpreter. In a year he made himself master of the Persian language and the Persian usages, and, being presented to the king, he obtained the greatest influence over him, and such as no Greek ever before enjoyed; partly owing to the high reputation and the hopes that he gave to the king of subjecting the Greeks to the Persians. The king gave him a handsome allowance, after the Persian fashion; Magnesia supplied him with bread nominally, but paid him annually fifty talents. Lampacus supplied wine, and Myus the other provisions. Before he could accomplish anything he died; some say that he poisoned himself, finding that he could not perform his promise to the king. A monument was erected to his memory in the Agora of Magnesia, which place was within his government. It is said that his bones were secretly taken to Attica by his relations, and privately interred there. Themistocles was, according to Plutarch, sixty-five years of age when he died, and if he was born B.C. 514, he died in B.C. 449. He left several sons and daughters. The descendants of Themistocles enjoyed certain honours in Magnesia in Plutarch's time. A tomb called that of Themistocles existed in the Peiraeus in the time of Pausanias (i. 1): Pausanias mentions also a portrait of Themistocles in the Parthenon: he says, it appears that the sons of Themistocles returned to Athens, and dedicated the painting in the Parthenon in which Themistocles was represented: it was probably an historical piece, in which Themistocles appeared as an actor. (Compare Pans. i. 26 and 37.)

The great abilities of Themistocles are thus briefly characterised by Thucydides (i. 138):— "Themistocles was the strongest example of the power of natural talent, and in this respect is particularly worthy of admiration; for by his natural understanding, without any education originally to form it, or afterwards to strengthen it, he had the best judgment in actual circumstances, and he formed his judgment with the least deliberation; and as to future events he made, in the general, the best conjectures; whatever he took in hand, he was also able to expound; and on matters where he had no experience, he was not unable to form a competent judgment; and both of the better and the worse, while it was still in uncertainty, he had a most excellent foresight; and to express all in brief, by the force of his natural capacity, and the quickness of his determination, he was the most efficient of all men in promptly deciding what was to be done. Undoubtedly he possessed great talents as a statesman, great political sagacity, a ready wit, and excellent judgment: but perhaps he was not an honest man; and, like many other clever men with little morality, he noted his career unhappily and ingloriously, an exile and a traitor too. Some of the anecdotes about him deserve little credit; but an examination of them belongs to another kind of work.

There is a life of Themistocles in the collection which goes under the name of Nepos. Plutarch has enlivened his biography with several curious stories about Themistocles, after his arrival in Asia. Diodorus (xi.), always a careless writer, is of little value for the biography of Themistocles. One and twenty letters attributed to Themistocles are spurious. [G. L.]

THEMISTOGENES (Θεμιστογένης), of Syracuse, is said by Xenophon (Helm. iii. 1 § 2) to have written a work on the Anabasis of Cyrus; but most modern writers, following the statement of Plutarch (de Glória Athen. p. 361), suppose that Xenophon really refers to his own work, to which he prefixed the name of Themistogenes. It appears, however, that Themistogenes was the son-in-law of Themistocles, since Suidas (s.v.) that he wrote other works. (C. Müller, Fragm. Historic. Graec. vol. ii. p. 74, Paris, 1848.)

THEMISTUS, the son-in-law of Gelon, was slain along with Andranodorus. (Liv. xxiv. 24, 25.) [ANDRANODORUS]

THEOCRATES (Θεοκράτης), of Cyrus, grandson, and grandfather, and grandson, won a victory at the Olympic games in the chariot-race, but in what Olympiad is not stated (Paus. vi. 12 § 7). A person of the same name is quoted by the Scholion on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 1750) as the author of a work on Libya; and from the subject of the book we may reasonably infer that he was a native of Africa, and may have been the same as one of the Olympic victors. Pliny also refers to Theocratus as one of his authorities. (H. N. Index, lib. xxxvii, and xxxviii, 2. s. 11 § 1.)

THEOCRATES (Θεοκράτης), 1. A Pythagorean philosopher. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 27.)

2. Of Naxos or Eretria, a poet of unknown time, to whom some ascribed the invention of the elegiac metre; but there can doubtfully be, as they have too much of the etymology, in connection with which it is mentioned, is absurd. (Suid. and Etym. Mag. s. v. ηραενής.) His verses appear to have been of a licentious character, and it is most probable that he is the same person as the Theocles from whose Iphigallies Athenaeus (xi. p. 497, c) quotes three lines. [P. S.]

THEOCRATES, 1. The son of Hegylos, was a Lacedaemonian statuary, and one of the disciples of Dipoenus and Seyllis. He therefore flourished about B.C. 550. He wrought in wood and in ivory and gold. Two of his works are apparently mentioned by Pausanias; but they were only separate parts of one and the same group, representing Hercules preparing to carry off the golden apples of the Hesperides. This group consisted of a celestial hemisphere (πόλος, see Dict. of Antig. s. v. 2d ed.) upheld by Atlas, with Hercules, and the tree which bore the golden apples of the Hesperides, and the dragon coiled around the tree, all carved out of cedar wood. An inscription on the πόλος stated that the work was executed by Theocles and his son. It stood at Olympia, in the treasury of the Epidamnians; but, in the time of Pausanias, the figures of the Hesperides had been removed from it by the Eleians, and placed quite a little distance from it. (Paus. i. 25. 1.) In his description of the temple of Hera (v. 17 § 1), Pausanias mentions these statues, five in number, as being of gold and ivory, which is not inconsistent with the other statement, that they were of cedar-wood; for the two accounts can easily be reconciled by supposing that they were of cedar-wood gilt, and the faces, hands, and feet covered with plates of ivory. Possibly the ivory may have been added to the statues when they were transferred to the temple of Hera. [P. S.]

THEOCLEIUS, a Greek writer of the lives of the Caesars, appears to have lived in the time of Aurelian or shortl afterwards. (Vopisc. Aurel. 6.)
THEOCRITUS.

p. 299, where the reference is defective), on the authority of the Latin Version of Avicenna (v. 2. § 2, vol. ii. p. 320, ed. Venet. 1595). The printed Arabic edition has which is an error. The Latin translator (Gerardus Cremensoni?) appears to have read in his MS. or which is not a bad conjecture, and which is also wrong. Sontheimer, in his "Zusammenge setzte Heilmittel der Araber" (p. 210), has clumsily confounded the word with and reads Hippocrates. The true reading is probably Nautracitis, as appears from Galen, De Compos. Medicin. sec. Loc. iv. 8, vol. xii. p. 764, from which work the passage in question (as also many other medical formulæ in the same chapter of Avicenna) is taken. Galen attributes the medicine to διὰ Ναυτρακίτης, "the native of Nautracis" in Egypt; but who is the individual thus designated, the Writer is at present unable to determine. [W. A. G.]

THEOCRINES (Θεόκρινος), the person against whom Demostenes spoke in one of his extant orations (p. 1822, foll. ed. Reiske), who, is, however, ascribed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus to Deinarchus. (Dein. 10.)

THEOCRITUS, an actor, the dancing-master of Caracalla, under whom he enjoyed high honour and exercised unbounded influence. In the year A. D. 216 he was despatched at the head of an army against the Armenians, and sustained a signal defeat. (Dion Cass. lxvii. 21.) [W. R.]

THEOCRITUS (Θεόκριτος). 1. Of Chios, an orator, sophist, and perhaps an historian, in the time of Alexander the Great, was the disciple of Metrodorus, who was the disciple of Isocrates. (Suid. s. v.) He was contemporary with Ephorus and Theopompus; and the latter was his fellow citizen and political opponent. Theopompus belonging to the aristocratic and Macedonian, and Theocritus to the democratic and patriotic party. (Strab. xiv. p. 645; Suid.) There is still extant a passage of a letter from Theopompus to Alexander, in which he charges Theocritus with living in the greatest luxury, after having previously been in poverty. (Ath. vi. p. 230, f.; Theop. Frag. 276, ed. Müller, Frag. Hist. vol. i. p. 525, in Didot's Bibliotheca.) Theocritus himself, too, is said to have given deep offence to Alexander by the sarcastic wit, which appears to have been the chief cause of his celebrity, and which at last cost him his life. When Alexander was making preparations for a magnificent celebration of his Asiatic victories on his return home, he wrote to the Greek cities of Asia Minor and the islands, to send him a large supply of purple cloth; and when the king's letter was read at Chios, Theocritus exclaimed that he now understood that line of Homer,— Δάλαθε πορφύροις δάδατος καὶ μούρα κρατάν.

(Plut. Op. Mor. p. 11, a.; Ath. xii. p. 540, a.) It is observed by C. Müller (loc. inf. cit.) that Arrian mentions (Anab. iv. 13. § 4), among the boys concerned in the conspiracy of Hermolaus against Alexander, one Anticles, the son of Theocritus; and that, if this was Theocritus the Chian, the fate of his son would account for his enmity against Alexander. A very bitter epigram upon Aristotle, by Theocritus, is preserved, in separate portions, by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 11), Plutarch (Op. Mor. p. 563, c.), and Eusebius (Procop. Ev. xiv. 1), and is quoted in the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Anal. vol. i. p. 184; Jacob, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 117, comp. vol. xiii. p. 928.) Numerous examples of his satirical wit might be quoted from the ancient authors: as a specimen we may mention his description of the speeches of Anaximenes as "a stream of words, but sense drop by drop" (λέξεως μὲν ποταμός, νοοὶ δὲ στάλαγμοι, Stob. Serm. xxxvi. p. 217, ed. Gesner, comp. Ath. i. p. 21, c.; and, for other examples, see Stob. Serm. ii. iv., xxxiv. xxxviii., lxxx., xxxii.; Ath. viii. p. 314, b.; Plut. Mor. pp. 534, c., 631, f.). At last he was put to death by Antigonus Gonatas, in revenge for a jest upon the king's single eye, though perhaps he might have escaped, if he had not included the king's cook also in his witticism. That functionary, the story goes, having been despatched by Antigonus, to require the orator's attendance, "I perceive," replied Theocritus, "that you have already eaten raw and boiled flesh. "Yes! and without your head," retorted the cook, and repeated the conversation to Antigonus, who at once put Theocritus to death. (Plut. Mor. p. 623, c.; Macrob. Sat. vii. 3.) This must have happened before n. c. 301, when Antigonus fell in battle.

The works of Theocritus, mentioned by Suidas, are Χρεία, ἱστορία Αἰλίδης, and ἐπιστολάς Σαμασσία, to which Endocia (p. 232) adds, λογοὶ παντη γνωμων. The Χρεία, that is, clever sayings, were probably, as C. Müller suggests, not a work written by Theocritus himself, but a collection, made by some one else, of the witticisms ascribed to him. By ἐπιστολάς Σαμασσία is meant, as Vossius calls them, epistolae admirables, but de rebus mirabilibus. About the Libyan history there is perhaps some mistake, as the name of Theocritus might easily be confounded with that of Theocresas, whose Libyan history we know. It is true that Fulgentius quotes a stupid story about the Gorgons and Porsena from "Theocritus antiquitatum historiographus" (Mythol. i. 26); but the same confusion of names might easily happen here; and, even if the passage be from Theocritus, it would rather seem to belong to the ἐπιστολαῖ Σαμασσίαι than to the Libyan history. Another case, in which the name of Theocritus has probably been confounded with one like it, is pointed out by C. Müller (Ath. p. 14, c., Διαβολοῦ ἂν ἐντοιχίᾳ Δημοττίκας ὁ Θεόκριτος τοῦ Χίου σφυρατον ἀδελφός. Nothing is known of a sophist named Theognis.

Theocritus of Chios is mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus (Prorept. p. 45), as δὲ διὰ τοῦ σφυρατοῦ. A life of him by Ambrosin, is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius (v. 11). The epigram, prefixed to some editions of the poems of the more celebrated Theocritus of Syracuse, as in Bruneck's Analecta (Exeg. 22, ed. Kiesling), is probably not the production of the poet himself, but of some grammarian who wished to mark clearly the distinction between the two persons. It is inscribed to Theocritus in the Palantine MS. and the Codex Politianus, and in the editions of the Anthology by Stephanus and Wechel; but in the Aldine edition it is assigned to Artemidorus, who is also the author of a distich 3 v 4

2. The celebrated poet, was, according to the epigram just quoted, a native of Syracuse, and the son of Praxagoras and Philimnas. This is also the statement of Suidas (s. n.), who adds, however, that others made him the son of Simichus, or Simichidas, and also that, by some accounts, he was a native of Cos, and only a μετώκος at Syracuse. The origin of the former variation will be understood by a reference to the brief account of him prefixed to his poems, under the title of Θεοκρίτου γένος, and to the Scholia on Idyl. vii. 21, from which it appears that Simichidas, the person into whose mouth that Idyl is put, was naturally identified by the ancients with the poet himself, whom, therefore, they made a son of Simichus or Simichidas (Schol. l. c., *et ad v. 41). Theocritus again speaks in the name of Simichidas in the 12th line of his Syrinx; but, as the full name there used is Πίθος Σιμιχίδας, it would evidently be unsafe to understand the latter word literally as a patronymic. The idea is much more probable, and more in harmony with the spirit of poetry, that Simichidas is an assumed name, like Tigyrus in Virgil; and this is the explanation given by some of the ancient grammarians, who couple it, however, with an etymology which is not at all probable. (Schol. l. c.; *Theok. *γένος.) The other statement, that Theocritus was a native of Cos, has probably arisen out of his connection with Philetas. In the Θεοκρίτου γένος we are told that "he was the disciple of Philetas (of Cos) and Asclepiades (of Samos), whom he mentions," namely, in Id. vii. 40:—

οὔτε τον ἅγγαλον Σικελιάνον νικήμην τον ὑπ' Σάμων, οὔτε Φιλητᾶς,

the first words of which the ancient commentators are probably right in referring to Asclepiades (Schol. ad loc.) Another reference to his connection with Philetas has been discovered by Bekker in a corrupted passage of Theoerobosus. (Bekker, *Annot. in Epym. *p. 705; *Φιλήτας [i. e. Φιλητᾶς] διδασκάλου Θεοκρίτου). He appears also to have been intimate with the poet Aratus, to whom he addresses his sixth Idyl (v, 2), and whom he mentions three times in the seventh (vv. 98, 102, 122); at least, it was the belief of the ancient commentators that the Aratus mentioned in these passages was the author of the Phaenomena. (Schol. ad ll. 11.) Now, it may safely be assumed that Theocritus became acquainted with these poets at Alexandria, which had already become, under the first and second Ptolemy, a place of resort for the literary men of Greece, and which it is certain that Theocritus visited at least once in his life. The 14th, 15th, and 17th Idyls bear every mark of having been written at Alexandria, and at all events they prove that the poet had lived there, and enjoyed the patronage of Ptolemy Philadephus. The 16th, in praise of Hiero, the son of Hierocles, was evidently written at Syracuse, and its date cannot be earlier than B.C. 270, when Hiero was made king. To these indications of the date and residences of Theocritus, must be added the testimony of the author of the Θεοκρίτου γένος, that Theocritus flourished under Ptolemy the son of Lagus; that of the Greek argument to the first Idyl, namely, that he was contemporary with Aratus and Callimachus and Nicander, and that he flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadephus; and also the important statement, in the argument to the fourth Idyl, that he flourished about Ol. 124, B.C. (Of Simichidas, (There can be little doubt the páo is the true reading.) The argument to the 17th Idyl mentions the statement of Munatius, that Theocritus flourished under Ptolemy Philopator, but only in order to refute it.

In interpreting these testimonies, our chief difficulty arises from a two-fold uncertainty respecting Philetas; first, as to the precise period down to which he lived; and, secondly, whether the accounts of his being the teacher of Theocritus refer to personal intercourse and instruction, or only to the influence of the works of Philetas upon the mind of Theocritus. Without attempting to decide these questions, we would hazard the conjecture, that the date above mentioned, of Ol. 124, B.C. 284—200, marks the period, either when Theocritus first went to Alexandria, or when, after spending some time there in receiving the instruction, or studying the works, of Philetas and Asclepiades, he began to distinguish himself as a poet; the poet's assumed names obtained for him the patronage of Ptolemy Philadephus, which was esteemed, and which was again confirmed in the kingdom with his father. Ptolemy the son of Lagus, in B.C. 285, and in whose praise, therefore, the poet wrote the Idyls above referred to, which bear every mark of having been composed in the early part of Ptolemy's sole reign (from B.C. 283), and of being productions of the poet's younger days. The manner in which Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, is alluded to, in Id. xvii. 14, confirms the supposition that Theocritus had lived under that king. From the 16th Idyl it is evident that Theocritus returned to Syracuse, and lived there under Hiero II., but the contents of the poem are not definite enough to determine the precise period of Hiero's reign at which it was composed: from the 76th and 77th lines it may perhaps be inferred that it was written during the first Punic War, after the alliance of Hiero with the Romans in B.C. 268. Be this as it may, the whole tone of the poem indicates that Theocritus was dissatisfied, both with the want of liberty and the vanity of Hiero in rewarding him for his poems, and with the political state of his native country. It may, therefore, be supposed that he devoted the latter part of his life almost entirely to the contemplation of those scenes of nature and of country life, on his representations of which his fame chiefly rests.

These views are, of course, to some extent, affected by the question respecting the genuineness of some of the Idyls but the only one of those which furnish our chief evidence, that is generally regarded as spurious, is the 17th. We possess no further information respecting the poet's life, except that another of his intimate friends was the physician Nicias, whom he addresses in terms of the highest commendation (Id. xi. 5, 6, xxviii. 7; comp. Arg. ad Id. xi., and Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 923).

Theocritus was the creator of bucolic poetry as a branch of Greek, and, through imitators, such as Virgil, of Roman literature. The germ of this species of poetry may be discovered, at a very early period, among the Dorianians, both of Laconia and of Sicily, especially at Tyndaris and Syracuse, where the festivals of Artemis were enlivened by songs, in which two shepherds or herdsmen, or two parties of them, contended with one another, and which gradually grew into an art, practised by a class of performers called Lygidiatae and Bucoliciatae, which flourished extensively in Sicily and the neighbouring districts of Italy. The subjects of their songs were popular mythical stories, and the scenes of country life; the beauty, love, and unhappy end of Daphnis, the ideal of the shepherd, who was introduced by Stesichorus into his poetry, and of Dionysus, who was named by Epicarmus; the melancholy complaints of the coy huntman Maenalus, and other kindred subjects. These songs were still popular in the time of Diodorus; but the only fragment of which they have come down to us consists of the two following lines in the Priapeian metre, prefixed to the works of Theocritus: —

Δέξα τάν ἀγάθαν τόγαν, Δέξα τάν ὄγλεσιν,

*Αν φέρομεν παρά τάς ταύς, Δν ἐκάλεσσο τέρα.

Theocritus, however, was the first who reduced the species of poetry to such a form as to constitute it a branch of regular literature; and, in so doing, he followed, not merely the impulse of his own genius, but, to a great extent, the examples of Epicarmus and of Sophron, especially the latter. His bucolic idyls are of an essentially dramatic and mimetic character. They are pictures of the ordinary life of the common people of Sicily; whence their name, εἶδη, εἴδολα. The pastoral poems and romances of later times are a totally different sort of composition from the bucolics of Theocritus, who knows nothing of the affected sentiment, the pure innocence, the primeval simplicity, or even the worship of nature, which have been ascribed to the imaginary shepherds of a fictitious Arcadia; nothing of the distinction between the country and the town, the description of which has been made a vehicle of bitter satire upon the vices of civilized communities. He merely exhibits simple and faithful pictures of the common life of the Sicilian people, in a thoroughly objective, although truly poetical spirit. He abstains from all the mere artifices of composition, such as fine imagery, high colouring, and pathetic sentiment. He deals but sparingly in descriptions, which he introduces only as episodes, and never attempts any of those allegorical applications of the sentiments and adventures of shepherds, which have made the Bucolica of Virgil a signal failure. Dramatic simplicity and truth are impressed upon the pictures exhibited in his poems, into the colouring of which he has thrown much of the natural comedy which is always seen in the common life of a free people. His fifteenth idyl, the Adonisæae, is a masterpiece of the mimetic specialization of female character, and more admirable by the skill with which he has introduced the praises of Arsinöe and Berenice, without sacrificing anything of its genuine dramatic spirit. The form of these poems is in perfect keeping with their object. The symmetrical arrangement and the rapid transitions of the lively dialogue, the varied language and the musical rhythms, the combination of the prevailing epichoric verse and diction with the forms of common speech, all contribute much to the general effect. In short, as Theocritus was the first who developed the powers of bucolic poetry, so he may also be said to have been the last who understood its true spirit, its proper objects, and its natural limits.

The poems of Theocritus, however, are by no means all bucolic. The collection, which has come down to us under his name, consists of thirty poems, called by the general title of Idyls, a fragment of a few lines from a poem entitled Berenice, and twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, besides that upon the poet himself, which, as above stated, is probably the production of Artemidorus. Several other works were ascribed to him by the ancient grammarians. Suidas, (εμε.), tells us that he wrote the poems called Bucolies in the Doric dialect, and that some ascribed to him also the following: —

Προτίδας, Ελευθίας, Προσινας, Πρωινας, επικεφαλεια μελα, ελευθεῖς, ιδάμους, επιγράμματα. The Greek author of a few sentences on the characteristics of the poetry of Theocritus, prefixed to his works, says that all poetry has three characters, the διηγηματικὸς, the δραματικός, and the μυτικός, and that bucolic poetry is a mixture of every form. Bergk has recently classed the poems of Theocritus under the heads of Carmina Bucolica, mimicra, lyric, epic, and epigrammata (Rhein. Mus. 1838—1839, vol. vi. pp. 16, &c.)

Of the thirty so-called Idyls, the last is a late Anacreontic, and perhaps scarcely so poetical merits, and has no claim to be regarded as a work of Theocritus. Of the others, only ten belong strictly to the class of poems which the ancients described by the specific names of Βουκολικα, ποιηματικά, ιστορικά, or by the first of these words used in a generic sense, Bucolica, or, as we say, pastoral poems; but, taking the term Idyl in the wider sense explained above, we must also include under it several of the poems which are not bucolic, but which are pictures of the life of the common people of Sicily. In this general sense, the Idyls, properly so called, are the first eleven, the fourteenth, fifteenth, and twenty-first, the last of which has a special interest, as being the only representation we possess of the life of Grecian fishermen; the second and fifteenth are evidently pretty close imitations of the mimes of Sophron. Several of them are erotic in their character, and allied, in their form, to different species of poetry: thus, the twelfth and twentieth have a decidedly lyrical complexion, while that of the nineteenth is epigrammatic, of the twentieth bucolic, and of the twenty-third tragic: the thirteenth and eighteenth, which are also erotic, have the epic character, both in their subjects and their form; and the twenty-seventh is an erotic poem under the form of a mime. The sixteenth and seventeenth are imitations of another branch of the ancient lyric poetry, the encomium. The twenty-second is an epic hymn to the Dioscuri; the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth appear to be fragments of an epic poem on the adventures of Hercules, in the learned tone of the Alexandrian epics, but still distinguished by the free and simple style of Theocritus; and the twenty-sixth is also epic, but of very inferior merit, being a fragment of the story.
of Theocritus, in a dry rhetorical manner. Lastly, the twenty-eighth, entitled Ἠ(strlen, is an occasional poem, written in a very pleasing style. This great intermixing of the different species of poetry is quite in accordance with the spirit of the age and of the Alexandrian school, in which the poet was brought up. But, in those of the idyls which are certainly genuine, all these varieties are harmonized by the true poetical genius of Theocritus.

But yet, if we carefully examine the collection as a whole, it will be found to contain incongruities of style and subject, and varieties of merit, too great to allow of the belief that all these twenty-nine idyls (for the thirtieth may be certainly excluded) are the genuine productions of Theocritus. The introduction of spurious poems into the collection can easily be accounted for. As early as B.c. 200 there existed a collection of the works of the bucolic poets, Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus, as we learn from the following epigram of Artemidorus, which is prefixed to the works of Theocritus, and is also contained in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anál. vol. i. p. 293; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 194):

Βουκολικά Μίωναί σποράδες ποικίν
φίη μίας πάσαι
Επτά μίας μάδρας, Επτά μίας άγδας.

Into such a collection, made at a time when critical science was in its infancy, every thing would naturally be swept together that had the least traditional or other claim to be regarded as the production of one of these three poets; and, moreover, whatever was of doubtful authority would naturally be ascribed to Theocritus, as the most celebrated of the three. Of this large collection the idyls that have come down to us are merely samples, selected by the grammarians (whence the name of Eclogae, which was afterwards applied to bucolic poetry in general); and thus it has happened that, while much of the genuine poetry of Theocritus has been lost, there must be much that is not his in the collection we now possess. To distinguish the genuine from the spurious, we have scarcely any other test than internal evidence; and here the danger arises; into which some critics appear to have fallen, of making the comparative excellence of the poems the sole test of their genuineness. It is impossible here to enter upon the detailed critical arguments for and against the genuineness of the several poems. The whole subject has been discussed by Eichstädt (de Carm. Theocrit. ad sua Gen. revocat. &c., Lips. 1794, 4to.), by E. Reinhold (de Genuinis Theoc. Carm. et Supposititis, Jan. 1819), by A. Wissowa (Theocritus Theocriti, Vratsislav. 1828, 8vo.), and by Warton, Meineke, and Wüstemann, in their editions of Theocritus. These idyls, of which the genuineness is the most doubtful, are the 12th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 26th, 27th, 29th, and 30th.

The metre chiefly employed in these poems is the heroic hexameter, adapted to the purposes of Theocritus by having a more broken movement substituted for the sustained and stately march of the Homeric verse. In a few cases other metres are employed. The dialect of Theocritus has given the grammarians considerable trouble. The ancient critics regarded it as a modification of the Doric dialect, which they called νέα Δορία, and some of the modern editors have carried this notion so far as to try to expunge all the epic, Aecolic, and Ionic forms, which the best MSS. present. The fact, however, is, that Theocritus purposely employed a mixed or eclectic dialect, in which the new or softened Doric predominates. (Jacobs, Proef ad Anth. Pol. p. xlix.; Wüstemann, Proleg. ad Theocrit. p. 1097.)

Of the other poems which have come down to us, the Berenice, of which we only possess five lines and a word, preserved by Athenaeus (vii. p. 284), was an encomium of the celebrated queen, the wife of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, and the mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The poem entitled Spring, contained in the Greek Anthology, is an exercise of ingenuity, consisting in the composition of twenty verses in such a manner that the length of each pair of verses is less than that of the pair before, and thus the whole resembles the ten pipes of the mouth-organ or Pan-pipes (στρυγγή). Of the epigrams, two (Nos. 17, 18, Brunck) are supposed by Jacobs to be the productions of Leonidas of Tarentum, while, on the other hand, the Palatine MS. assigns the 10th epigram of Erycius to Theocritus. (Brunck, Anál. vol. i. p. 376; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 194, vol. xii. p. 588.) It is unnecessary to say much of the reputation of Theocritus. Both in ancient and in modern times, he has been regarded with less reverence placed at the head of the species of poetry which he formed, and in a very high rank among all poets, for the force and truthfulness of his pictures, the beauty of his language, and the simple good taste of his style. The best discussion of his characteristics is that by Finkenstein, in the Introduction and Appendices to Arcibus, oder di. Bukeol. Dichter des Alterthums, Berl. 1806—1810. The Eclogues of Virgil are mere imitations of the Bucolics of Theocritus, to which they are incomparably inferior. (Virgilii.) The Alexandrian grammarians gave Theocritus a place in one of their Pleiads, that, namely, of the seven miscellaneous poets; and commentaries were written upon them by Amerias, Asclepiades of Myrlea, Theon, Theacetetus, Amaranthus, Munatus, and others. The existing Scholia evidently contain a very small, and probably not the most valuable, portion of those commentaries: they consist chiefly of paraphrastic explanations of the text. The modern literature of Theocritus is too vast to be considered here. The following list has been devised by any attempt to give here a list even of the chief editions and illustrative works. The titles of the whole occupy forty-nine columns of Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographicum Scriptorum Graecorum. The Editio Princeps, in folio, containing the Works and Days of Hesiód and the Idylls of Theocritus, is without place or date, but is believed to have been printed at Milan about 1481. There is another very early edition, in 8vo., without place or date. The next earliest edition is that of Aldus, containing the Idylls, and a vast mass of other matter, Venet. 1495, fol. For a full account of this and the other ancient editions, see Hoffmann. The chief among the more recent editions are those of Reiske, Viennae, 1755, 1765, 2 vols. 4to.; Warton, Oxon. 1775, 4to.; Brunck, in the Analect, 1772, 4to.; of Valckenaer, 1775—1781, 8vo.; of Scheffer, 1810, fol.; of Heindorf, 1810, 8vo.; of Gaiford, in his Poëtica Minoræ, Oxon. 1816, 1820, 1823, 8vo.; of Kissling, Lips. 1819, 8vo., reprinted, with Bion and Moschus, Notes, Scholia, Indices, and Portus's Lexicon Doricum, Lond. 1829, 2 vols. 8vo.; of Jacobs, Halae, 1824, 8vo., only vol. i. published; of Meineke, Lips. 1825, 12mo.; and, the most useful...

of all for ordinary purposes, that of Wüstemann, in Jacobs and Rost's Bibliotheca Græca, Gotha, 1830, 8vo. (a new edition is expected). For an account of the numerous Dejectuses, and of the translations of the whole, or separate portions, of the Idyls, and of the works upon Theocritus, the reader is referred to Hoffmann. The chief English versions are those of Greek, Lond. 1661, 1634, 1713, 1721, 12mo.; Fawkes, Lond. 1767, 8vo.; and Polwhele, Lond. 1786, 4to., 1792, 1811, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. THEOGENCY, an architect of little eminence, who wrote on the proportions of the orders of architecture. (Pseudo-Seria Symmetricarum, Vitruv. vii. Pref. § 14.)

THEODECTES (Θεόδεκτης). 1. The son of Aristander, of Phaselis, a Dorian city of Pamphylia, on the borders of Lycia, was a highly distinguished rhetorician and tragic poet in the time of Philip of Macedon (Suid. s. v.; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ψαφιαλίς (Eustath. ad Dion. Perig. 855)). He was a pupil of Isocrates (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. Isocr. 10, p. 837, d.); and also, according to Suid., of Plato and of Aristotle. The greater part of his life was spent at Athens, where he died at the early age of forty-one, while his father was still alive, and was buried by the side of the sacred road to Eleusis (Paus. 1. 37. § 3; Pseudo-Plut. l. c.).

The following epitaph, which was inscribed upon his tomb, is preserved by Stephanus (I. c.):

* Νεμείχθην κόλπασι Ψαφιαλίνη Θεόδεκτη Κριστε, δι' ἰδίας Νοίσα 'Ολυμπιάδες Αὐταρ ἐπὶ χείρον θεὸν ἑαυτοῦ τριλ καὶ δέχ' ἀμάλλης
'Οκτώ ἀγαρνότους ἀμφιβδόντω στεφάνοις.

The people of his native city also honoured the memory of Theocritus with a statue in their agora, which Alexander, when he stopped at Phaselis on his march towards Persia, crowned with garlands, to show his respect for the memory of a man who had been associated with himself in the study of Aristotle and philosophy (Pint. Alex. 17; the words are τιμήν ἀποδίδον τῇ γενομένῃ δι' ἀριστοτέλείαν καὶ φιλοσοφίαν δυναί πρὸ τὸν ἄνθρωπον). On this passage the question arises, whether the somewhat vague expressions used by Plutarch are to be understood as meaning simply that Alexander recognized a sort of tie between Theocritus and himself on account of their common connection with Aristotle, or whether the strict sense of the word δυναί is to be so urged as to establish a personal acquaintance between the king and Theocritus; each of these opinions having been maintained by eminent scholars (see Wölcker, Kayser, Wagner, and Clinton, as quoted above). We believe the former view to be the right one, but the question is too minute to be discussed here; nor is it of much importance, since the age of Theocritus can be determined on other grounds.

He was one of the orators who contended for the prize proposed by Artemisia for a funeral oration in honour of Mausolus, in b. c. 352 (Suid. s. v.; Aul. Gell. x. 13; Suidas, however, gives the date wrongly, Ol. 103, ρέτω, instead of Ol. 107, ρέτω; see Clinton. F. H. vol. ii. s. a., and p. 287). Now the visit of Alexander to Phaselis was in Ol. 111.

4, n. c. 332; and, if we assume that the statue of which he took such special notice had been erected but recently, we may suppose that Theocritus died about b. c. 355 or 334, and therefore, according to Suidas's account of the length of his life, that he was born about b. c. 376 or 375. He would then be about 23 or 24 at the time of the funeral of Mausolus; about the same age as Theopompos, his rival on that occasion, and his fellow-pupil under Isocrates; and about ten years younger than Aristotle, a result agreeing with the account which makes him not merely the friend, but the pupil of that philosopher (Suid. L. c.; Cic. Nat. Orat. 51, 57), and also with a story respecting their relation to each other, preserved by Athenaeus (xii. p. 566, e.). It is said that Theocritus was distinguished for his personal beauty (see also Steph. Byz. l. c.), which excited the admiration of Aristotle, as much as the beauty of Alkibiades enchanted Socrates. The several passages of Aristotle, in which Theocritus is mentioned, furnish decisive evidence of the strong regard and high esteem in which he was held by the philosopher. (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23. § 13, &c.)

Theocritus devoted himself, during the first part of his life, entirely to rhetoric, and afterwards he turned his attention to tragic poetry, but his dramatic works partook largely of the rhetorical character, so that, while in tragedy he may be regarded as, to some extent, an imitator of Euripides, he must be considered, in his whole literary character, as the disciple of Isocrates, whose style he is said to have followed very closely. (Dionys. de Is. 19.; Hermipp. ap. Ath. x. p. 451, 1.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 360, p. 487, n. 1, Bekker; Suid. L. c.) Like his master, he was a fellow-pupil, orator, and teacher of rhetoric and composer of orations for others, and was in part dependent on this profession for his subsistence, as we learn from a passage of Theopompos, who, while placing himself and Theocritus and Naurates, with their common master Isocrates, at the head of the oratorical profession (τῆς ἐν λόγιοι παιδείας) among the Greeks, boasts that he and Naurates were independent by their fortunes, while Isocrates and Theocritus were compelled by their necessities to teach, and to write orations for pay. (Phot. Cod. 176, p. 120, b, 30, foll.) Such a boast betrays, perhaps, a consciousness that, in real merit and in public esteem, Theocritus stood above the other pupils of Isocrates, and nearest to his master. It appears, however, pretty certain that, on one great occasion, when these four orators were placed in competition with each other, namely, at the funeral of Mausolus, the prize was gained by Theopompos, who in this case also betrayed his jealousy and vanity by the manner in which he boasted of his victory over his master Isocrates. (Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 3.) In the accounts of this transaction an important question arises respecting the share of Theocritus in the contest. Some writers have concluded, from the testimonies on the subject, that, while the other three orators came forward with funeral orations in honour of Mausolus, Theocritus entered the contest with a tragedy on the subject of the king's life, under the title of Mausolus. This idea is perhaps sufficiently absurd to carry with it its own refutation; but it is also quite unsupported by the testimonies on which it professes to rest a careful examination of which will show that Theocritus composed both an oration and a tragedy on the same subject; that, though he was defeated by Theodectes in the competition of oratory, his tragedy gained the prize; and that, while his oration was lost, his tragedy was extant down to the time of Gallina. (Gell. x. 18; Pseudo-Plut. Vit. Isocr. p. 838, b.; Suid. s. vv. Θεόδεκτης, Ἰσοκράτης.) In this, as in so many other cases, we have to thank Suidas for originating the error by confounding the testimonies together; but the truth may be detected even in his confused account. (Suid. s. w. Θεόδεκτης, Ἰσοκράτης &€Ωδεκτρις Χέων τα πρωτεύλ.) There still remains, however, a minor, and not unimportant question; namely, whether the tragedy of Theodectes was brought out in a dramatic contest (or perhaps merely recited) at the funeral of Mausolus, or whether it was afterwards composed for the Athenian stage, and there rewarded with the first prize. It is no sufficient answer to the latter idea, to say that the subject was not one which would interest the Athenians, for, besides that the tragedies of that day derived nearly all their interest from their manner rather than from their matter, the Athenians could not be indifferent to a subject which was employing the genius, not only of the greatest rhetoricians, but also of the greatest artists whom they then possessed. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. w. Mausoleum, 2d ed.) The only safe conclusion, we believe, is that the evidence is insufficient to determine the question. This is the art of rhetoric, as it was practised by the school of Isocrates. Theodectes appears to have possessed the highest qualifications. Among these, no mean place must be assigned to that personal beauty which has been already mentioned. His memory was so strong, that he could repeat any number of verses, after they had been read to him only once. (Quintil. xi. 2. § 51; Aelian, N. A. vi. 10; Pollux, vi. 108; Cic. Tusc. i. 24.) Connected with this strength of memory was a power greatly prized by the rhetoricians of the day, and possessed in a high degree by Theodectes, of solving a kind of complicated riddles called ρόφωσ. (Poll. l. c.; Athen. p. 451, f.; where two examples are given from his tragedies; Fr. 8, 19, ed. Wagner).

Dionysius places him, with Aristotle, at the head of the writers on the art of rhetoric. (De Comp. Verb. 2, de Vi dic. in Dem. 48.) His treatise on the subject, entitled Χέων ἄρτρωπος (Suid. Steph. Eustath. ll. ccc.), is repeatedly referred to by the ancient writers, from the comic poet Antiphanes, who was his elder contemporary (Ath. iv. p. 134, b.), down to Tzetzes (Chil. xii. 573). If we may believe Suidas (s. e.) it was in verse. Some appear to have believed the Rhetoric of Aristotle to be the work of Theodectes; but this is a manifest error. (Quintil. ii. 15. § 10; with Spalding’s Note; comp. Val. Max. viii. 14. § 3.) It seems, however, as might have been expected, that his work had some things in common with Aristotle’s views, especially as to the classification of words, and the exclusion of the idea of metrical numbers from prose composition (Dion. ll. ccc.), and we are told that Aristotle wrote an introduction (ἐξαθέωρητα) to the work of Theodectes. (Diog. Laërt. v. 24; Anon. Vit. Aristot., where it is called Σωφρωνης, and is said to have been in three books.) Cicero quotes certain statements, respecting the alleged occurrence of certain feet in prose, from the work of Theodectes, whom he calls in primis politus scriptor atque artifex (Orat. 51). The work is now entirely lost, as are also his orations, which are mentioned under the title of λόγοι ἄρτρωποι (Steph. Byz. l. c.), and which Eustathius (l. c.) calls λόγοι ἀγαθοί. All that we know of their subjects is that one of them was a defence of Socrates (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23; Phot. Frag. Cantab. p. 671, where he is wrongly called Θεόδεκτος), and that another was entitled Μέναγος (Aristot. l. c.) A most valuable account of that is that of the prose compositions of Theodectes is contained in the work of Mäecker, de Theodectis Phasellidae Vida et Scriptis Comment. I., Vratslav. 1835.

We now turn to his dramatic works. It was not till after he had obtained renown in rhetoric, that he turned his attention to tragedy. (Suid. Plut. Vit. Isocr.; Phot. Cod. 260, ll. c.) If, therefore, the view above stated he correct, that he brought out his tragedy of Mausolus at the funeral of the Carian prince in a. c. 352, it may be assumed that this was about the time when he began to compose tragedies. The number of his dramas is uniformly stated as fifty. (Suid.; Steph.; Eustath.; ll. c.) According to his epitaph, quoted above, he entered the dramatic contests thirteen times, and gained eight victories. Hence the conjecture seems very probable, that he always brought out a tetralogy, and that the fifty dramas ascribed to him are to be taken as a round number, for fifty-two or it may be said that he brought out eleven tetralogies and two trilogies; but the latter, though a more literal, is a less natural and more arbitrary explanation. We have the titles of ten of these dramas, Ἀτάς, Ἀλκαμίαος, Ἑλένη, Οὐνίτες, Λυκείς, Μαύρωλος, Οἰδίπους, Ορὸςτῆς, Τυδέας, Φιλοκτῆτης, to which three may be added with great probability, namely, Βελλεροφόρος, Θεσεις, and Μένων ἡ Αχίλλειος. Popular as his dramas were, on account of their adaptation to the taste of his contemporaries, it is probable, from the fragments which survive, that they would be condemned by a sound aesthetic criticism, as characterised by the lax morality and the sophistical rhetoric of the schools of Euripides and Isocrates. The former censure is meant to apply to the choice of his subjects rather than to the manner in which he treated them; for we find in the fragments sound moral sentiments, lamentations over the growing vice of the poet’s times, examples of the heroic virtues, arguments against impiety and atheism, and in favour of divine providence and justice; the last of which subjects appears to have been treated in such a manner as entirely to reject the old doctrine of fate, and consequently to make an essential change in the whole character and spirit of tragedy. His tragedies contained many of the enigmas to which reference has been made above; an ingenious specimen is the attempt of a rustic to describe the letters which compose the name Ῥαθενης.

A story is related about Theodectes, which, though almost certainly fabulous, ought not to be passed over, namely, that, in one of his tragedies he borrowed, or thought of borrowing, something from the sacred books of the Jews, and was struck blind as a punishment for his profanity; but, on his repenting of the crime, his sight was restored to him. (Aristeas, de LXX. Interpr. in Gallandi Bibli. Patr. vol. ii. p. 603; Joseph. Antiq. xii. 2 § 14; Euseb. Propp. Er. vii.; and other writers cited by Wagner, p. 114, b.) A sufficient proof of the fabulous character of the story is derived from the non-existence, at that time, of any Greek version of the Old Testament.

Theodectes had a son of the same name (see below), and a domestic slave, who was also his amanuensis (συραγός καλ. οίκον, named Sibyrtius, who is said to have been the first of his condition who devoted himself to the study of rhetoric. He wrote a treatise on the art, τέχνη προφυκα, according to Suidas, who, however, is just as likely as not to have confounded the master and the slave. (Suid. s. v. Σιβυρτιος.)

THEODEMIR, king of the Ostrogoths, and father of THEODORIC the Great. [THEODORICUS the Great.]

THEODOCUS (Θεοδόκος), the name given by Pocoke (in his Latin Version of Abi-l-Faraj, Hist. Dynast. p. 121), and Wüstenfeld (Gesch. der Arab. Aerzte, p. 9) to a Greek physician in the service of Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf, the general of the chalif 'Abd-Alla Mleak Ibn Menwân, in the seventh century after Christ. He is called in Arabic تيدووق

THEODORA, FLAVIA MAXIMIANA, the daughter of Galeria Valeria Eutropia (Eutrophia) by her first husband, whose name and station are alike unknown. After the second marriage of Eutropia with Maximianus Herculeus, Constantius Chlorus having been elevated (A. D. 292) to the rank of Caesar was required to repudiate his wife Helena [Helena] and to wed the step-daughter of his Augustus. By Constantius Theodora had six children: three daughters and three sons. The daughters were: 1. Flavia Valeria Constantia, united to the emperor Licinius. 2. Anastasia, wife of Bassianus [Bassianus]. 3. Eutropia, mother of Nepotianus who assumed the purple in A. D. 350 [Nepotianus]; with regard to the names of the sons, see the article HANNIBALIANUS. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 39, Epit. 39; Eutrop. x. 14; Tillemon, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. Dioclet. Art. iii.)

THEODORA, the wife of the emperor Justinian, was the daughter of Accius, who had the care of the wild beasts of the Green faction of Constantine. After the death of her father, she and her sisters earned their living as pantomimic actresses; and Theodora, by the charms of her person and her skill in acting, soon became one of the greatest favourites of the stage. She earned the reputation of being the most beautiful and most licentious of any of them; and Procopius, in his Secret History, has related the most scandalous tales of her amours. After practising her profession in public and in private at Constantinople for some time, she accompanied Ecebolus, who had been appointed to the government of the African Pentapolis. But she was soon deserted by her lover, and returned in indignity to the imperial city. On her arrival at the scene of her former glory and infamy, she assumed a virtuous character, retired from the world, and appeared to support herself by spinning. While living in this retirement she attracted the notice of Justinian, who then governed the empire under his uncle Justin, and she gained such a mastery over the affections and the passions of the youthful prince, that he married the fair courtesan in 525, in spite of the vehement remonstrances of his mother and other relatives. On the death of Emperor Constantius and the elevation of Justinian in 527, Theodora was publicly proclaimed empress; and not content with conferring upon her this honour, her uxorious husband declared her to be an equal and independent colleague in the empire, and required all public functionaries to take the oath of allegiance in the joint names of himself and of Theodora. The part which she took in public affairs is related in the life of Justinian. [JUSTINIANUS I.]

She died in 548 of a cancer, having retained to the last her hold on the affections of Justinian. She is represented by the historians as proud and tyrannical in the exercise of power; but as none of her enemies have brought any charge against her chastity after her marriage with Justinian, we may safely conclude that she never proved unfaithful to her husband. She bore Justinian only one child, a daughter, whom she buried in her lifetime. (Procopius, Historia Arcoman.; the graphic sketch of Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xi.; and the authorities quoted in the life of Justinian.)

THEODORETUS (Θεοδόροτος) is mentioned by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 432, ed. vet.) as a physician quoted by Paulus Aegineta (iii. 46, 50, vii. 11. pp. 470, 475, 659), but in these passages the word is the name of a medicine, not of a man. [W. A. G.]

THEODORETUS (Θεοδόροτος), or, as the name is sometimes written, both in ancient MSS. and in modern works, THEODORITUS,—though the former is undoubtedly the more correct orthography,—was one of the most eminent ecclesiastics of the fifth century; confessedly surpassing all his contemporaries in learning, and inferior to none of them in piety; while, in his public conduct, he stands conspicuous and almost alone, as a calm and moderate champion of freedom of opinion in religious matters, in an age when the orthodox and the heretics vied with one another in the bitterest intolerance and rancour. The one blot of moral weakness on the character of Theodoret is by no means so dark as some have represented, and, at all events, may be greatly extenuated, without unfairness. And yet, but for that one fault, his name would have come down to us consigned to the list of heretics, by men, such as Cyril and Dioscorus, to whose spirit, it is no small praise to Theodoret
Theodore was born at Antioch towards the end of the fourth century of our era. The exact year of his birth is uncertain; from a minute examination of the fragments of evidence, which are supplied chiefly by his own works, Garnier has fixed it at A.D. 386; and Tillemon, with greater probability, at A.D. 393. (See their works, quoted at the end of this article.) Theodore himself, who was naturally infected with the credulity, which was universal in his age,—for even the sceptics of the time were grossly credulous in some matters,—has related various marvels which attended his birth, as well as subsequent passages of his life. His parents were persons of good condition in life, and of distinguished piety; and his mother, especially, had the most profound respect for the hermits or ascetics, one of whom had healed her of a disease of the eyes by means of the sign of the cross, and had also convinced her of the sinfulness of worldly pomp and luxury. After thirteen years of sterile wedlock, during which the prayers of several of these pious men had been offered on her behalf in vain, one of them named Macedonius at length announced that a son should be granted to her, but upon the condition that he should be consecrated to the service of God. It was not, however, till three years afterwards that the child was born, and named Θεοδόρους, as being a special gift of God. As the period of his birth approached, the holy man who had predicted it kept continually in his mother's recollection the condition attached to the gift, of which too he frequently reminded Theodore himself in after years. The record of the latter's school-days, which are the portion of the wonders he relates, is important, on account of the influence which the belief of them exercised on the mind of Theodore.

He was brought up, and instructed in religion, by his mother, with a care suited to his peculiar position, and which he often mentions with gratitude. At a very early age (scarcely seven years, according to an inference drawn from his 81st epistle) he was sent for his education to a celebrated monastery near Antioch, presided over by Eupri- pinus; and there he remained for twenty years (Ep. 81), until he left it to take charge of his diocese. He had for his instructors some of the most eminent ministers of the Eastern Church. He himself names Diodorus of Tarsus and Theodorus of Mopsuestia as his teachers; but, as the former died before the end of the fourth century, he can scarcely have instructed Theodore, except through his writings. Still less can we take literally the statement of his contemporaries ('H. E. xiv. 54), that Theodore was a disciple of Chrysostom, which can only mean (and in this sense it deserves notice) that the writings of Chrysostom were studied by Theodore as a model for his own exegetical works. Of his actual teachers, it appears that the chief was Theodore of Mopsuestia, whose memory and works he constantly defended from the charge of heterodoxy. The use which Theodore made of those twenty-five years of study and retirement appears in the fruit which they bore at a later period, in his profoundly learned writings. During his residence in the monastery he was appointed, first a reader, and then a deacon, in the Church of Antioch, by the patriarchs Porphyry and Alexander; and, in the latter office, he seems to have obtained considerable reputation by his sermons against the Arians, Macedonians, and especially the Apollinarists, who were the most formidable, by their numbers, among the heretics in the diocese. This matter is not very certain; but it is clear that he must in some way have obtained a public reputation, to account for his appointment to the episcopate by Theodotus, the successor of Alexander in the see of Antioch.

It was in A.D. 420 or 423, according to different computations from his own writings (Epist. 81, 113, 116), that he left his monastery to succeed Isidorus as bishop of Cyprus, or Cyrillus, a small and poor city near the Euphrates, about two days' journey from Antioch; which was, however, the capital of a diocese of Syria, called Cyrhestice, and the diocese of which contained eight hundred parishes (Epist. 32, 113). We learn from his own testimony, which there is every reason to believe, that he carried into his new office the quiet spirit of the monastery, and that ecclesiastical domination was never an object of his ambition. He still practised also the greatest moderation in his own mode of life; while he improved the opportunities, presented by his office, of exercising the utmost generosity towards others. The fortune, which he had inherited on the death of his parents, he had at once divided among the poor; and his bishopric brought him no property, neither house, nor even a tomb (Epist. 115), and its annual revenues could not have been large. Yet out of these, in addition to his aims to the poor, he expended a large sum in the decoration of the city, in which he built covered porticoes, two large bridges, public baths, and an aqueduct (Epist. 79, 81, 138). He also endowed the schools of the young men, who were much wanted there, especially physicians; and he interceded, both with the imperial procurator, and with the empress Pulcheria, for an alleviation of the taxes with which the people of his diocese were burdened. In the midst of these acts of his public munificence we see an instance of his generosity to individuals, in the zeal in which he pleads in several letters to his friends, on behalf of Celestineus of Carthage, who had been stript of his all by the Vandals (Epist. 29—36). After an episcopate of five and twenty years he could declare that he had never had anything to do with a court of justice, and had never received the smallest present; and afterwards, in his adversity, he suffered extreme want rather than accept presents which would have enabled him to live in luxury. Not only did he thus conduct himself, but he succeeded, by his example and authority, in inducing his clergy to follow a similar mode of life.

At the same time he administered the spiritual affairs of his diocese with great vigour. At that wretched period in the history of the Church, one of the chief occupations of an orthodox bishop was to maintain the contest with the so-called heretics. The diocese of Theodore was overrun with Arians, Macedonians, and especially Marcionites; but such was his success in converting them, that he speaks of them, in the year 449, as being all reconciled to the Catholic Church, and he declares that he had baptized ten thousand Marcionites. In this contest he ran great personal risks, having been more than once in danger of being stoned to death. Still he never, like many bishops, called in the aid of the temporal power; but he was assisted by a devoted band of monks, among whom one named Jacob was conspicuous; and his zeal was inflamed by the belief that supernatural powers took part both for and against him. He tells us of devils appearing to him in the night, and demanding that he persecute Marcion, with other marvels in the spirit of his age.

In these useful labours and clerical duties, and in the composition of his exegetical and other works, Theodoret would, in happier times, have spent a peaceful life. But in that age it was impossible for a man of any eminence to be neutral in the internecine war of the religious parties; and there were various influences at work to draw Theodoret into the vortex of the Nestorian controversy. To understand what follows, the reader must be acquainted with the details of the history may read the article Nestorius. This part of the life of Theodoret has been grossly misrepresented by Garnier, and the writers who have followed him. If we are to believe them, he first adopted a heresy to gratify a private friendship; and afterwards, from selfish motives, recanted his heresy, and anathematized his friend. It is true that Theodoret had formed an acquaintance with Nestorius in the convent of Euprepius, where they were fellow students; but there is no proof of any great intimacy between them, and none that Theodoret ever adopted the tenets of Nestorius. His share in the contest is more that of an impartial mediator than that of a devoted friend and adherent: he acts, not with Nestorius, but with John of Antioch and the Oriental party; not in order to favour Nestorianism, but to resist the overbearing intolerance of Cyril, and to combat the errors, opposite to those of Nestorius, into which he conceived Cyril, and afterwards Eutyches, to have fallen. The proof of these statements is contained in the numerous writings in which Theodoret explains his views respecting the dispute, in all of which he appears as the champion of religious freedom, and the opponent of those authors who would subject the writings of the heretical Nestorian bishops, and the heretical tenets, of their successors, to the authority of the Church. Of this work we only possess a few fragments, and those chiefly from the Latin translation of Marius Mercator, a bigotted adherent of the Cyriacan party, who declares his belief that Theodoret wrote the book at the instigation of the devil. About the same time, also, Theodoret came forward in defence of the memory of his master, Theodore of Mopsuestia, whose works had been denounced by Cyril and his friend Proclus of Constantinople, as the poisonous source of the Nestorian heresy. In a work which is now lost, Theodoret replied in detail to all the arguments advanced by Cyril against the works of Theodore; and attacked Cyril with considerable bitterness, as we see from some fragments of the book, which are preserved in the Acts of the Fifth Ecumenical Council.

Of the transactions of the following years, until the death of Cyril, it must suffice to say that Theodoret acquiesced in the peace effected by the intercession of the emperor between the parties of Cyril and of John, in so far as its doctrinal basis was concerned; and he even submitted, and urged the friends of Nestorius to submit, to the deposition of Nestorius. But he always protested against that deposition; and, when it became evident that no limits were assigned to the severity with which the Nestorians were to be treated (A.D. 433), he threw aside all pretence of peace, and stood forth as the decided opponent of Cyril, who, on his part, displayed the bitterest enmity against Theodoret. It is alleged that, when Cyril died (A.D. 444), Theodoret was so far forget himself as to express his exultation at the event. Such conduct might be excused on the plea, that his joy was for the deliverance of the Church from a source of bitterness; but the truth is, that the charge rests on passages in two works which it is probable that Theodoret never wrote, while, in other works, which are undoubtedly genuine, he refers to Cyril's death in quite a different spirit.

Dioscorus, the successor of Cyril in the see of Alexandria, pursued his predecessor's line of conduct, with even greater bitterness, and Theodoret soon found himself forced into a more prominent and disastrous position in the controversy, through the necessity of resisting the renewed diffusion of the opinions of Cyril by the efforts of a party of Syrian monks, and still more by those of the celebrated Eutyches of Constantinople, with whose name the Cyrilian doctrine became identified. Eutyches.] Dioscorus supported the party of Eutyches with all his might; and, besides this ground of opposition, he had a personal motive of dislike to Theodoret, because the latter had signed a synodical epistle of Proclus, the bishop of Constanti- nople, implying thereby, as Dioscorus maintained, the superiority of that patriarch to those of Alexandria and Antioch. In fact, the conduct of Dioscorus throughout the whole Eutychian controversy betrays at least as much care for the aggravement of his own see as for the cause of truth. Through the influence of this prelate at the imperial court, Theodosius, who made no secret of the dislike he bore to Theodoret for his opposition to Cyril, was induced to issue a command to the bishop of Cyrus to confine himself within the limits of his own diocese, A.D. 448. At the same time that he obeyed the mandate, Theodoret addressed letters to some of the principal men of the empire, in vindication of his conduct; and in these letters we find mingled some of the most interesting particulars of his previous life (Epist. 79—82). He had already done his best to appease the enmity of Dioscorus by a letter, explaining his opinions, and adding, as a proof of his orthodoxy, his acceptance of the statement of doctrine agreed upon by John and Cyril. Dioscorus, however, replied in the most violent language, plainly calling Theodoret a Nestorian. As a last attempt to pacify the proud patriarch, Theodoret went so far, in a second letter, as to declare those accusations which said that the Virgin was not the mother of God, or that Christ was a mere man, or who would represent the Only-begotten as if in his person there were two Sons of God; Dioscorus cut short the correspondence, by pronouncing a public anathema upon Theodoret in the church of Alexandria; and soon afterwards, in A.D. 449, he assembled under his own pre- sidency the second Council of Ephesus, justly called the robber-synod, which pronounced the deposition both of the Nestorian bishops of Constantinople, Domnus, patriarch of Antioch, and the other bishops who had condemned Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople in the preceding year.

Theodoret had been excluded from the synod which deposed him by the express wish of the emperor, who now commanded him to retire to a monastery at Apamea; his enemies even threatened him with banishment. He bore his fall with dignity and cheerfulness, and preferred rather to suffer want than to accept the presents which were offered to him on every hand. Still neither he nor Flavian felt themselves bound to leave their enemies to enjoy their triumph and to domineer over the Church. They turned to the only remaining quarter in which there was any power to help them, the Roman bishop, Leo the Great, to whom Theodoret wrote a letter (Epist. 113), celebrating the renown of the apostolic see, praising the virtues and religious zeal of Leo, defending his own orthodox by quotations from his writings, and request- ing permission to come to Rome, provided that the emperor should give his consent, to submit the whole case to the judgment of Leo and the Western bishops; at the same time he requested to be ad-

chosen, and a Mercator, with Garnier, the compiler of Sirmond's edition of Theodoret, the value of whose very learned and elaborate treatise on the life of Theodoret is seriously diminished by the recklessness with which he not only adopts the calumnies of Mercator, but even falsifies facts in order to support them. Cave has been to some degree misled by these writers; but yet he gives us so warm and just a eulogy of the character of Theodoret as to make one smile at the words with which he introduces it: "Meliori quidem fati, et molliori censura dignus erat Theodotius." Tillemon has refuted many of Garnier's misrepresentations; but he sometimes defends the orthodoxy of Theodoret by arguments which the bishop of Cyprus himself would scarcely have adopted. For the complete vindication of Theodoret's character we are indebted to the German church historians, Schröck and Neander.

A strong emphasis upon his learning and his style will be found in Plotinus (Bibl. Cod. 46), who describes his language as pure and well-chosen, and his composition as clear, rhetorical, and altogether pleasing. In other passages Photius notices several of the works of Theodoret (Cod. 31, 56, 203—205, 273); and an incomplete list of them is given by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. xiv. 54). Many of them are mentioned by Theodoret himself, in his letters (Epist. 82, 113, 116, 145). The fullest account of them is contained in Garnier's second Dissertation, de Libris Theodoreti.

I. The most important of Theodoret's works are those of an exegetical character, in several of which he adopts the method, not of a continuous commentary, but of proposing and solving those difficulties which he thinks likely to occur to a thoughtful reader; so that these works are essentially apologetic as well as exegetical. This method is pursued, especially in the first of his commentaries, which is upon the first six books of the Old Testament, that is, the five books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, and is entitled Ἐπιστολὰς ἐν Τῶν Ἁρμόζονται τὰς Ἑρμοῦς Μάκαριν, καὶ τὸν πρώτον τῶν Παλαιοτέρων, as a specimen of his method, we give two or three of the first questions which he proposes on the book of Genesis. First, "Why did not the writer in fact his account of the creation with the doctrine of God." (Σελεβηγμα;) to which he replies, that Moses was sent to a people infected with Egyptian pantheon, and that therefore the very first thing that he had to teach them was the distinction between the creature and the Creator; and in so doing, instead of passing to the general subject of theology, he has laid the foundation on which it all rests, in the doctrine of the independent and eternal existence of the one true God. The second question is, "Why does he not mention the creation of angels?" The third, "Did angels exist before the heaven and the earth, or were they created at the same time with them?" In this and many other questions he grapples with some of the most difficult points of controversy which had occupied the Church from the apostolic age to his own time, especially with the various forms of Gnosticism and Manichaeism. His other commentaries are upon the Psalms (Ἑρμηνεύει εἰς τούς έκκαθέντας ψαλμούς), the Canticles (Ἑρμηνεύει εἰς τὸ δάσιν τῶν δάσματος), Isaiah (Εἰς τὸν Ισραήλ προφήτην ἑρμῆνευεν κατ' ἑκατον), Jeremiah, with Baruch and the Lamentations (Ἑρμηνεύει τούς προφήτας τοῦ Ἱερονομοῦ και Ἰερεμίαν, ἐν καθὼς ἑκατον), Daniel (ὑπόκυμα εἰς τὰ ὄρασιν τοῦ προφήτου Δανιήλ), and the Twelve Minor Prophets (ὑπόκυμα εἰς τὸν ὁδόκην προφήτας). With respect to the New Testament, we have commentaries by Theodoret on the four epistles of Paul (Ἑρμῆνευεν τῶν Ιησοῦ Χριστοῦ άποστόλοις Παύλου), etc.

II. Theodoret has also left two works of an historical character, but of very different value. (1) His Ecclesiastical History, in five books (Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία ἐν τοῖς πέντε), is a very valuable work, on account of its learning and general impartiality, though it is occasionally one-sided, and often runs into a theological treatise. It was intended, as he himself tells us in the preface, as a continuation of the History of Eusebius. It begins with the history of Ariusism, under Constantine the Great, and ends with the death of Theodore of Mopsuestia in A. D. 439, although it contains an allusion to an isolated fact which has probably come to the ears of the learned late as A. D. 444. (2) The work entitled Φιλάθεσις Ἱστορία, or Religiosa Historia, contains the lives of thirty celebrated hermits, and displays that weak side of the character of Theodoret, which has already been mentioned as the necessary result of the earliest impressions he received. It is rather the work of a credulous ascetic than of a learned theologian.

III. Of his works against Cyril, the Eutychians, and the heretics in general, the chief are, (1) His censure (ἀναρρητικῶς) of the twelve heads of anathematization (ἀναθεματισμός) of Cyril: (2) The great work against the Eutychians, in A. D. 447, the year before the condemnation of Eutyches at Constantinople, entitled Ἐραυνίας τοῦ Πολυμαρφίου Ευτυχιοῦ εἰς τὸν Μπρατάτον, which, as he explains in the preface, was intended to imply that the Eutychians endeavoured to pass off their doctrines, like beggars with their tales of imposture, under many guises, derived from many previous heresies. The work is in the form of a discussion between the Mendicant and the Orthodox (Ἐραυνίας and Ὄρθοδοξος), and it is divided into three dialogues; the first, entitled Ἀρετήσως, to prove that the Son of God is unchangeable; the second, Ἀναχρυσός, that his divine nature is incapable of being mixed or confounded with the nature of man; the third, Ἀναφεδῆς, that the divine nature is insusceptible of suffering; and to these dialogues are appended syllogistic demonstrations (ἀπόδειξις διὰ συλλογισμοῦ) of the three propositions maintained in them, namely, first, that God
the Word is unchangeable (ὁ θεός ἐν δεινότητι), secondly, that his union with the human nature is without confusion (ὁ θεός ἐν δεινότητι ἐν ἡμοίῳ), and, thirdly, that the divine nature of the Saviour is incapable of suffering (ὁ θεός ἐν δεινότητι)
The work displays great learning and power, with a moderation which made it as displeasing to the Nestorians as it was to the Eutychians (2), who opposed his doctrines in general, entitled Ἀνατρεπομένα κοιμάσθησ θεότητι, or, Ημ reticarum Fabularum Epitome, in five books, addressed to Schurz. In this work, which seems to have been written after the end of the Nestorian and Eutychian disputes, he not only uses, with regard to other heretics, the intolerant language which was common in that age, but he speaks of Nestorius in terms of bitterness which cannot be defended, and which occur again in a special work against Nestorius, addressed to the same Soracius. The warmest admirers of Theodoret must lament that, after the contest was over, he took such means to set himself right with his former oppo-ponents: (4) Twenty-seven books against various propositions of the Eutychians (δόγματι κ' πρὸς diaφορῶν δέεων), an abstract of which is supplied by Photius. (Bibl. Cod. 46.)

IV. The chief of his remaining works are: (1)
An apologetic treatise, intended to exhibit the confirmed existence of the Christian religion, contained in the Gentile philosophy; under the title of Ἑλληnικῶν θεραπευτικῶν παιδαμών ἢ εἰσαγωγῆς ἅθειας ἐκ Ἑλληνικῆς φιλοσοφίας ἐπίγνωσων, Graeco-Affectioonum Curatio; seu, Evangelico Veritatis ex Gentilium Philosophia Cognitio: (2) Ten Orations on Providence (προνοιας διάφορα δέεα); (3) Various Orations, Homilies, and minor treatises: (4)
One hundred and eighty-one letters, which are of the greatest importance for the history of Theo-doret and his times.

There are only two complete editions of the works of Theodoret, both of very great excellence; but the later having the advantage of containing all that is good, and correcting much that is faulty, in its predecessor. The first is that edited by the Jesuits J. Sirmond and Jo. Garnier, in five volumes folio, Paris, 1642—1684: the first four volumes, by Sirmond, contain the bulk of the works of Theodoret in Greek and Latin; and the fifth, some minor works and fragments omitted by Sirmond, together with Garnier's five dissertations on (1) the History, (2) the Books, (3) the En Theodoret, (4) on the fifth General Council,
(5) on the Cause of Theodoret and the Orientals.
The faults of these valuable treatises have already been mentioned. The other edition, founded on the former, is that of Lud. Schulze and J. A.
Noeent, Halae Sax. 1769—1774, 5 vols. in 10 parts 8vo. For an account of the editions of separate works, see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr.
Scriptorum Graecorum.

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS I., king of the Visigoths from A. D. 418 to 451, was the successor of Wallia, but appears to have been the son of the great Aric. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxxv. note 10.) Not content with the limits of his dominions, Theodoric broke the peace which existed between the Visigoths and the Romans, took several places in Gaul, and laid siege to Arles in A. D. 425. He was, however, obliged to retire on the approach of Aetius, with whom he concluded a peace; and he then turned his arms against the Vandals in Spain, upon receiving a sufficient subsidy from the Roman general. Theodoric however was only waiting for a favourable opportunity to attack the Romans again; and, accordingly, while the Burgundians invaded the Belgic provinces, Theodoric laid siege to Narbonne in A. D. 436. Aetius displayed his usual activity; he defeated the Burgundians in battle, and sent Litorius to oppose Theodoric. The inhabitants of Narbonne had resisted many months all the efforts of Theodoric to take the town; but they were reduced to the last extremities of famine, when Litorius, in the following year (A. D. 437) cut his way through the entrenchments of the besiegers.
The siege was immediately raised; and Aetius, who arrived shortly afterwards, was unable to withstand the forces of Aetius, and obliged him to retire into his own dominions. The Gothic king was now obliged to act on the defensive; and Aetius, on his return to Italy, left Litorius at the head of an army, chiefly consisting of Huns, to prosecute the war. Unable to resist the Romans in the field, Theodoric retired to Toulouse, where he was besieged by Litorius in A. D. 439. Despairing of success, Theodoric now endeavoured to obtain a peace by the mediation of his Christian bishops; but Litorius, confident of success, and relying upon the predictions of the pagan augurs, that he should enter the Gothic capital in triumph, refused all the proposals which were repeatedly made him.
The presumption of Litorius appears to have made him careless. The Goths availed themselves of a favourable opportunity, sallied out of their city, and, after a long and obstinate battle, defeated the Roman army, made their general prisoner, and conducted him in triumph through the streets of Toulouse. This victory turned the fortune of the war; and the whole of the country as far as the Rhone lay exposed to the ravages of the barbarians.
Aovius, who was then praefectus praetorio in Gaal, had no army to resist the Visigoths, and accordingly entered into negotiations with Theodoric, which ended in a peace, the terms of which are not related, but which must have been in favour of the barbarians. This last peace between Theodoric and the Romans does not appear to have been interrupted. Theodoric had sought to strengthen his power by giving one of his daughters in marriage to the eldest son of Genseric, king of the Vandals in Africa; but Genseric, who suspected that his son's wife had conspired to poison him, igno-miously deprived her of her nose and ears, and sent her back in this mutilated condition to her father at Toulouse. To revenge this unpardonable by Gibbon and most writers. See Clinton, Fasti

THEODORICUS.

outrage, Theodoric made formidable preparations for an invasion of Africa; and the Romans, who always encouraged the discords of the barbarians, readily offered to supply him with men and arms. But Genseric averted the threatening danger by persuading Attila to attack both the Romans and the Goths. With an enormous army composed of various nations, Attila crossed the Rhine at Strasburg, and marched into Gaul. Aëtius collected a powerful force to oppose him, and Theodoric, at the head of his Visigoths, and accompanied by his two sons Thorsimond and Theodoric, joined the Roman general. On the approach of Aëtius, Attila, who had laid siege to Orleans, retreated to the plains of Champagne. Aëtius followed close upon his rear. The hostile armies at length met in the neighbourhood of Châlons on the Marne, and in a short but most bloody engagement, Attila was defeated with great loss. The victory was mainly owing to the courage of the Visigoths and of the youthful Thorsimond; but their king Theodoric fell at the commencement of the engagement, as he was riding along the ranks to animate his troops (A. d. 451). He was succeeded by his son Thorsimond. Theodoric was a wise and prudent monarch; and by his courage in war, and his just administration at home, he earned the love of his subjects and the respect of his enemies. He introduced among his subjects a love of Latin literature, and his sons were carefully trained in the study of the writers and the jurisprudence of Rome. (Jormandes, de Reb. Get. 34, 36—41; Sidon. Apoll. Panegyricus Avito; the Chronicles of Iadius and the two Prosperi; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xxxv; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.)

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS II., king of the Visigoths A. d. 452—466, was the second son of Theodoric I. He was present with his father at the battle of Châlons in 451, and succeeded to the throne by the murder of his brother Thorsimond at the close of the following year (452). [THORSIMOND.] In A. d. 455 Avitus, who had been well acquainted with the elder Theodoric, was sent as ambassador to the court of Toulouse, to renew the alliance between the Visigoths and the Franks. While staying with Thorsimond, he received intelligence of the death of Maximus, and of the sack of Rome by the Vandals. His royal host pressed him to mount the vacant throne, and promised him his powerful assistance. Avitus could not resist the temptation, and the senate was obliged to receive a master from the king of the Visigoths. Theodoric soon showed that he was an able and willing ally of the emperor whom he had placed upon the throne. The Suevi, who had settled in Gallicia in Spain, threatened to extinguish the last remains of Roman independence in that country. The inhabitants of Cartagena and Tarragona implored the assistance of Avitus; and when Rechiarus, the king of the Suevi, refused to listen to the proposals of peace and alliance which were made by the emperor, Theodoric, at the head of a formidable army, crossed the Pyrenees. This expedition was followed with the most complete success. The Suevi were defeated with great slaughter about twelve miles from Astorga, their capital Braga fell into the hands of Theodoric, and their unfortunate monarch, who had attempted to escape, was taken prisoner and put to death. These events happened towards the close of 456. Theodoric now carried his victorious arms into Lusitania, and took Merida the capital of the country. But early in the following year (457), before he had time to provide for the security of his conquests, he was obliged to return in haste to his own dominions, probably fearing evil consequences from the fall of Avitus. [AVITUS.] Although Theodoric had professed to invade Spain as the servant of Avitus, he had made a secret stipulation that all the conquests he effected should belong to himself. He was therefore unwilling to relinquish the advantages he had already gained in that country; and accordingly we find that he sent an army into Spain in 458, under the command of Cyrilis, and again in the following year (459) fresh troops under Suniericus. In the course of the latter year he had a more formidable enemy to cope with; for the emperor Majorian marched into Gaul, defeated Theodoric in battle, and concluded a peace with him. The death of Majorian in 461, and the conquests of the Vandals in Italy released Theodoric from all fear; he violated his recent treaty with the Romans, and appears to have designed to make himself master of the whole of the Roman dominions in Gaul. He succeeded in uniting the territory of Narbonne to his own; but his victorious career was checked by the defeat and death of his brother Thorsimond. He then went into battle near Orleans by Aegidius, the Roman commander in Gaul. A great part of Spain apparently owned the authority of Theodoric; but the Chronicles merely tell us of embassies that constantly passed between the king of the Visigoths and the king of the Suevi, and give us little or no information of the relative power of the two parties. Theodoric lost his crown by the same crime by which he had gained it. He was assassinated in 466 by his brother Enric, who succeeded him on the throne. Theodoric II. was, like his father, a patron of letters and learned men; and the poet Sidonius Apollinaris, who resided for some time at his court, has given us an interesting account, in a letter to a friend (Ep. i. 2), of the personal appearance, manners and habits, of the king of the Visigoths. (Jormandes, de Reb. Get. 43, 44; Sidon. Apoll. Panegyricus Avito; the Chronicles of Iadius, Maruis, and Victor; Greg. Tur. ii. 11; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.)

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS (Θεό-δερίκος), surnamed the GREAT, king of the Ostrogoths, was the son of Theodemir by his favourite concubine Eralieva. He was born in the neighbourhood of Vienna in A. d. 455, two years after the death of Attila. His father, and his father's brothers, Walamir and Widimir, had secured the independence of the Ostrogoths by the defeat of the Huns, and ruled their people as the acknowledged descendants of the royal race of the Amali. In the eighth year of his age Theodoric was sent as a hostage to the emperor Leo, who had purchased the assistance of the Ostrogoths by an annual subsidy. Theodoric received his education at Constantinople, and was restored to his father in 475, when he had reached the age of eighteen, as the emperor hoped to gain the favour of the Ostrogoths by this mark of confidence. During his absence Theodemir had become sole ruler of the nation, since Walamir had fallen in battle, and Widimir, the younger of the brothers, had marched into Italy and Gaul at the head of an army of barbarians. Theodoric had been carefully trained at Constantinople in all martial exercises, and had not lost, amidst the effeminacy of the Greek court, any of the ferocious valor of his people. Soon after his return he gathered around him a body of volunteers, and, without the knowledge of his father, descended the Danube, and conquered and slew in battle a Sarmatian king. Theodoric afterwards accompanied his father and the Ostrogoths, when they quitted their settlements in order to obtain a more fertile territory at the expense of the Byzantine empire. This was in the last year of the reign of the emperor Leo; and Zeno the Isaurian, who succeeded him in 474, hastened to make peace with the Ostrogoths, ceded to them the southern part of Pannonia and Dacia, and entrusted them with the defence of the lower Danube. They had scarcely time to take possession of their new territory, when the death of Theodoric, in 475, placed Theodoric on the throne of the Ostrogoths.

Theodoric was for some time a faithful ally of Zeno. He was of great assistance to the emperor in the war which Zeno had been compelled to wage against the Persians. But the treachery of Zeno, who neglected to supply him with the provisions and the reinforcements of troops he had promised, led the son of Theodoric to conclude a peace with the son of Triarius. To punish the emperor, and, still more, to satisfy the appetite of his subjects for plunder, Theodoric, the son of Theodoric, now ravaged the Byzantine dominions, and laid waste the whole of Macedonia and Thessaly. At length, in 483, Zeno appeased his resentment by conferring upon him the titles of Patrician and Praefectus militiae, by liberal donatives, by adopting him as his son, by erecting his statue in front of the imperial palace, and, finally, by raising him to the consularship in the following year, 484. But these honours did not long retain Theodoric in his allegiance; the restless spirit of his countrymen restored him to the high place to which he had wished to remain quiet; and accordingly he again took up arms in 487, and marched upon Constantinople.

To save himself and his capital, Zeno gave Theodoric permission to invade Italy, and expel the usurper Odoacer from the country. The proposal was gladly accepted by the king of the Ostrogoths; but the terms on which the conquered country was to be held seem to have been purposely left in ambiguity. The Greeks afterwards asserted that Theodoric had promised to conquer the country for the emperor; while the Ostrogoths, on the other hand, alleged that Zeno had expressly ceded Italy to their king.

Theodoric commenced his march towards Italy in 488. The reputation of the leader, and the wealth and beauty of Italy, attracted to his standard a vast host of Goths. They were accompanied by their wives and children, and they carried with them all their movable property. It was, in fact, an empire of the whole nation. After encountering numerous obstacles and dangers, and fighting his way through various tribes of Bulgarians, Gepidae, and Sarmatians, Theodoric at length entered Italy in the summer of 489. Odoacer had collected a powerful army to oppose him, and the first battle was fought on the banks of the Sontius or Isontius, not far from Aquileia (28th of August, 489). Odoacer was defeated with great loss, but he again collected his troops in the neighbourhood of Verona, and offered battle a second time to Theodoric (27th of September, 489). This second battle was still more disastrous to the former one, and Odoacer was compelled to relinquish the open country to the invaders, and to shut himself up within the strong fortifications of Ravenna. In the following year (490) he sallied out of the town, and at first gained some advantages over the troops of Theodoric in the neighbourhood of Pavia; but the Gothic king soon rallied his forces, and defeated Odoacer in a third and decisive victory on the banks of the Adda (August, 490). Odoacer again took refuge in Ravenna, where he sustained a siege of three years, while the generals of Theodoric gradually subdued the whole of Italy. At length, in 493, Odoacer agreed to admit the Ostrogoths into Ravenna, on condition that he and Theodoric should rule jointly over Italy. The treaty was confirmed by an oath, but after a few days Odoacer, in the midst of a banquet, was stabbed by the hands or command of his more fortunate partner, Magnentius.

Theodoric was now the undisturbed master of Italy, which he ruled for thirty-three years, till his death in 526. The history of his long and prosperous reign does not fall within the plan of the present work. A few particulars only can be mentioned, and the reader must refer for further information to the glowing description of Gibbon. As soon as Theodoric was firmly seated on the throne, he turned his attention to the improvement of the country, which had sunk into the most miserable condition from the long and devastating wars it had gone through. The third part of the lands, which had been previously seized by Odoacer, were assigned to his Gothic warriors, who were thus scattered over the whole country, and formed the standing army of his kingdom. The Italians were secured in the possession of the remaining two thirds of the lands; they were deprived from the use of arms, but they retained all the other rights and privileges which they previously enjoyed. Theodoric also gradually introduced among his rude warriors a strict discipline, and taught them to respect the lives and property of their Italian neighbours. Although an Arian himself, the most complete toleration was given to the Catholic religion, and Theodoric rather discouraged than promoted conversion to the Arian faith among his Italian subjects. Under his mild and beneficent rule agriculture and commerce flourished, and Italy again became one of the most prosperous countries in the world. Theodoric's relations with foreign nations were marked by principles of justice and integrity, and he showed no desire to extend his dominions at the expense of his neighbours. Unlike other barbarians, he had sufficient penetration to see that the extension of his dominions would not bring an extension of power, and thus most of the wars in which he engaged were purely defensive. The various Germanic nations looked up to him as their chief, and he cemented his connection with them by intermarriages with most of their royal families. Thus he married his two daughters Theodichusa and Ostrogotha, the former to Alaric II., king of the Visigoths, and the latter to Sigismund, the son of Gundobald, king of the Burgundians; his sister Amalfrida, the widow of a noble Goth, he gave in marriage to Thrasimund, king of the Vandals; and his niece Amalaberga to Hermanfri, the last king of the Thuringians. So widely extended was Theodoric's name that the most distant nations courted his alliance and his friendship, and embassies from the rude people on the shores of the Baltic came to Ravenna to present to him their gifts. He became ruler of the Visigoths on the death of his son-in-law Alaric II. The only legitimate son of Alaric was a child named Amalaric, whom he had by the daughter of Theodoric; and to protect the rights of his grandson against the Franks, he sent an army into Gaul, by which he established his power in that country.

Theodoric usually resided at Ravenna, but he removed his court to Verona, whenever his kingdom was threatened by the neighbouring barbarians.
On one occasion (p. 500), he visited Rome, where he convened the senate, and assured them of his intention to govern with justice. Although ignorant of literature himself, Theodoric encouraged learned men; and among his ministers were Cas-siodorus and Boethius, the two last writers who claim a place in the literature of ancient Rome.
Prosperus as had been the reign of Theodoric, his last days were darkened by disputes with the Catholics, and by the condemnation and execution of Boethius and Symmachus, whom he accused of a conspiracy to overthrow the Gothic dominion in Italy. [Boethius; Symmachus.] Theodoric died in 526. His death is said to have been hastened by remorse. It is related that one evening, when a large fish was served on the table, he fancied that he beheld the head of Symmachus, and was so terrified that he took to his bed, and died three days afterwards. Theodoric was buried at Ravenna, and a monument was erected to his memory by his daughter Amalasuntha. His ashes were deposited in a porphyry vase, which is still to be seen at Ravenna.

Theodoric left no male issue. He bequeathed his dominions to his two grandsons, Athalaric, the son of his daughter Amalasuntha by a prince of the royal race of the Amali, and Amalric, the son of Alaric II. and Theodichus. The Rhone was declared to be the boundary of their dominions: Athalaric was to possess Italy and the conquests of the Ostrogoths, while Amalric was to succeed to the sovereignty of the Visigoths in Gaul and Spain.
The great monarch of the Ostrogoths was long celebrated in the old Teutonic songs. He appears in the "Niebelungen-Lied" under the title of Dietrich of Bern, that is, Verona. (Jornandes, de

THEODORIDAS (Θεόδοριδας), of Sicily, was one of the ambassadors sent by the Achaenans in b. c. 187, to renew the alliance with Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt. (Polyb. xxi. 1.) He must have been a man of considerable power and influence in his native country, as at a later period
(b. c. 169), we find the two Ptolemies (the sons of Epiphanes), who were then joint rulers of Egypt, applying to him to raise for them 1000 mercenaries. (Id. xxii. 3.)

THEODORIDAS (Θεόδωριδας), of Syracuse, a lyric and epigrammatic poet, who is supposed to have lived at the same time as Eurphon, that is, about b. c. 235; for, on the one hand, Eurphon is mentioned in one of the epigrams of Theodorics (Ep. ix.), and, on the other hand, Clemens Alexandrinus (Ström. v. p. 673) quotes a verse of Eurphon in τοις πρὸς Θεοδωρίδος ἀντιγραφαῖς, which Schneider suggests the emendation Θεοδωρίδων. He had a place in the Garland of Meleager. In addition to the eighteen epigrams ascribed to him in the Greek Anthology, about the genuineness of some of which there are doubts voll. ii. p. 42, vol. xiii. p. 959), he wrote a lyric poem Ἐλιτέρα, upon which a commentary was written by Dionysius, surnamed Ὁ Ἀλεξάντος (Ath.
xi. p. 475, f.), a dithyramb entitled Κέρνατορι (Ath. xxv. p. 390); Enstat. ad Olym. p. 1571, 16), licentious verses of the kind called ἰλιαξες (Suid. s. v. Σωτάδης, as corrected by Meineke.
Amal. Alex. p. 246), and some other poems, of which we have a few fragments, but not the titles.

THEODORITUS. [THEODORITUS.]

THEODORUS I. LA'ASCARIS, Greek emperor of Nicea, a. d. 1206—1222, was descended from a noble family at Constantinople. While in a private station he married Anna Angela Com-nena, the second daughter of the emperor Alexis III.
Angelus. He was a man of energy and ability, and exhorted his father-in-law to resist the Latins when they laid siege to Constantinople in 1203;
but Alexis in despair abandoned the city and fled to Italy, to Conrad, Marquis of Monteferrato, who had married his sister. In the troubles which followed at Constantinople, the history of which has been related elsewhere [ALEXIS IV. and V.], Theodore continued to support the party that was opposed to the Latins; but after Constantinople had been taken by storm on the 12th of April 1204, and Baldwin, count of Flanders, had been placed on the imperial throne, Theodore fled with his wife to the Asiatic coast. Here he succeeded in raising some troops, by means of which he made himself master of the town of Nicea, and the greater part of Bithynia. He was, however, soon deprived of his conquests by Louis Count of Blois, who had received Bithynia as his share of the Byzantine dominions; but he recovered them again when Louis was recalled to Constantinople to the assistance of Baldwin, who was hard pressed by the Bulgarians and the revolting Greeks. Theodore had previously governed with the title of Despot, in the name of his father-in-law, the deposed emperor Alexis III.; but as the latter was still retained in captivity by the Marquis of Monte-ferrato, he now assumed the title of emperor of the Romans, as lawful heir to the crown, in virtue of his marriage with Anna, and was publicly crowned at Nicea as emperor by Michael Autorhians, the Greek patriarch (1206). His title, however, was disputed by several other Greek princes, who had established for themselves inde-dependent principalities in Asia Minor. The most formidable of these rivals was Alexis Comnenus, who reigned as emperor at Trebizond, with whom Theodore carried on a successful war for some years. He also had to contend with Henry, the THEODORUS.

Latin emperor at Constantinople, and the successor of Baldwin, over whom he gained several victories; and it is no small proof of his abilities, that although surrounded by so many enemies, he gradually extended his dominions and increased his power. For the history of his war with the Latins, see HENRICUS. In 1210 a new enemy appeared. In this year his father-in-law, Alexis, who had escaped from captivity, claimed the throne, and was supported in his claims by Gayách-ed-din, the powerful sultan of Koniah. As Theodore refused to surrender the crown to his father-in-law, the sultan marched against him at the head of a powerful army, but was defeated and slain in battle. Alexis fell into the hands of Theodore, who kept him in confinement in a monastery, where he died some years afterwards. Theodore spent the latter years of his reign in peace. He died in 1222, a little more than 45 years of age, and in the 15th year of his reign, computing from the time that he first became master of Nicea, but in the 16th year from the date of his coronation. He left no male offspring, and was succeeded by his son-in-law John Vatatzes, who had married his daughter Irene [JOANNES III.]. Theodore was married thrice. 1. To Anna Comnena, the daughter of Alexius III. 2. To Philippa, an Armenian princess, whom he divorced. 3. To Maria, the daughter of Peter of Courtenay, emperor of Constantinople. (Nicetas, Alex. Comm. and Baldwinus; Acropolita, cc. 6, 14, 15, 18; Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 219.)

THEODORUS II. LASCARIS, Greek emperor of Nicea, A.D. 1235—1259, was the son of John Vatatzes and of Irene, the daughter of Theodorus I. Lascaris, from whom he derived the surname of Lascaris. His short reign presents nothing worthy of record. He died in August, 1259, in the 36th or 37th year of his age, and was succeeded by his son John Lascaris [JOANNES IV.] (Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 223.)

THEODORUS ANGELUS, the Greek emperor of Thessalonica, A.D. 1222—1230, was descended from a noble family, being the son of Johnnes Angelus, also called Comnenus, and the grandson of Constantius Angelus. After the overthrow of the Greek empire by the Latins in 1204, Theodore Angelus served for some time under Theodore Lascaris, the emperor of Nicea, but afterwards passed over to Europe to join his bastard brother Michael, who had established an independent principality in Epeirus. On the death of Michael he succeeded to his dominions, which he greatly enlarged by the conquest of Thessaly, Macedonia, and other surrounding countries. He took Peter of Courtenay prisoner, who had been elected emperor of Constantinople, as he was travelling through Epeirus to the imperial city, and kept him in captivity till his death [PETRUS]. Elated by his numerous successes, Theodore assumed the title of Emperor of the Romans, and was crowned at Thessalonica in 1229, in the same year that Johnnes Vatatzes succeeded to the imperial title at Nicea, and Andronicus at Trebizond. He carried on war with success against the Latins, took Adrianople, and advanced as far as the walls of Constantinople. He was, however, recalled to the defence of his own dominions by an invasion of Asan, king of the Bulgarians, who defeated him in battle, took him prisoner, and deprived him of his eyes, in 1230. During his captivity among the Bulgarians, his brother Manuel had seized his dominions and assumed the title of emperor; but Theodore having obtained his liberty, gained possession of Thessalonica by stratagem, and deposed his brother. In consequence of the loss of his sight, he conferred the title of emperor upon his son Johnnes; but the latter was subsequently conquered, in the life-time of his father by Johnnes Vatatzes, the emperor of Nicea, who compelled him to renounce the imperial dignity, and to content himself with the rank of despot. [JOANNES III.] (Acropolita, cc. 14, 21, 23, 26, 38, 40, 42; Du Cange, Familiae Byzantinae, p. 207.)

THEODO-RUS (Θεόδορος), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. ABBAS ET PHILOSOPHUS, a learned Greek ecclesiastical of the latter part of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, from whom it is commonly supposed, that the tractate of Papianus LAMPUS [ΛΑΜΠΠΟΣ, No. 5] derived the materials of his work De Sectis. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 538, ed. Oxford, 1740—1743; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 310.)

2. ABUCARA (Ἀβουκάρα, an Arabic name signifying “Father (se. bishop) of Caræ,” derived from the city of which Theodore was bishop), a Greek ecclesiastical writer. He flourished, at the least, in the beginning of the ninth century, and is to be carefully distinguished from Theodorus, bishop of Caria in Thrace [No. 20], the contemporary of Photius; from Theodore of Rahith [No. 65], and from Theodore of Antioch, otherwise Theodore Hagiotis [No. 11], with each of whom he appears to have been, by various writers, improperly confounded. Very little is known of him. The time at which he lived is ascertained by the inscription to a piece published among his works, from which it appears that he was contemporary with the patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem, known both of his episcopal and patriarchal dignity, who succeeded from A.D. 807, or earlier, to somewhere between A.D. 821 and 829. (Comp. Le Quien, Orientis Christianus, vol. iii. col. 356.) Of what place Abucara was bishop has been much disputed, but it appears probable that it was a village called Caræ or Charra in Coele-Syria.

The pieces published under the name of Theodore Abucara are forty-three in number, and are almost entirely on polemical divinity. They are chiefly directed against the Mahometans, and against the Jacobites and Nestorians, the predominate heretical sects of the East. It is to be observed that in the Latin versions of two of his pieces by Turrianus [Nos. 26 and 27 in Greuter], he is called “Theodorus Monachus,” and “Theodorus Hagiotis:” presuming that these designations were found in the originals employed by Turrianus, it would appear, either that Theodore had been a monk at Jerusalem before he was bishop, or that his works have been confounded with those of another Theodore [No. 11]. Many of the pieces are in the form of a dialogue, and it is not impossible, from the great brevity of some, that they may be accounts of actual discussions in which Theodore was engaged, and which were reported by John, a disciple of Theodore, or some other person. The first published were fifteen, in the Latin version of Gilbertus Genebrardus [Nos. 1, 3, 7, 11, 13, 14, 16, 23, 25, 31, 33, in Greuter, whose arrangement differs much from that of Genebrardus]. They were given in vol. v. of the Bibliotheca Patrum of...
Lectiones Antiquae of Caius, vol. iv. 4to, Ingol-stadt, 1604 (vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 463, ed. Basnage), appeared a Latin version by Francisus Turrianus, of three others (Nos. 27—29, in Gretser) ; and very soon after Gretser published, with the Hodegus of Anastasius Sinaita (4to. Ingolstadt, 1606), fifty-four pieces of Theodore, including all those which had been given in the Bibliotheca and by Caius. They were given in the Greek (except Nos. 10, 28, and 32) and in a Latin version, partly by Gretser himself, but chiefly by Turrianus, and in the same year in the form of a Latin treatise.
The Latin version was reprinted in the Bibliotheca Pa-Cologene, 1618, and vol. xvi. ed. Lyon, 1677: the Greek text and Latin version were both given in the Auctarium of Ducaeus to the edit. of Paris, 1624, in vol. xi. of the edit. Paris, 1654, and in the collected edition of Gretser's works, vol. xv. fol.
Ratisbon, 1741. The Greek text of No. 18 was published by Le Quien in his edition of Damascenus (vol. i. p. 470, fol. Paris, 1712), with the version of Turrianus, a little altered : the Greek of No. 25 was published by Cotelerius, in a note to the Constitutiones Apostolicæ, lib. v. c. 7, in his Patres Apostolicæ, fol. Paris, 1672 (vol. i. p. 310, ed. Leclerc, fol. Amsterdam, 1724) : the Greek of No. 32 has never been printed. (Cave (who has confounded him with Theodore of Caria [No. 20]), Gracæ, vol. x. p. 364, &c.; Gretser who also identifies him with Theodore of Caria), Epistol. Dedictæ.

3. Of ALANIA. There is extant in MS. at Vienna, and perhaps elsewhere, a sermon on the Burial of Christ, In Jesu Sepulturam, by Theodore, bishop of Alania, which Cave conjectures to be a city not far from Constantinople. But as the Vienna MS. contains also &c discourse or letter addressed by Theodore to the Patriarch of Constantinopole, in which are recorded his apostolic labours among the Alani, and his subsequent consecration as bishop of Alania, it is evident that the name Alania designates the country of the Alani, between the Euxine and Caspian seas, north of the Caucasian ange. Kollar has given a brief extract from this discourse. The time in which Theodore lived is not clear ; but the mention of his apostolic labours among the Alani indicates that he first converted them to the belief of Christianity, which may have in the time of Justinian, when the neighbouring tribe of the Abasgi were converted. He must, as the Apostle of the Alani, have been a different person from the Theodorus who was bishop of Alania in the thirteenth century. (Kollar, Supplement. ad Lambeii Commentar. de Biblioth. Cosa-rrae, lib. i. col. 254, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christianissimi, vol. i. col. 1348 ; Allatius, De Symeon.

4. Of ALEXANDRIA (1, 2). There were two patrons of Alexandria, the name of the city, over a very few short pieces by Genebra Melchite, or of the orthodox Greek Church, who, after a patriarcho of two years, perished apparently in the troubles occasioned by the revolt of Egypt and Africa against the usurper Phocas, A. d. 609 ; the other, a Jacobite, who was patriarch from A. d. 727 to 738. (Le Quien, Oriens Christianissimi, vol. ii. col.
445, 457.)

5. Of ALEXANDRIA (3). Theodore, a deacon of the church at Alexandria, who at the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451, presented a Διδωσθαι, Lb. bellus, against the patriarch of Alexandria, Dioscorrus, charging him with having grievously oppressed him (Theodore), on account of the regard in which he had been held by Cyril, the predecessor of Dioscorus. The document is given in the various editions of the Concilis (e.g. vol. iv. col. 393, ed.
Concilii Chalcedonensis, actio iii. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 451, vol. i. p. 443 ; Fabric. Bibl. Gracæ,
vol. x. p. 386.)

6. Of ALEXANDRIA (4). A monk who flourished about the commencement of the sixth century. Cave improperly places him in the seventh.
He belonged to that branch of the Monophysite body called Theopaschite, and is known by his controversy with Themistius, another Theopaschite mong, who is charged with having broached the eresy of the Agnoetae, a sect so called from their affirming that Christ knew not the time of the Day of Judgment. Theodore attacked Themistius in a work of which Photius has given an account.
As in this controversy Theodore was on the same side as the orthodox Church, it was probably by some other writing that he incurred the condemnation of the emperor Justinian, as mentioned by Pacundus in his Phot. Bibl. Cod. 108 ; Pacundus Herman. Pro Defensione trium Capitolium, lib. ii.
pp. 372, 710 ; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 601, vol. i.
p. 573.)

7. Of AMASIA. Possevino (Apparatus Sacer, vol. ii. p. 462, ed. Cologne, 1608) mentions two works, Explicatio ad Ecclesiastem et Canticum Can-ticorum, and Dogmatica Panoplia adversus Judaeos, Armenios et Saracenos, as written by Theodore, bishop of Amasia in Pontus. Le Quien (Oriens Christianissimi, vol. i. col. 528) notices both works in the speaking of Theodore, who was bishop of Amasia at the time of the fifth General Council, A. D. 553, where his signature appears among those of the subscribing prelates ; but if, as its title indicates, the Panoplia is a defence of orthodox Christianity against Mohammedanism, the work cannot be of so early a date. No other Theodore is known among the bishops of Amasia. (Possevino ; Le Quien, u. c.)

8. ANAGNOSTES (Ἀναγνώστης) or LECTOR, the Reader, an ecclesiastical historian, generally supposed to have written in the reign of the emperor Justin I., or his successor Justinian I. No-	hing of his personal history is known, except that he held the subordinate ecclesiastical post of reader at Constantinople, and, as Suidas states, in the great circle (Suidas, s. v.). Suidas states that he brought down his history to the time of Justi-rian I.; and though nothing in the extant fragments of his works leads us to a later time than the accession of Justin I., we may not unreasonably admit the correctness of Suidas' statement, so far as to place the composition of the history of Theodore in the reign of Justinian. Theodore is quoted by Joannes Damascenus and by Theo-phanes, and in the Acta of the second Nicene (seventh General Council), all in the eighth century.
He was the author of two works on ecclesiastical history, which were sometimes both comprehended THEODORUS.

under the general title of 'Εκκλησιατικὴ Ἰστορία, Historia Ecclesiastica, and referred to as constituting one work. They are, in fact, two consecutive works on one subject. 1. 'Εκκλησιατικὴ Ἰστορία, a compendium of Church history from the time of Constantine the Great, in two books, compiled chiefly from Sozomen, with additions from Theodore. It is probable that Theodore intended that this compendium should comprehend the whole period included in the histories from which he made his extracts: but if so, the work was not completed; for it breaks off at the death of Constantius II. From its incomplete state it was probably the latter of Theodore's two works in the order of composition, and was apparently designed as an introduction to the other, 2. 'Εκκλησιατικὴ Ἰστορία, Historia Ecclesiastica. An original work on ecclesiastical history, also in two books, comprehending the period from the reign of Theodosius the younger, where Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodore end to the reign of Justin I, perhaps of Justinian I. From the circumstance of this work commencing from the point where the earlier ecclesiastical histories cease, it is inferred that the compendium just mentioned was intended to come down to the same point, and continue from Theodore. Its incompleteness occasioned a void of seventy years to be left between the close of one, and the commencement of the other of Theodore's works. The compendium is extant in MS., in the library of St. Mark at Venice, though the MS. is mutilated at the beginning. A copy (whether transcribed from the Venetian MS. is not known) was in the possession of Alliatus, who intended to publish it, but who never fulfilled his intention; nor has it ever been published. Alliatus sent a transcript of some portions to Valesius, who employed it in correcting the text of his edition of the original authors. Theodore's own history is lost, except some extracts ἀπὸ φωνῆς Νικηφόρου Καλλιστοῦ του Εαυτοῦθου, ἐκ τῶν Νικηφορίου Callisti Xanthopuli. As Nicephorus never in his own Ecclesiastical History quotes Theodore, except for statements contained in these extracts, it is fairly inferred by Valesius that the original was not in his possession, and consequently was extant from some one before his time, and were all the remains of Theodore's work then extant, at least all that he had access to. These extracts ('Εκκλησιατικῆς Εκκλησιατικῆς) were first published by Robert Stephens, with Eusebius and the other Greek ecclesiastical historians, fol. Paris, 1544: and again, with the Latin version of Christopher, fol. Geneva, 1612: but the best edition is that of Henri Valois, or Valesius; who published them with the ecclesiastical histories of Theodoret, Evagrius, and Philostorgius, fol. Paris, 1673, reprinted under the care of Reading, fol. Cambridge, 1720, and again at Turin, 1748. Valesius published not only the Excerpta of Nicephorus, but other some fragments of Theodore. Combebs, in his Originum Rerumque CPo-litanarum Mupulii, and Bandurris in his Imperia Orientale, have given an anonymous work Παραστάσεις σύμφωνοι χρονικοὶ, Brevis Demon-strations s. Exameron, Chronicon, in which are some and the Chronicle of a Theophanes, Theodorus, or Θεόδωρος Ασαγάκτης, Theodorus Lector, or Θεόδωρος Χρυσογόνος ἀναφερεῖσθαι ἀναγγελόμας, Theodorus Chronographus Lectionarius clarus (comp. Combebs, pp. 11, 12, 19, 35, ed. Paris, 1604 ; Bandurris, vol. i. p. iii. pp. 88, 89, 93, 102, ed. Paris, 1711). If these references are to one and the same writer, and that writer the subject of this article, as critics generally seem to admit, he must have written on other subjects than ecclesiastical history, and have lived at a considerably later period than is generally supposed. The extracts chiefly or wholly relate to the statues with which Constantinople was adorned; and one of them (p. 11, Combebs, p. 88, Bandurris) contains a curious incident in the personal history of the writer which shows him to have lived in the reign of the emperor Philippicus (A. d. 711—713), nearly two centuries after the reign of Justin I, in which Theodorus is usually placed. Another extract notices statues of the daughter and niece of the empress Sophia, wife of Justin II., which also implies the writer to have lived long after the time of Justin I. Though there seems no decisive reason for identifying the writer on the statues with the ecclesiastical historian, yet the name and title render their identity not improbable: and it may be observed that Damascenus, the earliest writer who has mentioned Theodore, belongs to a period somewhat later than the reign of Philippicus (Theod. Vit. Damasc.), was at this time a precocet of the Emperor Phocas, and was afterwards a companion of the emperor Procopius ad Theod. retum, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 518, p. 60, fol. i. p. 503; Dupin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccles. vol. iv. (6me série) p. 92, ed. Paris, 1698; Ceillers, Auteurs Savois., vol. xvi. p. 187, &c.; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 368, 435, &c., vol. x. p. 398; Schoell, Hist. de la Litterature Grecope Franf. vol. vii. p. 26, ed. Paris, 1825.

9. Of ANCYRA. Fabricius in two places (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 696, x. p. 339) mentions a Theodore of Ankyra, as being cited in the Catalogue of the Fathers on the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles: but the similarity of the names leads us to suspect that the author cited is Theodotus, who was bishop of Ankyra in the first half of the fifth century. The names Theodotus and Theodorus are in MSS. frequently confounded (comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 512). Dr. J. A. Cramer, in the Cataloga in Acta SS. Apostolorum, edited under his care at Oxford, 1693, has substituted (pp. 33, 227, 427, 438) that the name of Theodotus was the MSS. have that of "Theodore of Ancyras," or "Theodore the Monk," or "Theodore the Monk and Presbyter."

10. Of ANTIDA OF ANDIDA or more correctly of SANDIDA, a bishopric of the province of Pamphylia Secunda, of which Perga was the ecclesiastical metropolis (comp. Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. i. col. 1013, 1030). Allatius in several of his works has cited some passages from an Espositio Missae by "Theodorus Antidorum (s. Andidorum) Episcopus: but gives us no clue to the age of the writer except in one place, and there (J. H. Höttings Der Hours, &c., convexit, p. 12, 8vo. Rom. 1661) we only learn that Theodore was later than Photius, who lived in the ninth century. The citations of Allatius are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 372).

11. Of ANDZHEG (1—3). There were several patriarchs of Antioch of the name of Theodore. An Arian patriarch in the reign of the emperor Valens is called Dorotheus by Sozomen (H. E. vi. 27), but Theodorus by Philostorgius (H. E. ix. 14), who identifies him with Theodore of Heraclea (No. 42).
The orthodox Greeks do not recognise him; their first certain Theodorus I flourished 730 or 731 to 773 or 774; or later, Theodorus II, under the reign of the emperor John Tzinicesse; Theodorus III, in the first half of the eleventh century; Theodorus IV, a learned jurist [BALSAMO, THEODORUS] in the twelfth century; and Theodore V, of a more recent date. (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. ii.)

Theodoretus, successor of Theodore I, is sometimes erroneously called Theodorus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 396, vol. xii. p. 733.) An extract from a Ζωνσίων, Synodica Epistola, of Theodore of Antioch, evidently Theodore I., is cited by Theodore Studita in his Antiatherticus II. (Sirmond, Opera Varia, vol. v. p. 124.) Two works entitled Homilia de Sancto Theodoro Orientali, and In duodecim Prophecia, the first in Arabic, the second in Greek, both by a Theodore of Antioch, are extant in MS. (Le Quien, Oriens Christian. vol. ii. col. 746; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 396), but whether they are by the same person, and with which of the Theodores he is to be identified, is not known.

12. ASCIDAS (ὁ Ἀσκίας), a Cappadocian, first a monk of the convent of Nova Laura in Palestine, and afterwards archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia in the reign of Justinian I. He was probably appointed to his see in a. d. 536, or soon after, but resided little in his diocese, being much at court, where he enjoyed the favour and confidence of the emperor, and was much employed by him. He was also in favour with the empress Theodore, probably from his secretly holding the opinions of the Aneapuli. When the revival of the doctrines of Origen [ORIGINES] in the monasteries of Palestine, and especially in that monastery called Nova Laura, began to excite attention, Eustochius, patriarch of Jerusalem, a decided Anti-Origenist expelled from the convent of Nova Laura those of the monks who were known as Origenists, and compelled them, by his persecution, to fly to distant parts. In their dispersion, however, they diffused their views more widely, and their cause was warmly espoused by many persons, of whom Theodore Asidias was at once the most active and influential. He loudly protested against the conduct of Eustochius as both impious and unjust; so that Eustochius found it needful to send as delegates to Constantinople, to counteract Theodore’s influence, several monks of his own party, at the head of whom were Canon of the monastery of St. Saba and Rufus, abbot of the monastery of St. Theodosius. Theodore, with undaunted resolution, maintained the Origenists, but the emperor was persuaded by Pelagius the Deacon, legate of Pope Vigilius, and by Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople, to order the condemnation of certain propositions, extracted by the Palestinian monks from the works of Origen and to anathematize their author. The condemnation of Origen was a severe mortification to Theodore, who, however, availing himself of this example of the anathematizing of the dead, prevailed on the emperor, by holding out to him the prospect of thereby reconciling the Monophysites to the church, to issue a libellus, condemning the three decisions “tria Capitula” of the Council of Chalcedon, which recognised the orthodoxy of Theodoret of Cyrus, of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and of the Epistle of Ibas of Edessa; and to anathematise Theodore of Mopsuestia, a prelate much revered by the opposite party. This condemnation of the tria Capitula excited great disturbances in the church; Pope Vigilius resisted the condemnation for a time, and issued an act of deposition and excommunication against Theodore, which was of no effect. The emperor persisted; bribery and persecution were freely employed to obtain ecclesiastical support for the imperial edict; and so great was the confusion that even Theodore himself is said to have publicly acknowledged that both he and his great opponent the deacon Pelagius, the pope’s legate, deserved to be burnt alive for the scandals their struggle had occasioned.

This disturbance was only ended by the assembling of the fifth general (or second Constantinopolitan) council A. d. 553. That council condemned Origen and his supporters on the one hand; and Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas on the other. Theodore Asidias subscribed to these several anathemas. He died A. d. 558 at Constantinople; if, as is most likely, he is the bishop of Caesarea, whose death is noticed by Joannes Malalas, Chronographia, p. 234, ed. Oxford, p. 81, ed. Venice, p. 459, ed. Bonn. (Cyril. Syctophylus. Saba Vita, c. lxxii. & apud Coteler, Monumenta Eccles. Graec. vol. iii. p. 361, &c.; Evagrius, H. E. iv. 38; Liberat. Breviar. c. xxiii. xxiv.; Malalas, Chronographia, p. 234, ed. Oxford, p. 81, ed. Venice, p. 489, ed. Bonn; Concilia, vol. iii. pp. 1, &c. ed. Hardouin; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 378, &c.) The Testimonium of Theodore and of Cethgus the Patriarch as to the tergiversation of Vigilius in the matter of the tria Capitula was first published by Baluze in his Supplementum to the Concilia (Paris, 1683, and again 1707), and is given in the Concilia of Harduin, vol. iii. col. 184, and of Mansi, vol. ix. col. 363.

13. ASINARUS (ὁ Ἀσιναύς), a Neo-Platonic philosopher, a native of one of the towns which bore the name of Asine, probably of the Laconian Asine, on the coast, near the mouth of the Eurotas. He was a disciple of Porphyry, and one of the most eminent of the later Platonists. Proclus repeatedly mentions him in his commentaries on Plato (see the references in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 443), and frequently adds to his name some laudatory epithet, ὁ μέγας “the great,” ὁ ἀνθρώπος “the admirable,” ἕρως “the noble.” He wrote a work on the soul, now lost. It is cited by Nemesis of Eneas [NEMESIUS, No. 1] in his De Natura Hominis, cap. ii. De Anima, under this title of ὁ ἐφικτός αὐτής, τῇ ἀδοκίμῳ ἀνίσοις ὀνόματι. (Proclus, Comment. passim; Damascius, Vita Isidori, apud Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 242; Brucker, Hist. Critica Philosoph. Period ii. Pars i. Lib. i. c. 2. § 4, vol. ii. pp. 232, 249, ed. Leipzig. 1766; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 190, vol. ix. p. 443, vol. x. p. 573.)

14. OTHO, a native of the orator Isocrates [ISOCRATES] according to Photius. (Biblioth. Cod. 260.) Theodore was of the demos of Erchia, which was also the birth-place of the historian Xenophon.

15. THE ATHRIEST. [No. 32.]

16. BALSAMO. [BALSAMO.]

1. Of BYZANTIUM (1), a rhetorician or pleader of Byzantium. He is mentioned, but somewhat contemptuously by Plato (Phaedr. vol. iii. p. 266, ed. Steph. vol. i. pt. i. p. 81, ed. Bekker, p. 811, ed. Baier, 4to. Zürich. 1639) as “the most excellent trickster-out of a speech,” τὸν γὰρ ἐπικόους ἀιφοδίσον. He appears to have written a treatise on rhetoric, as Plato, in the passage just cited, refers to the minute subdivisions of an oration mentioned by Theodore (comp. Rufinus, De Compositione et Metris Oratorum). Cicero (Brut. c. 12) describes him as excelling rather in the theory than the practice of his art, "in arte subtillis, in ornaminibus autem jejunior." He was apparently contemporary with Plato. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (De Antiq. Orat.; de Isaeo, c. 19) speaks of him as antiquated, careless and superficial. He is curiously noticed by Quintilian (Institut. Orat. i. i.) and Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104). Suidas (s. v.) says he wrote Κατὰ Ἀθηναίου, Contra Andocidem, Κατὰ Θαρσύβαυχον, Contra Thrasybulum, and some other pieces, which are all now lost. (Diogenes Laërtius says (l. c.) there was another sophist Theodore, but does not mention whether he was a Byzantine or not. Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. vi. p. 138, vol. x. p. 382.)

18. Of Byzantium (2), styled Diaconus et Rhetor, a Monarchite of the time of Maximus the Confessor [Maximus Confessor]. He was the author (or representative in some synod) of Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, an appointment which indicates the esteem in which he was held. He was the translator of two brief 'ταυτικά, Diktationes, which, with the "Εμφάνεσες, Solutions of Maximus, are given by Comèbes in his edition of the works of that father. (Vol. ii. p. 116, &c. fol. Paris, 1675.)

19. Of Caras. [No. 2.]

20. Of Caras, one of the supporters of Photius [Photius, No. 3] in his contest with Ignatius [Ignatius, No. 3] for the patriarchate of Constantinople, in the ninth century. He is noticed here only to guard against his being confounded, as he has been by some writers, with Theodore Abucara [No. 2].

21. Of Chios, a Stoic philosopher mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104).

22. Cottontia, a Greek Hymnographer, who wrote Canon in Joanneum Euchætorum Episcoporum cogomento Mauropodem [Joannes, No. 58], of which Allatius (Contra Hottinger. p. 130) makes some extracts. As Joannes lived in the middle of the eleventh century, and the Cottontia of Theodore was written toward the end of his death, we are enabled to fix the time at which Theodore lived.

23. Of Colophon, a Greek poet of unknown age, author of a song entitled Αλήθης, "the wandering," because sung at the Athenian festival called Αλήθης or αἰώρα, instituted in commemoration of the wandering of Kirgona, in search of her father Icirus. (Pollux iv. 7, § 55.) [Icarius] Aristotle, in his account of the constitution of Colophon (νῦν Κολοφωνίων πολιτεία, apud Athen. xiv. p. 618) mentions a tradition that Theodore was a self-indulgent, luxurious person, which he thinks is apparent also from his poetry; and states that he perished by violence.

24. The Comedian (ὁ κωμικός), mentioned by Hesychius as being summoned, or rather nicknamed πελεθρεύς, "dung-diver." According to some accounts he was a poet. Nothing is known of his time or country. (Hesych. s. v. Pelēthreus.)

26. Of Constantinople (1—2). The list of Patriarchs of Constantinople comprehends two Theodores: Theodore I., from a. p. 676 to 678, when he was deposed, on what account is not known. But on the death of George, who had been appointed to succeed him, he recovered his patriarchate, which he held only for a short time, probably from A. D. 683 to 686. Theodore II. was succeeded by Irenicus or Copas; he had previously held the office of Summus Philosophorum, "Ταυτας των φιλοσοφων, and Chartophylax of the Great Church at Constantinople; and was patriarch for sixteen months only, A. D. 1213—1215, while Constantinople was in the hands of the Latin invaders. (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 392, 233, 277.)

27. Cronus; more correctly Diodorus Cronus. [Diodorus, Literary, No. 6.]

29. Of Cynopolis, a Greek rhetorician of uncertain date. Allatius published under his name an Ethypoeia (Ἡθοποιεία). The piece was, however, published by Gale among the Ethyposes of Severus [Skeuérus], to whom it is also assigned by Walz. (Gale, Rheteros Selecti, 8vo. Oxon. 1676, p. 219; Allatius, Exempla Variar Graecor. Rheter. ac Sophistorum, 8vo. Rome, 1641, p. 235; Walz, Rheteros Graeci, vol. i. p. 540, Stuttgart, 1832.)

30. Cynulus (ὁ Κυνοῦλος), one of the speakers in the De Philotheia of Athenaeus. (Epit. lib. i. p. 1, d., iv. p. 156, e., p. 159, e., p. 160, d., viii. p. 347, d., &c., xv. p. 668, b., ed. Casaub.) He is represented as a Cynic philosopher, a native of Megalopolis, and as laying aside his true name of Theodore for the epithet Cynulus. Whether he was a real or imaginary personage is not known. The epithet Cynulus, "one whom the Cynics (κύις) followed," was borne by other teachers of the Cynic philosophy, e. g. Carneus.

31. Of Cyrene, a Pythagorean philosopher of the age of Pericles. According to Proclus (In Euclid. Element. Lib. I. Commentarius, lib. ii. p. 18, ed. Grym. fol. Basil. 1533), he was a little younger than Anaxagoras [Anaxagoras], and was eminent as a mathematician. Apuleius (De Dogmat. Platonis, lib. i. s. De Phoeb. Natural, hast long ab init., and Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 6, comp. ii. 103) state that Plato went to Cyrene to study geometry under Theodorus the mathematician, apparently the subject of this article. He is one of those enumerated by Iamblichus (De Pythag. Vita, c. ult.) in his catalogue of the eminent Pythagoreans. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. i. p. 076, vol. x. p. 505.)

32. Cyrenaicus, a philosopher of the Cyrenaic school [Aristippus], to one branch of which he gave the name of "Theodorians," Theodoret. He is usually designated by ancient writers Areus (ο Αρείος), the Atheist, a name for which that of Theus (Θεός) was afterwards substituted. He was apparently a native of Cyrene (comp. Diog. Laërt. ii. 103), and was a disciple of the younger Aristippus (ib. ii. 86), who was grandson of the elder (Suidas, s. v. Ἀριστίππος) and more celebrated Aristippus, by his daughter Arete [Aristippus; Arete]. Theodorus belonged to the age of Alexander and his successors, a circumstance which, as well as the opposite character of his opinions, distinguishes him from the subject of the preceding notice. He heard the lectures of a number of philosophers besides Aristippus; as Aniceris [Aniceris], and Dionysius the dialectician (Laërt. ii. 98), Zeno of Citium, Bryson, and Pyrrhon (Suidas, s. v. Θεόδωρος); but not Crates, as Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 139) has from a hasty and inaccurate interpretation of a passage in Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 23) erroneously stated. Nor could he have been, as Suidas states (s. v. Αρεάτης), a hearer of Socrates. He was banished from Cyrene, but on what occasion is not stated (Laërt. ii. 103); and it is from the saying recorded of him on this occasion, "Ye men of Cyrene, ye do ill in banishing me from Cyrene to Greece" (ib.), as well as from his being a disciple of Aristippus, that we infer that he was a native of Cyrene. Of his subsequent history we have no connected account; but unconnected anecdotes of him show that he was at Athens, where he narrowly escaped being cited before the court of Areopagus. The influence, however, of Demetrius Phalereus shielded him (ib. ii. 101); and this incident may therefore probably be placed during Demetrius' ten years' administration at Athens, B.C. 317 -307 [Demetrius, literary, No. 23]. As Theodorus was banished from Athens, and was afterwards in the service of the Ptolemy son of Lagus, first king of the Macedonian dynasty in Egypt, it is not unlikely that he shared the overthrow and xile of Demetrius. The account of Amphilocrates cited by Laërtius (ii. 101), that he was condemned to drink hemlock and so died, is doubtless an error. While in the service of Ptolemus, Theodorus was sent on an embassy to Lysimachus, whom he offended by the freedom of his remarks. One answer which he made to a threat of crucifixion which Lysimachus had used, has been celebrated by many ancient writers (Cic. Quaest. Tusc. i. 43; Senec. de Tranq. An. c. 14; Val. Max. vi. 2, extern. 3): "Employ such threats to those courtiers of yours; for it matters not to Theodorus whether he rots on the ground or in the air." From the court or camp of Lysimachus he returned apparently to that of Ptolemy (Diog. Laërt. ii. 102). We read also of his going to Corinth with a number of his disciples (ibid.) : but this was perhaps only a transient visit during his residence at Athens. He returned at length to Cyrene, and lived there, says Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 103), with Marius. This Roman name is very questionable; and Grattan,apul. Mag. Obs. in Diog. Laërt. L.c. not improbably conjectures that we should read Magus, who was stepson of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, and ruled over Cyrene for fifty years (from B.C. 300 to c. 258), either as viceroy or king. The account of Laërtius tends to the inference that Theodorus ended his days at Cyrene. Athenaeus (xii. p. 611, a) states that he died a violent death, but this is probably only a repetition of the erroneous statement of Amphilocrates already noticed. Various characteristics anecdotes of Theodorus are preserved by the ancients (especially by Laërtius, ii. 97-103, 116; Plutarch, De Animis Tranquill. Opp. vol. vii. p. 629, De Exaëlia, Opp. vol. viii. p. 391, ed. Reiske; Val. Max. l. c. Philo Jud. Quod omnis probus liber, c. 18, vol. ii. p. 465, ed. Mangey, p. 884, ed. Pfeiffer. s. Paris, vol. v. p. 295, ed. Richter, Leipsic, 1828; Suidas, s. v. Θεόδωρος), from which he appears to have been a man of keen and ready wit, unrestrained either by fear or a sense of decency.

It has been already noticed that Theodorus was the founder of that branch of the Cyrenaic sect which was called after him "Theodorei" (Θεόδωρεος), "Theodoreans." The general characteristics of the Cyrenaic philosophy are described elsewhere [Aristippus]. The opinions of Theodorus, as we gather them from the perplexed statement of Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 98, foll.) partook of the lax character of the Cyrenaic school. He taught that the great end of human life is to obtain joy and avoid grief, the one the fruit of prudence, the other of folly; that prudence and justice are good, their opposites evil; that pleasure and pain are indifferent. He made light of friendship and patriotism, and affirmed that the world was his country. He taught that there was nothing really disgraceful in theft, adultery, or sacrilege; but that they were branded only by public opinion, which had been formed in order to restrain fools. But the great charge against him was atheism. "He did away with all opinions respecting the Gods," says Laërtius (ib.), but some critics doubt whether he was even an atheist, others doubt whether there was the existence of the deities of popular belief. The charge of atheism is sustained by the popular designation of Theodorus "Atheus," by the authority of Cicero (de Nat. Deor. i. 1), Laërtius (l. c.), Plutarch (De Placit. Philos. i. 7), Sextus Empiricus (Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. iii. p. 162, ed. Fabric. 1718, p. 172, ed. Bekker, 1842), and some of the Christian Fathers; while some other authorities (e. g. Clem. Alex. Protrept. ad Genes. p. 7, ed. Syllburg. pp. 20, 21, ed. Pott. vol. i. p. 20, ed. Klotz. Leipsic, 1831) speak of him as only rejecting the popular theology. The question is discussed and the authorities cited by Reimann (Hist. Atheism., sect. ii. c. xxiv. § 3), and Brucker (Hist. Crit. Philos. pars ii. lib. ii. c. iii. § 11).
Theodore wrote a book Πελθ Θεών, De Dies, which Laërtius who had seen it, says (ii. 97) was not to be contemned; and he adds that it was said to have been the source of many of the statements or arguments of Epicurians. According to Suidas (s. v. Θεόδωρος) he wrote many works both on the doctrines of his sect and on other subjects. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 199, 615, vol. x. pp. 373, 383.)

33. DAPHNOPATES. [Daphnopates.]

34. DESCALPITA (Δεκαπαλίτη), called also PATRICIUS and QVAESTOR, lived under Constantine VII. Porphyrigenitus, several of whose Novellae were drawn up by our Theodore. (Codinus, De Originibus C Politianis, p. 78, ed. Paris, p. 155, ed. Bonn. cum notis Lambecii ; Lambeck. De Biblioth. Caesareae, vol. vi. pars i. col. 37.)

35. Of Edessa, was first of that city, and then archdeacon (Cave says archbishop) of the Church there. Possin and Cave place him in the twelfth century; and Cave observes that the capture of Edessa by the Saracens prevents our placing him later. Εἰκ. Κατηχηθείσας Θεοδόρου Edesseni L. were given in a Latin version subjoined to Pontanus's edition of the works of Symeon of St. Mamux [SYMMD, No. 16], Ingoldstadt, 1603, and were reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xii. pars i. p. 620, vol. ii. p. 1618; in the Bibliothecae Patriar. Supplementum of Morel, vol. i. Paris, 1639; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxii. p. 752, fol. Lyon, 1677. But they were given more fully, Κατηχηθείσας Θεοδορος, and in the Greek original as well as in a Latin version, in the Θεωρίας Αρχαιος of Possin, p. 345, 4to. Paris, 1684. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 337 ; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. I101, vol. ii. p. 185.)

36. EPGRAMMATICO PORTA (ποιητῆς ἐνγραμμάτων), mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104), but without any notice of time or country. Suidas and Eudocia (s. v.) mention a Theodore, a poet, author of various pieces, especially one addressed Εἷς Κλεισάπρατα, Αδ Κλεισάπρατα. Pollux also (Onomasticon, iv. 7, 2) mentions a Theodore of Colophon, a poet; but whether these writers refer to the same individual is not certain. Two very short Επγραμματα are assigned to "Theodorus Proconclus," ΡΩΠΟ, I10 Tal. Gr. vol. xi. pp. 140, 220, ed. Stephan. I10vol. 203, 320, ed. Weichel ; Aneletta, Brunck, vol. iii. p. 6, vol. ii. p. 227, ed. Jacobs), but we have no means of knowing whether he is one of those mentioned above. Jacobs identifies him with a Theodore Illustrius, twice proconsul, to whose bust or statue Agathias wrote an Επγραμμα εἰς εἰκόνα Θεόδωρου Αὐλοκτονίας καὶ δῖς ἀνθυπατόν, Ad Imaginem Theodiir Iuoriri et bis Proconsul. Anth. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 616, ed. Jacobs), and whom, therefore, Jacobs (vol. xiii. p. 960) assigns to the age of Justinian I. These various Theodori are to be distinguished from Cyrus Theodorus, Κύρος Θεόδωρος [No. 64], whose Επγραμματα, in which all the chapters of the Old and New Testaments are enumerated, were published at Basel, a. d. 1686. (Jacobs, l. c.)

37. OF GADARA (Θεόδωρος Γαδαρέως), an eminent rhetorician of the age of Augustus. His surname indicates his birth-place, Gadara, in the country east of the Jordan. (See also Strabo, Geogr. lib. xvi. p. 759, Causab.) He is said to have been originally a slave (Suidas). He appears to have settled at Rhodes, where Tiberius, afterwards emper., during his retirement (from b. c. 6 to a. d. 2) to that island, was one of his hearers. (Quintil. Institut. Orat. lib. iii. c. i. §§ 17, 18 ; comp. Seneca, Suidas), s. v. Θεόδωρος Γαδαρέως.) Whether his settlement at Rome preceding or followed at Apollodorus is uncertain: it is likely that it did, and that Tiberius received instruction from him in rhetoric in his boyhood, as well as in mature years, during his retreat at Rhodes. By this supposition we may reconcile the statement given above from Quintilian with the following remarkable passage from Suettus (Tiber. c. 57) :— "His (Tiberius') cruel and sluggish temperament did not escape notice even in his boyhood; Theodore of Gadara, his teacher in rhetoric, seems to have been the first who sagaciously perceived and aptly expressed it by a comparison, calling him from time to time when reproving him (πηναλ αλματι περιμοφινων), 'clay tempered with blood.'" Theodorus was one of the most eminent rhetoricians of his time (comp. Juvenal, Sat. viii. 177); and was in fact the founder of a certain school of rhetoricians who were called "Theoredei (Quintil. l. c. ; comp. Strab. Geog. vi. p. 625, Causab.), from distinguished from the "Apollodori" or followers of Apollodorus of Pergamus, who had been the tutor of Augustus Caesar at Apollonia. (Apollodorus, No. 22.) Hermogoras the rhetorician, surnamed Carion [Hermagoras, No. 2] was a pupil of Theodore. (Quintilian, l. c. § 19.) Theodore wrote many works. (Quintil. l. c. c. 18.) Suidas (s. v.) and Eudocia (apud Villoison. Anecdota Graec. vol. i. p. 230) mention the following:— 1. Πελθ των ἐφοιτησίων ξυνωνύμων των Aμβατάς (ii. 8), Libri tres de sua vocis quibus quaeruntur. 2. Πελθ ιστορίας ας, Η Αυτικής Liber unus. 3. Πελθ οίκεως εν, Νες The Dhea L,eris. 4. Πελθ διαλέκτων διαλέκτως καὶ Αριηλέπος β., De Dialectorum Similitudine et Demonstratione Liber duo. 5. The list shows that Theodore was a man of varied attainments. His works are all lost, a few fragments are preserved, by Quintilian, whose frequent references to or citations from Theodore (Institut. lib. i. c. xv. §§ 16, 11. c. vi. §§ 2, 36, xi. c. §§ 3, 26, lib. iv. c. § 23, lib. v. c. xii. § 59) show the reputation he had attained. He is also cited by Longinus (De Sublinit. c. 2), Theon (Progrmmastam. c. xii.), and perhaps by Demetrius, miscalled Phile-lines (De Interpretatione, c. ccxxxvii). Antonius, a son of Theodore of Gadara, became a senator in the time of Adrian (Suidas, l. c.). (Langbaine, ad Longin. c. ii. p. 24, ed. Oxford, 1638; Manlg. ad Dier- Lact. l. i. 104 ; Fabric. Bibl. 39. GRAMMATICON. Athenæus repeatedly cites either two works of this Theodore, or the same work, under two somewhat different titles, "Aratikê Phle- ron, Attiko Atticô Glosaie, and "Aratikê Phelai, Attika Voes. 43. Of Hermopolis, a Greek jurist. See below.
44. Hymnographus. [Studita.]
45. Hyrtaceus, a native probably not of Hyrtaucus or Artacina in Crete, but of Artace, near Cyzicus, on the Propontis. He lived in the time of the emperor Andronicus the elder, and occupied at Constantinople the office of superintendent of the public teachers of rhetoric and belles lettres. He was well acquainted with the works of the ancient poets, as is abundantly testified by his extant writings, which are full of quotations from them, though these are not always of the most appropriate kind. The dictio of his address to the Virgin is a close imitation of the hymn of Callimachus to Diana; and in his panegyric on Saint Anna he has introduced the fable of Niobe. There are still extant by him ninety-three letters to different persons; a congratulatory address to the emperor Andronicus the elder, on his return to Constantinople; three funeral orations, one on the emperor Michael Palaeologus the younger, who died a. D. 1320, another on the empress Irene, the second wife of Andronicus the elder, and the third on Nicephorus Chummus, the historical value of which is greatly impaired by their rhetorical style. They contain a plentiful sprinkling of biblical and Homeric passages. His panegyric on the Virgin Mary, his oratorical description of the garden of Saint Anna near Nazareth, and a panegyric on Anna Thaumaturgus, are still in MS. His letters were published by Laporte du Theil, in the Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la bibli. du roi, vol. p. 709, &c., vol. vi. p. 1. The four orations are printed in Boissonade's Anecedota Graeca, vol. i. p. 248—292. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 397; Schöll, Geschichte der griech. Lit. vol. iii. p. 151.)
48. Lector. [No. 8.]
49. MALLIUS OF MALLIUS, a contemporary of St. Augustin, who dedicated to him his work De Vita beata. He was consul in a. D. 399. A Latin work by him (De Rerum Natura) is still extant, though not published. A life of Theodore, written by Albertus Rubenius, was published by Grævius.
THEODORUS.

50. Mathematicus. [No. 31.]

51. Mechanicus, a person of whom nothing more is known than that Proclus addressed to him his treatise De Providentia et Fato. There was a younger mechanic of this name who lived in the time of Justinian, and to whom Leontius dedicated his treatise on the sphere. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 400.)

52. Melitenota, a native apparently of Melitene in Armenia, filled the offices of Sacellarius Magnus and Chief Teacher (Biblia Graecor. των διδασκάλων των Θεοτοκοῦ) in the great church at Constantinople towards the close of the twelfth century. He was the author of a work on astronomy, the introduction and first chapter of which were published by Ismael Bulloaldus, appended to his edition of Ptolemaeus, De jucundiae Facultate et Anima Principat, Paris, 1663, and reprinted by Fabrictius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 401, &c.).

53. Metochita. [Metochita.]

54. Of Miletus, a Stoic philosopher mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 104).

55. Monothelita. [Byzantius, Pharanitas.]

56. Mopsuestenus, bishop of Mopsuestia, was born at Antioch, of distinguished and wealthy parents. Together with Joannes Chrysostomus he studied rhetoric under Libanius, and afterwards philosophy under Andragathus. At an early age he embraced the monastic life, after the example of his friend Chrysostom, by whom he was strengthened in his purpose of adhering to the monastic discipline, when he was on the point of marrying a lady named Hermione. Two of the letters of Chrysostom, addressed to Theodorus on this subject, are still extant. Theodorus studied sacred literature with great diligence under Flavianus of Antioch, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Craterius. From Antioch he removed to Tarsus, and about the year 394 succeeded Olympius, as bishop of Mopsuestia, in Cilicia. He was present at the council held in A. D. 394 at Constantinople, and subsequently at several others. He died in A. D. 429, after having filled the office of bishop for thirty-six years, and was succeeded by Meletius. For fifty years he had occupied a conspicuous position as a preacher and writer in the Eastern Church, and had distinguished himself as the opponent of the Arians, Apollinarists, and other heretics. His own theological position is a subject which has given rise to a great deal of discussion, into the details of which we cannot here enter. Even during his lifetime he was accused of favouring the heresy of Pelagius, and is said to have found it necessary to establish his reputation for orthodoxy, by a retraction of his suspicious expressions. He, at all events, remained un molested in the communion of the Church. After his death, however, the Nestorians appealed to his writings in confirmation of their opinions, and at the fifth oecumenical council (A. D. 553) Theodorus and his writings were condemned. He found, however, many warm defenders, especially Facundus. [Facundus.] Among those who most bitterly assailed him and his writings were Leontius, Cyril of Alexandria, Rabulas of Edessa, and others. His works were held in great repute among the Syrian Churches, and many of them were translated into Syriac, Arabic, and Persian. His memory was revered among the Nestorians, several distinguished ecclesiastics are mentioned as his disciples, as Nestorius, Joannes of Antioch, Andreas of Samosata, Maria the Persian, Theodoretus bishop of Cyrus, Rufinus the Syrian, and Barsumas the Persian. His brother Polychronius was bishop of Apamea.

Theodorus took an active interest in the Augustinian controversy, and wrote a work on the doctrine of original sin, directed especially against Jerome. (Photius, Cod. 177.) Though from his antagonism to the theology of Augustine he naturally approximated somewhat to that of Pelagius, his opinions differed from those of the latter in several most important respects, especially with respect to the necessity and effects of Christ's work. This he regarded as intended not so much to restore a ruined nature as to enable a created and imperfect nature to realise the true end of its existence: its new creation consisting in its being raised into a higher sphere, and rendered capable of a development overshooting the limits of finite nature, — a divine life exalted above temptation and change, through union with God. In this purpose he held that all intelligent beings were included, and therefore of course denied the eternity of future punishment, and, if he carried his principles out consistently, his scheme must have admitted of the restoration of the fallen angels. His view of Christ's nature bore an analogy to his conceptions of the destiny of man. He accepted the doctrine of the incarnation of the Divine Word, but looked upon the moral development of the human nature of Christ as progressive; that development being more certain and rapid than it is generally, from the indwelling Divine Word aiding his human will, though not superseding it. But the exaltation of Christ's humanity to divine perfection and immutability, while commencing from his birth, was not complete till his resurrection.

Theodorus was a somewhat voluminous writer.

1. One of his earliest works was that Peri ἐναρκτησεως του μονογενος, against the Arians, Eunomians and Apollinarists (Marius Mercator, ii. p. 259).

2. Facundus (iii. 2) quotes from the thirteenth book of a work which he entitles Mystics. 3. Photius (Cod. 4. 177) mentions a work Ενε ϑεολογία ματκ Ενεωνοιν Ενεευ κηθεν Ενεσυν τον ανθρωπουν, in twenty-five or twenty-eight books (unless, as some suppose, Photius speaks of two distinct works). 4. De adsumto et adsumto, fragments of which are extant (Collect. iv. Synodi v.). The preface is given by Facundus (x. 1). 5. Peri μη παιζετατε, Phot. (Cod. 91), in three books. 6. A work in five books. Περι τουν ἀνθρωπουν φυσιν και ον γονιμων τον ανθρωπου, in which he especially attacked Jerome, and indirectly at least, Augustine (Photius, Cod. 177). From a misunderstanding of the expressions in Photius, Salmassius was led into the error of supposing that Theodorus prepared another Greek version of the Scriptures. 7. Theodorus was especially celebrated as a commentator on the Scriptures. In this department he seems to have begun to exert his powers at a very early age. (Leontius, lib. 3. cont. Nest. et Est. p. 696.) In his expositions he aimed at educating the literal sense of passages, avoiding the allegorical interpretations of Origenes and his followers. He appears to have written upon almost all the books of the Bible, though he rejected the canonical authority of several (the Book of Job, the Canticles, the Epistle of James) the Second and Third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude]. Fragments of these commentaries are preserved in the Acta of the fifth Council and elsewhere. His commentaries on the Twelve Minor Prophets are said to be still extant. Those on Jonah, Othniel, Nahum, and the precises to those on Amos, Zachariah, Haggai and Hosea, were published by Angelo Mai (Script. veterum nova Collect. vol. i. sect. ii. p. 41—104). The fragments of the commentary on Luke, preserved in the Catena, were published by Münzer (1738). Photius (Cod. 331) mentions Theodorus's ἑρμηνεία τής κτίσεως, fragments of which are extant.

8. A work on the Nicene creed is quoted in the Acta of the fifth council (Collat. iv. p. 81). A treatise addressed to candidates for baptism (ibid.). 10. A confession of faith is extant (Act. VI. Concil. Ephes. tom. i. p. 1515, ed. Hard.), which is by some ascribed to Theodorus, by others to Nestorius. 11. A work against the allegorical interpretation of Scripture is mentioned by Ebed Jesus and Facundus (iii. 6). 12. Theodorus also compiled a liturgy, which was adopted by the Nestorians. 13. Few other treatises are mentioned by Ebed Jesus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 346, &c.; Neander, Allgemeine Geschichte der Christlichen Religion und Kirche, vol. ii. Abt. ii. and iii.)

57. NEOCARASIRENSIS. [Gregorius Théodemos-Turgus.] 58. Son of Theodorus, bishop of Jerusalem, was pope from Nov. 3, A. D. 642, to April 20, A. D. 649. There is still extant a letter addressed by him to Paulus, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the matter of one Pyrrhus, a Monothelitist; and likewise a letter addressed to the bishops who consecrated Paulus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 427, vol. xii. p. 707.)

59. PATRIARCHA. [No. 26.] 60. Of Perinthus. [No. 42.] 61. Bishop of Petra in Galilee, flourished in the sixth century, and was the author of a life of the archimandrite Theodosius, whose disciple he was. His Canonicon also is quoted by Nic. Comnenus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 337, 428.)

62. PHARANITES, bishop of Pharum, belonged to the Monothelite party. He was one of those condemned by the sixth oecumenical council, held at Constantinople. We find ascribed to him a treatise περὶ οὐσίας καὶ φύσεως, ὑποστάσεως τε καὶ προσώπου, ἀ λόγος πρὸς Χριστόν, and another εἰς τὰς ἑρμηνείας τῶν πατρικῶν χρήσεως, some fragments of which remain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 428.)

63. PRODOMUS. There were two of this name.

1. A writer on canonical law, whose ἑρμηνείας of the canons of the councils is repeatedly quoted by Nic. Comnenus and others. Nothing is known of him except that he seems to have lived a long time before Balsamo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 428, vol. xii. p. 206.) There is some confusion in the notices contained in Fabricius. In vol. x. p. 429, and vol. xii. p. 206, he speaks of this Prodomus as τὸν τῶν ἱερῶν κανώνων πρώτον σαρματιστήν, and as the author of an exposition of the canons or hymns appropriated to the demoniacal festivals; while in vol. viii. p. 142, note h, that work is assigned to the following Theodorus Prodomus.

64. PRODOMUS (2), or, as he is sometimes called in the MSS., Theodorus Prochoroprodromus, a monk who lived in the first half of the twelfth century. On entering upon the monastic life he received the name of Hilarius. He was held in great repute by his contemporaries as a scholar and philosopher, and received the appellation of Ῥαὸς (equivalent to κωπῶν in the Greek of the Middle Ages). He wrote upon a variety of subjects,—philosophy, grammar, theology, history, and astronomy, and in particular was a somewhat prolific poet. Several of his compositions have come down to us, and some have been published. The following are extant: 1. A metrical romance in nine books, on the loves of Rhodanthe and Dosicles. It is written in iambic metre, and exhibits no great ability. The reader would look in vain for anything like a natural progress in the action, or unity in the characters. Not only are we introduced at once in medias res, but instead of narrating on suitable opportunities what had preceded, Dosicles is made to tell what had gone before, beginning at the end, and interweaving the preceding parts of the narrative into his story. There is only one edition of this work. (Paris, 1625.) Poor as the poem is, however, it found an imitator. There is extant an iambic poem, also in nine books, on the loves of Drosilla and Clarice, by Nicetas Eugenianus, which has been erroneously ascribed to Theodorus Prodomus. 2. A poem entitled Calomonymochia, in iambic verse, on the battle of the mice and cat, in imitation of the Homeric Batrachomyomachia. Victory declares itself on the side of the mice, the cat being killed by the fall of a beam. This piece is often appended to the editions of Aesop and Babrius. It has also been edited by K. D. Ilgen, in connection with the Homeric hymns. (Halle, 1796.) 3. Η ἀνδόνυμος φαλα, a poem in iambic senarii. Friendship relates how Human Life, to whom she had been married, had repudiated her by the advice of his slave Folly, and given her hand to Enmyt. After a long conversation, depicting the operation of Friendship in the world, the upshot is that Friendship marries the stranger to whom her narrative is addressed.

This dialogue, with the translation of Conrad Gesner, has frequently been appended to the editions of Stobæus. A separate edition was published by J. F. Morell. (Paris, 1549.) It is also edited by Hunter and Guntius in the collection of the epigrams of Theodorus (Basel, 1536), and by J. Erard, with some other small poems by the same author. (Leipzig, 1598.) 4. A poem of above 1000 lines, divided into two books, in which Theodorus complains to the emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned from 1143 to 1180) of his extreme poverty, and begs him to withdraw him from the misery which he had to endure in his convent, while those placed over him indulged in debaucheries. About forty lines at the beginning and end of each book are written in old Greek, the remainder in a dialect resembling the modern Greek. The poem has been published by Koray, in the first volume of the Alata (Paris, 1829).

5. Αμάρωτος, ή γέφυρας ἑστωτε, a dialogue in prose, published by Gaultin, together with No. 1, and also by De la Porte du Theil (Notices et Extraits, vol. viii. 1810). 6. A Dissertation on Wisdom, being an invective against the saying ή πεντα γέφυρας, published by F. Morell. (Paris, 1608.) 7. Epigrammata, described more fully as Τετράστυχα αμάρλα καὶ ἀναίος εἰς τὰ κεφαλαπώδα προβεντα ἐν τῷ γραφή, consisting of poetical summaries of the subject-matter of the

65. ΡΗΘΥΝΙΣΚΗΣ, lived in the middle of the seventh century in the monastery of Rhaithu, near Elin, in Palestine. He was the author of a work on the incarnation of Christ, entitled, Προ- παρασκευή τις καὶ γνωματικά τῷ βουλόμενῳ μαθείν τίς θρόσος τῆς θείας ενανθρωπήσεως καὶ οἰκονομίας, καθ’ ὑπὲρτατα καὶ τίνα τὸ πρῶτο τοις ταυτόν μη ὀρθῶς νοοῦντος λεγόμενα παρὰ τῶν τῆς ἱεράτης τροφίων, the object of which was to defend the orthodox view against the heresies of Manes, Paul of Samosata, Apollinaris, Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Nestorius, and Eutyches. Comnēnus considers Theodorus of Rhaithu to be the same with the monk Theodorus, to whose inquiries Maximus the Confessor wrote a reply. (Maxim. opp. vol. ii. p. 151.) It is also doubtful whether Theodorus of Rhaithu was identical or not with the Theodorus Presbyter, whose treatise to prove the genuineness of the writings attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, is mentioned by Photius (Cod. 1). The treatise of Theodorus on the In- carnation was first published in the Latin translation of Godfr. Tilmann (Paris, 1566). It was first published in Greek by Theodorus Beza, in 1576. The best edition is that by Carzhov (Hels- muth, 1779-80). Three of the smaller works of Theodorus Abuam have by some been erroneously attributed to Theodorus of Rhaithu. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 430; Cave, Hist. Lit. SS. Eccles. vol. i. p. 587.)

66. Of SAMAITHARACE, a writer from whom Pto- lemaeus Hephæstion quotes the statement that Jupiter, after his birth, laughed for seven days con- tinuously, and that hence seven came to be regarded as a perfect number. It is perhaps this Theodorus who is quoted by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 264). Comp. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 503.

67. SANTABARENUS, the contemporary and friend of Photius. For some account of him the reader is referred to the article PHOTIUS. [Vol. III. p. 350.] This Theodorus was also noted as a composer of hymns.

68. Bishop of Scytopolis, the author of a treatise against Origines, presented to the emperor Justinian. This treatise was published by Mont-avin, (Codal. Bibl. Cisitinae, p. 94—96. Paris, 1715.)

69. STUDITA, abbot of the monastery of Stud- ium, was born at Constantinople in A.D. 759. In 781 he entered the monastery of Saecundium, which was presided over by his uncle Plato; and on the resignation of the latter, succeeded him in 794. Theodorus was one of the most vehement opposers of the Iconoclasts, and his zeal procured him considerable reputation, especially with the monks. In 795; when the emperor Constantius married Theodote, Theodorus took upon himself to anathematize that emperor, and to denounce the patriarch Tarasius, and in the following year was scourged and banished to Thessalonica. On the death of the emperor in 797, Theodorus was brought back to Constantinople with great pomp, and was regarded with great favour by Irene, to whom he offered the most abject flattery. In the following year, in consequence of the incursions of the Saracens, he removed to the monastery of Studium, within the city. In 806, when Nicephorus was made patriarch, and the abbot Josephus, who had sanctioned the marriage of Constantius, was restored to the communion of the Church by a council held at Constantinople, the wrath of Theo- dorus was again excited, and he refused all communion with the patriarch. He was joined in his violent proceedings by a large number of monks, and, when reproved by the Pope Leo, replied in an insolent and angry tone. These proceedings led to his being again banished in 809, together with his brother Josephus and the abbot Plato, to an island near Byzantium. In 811, on making his submission to Nicephorus, he was set at liberty.
by Michael Rangabe. Two years afterwards, when the emperor Leo the Armenian issued an edict against the worship of images, Theodorus, backed by a considerable number of monks, set the edict at defiance, openly celebrated processions of images, and incited the people to sedition. He was at first placed in confinement; but as he did not cease to send out encyclical letters against the emperor, he was subsequently removed to various prisons, and at length taken to Smyrna, and there closely confined. In 821 he was set at liberty by the emperor Michael Balbus, and resumed his post at the head of his monastery. His imprisonments had not taught him moderation. His furious zeal for image worship soon broke out again. In 824, indignant that the emperor would not take strong measures against the Iconoclasts, he favoured the machinations of Thomas against the emperor, and when the attempts of Thomas were suppressed, found it necessary to retire to Constantinople. After wandering about in several places, he at length settled in the island Chalcite, where he died in 826, on the 11th of November. Those who wish for detailed information respecting the piety and miracles of Theodorus, may consult Baronius (Annales, vol. ix. a. 795—826), who derived his materials from a life of Theodorus by Joannes, or some other Greek writer. In one MS. this life is attributed to a monk of the name of Michaelis, and under his name it is published in the fifth volume of the works of Sirmundus (Paris, 1896), where also will be found the following liturgical remains of Theodorus.

1. An oration on behalf of images, delivered before the emperor Leo. 2. Διαθήκη, a confession of faith, written by Theodorus shortly before his death, and accompanied by various precepts respecting the monastic life, intended for the benefit and guidance of his successor in the office of abbot. 3. Βίοι δογματικοί, en y στεφόλ λόγοι γα και αντιφημια. Three discourses against the Iconoclasts. 4. Έλεγχοι κατά άντικινα, where Theodorus, a refutation of certain iambic acrostics composed by Joannes, Ignatius, Sergusius, and Stephanus, against the worship of images. 5. Προθάματα των προσκυνήματος. 6. Κατά εἰκονομάχους κεφάλαια ἐπίτα. 7. Ἐπιστολή πρὸς Πλάτων περὶ τῆς προσκυνήματος τῶν σεκτῶν εἰκόνων. 8. Two books of epistles, comprising altogether 276. Almost twice as many however are extant. In one MS. of the Coislinian library there are 548.

These letters form a collection of considerable historical value not only for the life of Theodorus, but with reference to the disputes which agitated the Church in his time. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 432. &c.) has given a list of those to whom these letters are addressed, amounting to 284. 9. Ημείοι εἰς διάθροος ὑποθέσεως, epigrammatic poems in iambic metre on various subjects. The following are the most important: (a) It was at first placed in gentle confinement: 10. Διαθήκη περὶ τῶν καταργήσεως τῶν ἁγίων εἰκόνων, published in the works of Damascenus (Basil. 1575, fol.). There is a Latin version in the Bibliotheeca Patrum (Paris, 1589, 1644 and 1654, vol. iii.). 11. Επιστάμους εἰς Πλάτων τῶν ἀυτοῦ πνευματικῶν πατέρα; published in Greek by Henschen and Papebroche (Acta Senticorum, vol. i. April, p. xlvii., and in Latin, p. 366). Other Latin translations are also found. 12. Αἴγιος εἰς τὴν προσκυνήσει τοῦ τιμοῦ καὶ Κοσμοῦ σταυροῦ εἰς τὴν μεταφορήσει, published in Greek with the translation of J. Greter, in the work of the latter De Grace (vol. ii. p. 267). There is also a Latin translation in the Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. xiv. p. 900). 13. Καρον εἰς τὴν σταυροπροκάζησιν, a hymn on the adoration of the cross, published by Greter (Bibl. vol. iii. p. 407). 14. Καρον φαλάγ- μαν εἰς τὴν χριστιανὴν ἁγίαν εἰκόνα, published in Greek and Latin by Baromus (Cassell's Classical Lexicon, a. 842) and in Latin in the Bibl. Patrum (Lugd. vol. xiv. p. 589). It is questionable, however, whether this composition is authentic, as it indicates a much more peneable recognition of the adoration of images than was the case in the time of Theodorus. It has been supposed therefore that it is the composition of a Theodorus of later date. 15. Η μεθηρίαν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ Παρθολόμαου, a Latin version of this will be found in the Bibl. Patr. (Colom. vol. ix., Paris, vol. ii., Lugd. vol. xiv. p. 850). 16. Εγκαζομένων περὶ τοῦ ἁγίου Βαρθολομαίου, a Latin translation was published by Lucas Dacherius (Spicilegium, vol. ii. p. 13, Paris, 1659), and by Combeis (Bibl. Concil. vol. vii. p. 755). 17. Εγκαζομένων εἰς τῷ ἱερῷ Ἀπόστόλων καὶ Ἐναγκαζο- μένων τὴν ἱεραρχίαν, published in a Latin version by Combeis (Paris, 1672). 18. Sermo brevis in Dominecum quartum Quadragesimae, in the version of Joannes Livineius, published together with the Catechesis. 19. Capitula quattuor de Vita ascetica, published in Greek and Latin by P. Possinus (Thescan, Asceticum, Paris, 1684). 20. Εγκαζομένων εἰς τῷ τριτῃ ἀδείας τῆς τιμίας λειψανίας τοῦ ἁγίου προδρόμου, published with the version of Combeis by Du Fresne (Traité historique du chef de S. Baptiste, Paris, 1666). 21. Τριπάρτια, κανόνες, &c. published in the various Greek collections of such hymns. 22. Η μεγάλη καλομενή κατηχητική, divided into three parts, the κατηχή- σεις, μνημονίων, and διδασκαλία. This work is yet unpublished. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 449, &c.) has a notice of the MSS, in which it is extant, a list of the titles of the 217 discourses of which the work consists, and one of the discourses (the tenth) printed at full length. The reader is also referred to Fabricius (L. c. p. 471. &c.) for a list of various other unpublished works of Theodorus. (Baronius, l. c. ; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 8, &c.; Fabric. l. c. p. 434, &c.)

70. TABENNISIUS, abbot of Tabenna, was born about A. D. 314, at Latopolis in the Thelkaid. He belonged to a Christian family of station and wealth. As his mother is frequently mentioned, but not his father, it would appear that she was left a widow while Theodorus was still young. He had two brothers, Macarius and Paphnutius, who were also monks at Tabenna. Macarius was older than Theodorus, and his half-brother. Theodorus appears to have addicted himself to ascetic rules of living at a very early age. When not more than thirteen or fourteen years old, he joined some religious, and was soon afterwards introduced to Pachomius at Tabenna, by whom he was received with great favour, and under whom he is said to have made rapid advances in all monastic virtues. His example seems to have induced his mother to enter a convent which Pachomius had established. Notwithstanding his youth, Theodorus was employed by Pachomius to supply his place in instructing the other monks, and even the great master himself professed to derive edification from the discourses of his young disciple. He also took him with him, or sent him alone, to visit and inspect the other monasteries which looked to him as their superintendent. When he was about thirty years of age, Pachomius appointed him to supply his place in the monastery at Tabenna, while he himself retired to another. When his end approached, however, in order, as it is said, to try the humility of Theodorus, he appointed a man of the name of Petronius as his successor. Petronius died not long afterwards, appointing Orsius as his successor. The latter soon found himself incapable of maintaining the discipline of the monastery with sufficient vigour, and appointed Theodorus in his room. There is extant a letter of Theodorus, translated into Latin by St. Jerome, inviting all the recluses of the order to assemble at a neighbouring monastery to celebrate the festival of Easter. Theodorus on various occasions had epistolary and personal communication with Athanasius, who is said to have manifested great regard for him. Theodorus died April 27, A.D. 367. He is regarded as a saint by the Greek Church; his memory being honoured on the 16th of May, in order to connect him with Pachomius. A large collection of somewhat dull stories about Theodorus will be found in Tillemont (Hist. Eccles. vol. vii. pp. 469—499).

72. THEUS. [No. 32.]

A great many more Theodori are met with, especially in ecclesiastical history. As they have not been thought worth inserting here, they have referred to the catalogue in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 346—416, and Index.) A list of twenty of the name is given by Digenes Laërtius (i. 104. [C. P. M.]

THEODORUS (Θεόδωρος), of Hermopolis, was a native of Hermopolis in the Thebaid. He was an advocate (σχολαστικός) at Constantinople, where he wrote his commentaries on the Digest, the Code, and the Novellae. In the Brevarium of the Novellae he is named at full length as "Theodorus Scholasticus, a Theban of Hermopolis." This Theodorus was living as late as the reign of Mauricius, in whose time, it was affirmed, he composed his Brevarium after the collection of 168 Novellae, in which collection appear three Novellae of Tiberius, which Theodorus has not neglected. If Theodorus of Hermopolis wrote so late, it is hardly within the limits of probability that he was the Theodorus, professor at Constantinople, one of those to whom Justinian addressed his constitution on the course of law studies (Omnem retipulicæ nostræ). There is a small number of fragments by Theodorus, which are placed in the Basilica under certain texts of the Digests; but whether he commented on the whole work is doubtful. The commentary on the Code was a Brevarium, consisting of abridgments or summaries of the Constitutions in the Code, with notices of similar passages in the Code or the Novellæ. The Brevarium of the Novellæ exists complete in a MS. of Mount Athos, the only one at present known. It has been published by Zacharine, Anecdota (pp. 1—163). THEODORUS THEODORUS (Θεόδωρος), the name of two members of the family of the Asclepiades, and of several physicians whom it is impossible to distinguish with any tolerable degree of certainty:—

1. The seventh in descent from Aesculapius, the son of Cleomyttaeus I, and the father of Sostratus II, who may be supposed to have lived in the ninth century B.C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vet.)

2. The eleventh in descent from Aesculapius, the son of Cleomyttaeus II, and the father of Sostratus III, who lived perhaps in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C. (Poeti Epist. ad Artax. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770). John Tzetzes (loco cit.) makes him to be the son, not of Cleomyttaeus II, but of King Crisamis II; and consequently the eleventh, but the tenth of the family of the Asclepiades.

3. A physician quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 40, xxiv. 120), who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. He may possibly have been the same person as the pupil of Aeneas, who (if the Aeneas in question be the founder of the sect of the Pneumatiei) must have lived in the first century after Christ. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 8 § 104.)

4. THEODORUS PRISCIANUS. [PRISCIANUS.]

5. THEODORUS MOSCHION, whose fifty-eighth book (?) is quoted by Alexander Trallianus (i. 15. p. 156), must have lived in or before the sixth century after Christ, and is probably the same person whose second book (?) is quoted in the same chapter a few lines above. Fabricius (Bibl. Lot. iv. 12, vol. ii. p. 591) supposes him to have been the same person as Theodorus Priscianus; Haller (Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. i. p. 183) the same as the physician quoted by Pliny, and also the same person who is quoted by Aëtius (iv. 1. 46. p. 628).

6. The author of a short Latin work, entitled "Diseta sive de Rebus Salutaribus Liber," which was first published in 1533. fol. Argent., with "Hildegardis Physica," and in a separate form in 1632. 8vo. Hal. ed. E. G. Schreiner. He is generally supposed to be the same as Theodorus Priscianus, which may be correct, but he appears to be called simply Theodorus in the MSS. and editions of his work. (Choulant’s Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Ästetere Medizin.)

7. The name is found in some other ancient authors; for instance in Aëtius in several places, in each of which the same person is probably intended. Now the person quoted by Aëtius (ii. 2. 91. p. 291) is the same who is quoted by Niclaus Myrpesus (xxxvi. 136. p. 730), and called "Ac- tuarius;" and as the title of "Ac tuoarius" was only in use at the court of Constantinople (see Dict. of Ant. p. 746, 2d ed.,) this Theodorus probably lived in the fifth century after Christ, and cannot therefore be (as Haller supposed) the physician quoted by Pliny.

8. A celebrated Christian physician at Nishapür in Chorasan, where one of the Persian kings, either Shahpur (or Sogur) II. or Bahram (or Var- ranes) IV., built at his request a Christian church, in the fourth century after Christ. He wrote a work called "Pandectae Medicinae" (Ibn Abi Osabib, Fontes Relationum de Class. Medici- xi. 1. (MS. Arab. in Bibl. Bodl.); Wüstenfeld, Gesell. der Arab. Aerzte, p. 6.)

9. A Jacobite Christian of Antioch, in the thirteenth century after Christ, who was well ac- quainted with the Syriac and Latin languages, and also with mathematics and other sciences. He went first to the court of Alman-d-Din, sultan of the Seljuks in the kingdom of Rûm, in order to become his-sician; but not receiving from the prince the welcome he expected, he went on to Armenia, to the court of Constantine the father of King Hâtem, and afterwards to one of the Latin emperors of Constantinople. Here he was loaded with riches and honours; but after a time he was seized with a great desire to revisit his friends and native country, and requested permission to return home. This was refused, so Theodorus took an opportunity of leaving the city by stealth, while the emperor was absent, and set sail for Acre. He was, however, compelled by stress of weather to put into a port where the emperor then happened to be, which had such an effect upon Theodorus that he poisoned himself. (Abîl-Faraj, Hist. Dynast. p. 341; D’Herbelot, Bibl. Orient.)

Haller by some confusion makes two physicians out of this last Theodorus. (Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. i. pp. 311, 406.)

THEODORUS (Θεόδωρος), artists. This name occurs in several passages of the ancient authors, in such a manner as to give rise to great difficulties. There existed, at an early period in the history of Grecian art, a school of Samian artists, to whom various works and inventions are ascribed in architecture, sculpture, and metal-work, and whose names are Rhoeus, Telecles, and Theodorus. The genealogical table of the succession of these artists, according to the views of Muller, given under Rhoeus, may be referred to as a key to the ensuing discussion of the ancient testimonies, which is necessary in order to make the subject at all intelligible.

First of all, a manifest error must be cleared away. Thiersch (Epochen, p. 50), following Heyne and Quatremère de Quincy, places this family of artists at the very beginning of the Olympiads, that is, in the eighth century, B.C. The sole authority for this date is a passage of Pliny which, besides being quite vague, contains a decided mistake. (H. N. xxxvi. 12. s. 43.) He says that "some relate that the first who invented the plastic art (plasticen) were Rhoeus and Theodorus, in Samos, long before the Bacchiadai were expelled from Corinth," an event which is supposed to have occurred about the 30th Olympiad, B.C. 669; and he then proceeds to relate how, when Demaratus fled from that city into Italy, he was accompanied by the modellers (fetores) Euecius and Eugrammus, and so the art was brought into Italy. Now, in the whole of this passage, Pliny is speaking of plastice in the literal sense of the word, modelling in clay, not in the secondary sense, which it often has in the Greek writers, of casting in metal; but it is quite in accordance with his mode of using his authorities, that he should have understood the statements of those writers who ascribed to Rhoeus and Theodorus the invention of plastice in the latter sense, as if they had been meant in the former. Having thus fallen into the mistake of making these artists the inventors of modelling, he was compelled to place them considerably earlier than Euecius and Eugrammus, by whom that art was said to have been brought into Italy. Even if this explanation be doubted, the statement of Pliny cannot be received, insomuch as it is inconsistent with other and better testimonies, and is entirely unconfirmed; for the passage in which Plato mentions Theodorus in common with Daedalus (Ion, p. 533, a.) has no chronological reference at all, but the names of eminent artists are there purposely taken at random. The blundering account of Athenagoras (Legat. pro Christ. 14. p. 60, ed. Dechair), that Theodorus of Miletes, in conjunction with Daedalus, invented the arts of statuary and modelling (ἀρχιτεκτονική καὶ πλαστική) scarcely deserves to be mentioned, except that it may perhaps be regarded as involving a tradition of some value, because it indicates the coast of Asia Minor as one scene of the artistic activity of Theodorus. We proceed therefore to the positive testimonies respecting these artists.

The most definitely chronological of these testimonies are the passages in which Herodotus mentions Theodorus as the maker of the silver crater which Croesus sent to Delphi (i. 51), and of the celebrated ring of Polykrates (iii. 41). Now we learn from Herodotus that the silver crater was already at Delphi when the temple was burnt, in Ol. 58. 1, B.C. 548; and Polykrates was put to death in Ol. 64. 3, B.C. 522. Again, with respect to his identity, for this, as well as his date, is a point to be ascertained; in both passages Herodotus makes Theodorus a Samian, and in the latter he calls him the son of Telecles; in both it is implied that he was an artist of high reputation; and, in the former, Herodotus expressly states that he believed the tradition which ascribed the crater to Theodorus, because the work did not appear to be of a common order (συγγενές). Pausanias (viii. 14. § 5. s. 8) also mentions the ring of Polykrates as the work of Theodorus, whom he also calls a Samian and the son of Telecles, and to whom, in conjunction with Rhoeus, the son of Philaeus, he ascribes the first invention of the art of fusing bronze or copper, and casting statues (διέρχεσθαι δὲ χαλλών πρωτο καὶ ἀγάλματα ἐξωειδοῦτα). There appears here to be a difficulty as to the distinct specific meaning of the two verbs: but the true meaning, that is, Rhoeus and Theodorus invented the art of casting figures, and at the same time made improvements in the process of mixing copper and tin to form bronze; as we learn from another passage (x. 38. § 3. 6), in which Pausanias states that he has already, in a former part of his work (that is, in the passage just cited) mentioned Rhoeus, the son of Philaeus, and Theodorus, the son of Telecles, as those who invented the process of melting bronze more accurately, and who first cast it. (τοὺς εἰδώτας χαλλόν δὲ τῷ ἀκριβίστοτερῳ τίμησι καὶ ἐξωειδοῦσιν αὐτοῦ πρωτο.) In still another passage (iii. 12. § 8. s. 10) he makes the statement respecting the fusing and casting of metal, but in a slightly different form; namely, that "Theodorus of Samos was the first who discovered the art of fusing iron, and of making statues of it (δὲ πρώτος διασχίξας σίδηρων εἰρή καὶ ἀγάλματα αὐτῷ πᾶδασα)". Here nothing is said of Rhoeus, nor of Telecles; and it is also worth while to observe that we have here an example of the use of παδαι in the sense which we supposed above to have missed Pliny.

There is another set of passages, in which various architectural works are attributed to these artists. Herodotus (iii. 60), speaking of the temple of Hera at Samos as the greatest known in his time, states that its architect was Rhoeus, the son of Phileus, a native of the island; and Vitruvius (viii. Pref. § 12), mentions Theodorus as the author of a work on the same temple. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 13. s. 19. § 3), in describing the celebrated Lemnian labyrinth, says that its architects were Similis, Rhoeus, and Theodorus. (Comp. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 22, where the common reading places the laboratory at Samos; but this is easily corrected by a change in the punctuation, proposed by Müller in his Agniotica, p. 99, and adopted by Sillig, in his edition of Pliny; namely, Theodorus, qui labyrin- thanum fecit, Sami ipso ex aere fudit: it is, however, just as likely that the mistake is Pliny’s own, or, that it was made by a copyist; see below.) Another architectural work, ascribed to Theodorus, was the old Σείς at Sparta, as we learn from the same passage in which Pausanias mentions him as the inventor of casting in iron (iii. 12. § 8. s. 10). He is also connected with the erection of the celebrated temple of Artemis at Ephesus by an interesting tradition, recorded by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 103), that Theodorus advised the laying down of charcoal-cinders beneath the foundation of the temple, as a remedy against the dampness of the site: here he is called a Samian, and the son of Rhoecus.

Lastly, the names of Theodorus and Telecles are connected with the history of the ancient wooden statues in a very curious manner. Diodorus (i. 98), in relating the various claims set up by the Egyptians to be considered the instructors of the Greeks in philosophy, science, and art, tells us that they asserted that the most celebrated of the ancient statues, Telecles and Theodorus, the sons of Rhoecus, lived a long time in Egypt; and that they told the following story respecting the wooden statue (ξανών) of the Pythian Apollo, which those artists made for the Samians. Of this statue, Telecles made the one half in Samos, while the other half was made by his brother Theodorus at Ephesus; and, when the two parts were placed together, they agreed as exactly as if the whole body had been made by one person; a result which the Egyptians ascribed to the fact, that their rules of art had been learnt by Telecles and Theodorus. With this tradition we may connect one preserved by Pliny, that Theodorus was the inventor of certain tools used in working wood, namely, the norma, libella, tornus, and clavæ. (Plin. H. N. vii. 56. s. 57.)

Now, in considering the conclusions which are to be drawn from all this evidence, it is as well first to exclude the assertion of Thiersch, that there were two artists of the name of Telecles, which rests on no other ground than the necessity of lengthening out the genealogy in order to suit the too early date which he has assumed for Rhoecus. He makes Rhoecus, with his sons Telecles and Theodorus, flourish at the beginning of the Olympiads, and then, nearly two centuries later, he comes to another Telecles, with his son Theodorus, the artist who lived in the time of Polycrates.

The real questions to be determined are these, Were Theodorus, the son of Rhoecus, and Theodorus the son of Telecles different persons, or the same? If the former, was the one Theodorus, namely, the son of Rhoecus, the same as Theodorus, the brother of Telecles, and was this Telecles the same as the father of the other Theodorus? If these questions be answered in the affirmative, little difficulty remains in adopting the genealogy of Müller, as given under Rhoecus.

If the first of these questions can be satisfactorily answered, the others are easily disposed of. And here, in the first place, the above testimonies can hardly be explained on any other supposition than that there existed distinct traditions respecting two different Samian artists of the name of Theodorus, the one the son of Rhoecus and the brother of Telecles, and the other the son of Telecles. For the former, we have the passages in Diogenes and Diodorus; for the latter, one passage of Herodotus and two of Pausanias; and besides these, there is one passage of Herodotus, one of Plato, one of Pausanias, one of Vitruvius, and four of Pliny, in which Theodorus is mentioned, without his father’s name, but, in nearly every instance, as a Samian, and as closely connected with Rhoecus. Of course, the well-known facts, of the alternate succession of names, and the hereditary transmission of art, in Grecian families, must not be left out of the consideration. On the other hand, if we suppose only one Theodorus, we must assume that Diogenes has made one decided mistake, and Diodorus two, namely, in making Telecles and Theodorus sons of Rhoecus; or else we must have recourse to the still more improbable supposition, that this one and only Theodorus was the son of Telecles, and the grandson of Rhoecus. The conclusion adopted by Mr. Grote (History of Greece, vol. iv. p. 132), that there was only one Theodorus, namely, the son of Rhoecus, is the least probable of all, as it compels us to reject the positive statements, which make him the son of Telecles, and therefore, “the positive evidence does not enable us to verify” his theory, as he remarks of the genealogies of Müller and Thiersch. A positive argument for distinguishing the two Theodori has been derived from a comparison of the passage in which Pausanias speaks of the bronze statue of Night, ascribed to Rhoecus, as being of the rudest workmanship (x. 38. § 3. s. 6), with that in which Herodotus describes the crater made by Theodorus as a work of no common order (1. 51). Surely, it is argued, there could not be so great a difference in the works of the father and the son, and much less can it be supposed that two sons should be given to Theodorus to have been strictly contemporary. There is perhaps some force in this argument, but it can hardly be considered decisive.

It may also be observed that, in none of the passages, in which the architectural works of Theodorus are referred to, is he called the son of Telecles, while, on the other hand, the names of Rhoecus and Theodorus are closely associated in these works; facts which suggest the hypothesis that, while the elder Theodorus followed chiefly the architectural branch of his father’s profession, the younger devoted himself to the development of the art of working in metal. Müller has attempted also to draw a positive conclusion respecting the dates of these artists from the buildings on which they are said to have been engaged. The Heraeum at Samos is referred to by Herodotus in such a way as to imply, not only that it was one of the most ancient of the great temples there existing, but also that it had been at a later period erected, before the 37th Olympiad; and hence Müller places Rhoecus about Ol. 35, which agrees very well with the time at which his supposed grandson Theodorus flourished, namely, in the reigns of Croesus and Polycrates. This also agrees with the story told by Diogenes of the connection of the first Theodorus, the son of Rhoecus, with the laying of the foundation of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was probably commenced about Theodorus.

B. C. 600. [Chersiphon.] The most probable conclusion, then, (for anything like certainty is clearly unattainable,) we think to be this: that the genealogy and dates given under Rhoeus are tolerably correct: that Rhoeus was the inventor of the casting of metals, and that this art was carried on by the family of which he was the head: that Rhoeus and his son Theodorus erected the Heraeum and the Lemnian labyrinths, and that the latter laid the foundation of the temple of Artemis: that the younger Theodorus devoted himself more especially to the task of perfecting the art of casting metals, and that this is the reason why he, rather than other members of the family, is mentioned, with Rhoeus, at the head of that branch of art; and that to this younger Theodorus should be ascribed the silver crater of Croesus and the ring of Polycrates. We are quite aware of some minor objections to this theory, which remain unanswered; but the subject, interesting as it is, both critically and historically, has already been pursued almost beyond the proper limits of this article.

Another question, important in the early history of Greek art, arises out of the statements respecting these Cretan artists, namely, how far they were affected by foreign influence. The story told by the Egyptians, and repeated by Diodorus, must be received with great caution; but even those, who contend most strongly for the native origin of Greek art, admit that Telecles and Theodorus may have learnt some mechanical processes from the Egyptians. But the fact is, that the point involved in the story relates not so much to mechanical processes as to rules of proportion; for, in order to accomplish the result stated, the precise proportions of the human figure must have been settled by rule, as well as the precise attitude; and the question is, whether the Greeks, at this early period, had established such rules of proportion independently of the Egyptians. On the other hand, the statements respecting the invention of metal-casting make it of purely native origin; whereas we know that it existed long before, among the Phoenicians, for the two bronze pillars and various vessels of Solomon's temple are expressly said to have been cast in earthen moulds by Phoenician artists. (1 Kings vii. 46.) Now, when we remember that an extensive commerce was carried on in very early times by the Phoenicians in the Levant and the Aegean, and also that Samos is said to have been the earliest Greek maritime state in those parts, a strong probability is established, that arts already existing in Egypt and Phoenicia may have been transferred to Samos. The full discussion of these questions belongs to the general history of Greek art: we will here only add that we believe the Egyptian and Phoenician influence on Greece in early times has been long since much undervalued as it was formerly exaggerated.

It only remains to explain one or two points connected with the works ascribed to these artists. Besides the silver crater presented by Croesus to the Delphians, there was a golden one found by Alexander among the treasures of the Persian kings, which was also said to be the work of Theodorus of Samos. (Amynt. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 515, a.)

With respect to the ring of Polycrates, it has been much disputed whether the stone in it was engraved or not. The words of Herodotus (iii. 41, σφρηγς ... χρυσόδετος, σμήριδέου μην λίθον ἔσωσ, ἐφιγυ ἃς κ. τ. λ.) will, we think, bear either meaning. Of course no great weight can be assigned to the statements of later writers, such as Strabo (xiv. p. 638), Pausanias (i. 41.), Pollux (v. 100), and Clemens (Protrept. iii. p. 247, ed. Syllburg), who assert that it was engraved, any more than to that of Pliny, who says that it was not, and that the art of gem-engraving was invented many years later. (H. N. xxxvii. 4.) This last statement can be positively contradicted, so far as the East is concerned, by the account of Aaron's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 17—21), in which not only were the precious stones engraved, but they were "like the engravings of a signet." Other evidence might be adduced to prove the very early use of engraved seal-rings in the East. Some evidence that the art was known in the islands of the Aegean, and particularly in Samos, even before the time of Polycrates, is furnished by the tradition that the father of Pythagoras was an engraver of seal-rings, Σαλακε σηκοφο, (Diog. viii. 1; Mee- sarcinus), and there is another tradition which would prove that it had been introduced at Athens in the time of Solon. (Diog. i. 57.) Lastly, with respect to bronze statues by Theodorus, Pausanias expressly says that he knew of none such (x. 8. § 3. s. 6); but Pliny, on the contrary (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 22), tells us that the same Theodorus, who made the labyrinth, cast in bronze a statue of himself, which was equally celebrated for the excellence of the likeness and for its minute size. It held a file in the right hand, and a little quadriga in the left, the whole being so small as to be covered by the wings of a fly, which formed a part of the work (saeintur et totam com curramque et aurigam integredi ali simul facia musca). It is obvious that a work like this could not belong to the age of Croesus and Polycrates.

Such productions of patient ingenuity were made at a later period, as by Myrmekides; and, considering how common a name Theodorus was, it seems very probable that there may have been, at some period, an artist of the name, who made such minute works, and that some thoughtless transcriber has introduced the words "qui laboravit in arte;"

To sum up the whole, it seems probable that there were two ancient Samian artists named Theodorus, namely:—

1. The son of Rhoeus, and brother of Telecles, flourished about B. C. 600, and was an architect, a statuary in bronze, and a sculptor in wood. He wrote a work on the Heraeum at Samos, in the erection of which it may therefore be supposed that he was engaged as well as his father. Or, considering the time which such a building would occupy, the treatise may perhaps be ascribed to the younger Theodorus. He was also as engaged, with his father, in the erection of the labyrinth of Lemnos; and he prepared the foundation of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. We would also ascribe to him the old Σcis at Sparta. In conjunction with his brother Telecles, he made the wooden statue of Apollo Pythius for the Samians, according to the fixed rules of the hieratic style.

2. The son of Telecles, nephew of the elder Theodorus, and grandson of Rhoeus, flourished about B. C. 560, in the times of Croesus and Polycrates, and obtained such renown as a statuary in bronze, that the invention of that art was ascribed to him, in conjunction with his grandfather. He also practised the arts of engraving metals (τροχο-τούς, caselatura), and of gem-engraving; his works in those departments of modern writers respecting these artists, see Sillig, Cat. Artif. s. v. Telecles, Theodorus; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst §§ 53, n.1, 55, n., 60, 70, n. 4, 80. n. i. 1, 97, n. 2, 159; Bähr, ad Herod. l. cc.

There were several later artists of the same name:

3. An Argive sculptor, the son of Poros, made a statue of Nicos, the son of Andromidas, which was dedicated by the people of Hermione, as we learn from an extant inscription, the character of which as well as the nature of the work, an honorific statue of a private individual, lead to the conclusion that the artist lived at a comparatively late period. (Böckh, Corp. Inser. No. 1197; Welecker, Kunstblatt, 1837, No. 93; R. Rocheville, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 415, 416, 2d ed.)

5. A Theban statuary, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, in his list of persons of the name (ii. 104). Nothing more is known of him, nor of the three other painters whose names are found in the same list.

6. A painter mentioned by Polemon (Diog. l. c.).

7. An Athenian painter, mentioned by Menodotus. (Diog. l. c.)

8. An Ephesian painter, mentioned by Theophrastus, in his work on painting. (Diog. l. c.)

9. A painter, whose name is contained in Pliny's list of those who lived prior to 500 B.C. (H. N. xxiv. A s. 40. 40), and who may very probably be identical with one of the three mentioned by Diogenes. Pliny ascribed to him the following works:—Se inuentem, which appears to mean an athlete anointing himself; the murder of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus by Orestes; the Trojan War, a composition on several panels, preserved at Rome in the portico of Philip; Cassandra, also at Rome, in the temple of Concord (comp. Welecker, ad Philostr. Imag. p. 459); Leontium Epirci cogeticantem, which ought perhaps to be read like the similar passage a little above (10. s. 36. § 19) Leontium pictorem; and king Demetrius. This last work, if a portrait taken from life, would place the artist's date at, or a little before, n. c. 300.

10. A Samian painter, the disciple of Nicothene, mentioned by Pliny in his list of those painters who were non ignobiles quidem, in transcursus tamen dicendi. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42) [P. S.]

THEODOSIUS. This able general, from whom descended a line of Roman emperors, after having acquired a great military reputation, was sent a.d. 367 by Valentine I. to drive away the Piets and Scota, who were ravaging Britain. Theodosius crossed the straits from Boulogne with his troops of Heruli, Batavians, Jovii, and Victores, and landed at Sandwich. On his road to London he defeated several hordes of the barbarian invaders; and the citizens of London, who were despairing of their safety, gladly received him within their walls. After establishing order and confidence, he commenced his operations against the invaders, and in two campaigns cleared the province of its savage enemies, and repaired and strengthened the military positions. He drove the Caledonians to the northern part of the island, and formed a province or provincial division of Valentinia or Valentinius, so named in honour of Valentinein. This tract composed the country between the wall of Severus and the rampart of Antoninus, which Theodosius recovered from the enemy. The history of these campaigns is recorded by Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 8, xxviii. 5). Claudian leads us to infer that Theodosius also pursued the enemies of Rome on the stormy seas of the North; and the Orkneys and Thule were stained with the blood of the Piets and the Saxons. (In Quart. Cons. Honor. 31, 32.)

Theodosius, on his return from Britain a.d. 370, was rewarded for his services with the rank of master-general of the cavalry, and in the same year, on the Upper Danube, he defeated the Alamanni. In a.d. 372, Firmus, a Moor, the son of Nabal or Nubal, the most powerful of the Moorish princes who professed obedience to the sovereignty of Rome, revolted against the Roman authority; and the natives, who were exasperated at the tyranny of Count Romanus, the governor of Africa, joined the standard of Firmus. The Moorish chief, plundered Caesarea, on the site of the modern Algiers, and made himself master of Mauritania and Numidia; and he is said to have assumed the title of king. Romanus being unable to oppose this active enemy, Theodosius was sent to Africa about the close of 372 or the beginning of 373. He sailed from the Rhone and landed at Igligilia, before the Moorish chief heard of his coming. The first step of Theodosius was to arrest Romanus, whose military administration was considered to be the cause of the revolt. The campaign against Firmus is recorded by Ammianus (xxix. 34. 35) as being, most confused, and corrupt chapter, out of which Gibbon has extracted a narrative. Firmus had the cunning and treachery of Jugurtha, and Theodosius displayed all the talents of Metellus, in his negotiations with the Moor, and in pursuit of him through a country which presented unexpected difficulties to regular troops. Firmus at last fled to Igmazen, king of the Iasifenses, a people of whose position Ammianus gives no indication. Igmazen was summoned to surrender Firmus, and after having felt the Roman power, and the consequences of refusal, he determined to give him up. Firmus escaped by a voluntary death. He first made himself drunk, and while his guards were asleep, hanged himself by a rope, which he fixed to a nail in the wall. The dead body was given up to Theodosius, who led his troops back to Siffin. In the reign of Valena, a.d. 376, Theodosius was again at Carthage. The cause of his execution is unknown. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, vol. iv. c. 25; Tillemon, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v., where all the authorities are referred to.)

THEODO'SIUS I., was the son of Theodosius, who restored Britain to the empire, and was beheaded at Carthage. The family of Theodosius was Spanish, and the future emperor was born in Spain, about a.d. 346, as some say at Italia, the birth-place of Trajan, though other authorities say that he was a native of Cauca in Galicia. A great number of captives with four thousand waggons (Zosimus, iv. 25). In A. D. 381, Athanaric was compelled to leave his forests, and to cross the Danube; and many of those who had formerly acknowledged Fritigern as their leader, and were weary of anarchy, now yielded obedience to this Gothic judge. Tillemont conjectures that Athanaric was expelled by Fritigern, Alathæus, and Saphrax; but Gibbon’s narrative seems to signify (for seems is all the meaning that in many cases can be imputed to it) that Fritigern was already dead. However Athanaric was too old and too prudent to carry on war with the new emperor: he listened to proposals of peace, and he even went to Constantinople to visit the emperor. Theodosius left the city to meet him, and received him with the greatest respect. The Goth was struck with amazement at the magnificence of Constantinople, and exclaimed that the Roman emperor was an “earthly God.” Athanaric fell ill at Constantinople, and died there. Theodosius gave him a splendid funeral, and erected a monument to his memory. This politic behaviour gained him over the whole army of Athanaric; and the admission of so large a body of Visigoths was followed by the submission of the rest. “The general or rather final capitulation of the Goths may be dated four years, one month, and twenty-five days after the defeat and death of the emperor Valens.” (Gibbon; comp. Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v. p. 216.)

The Ostrogoths, who had retired from the provinces of the Danube about four years ago, returned (A. D. 386) to the lower course of that river recruited by an army of Scythians, whom none of the inhabitants on the banks of the Danube had ever seen before (Zosimus, iv. 38). Promotus, the general on the Thracian frontier, who knew that he was a match for the invaders, thought it prudent to draw them over to the south bank, without letting them wait for their opportunity in the winter; and by his spies he encouraged them to hope that by secretly crossing the river, they might destroy the Roman army. The passage was made on a dark night in numerous canoes; but the Ostrogoths discovered their mistake when they found the south bank of the Danube guarded by a triple row of vessels through which they could not penetrate. At the same time the Roman galleys descending the river, swept before them the frail boats of the Ostrogoths, and Alathæus the king, and his bravest troops, were either drowned in the Danube or destroyed by the sword. Those who escaped sued for mercy to the Romans. It is uncertain whether Theodosius had personally any share in this victory. Zosimus says that after the victory Promotus sent for Theodosius, who was at no great distance. If the historian Zosimus unjustly deprives Theodosius of all credit, the poet Claudian made amends for it by flattering exaggeration.

A treaty was made with the Goths, the precise date and terms of which do not appear to be known; but they were settled within the limits of the empire, in tracts which were neglected or unoccupied. A colony of Visigoths was established in Thrace, and the remains of the Ostrogoths were planted in Phrygia and Lydia. They were not scattered among the population of Thrace or Asia Minor, but they obtained whole districts in which they still lived as a Gothic people, acknowledging the emperor as their sovereign, but probably retaining jurisdiction in all disputes among themselves. The chieftains still governed their followers, but there was no kingly dignity. Forty thousand Goths were kept in the service of the Eastern empire, under the title of Foederati, and were distinguished from the other troops by golden collars, better pay, and more licence. But though the Goths were thus converted from enemies into dubious allies, their settlement within the limits of the empire is justly viewed as the immediate cause of the downfall of the western division. In the civil war against Maximus (A.D. 388), some of those barbarians who were in his army listened to the proposals of Maximus, but their treachery being discovered, they fled into the marshes and forests of Macedonia, where they were pursued by Theodosius and cut to pieces.

Maximus, a native of Spain, like Theodosius, was living in Britain in retirement or in exile. When this province revolted against Gratian, Maximus was chosen their leader, and he invaded Gaul with a powerful army. Gratian fled from Paris to Lyon, where he was overtaken by Andragathius, the commander of the cavalry of Maximus and put to death (A.D. 383). Maximus sent an envoy to Theodosius to explain and justify his conduct, to excuse the assassination of Gratian as having been accomplished without his orders, and to offer to the emperor of the East peace or war. A war with the fierce soldiers of the north would perhaps have been an unequal contest for Theodosius, whose dominions had recently suffered from the ravages of the Goths; and reluctantly, as we may conclude, he made a treaty with Maximus, who was acknowledged emperor of the centre and north of the Alps, but he secured to Valentinian the brother of Gratian, Italy, Africa, and western Illyricum. Thus the empire was divided into three parts; one of which, an empire won by usurpation, consisted of three rich countries.—Spain, Gaul, and Britain.

Theodosius was the son of a Christian father, whose ancestors acknowledged the creed of Nicaea; and next to Constantine he became the great glory of the Christian church. The merits of Gratian secured him from the orthodox Christians a rank equivalent to that of a saint; and after his death they found a worthy successor to his orthodoxy in the more vigorous emperor of the East. Theodosius was not baptized until the end of the first year of his reign, when he was admonished by a serious illness no longer to delay this ceremony. In A.D. 390, before he commenced operations against the Goths, he was baptized at Thesalonica by the archbishop Acacius, in the orthodox faith of the Trinity; and his baptism was immediately followed by a solemn edict which fixed the faith of his subjects (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v. p. 198; Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 1. s. 2), and branded with the name of heretics all who dissented from the imperial creed. The edict declared "according to the discipline of the apostles, and the doctrine of the gospel, let us believe the sole deity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, under an equal Majesty and a pious Trinity; we authorise the followers of this doctrine to assume the title of Catholic Christians; and as we judge that all others are extravagant madmen, we brand them with the name of heretics, and declare that their conventicles shall no longer usurp the respectable appellation of churches: besides the condemnation of divine justice, they must expect to suffer the severe penalties which our authority, guided by heavenly wisdom, shall think proper to inflict on them." (Gibbon, vol. v. c. 27). The faith which Theodosius so ardently embraced can hardly be supposed to be the result of a subtle inquiry into the metaphysical distinction between the sameness of substance or strict homousian doctrine of Athanasius, and the similarity of substance in the Father and the Son, or the homousian doctrine in which some of the Arians sought refuge. A singular anecdote is told of Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium and afterwards a saint, who administered to Theodosius a practical lesson on the homousian doctrine. It was in A.D. 394, just after Theodosius had raised his son Arcadius to the rank of Augustus, and the two emperors were seated on a throne to receive the homage of their subjects. Amphilochius saluted Theodosius with reverence; his son he addressed with the familiarity of an equal. The emperor, indignant at this rudeness, ordered the bishop to be dragged from his presence, when he exclaimed, "Such is the treatment, O emperor, which the King of heaven has prepared for those impious men who affect to worship the Father, but who refuse to acknowledge the equal majesty of his divine Son." Theodosius embraced the bishop, and never forgot the lesson. Arcadius was at this time about six years of age.

Constantinople was the head-quarters of Arianism at the time of the accession of Theodosius; but his baptism in the orthodox faith and his edict gave the Catholics hopes of their supremacy being re-established. The emperor entered Constantinople with his army, and offered Damophilus the Arian prelate the alternative of subscribing to the creed of Nicaea or of resignation. Damophilus resigned his dignities, and retired into exile and poverty. Gregory of Nazianzus, who had laboured hard to restore the Catholic faith at Constantinople, was placed on the archiepiscopal throne which Damophilus had left vacant. Early in A.D. 381, Theodosius declared his intention to expel from all the churches both bishops and clergy who should refuse to profess the creed of Nicaea; and Sapor, his lieutenant, was armed with full powers to effect a change, which was accomplished without disturbance in all the Eastern empire. In the month of May (A.D. 381) a meeting of one hundred and fifty bishops who formed the first general council of Constantine, and the second of the oecumenical general councils, was assembled to confirm and complete the creed that had been established by the council of Nicaea. The council had to explain some things which were misunderstood and to dispose of the sect of the Macedonians, who, to the heresy of homousianism, added that of a belief that the Holy Ghost was created (κτιστηκόν).* The council declared the equal divinity of the Holy Ghost, the third person in the Trinity, which doctrine has prevailed in the Eastern church without interruption to the present time. After the death of Meletius, Gregory of Nazianzus presided in this council, and he has left a picture of the turbulent and disorderly proceedings which characterised its close.

Theodosius, after establishing the supremacy of and embarked Justina, and threatened her life. It was about the time that the council was sitting that he deprived all persons who apostatised from Christianity to Paganism of the right which every Roman citizen had enjoyed at least from the time of the Twelve Tables, of disposing of his property by testament. In July (A.D. 331) he forbade the Arians and Eunomians to build any church; and the law appears to mean that every place of worship which they already possessed should be taken from them. The various enactments against heretics are contained in the Code of Theodosius (16. tit. 5. s. 6—28; and the commentary of Goths.)—the Eunomians, whose guilt consisted in denying any resemblance between the two substances, and who were accordingly Anomoeans, were also deprived of the power of testamentary disposition, and of taking by testamentary gift: they seem, in fact, to have been deprived of all the rights of citizens. The Manichean heresy was punishable with death; and the same penalty threatened the Arians or the Quartodecimans, who celebrated the festival of Easter on the wrong day. To the reign of Theodosius belonged the glory or the infamy of establishing Inquisitors of Faith, who seem to have been specially enjoined to look after the crime of the Quartodecimans. Though Theodosius thus established the principle of persecution, it is said that his rival Maximus was the first Christian prince "who shed the blood of his Christian subjects on account of their religious opinions." It is fortunate for the fame of Theodosius that there is not the same evidence of his giving effect to his own laws as there is for the severity of Maximus, under whose reign Priscillianus and others suffered death for heresy at Tres, A.D. 385.

In A.D. 337 Maximus, not content with the possession of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, aspired to wrest Italy from the feeble hands of Valentinian II., who as an Arian was disliked by his Catholic subjects of Italy, and was opposed in his heretical projects by the zeal of Ambrose, the Catholic archbishop of Milan. Maximus was in sight of Milan, before Valentinian and his mother Justina, who directed the administration, were aware of his hostile intentions; and he entered the city without resistance. Justina and her son embarked from one of the harbours in the north part of the Hadratic and arrived in safety at Thessalonica. No resistance was made to Maximus, except by the small town of Aemona, on the border of Italy. Theodosius visited Justina and her son at Thessalonica, and reminded Valentinian that his opposition to the faith of Nicæan was the cause of his own ruin and of the success of Maximus. Valentinian, it is said, acknowledged his errors, and returned to the true faith; and the orthodox emperor promised to restore him to his throne: but perhaps he was influenced by other motives than gratitude to Gratian, and zeal in support of the Catholic faith. Theodosius was a widower; and Valentinian had a sister Gallia, young and beautiful. Tillemont would fix the marriage of Theodosius and Gallia a year before the visit to Thessalonica at the close of A.D. 386; or he would make a compromise by admitting that Theodosius asked her in marriage in A.D. 386, but did not actually marry her till A.D. 397 (Histoire du, & c. vol. v. p. 740); his desire was to protect the piety of Theodosius from the scandal of a gross marriage. But Zosimus (iv. 44) states that Justina, a woman of singular influence, who knew the amorous propensities of Theodosius, prevailed over the irresolution of the emperor by her daughter's tears and beauty. Theodosius saw her and was captivated: he asked her of her mother for his wife, but he only obtained her on condition of restoring Valentinian. Though Gibbon has preferred the authority of Zosimus, there is some evidence opposed to it; and yet the narrative of Zosimus is so precise and circumstantial that it is difficult not to give credit to it. There is nothing improbable in the fact of a passion for a woman determining a political question.

After Theodosius had decided on his course, his operations were rapid and vigorous. He found Maximus encamped near Sisæa, in Pannonia, a city situated on the great river Save. Maximus had not taken the Savoy for his base. There was a force which confounded the soldiers of the usurper by a mode of attack to which they were unaccustomed. His Huns, Alans, and his Goths were mounted archers, who annoyed the heavy troops of Gaul and Germany by the irregularity of a Parthian attack. Maximus, after sustaining one defeat on the banks of the Save, and probably a second, fled across the Alps, and shut himself up in Aquileia, just before Theodosius reached the gates. But in spite of his Moorish guard, he was given up to Theodosius by his own soldiers and the people of Aquileia, with his hands tied behind him. Theodosius, according to his panegyrist Pæactus, was not indisposed to pardon; but his soldiers saved him the difficulty of a decision, by dragging Maximus from his presence and beheading him. Maximus had left his son Victor in Gaul, with the title of Caesar, or perhaps of Augustus. Arbogast, the active general of Theodosius, seized the youth, and put him to death a short time after his father. Theodosius spent the winter at Milan, and in the following year (June 13th, 389) he entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by Valentinian and his own son Honorius.

Two events in the life of Theodosius may be brought into juxtaposition as evidence of his uncertain character and his savage temper. In A.D. 387, the city of Antioch complained of increased taxation, the necessary consequence of the wars in which the emperor had been engaged; and Antioch, as it had not suffered from an enemy whose ravages had been confined to Europe, was unwilling to bear its share of the expense of the Gothic campaigns. The complaints of the citizens was soon changed into active riot (February): the statues of the emperor, of his father, and of his wife Placilla, were thrown down; but these idle demonstrations were quickly suppressed by an armed force. The governor sent to the emperor at Constantinople an account of these riots, and the citizens of Antioch, in great alarm, despatched Flavian their bishop, and the senator Hilarus, to acknowledge their guilt and to pray for forgiveness. In March the judgment of the emperor was brought by Hellebicus and Caesarius, two of his officers, who declared that Antioch was degraded from the rank of a city, was stripped of its possessions and privileges, and reduced to the condition of a village dependent on Laodicea. The places of public amusement were shut up, and the usual distribution of corn was stopped, which was equivalent to a sentence of starvation against those who were accustomed to receive this pauper’s allowance. A severe investigation was made into the circumstances of the riot, and those who were convicted by the extraordinary commissioners of the emperor lost their property, and were reduced to beggary. Some of the rioters, or of the accomplices, were put to death. The commissioners, however, suspended the complete execution of the emperor’s sentence against the city, and Caesarius went to Constantinople to obtain a final answer from the emperor to the petition of the people and the prayers of the monks and hermits, who left their solitudes, and crowded to Antioch, to intercede for the metropolis of the East. The emperor had already relented at the entreaty of the bishop and the eloquent address of the senator; the senate of Constantinople had interceded for Antioch, and Theodosius pardoned the city, and all who had taken part in the riot. The property of those who had been convicted was restored, the poor got their allowance again, and Antioch resumed its former dignity and jurisdiction. Tillemont has collected all the circumstances of this affair of Antioch (Histoire, &c., vol. v. p. 261, &c.), at great length.

In a. d. 390, Thessalonica, the metropolis of the Illyrian provinces, was disturbed by a riot during the emperor’s residence at Milan. Botheric, who commanded the soldiers there, had imprisoned one of the charioteers of the Circus, who had solicited a youth to a shameless intercourse. The populace in vain called for their favourite charioteer during the celebration of the games: the general kept him in the prison which his crime had merited. It seems that the populace was ready for insurrection; a trifling cause was enough to set them in motion, and the garrison was weak. Botheric and his officers were overpowered and assassinated by the people, and their bodies were dragged about the streets. An inquiry into the riot, and the punishment of the guilty, was necessary and just; but Theodosius punished a whole city, guilty and innocent together. It is said that his minister Rufinus prompted the emperor to issue his savage orders, notwithstanding the intercession of the bishops. An army of barbarians was sent to Thessalonica instead of a civil commission supported by a sufficient force. The people were invited to the games of the Circus, and they came without suspicion; but as soon as the place was full, the soldiers received the signal for a massacre. For three hours the spectators were indiscriminately exposed to the fury of the soldiers, and seven thousand of them, or, as some accounts say, more than twice that number, paid the penalty of the insurrection. The soldiers, it is said, were ordered to produce a certain number of heads, an order which aggravates the guilt of Theodosius, who, if not softened by the usual feelings of humanity, might have remembered the city in which he had so often resided. This massacre, unparalleled in history, is a stain on the name of Theodosius, an eternal brand of infamy. Tillemont, who has so minutely recorded the remembrance of Theodosius in the affair of Antioch, observes, “that this year (a. d. 390) is celebrated for the cruelties which the order of Theodosius caused to be committed at Thessalonica, and still more celebrated for the penance which Theodosius performed to expiate so great a crime. We only touch, in a few words, on an event so illustrous and important, because we reserve it for the history of St. Ambrosius.” The illustrious and important event was the penance, more illustrious and important in the eyes of the pious historian than the unpardonable crime of massacring thousands. It is singular, as Gibbon remarks, that Zosimus, who is certainly not partial to Theodosius, perhaps hardly just, and exposes his faults, does not mention the massacre of Thessalonica: and yet the fact is not doubtful.

Ambrosius, the archbishop of Milan, thought that the civil administration was an affair in which the clergy had an interest; and a riot at Callinicum on the Persian frontier, in which the fanatics of the place, at the instigation of their bishop, had burnt a place of worship of the Valentians, and the synagogue of the Jews, found an apologist in the archbishop of Milan. The provincial magistrate had condemned the bishop to rebuild the synagogue, or to make good the damage, and the rioters to be punished; and the emperor confirmed this equitable and moderate sentence. But to tolerate difference of opinion was, in the archbishop’s judgment, the same as to persecute the orthodox; and Theodosius was compelled, by the archbishop’s monitions and lectures, to let the bishop and his turbulent flock go unpunished. “St. Ambrosius,” says Tillemont, “thought that a bishop who pardoned so many other similar acts, ought not to expose the Christian religion to the insults of its enemies by so rigorous an order.” The massacre of Thessalonica was a trial for the firmness of Ambrosius: he who thought that the burning of a Jew synagogue ought not to be punished could hardly overlook the massacre of a Christian city. He retired from the emperor’s presence, but he represented his crime to him in a letter, and he told him that penitence alone could efface his guilt. But the archbishop was prudent in his remonstrances, and to protect himself, he called in the aid of a vision, in which he said that he had been warned not to offer the oblation in the name of Theodosius, nor in his presence. When the emperor proceeded to perform his devotions in the usual manner in the great church of Milan, the archbishop stopped him at the door, and demanded a further acknowledgment of his guilt. The consciousness of his crime humbled himself before the church, which has recorded his penance as one of its greatest victories. He laid aside the insignia of imperial power, and in the posture of a suppliant in the church of Milan, entertained pardon for his great sin before all the congregation. After eight months, the emperor was restored to communion with the church, at Christmas, a. d. 390.

Theodosius spent three years in Italy, during which he established Valentinian on the throne of the West, a measure for which his historians may claim the merit of generosity; for he probably would have had no difficulty in keeping the western empire, which he had wrested from the usurpation of Maximus. Theodosius returned to Constantinople early in November a. d. 391.

Valentinian II. did not long maintain his power.
Arbogastes, who had served Gratian with fidelity, and had contributed under Theodosius to the overthrow of Maximus, was appointed master-general of the forces in Gaul. But he aspired to govern a master who had not vigorous enough to command obedience, and the emperor's authority gradually declined. In A.D. 382 Valentinian made a last effort to resume his power, and he personally announced to Arbogastes that he was dismissed from all his employments. The general received the announcement with contempt; and in a few days after Valentinian was found dead. It was believed that he had been strangled by order of Arbogastes. The barbarian, who did not think it prudent to assume the imperial purple, set up Eugenius, a rhetorician, and formerly his secretary, as emperor of the West. Theodosius received the ambassadors of Eugenius, who announced his elevation, with dissembled indignation, for he was ill disposed to renew a war in the west, which he had only just ended. But his own pride, and the tears of his wife Gaia, the sister of Valentinian, urged him to punish the usurper. Two years were spent in the preparation for this war; but the emperor, with prudent precaution, imitating the example of those who consulted the sign of the Dioskuroi in the times of heathenism, sent a favourite eunuch to ask the advice of John of Lycopolis, an Egyptian anchorite, whether he should make war on Eugenius, or wait till Eugenius attacked him. John declared that Theodosius would be victorious, but yet not without loss and bloodshed, as in the war with Maximus; that he would die in Italy after his victory, and leave to his son the empire of the west. "Thus Theodosius did not engage in this war any more than in the other, except by the order which God gave to him by his prophet." (Tillemont.)

Theodosius prepared himself to fulfill the prophecy by recruiting his legions, with the aid of his two master-generals Stilicho and Timasius. Arbogastes, who commanded for Eugenius, posted himself on the border of Italy, but allowed Theodosius to pass the Julian Alps, and enter the plains which extend to Aquileia. Here he found the formidable army of Arbogastes, consisting of barbarians and Germans. Theodosius attacked the enemy, but he was compelled to retire with great loss, particularly of his Gothic allies. Arbogastes now occupied the passes in his rear, and the emperor's position was most critical. But he was saved by the treachery of the generals of Eugenius, who sent to express their readiness to desert, if the rewards which they asked were granted. Theodosius accepted their conditions, and led his troops to a fresh attack on the camp of the enemy. A tempest, that rose during the battle, and blew full in the face of the troops of Eugenius, contributed to their discomfiture and the victory of Theodosius. The head of Eugenius was separated from his body, while he was suing for mercy at the feet of his conqueror; and Arbogastes, after wandering in the mountains, terminated his fortunes by his own sword. Theodosius received the submission of the west, and, at the intercession of Ambrosius, used his victory with moderation.

Theodosius died on the seventeenth of January A.D. 395, four months after the defeat of Eugenius, whether, as some say, in consequence of the fatigues of war, or, as others, in consequence of intemperate habits, it is not possible to decide. The two sons, Arcadius and Honorius, had already been elevated to the rank of Augusti, and it was arranged that the empire should be divided between them. Honorius was not in the war against Eugenius, but he came to Milan before his father died, and received from him the gift of the empire of the west. The arrival of Honorius was celebrated by the games of the Circus, at which the dying emperor assisted.

The formal destruction of paganism marks the reign of this orthodox emperor. "The ruin of paganism, in the age of Theodosius," says Gibbon, "is perhaps the only example of the total extirpation of any ancient and popular superstition, and may therefore deserve to be considered as a singular event in the history of the human mind." Without admitting the truth of this remark as to the total extirpation of paganism, we must assign to Theodosius the design to extirpate it. His vigorous steps towards the overthrow of the ancient religion are traced by Tillemont with minute diligence (vol. v. p. 229, &c.). In December 381 he prohibited sacrifices, either by day or by night, in the temples or out of the temples; and also he forbade the curious inquisition into futurity by the examination of the viscera of animals. Libanius, in his oration in defence of the temples, written probably about A.D. 384, says, that the laws of Theodosius at that time had not closed the temples, nor prohibited persons from going there, nor the burning of incense, but only the sacrifice of animals. But so long as the temples existed, the old religion would subsist; and therefore to destroy it the temples must be destroyed. Libanius complains that people, clothed in black (no doubt he means monks), ran in bodies to the temples, overthrew the altars, pulled down the roofs and the walls, and sometimes killed the priests who resisted. He says, however, that soldiers were also employed in this work of demolition, and that in fact no temples were destroyed without the order of the emperor. Some few temples were converted into Christian churches, and thus preserved; "but in almost every province of the Roman world, an army of fanatics, without authority and without discipline, invaded the peaceful inhabitants; and the relics of the finest structures of antiquity still display the ravages of those barbarians, who alone had time and inclination to execute such laborious destruction." (Gibbon.) The lands of the temples were probably given to the Christian churches as a general rule. (Tillemont.)

Cynegius, the praetorian prefect of the East, was sent by Theodosius in 386 into Egypt, the seat of all monstrous superstitions, with a commission to prohibit idolatry, and to close the temples. It does not appear that he had any power to destroy them. It was probably not till 389 that the Christians obtained their great triumph over the idolatry of Egypt, by the destruction of the magnificent temple of Serapis at Alexandria. The fall of this great idol shook the popular belief of Egypt to its foundation. The emperor had given his orders to destroy the statue of Serapis; but the heathens believed that the deity would resent the slightest affront to his majesty. A soldier, bolder than the rest, encouraged by the archbishop Theophilus, dealt a blow against the cheek of Serapis with a ponderous axe, and the face of the idol fell to the ground. The deity silently submitted to his fate; the idol was broken in pieces, and dragged through the streets of Alexandria. The overthrow of the old religion, which was still practised, was accomplished...

by the last edict of Theodosius in 390 (Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 10. s. 12), which in harsh and intolerant terms, censured by a modern Christian writer, forbad, under severe penalties, in some cases extending to death, "the worship of an inanimate idol by the sacrifice of a guiltless victim." The spirit of the Theodosian edicts was that of the most bitter persecution; and while we commend his wishes to purge society of gross and debasing superstitions, we cannot reconcile the laws of the emperor with the religion which he professed, nor admit that persecution would have been so efficient a cure of idolatry as the inculcation of the doctrines of Christ, and the example of a practice conformable to them. But he who could order the massacre of Theaslonicia was ill-adapted to teach a faith which was contradicted by his practice.

The reign of Theodosius is one of the most important periods of the later empire. Gibbon has sketched it in a masterly manner, but too favourably for the character of Theodosius; who was probably a voluptruous, a sensualist, certainly a persecutor, cruel and vindictive. That he possessed some great qualities cannot be denied; and his natural temper may have been mild, but it was unequal and uncerctain; it wanted sufficient consistency to entitle him to the name of a truly great and good man. Tillmont has, with unwarried industry which allows nothing to escape it, collected, in his dry, annalistic fashion, all the materials for the reign of Theodosius; and Gibbon has largely availed himself of the labours of the learned ecclesiastic.

COIN OF THEODOSIUS I.

THEODOSIUS II., was the only son of the emperor Arcadius, who died on the first of May,
A.D. 408. Theodosius was born early in A.D. 401, and was declared Augustus by his father in January A.D. 402. There is a story that Arcadius, by his testament, made Yezgird, king of Persia, the guardian of his son; but it hardly deserves notice, and certainly not refutation. On the death of Arcadius, the government was given to or assumed by the praefect Anthemiou, the grandson of Philip, a minister of Constantius, and the grandfather of the emperor Anthemiou. In A.D. 405 Anthemiou was made consul and prætorian praefect of the East.
He faithfully discharged his duty as guardian of the empire and the infant emperor. In the year in which Arcadius died, the Huns and the Scyri entered Thrace under Uldin, who rejected all terms of accommodation, but, being deserted by some of his officers, he recrossed the Danube, after losing a great number of his Huns. The Scyri, who loitered in his rear, were either killed or made prisoners, and many of the captives were sent to cultivate the lands in Asia. Anthemiou strengthened the Illyrian frontiers, and protected Constanti-tinople, by building what were called the great walls, probably in A.D. 413.

Theodosius had a sister, Pulcheria, born A.D.
399, who, in A.D. 414, became the guardian of her brother and the administrator of the empire, before she was sixteen years of age: she was declared Augusta on the fourth of July, A.D. 414. Pulcheria was undoubtedly a woman of some talent, though of a peculiar kind. She superintended the education of her brother, and directed the government at the same time; nor did her influence cease with the minority of Theodosius. [Pulcheria.]
She educated her brother after her own ascetic notions; and though his literary instruction was not neglected, nor the exercises proper to form his health and strengthen his body, his political education was limited to the observance of the forms and ceremonies of the court. It may be that Pulcheria, with some vigor of understanding, had no knowledge of the more important duties of a man who is at the head of a nation. Pulcheria and her sisters, Arcadia and Marina, had publicly dedicated themselves to the service of God and to a life of chastity; and the whole imperial household was regulated in conformity to this principle. "Pulcheria," says Tillemont, a great admirer of this saint, "accustomed Theodosius to pray incessantly, to visit the churches often, and to make them presents; to respect the bishops and other ministers of the altar, &c."
But if the young emperor was carefully protected against the dangers to which a youth in an exalted station is exposed, he was not trained in those studies which befit a man and an emperor. To excel in mechanical occupations, to write a fine hand, which, in a private station, may give amusement, and are at least harmless, imply in a prince a want of taste and of talent for more important things, or an ill-directed education. Theodosius had, in fact, little talent, and his education was not adapted to improve it. He passed a blameless youth, for he was shut up in his palace, except when he went a hunting; and he possessed the negative virtues of a retired and austere life. The ecclesiastics extol him for his piety and his respect to the church; and he prosecuted the work which his grandfather commenced, by demolishing to their foundations the temples of idols, the monuments of the super-sition and of the taste of the pagans. It was his ambition not to leave a vestige of the ancient religion behind him.

He published various edicts against heretics, and an edict specially directed against Gamaelio, the last patriarch of the Jews. By an edict of the 16th May, 415, he declared it incest for a widower to marry his wife's sister, and the children of such a marriage were made bastards. Constantius, in A.D. 355, had already enacted the same law, which, though enacted again in our own times, is protested against by the common understanding of mankind.
The great event of the life of an emperor who was a nullity, was his marriage, which was managed by his sister, who managed every thing.
The woman whom his sister chose for his wife, and whom Theodosius married (probably in A.D. 421), was the accomplished Athenais, who, after her baptism, for she was a heathen, received the name of Eudocia. Her life from this time is intimately connected with the biography of her husband, and is told at length elsewhere. [Eudocia.]

About the close of A.D. 421 war broke out between the emperor of the East and Vannes or Brahm, the successor of Yezgird. A Christian bishop had signalized his zeal by burning a temple of the fire-worshippers at Susa, and this excess was followed by a persecution of the Christians by the THEODOSIUS.

Magi. This persecution, begun at the close of the reign of Yeazigerd, was continued under his successor; and some Christian fugitives crossed the frontiers into the Roman territories to seek protection. The Persian king claimed the fugitives, but his demand was refused; and this, added to other causes of dispute, kindled a war between the two empires. Theodosius was not a soldier, and the war was carried on for about two years by his general Ardaburius, with no important results. The defence of Theodosiopolis in Mesopotamia has immortalised the name of its warrior bishop Eunomus. The town had been besieged by the enemy for some time, but the bishop and his flock stoutly held out, and destroyed the wooden towers of the enemy. The obstinate resistance of the place provoked the blasphemy of a Persian prince, who threatened to burn the temple of God when he took the town. The bishop, shocked at his impious threats, pointed at him a ballista, which bore the potent name of St. Thomas, and the formidable machine discharged a stone which struck the blasphemer dead. Upon this the king of Persia lost heart, and withdrew his troops. (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. vi. c. 13.)

Socrates, the chief authority for the history of the Persian war, says that Theodosius, notwithstanding his success in the war, was the first to propose terms of peace. A truce for one hundred years was concluded between the Persians and the Romans. The kingdom of Armenia, now extinguished, was divided between the Persians and the Romans, an arrangement which gave to the empire of the East a new and extensive province. The division of Armenia probably followed the conclusion of a second Persian war, A.D. 441. In A.D. 423 died Honorius the emperor of the West. Placidia, the sister of Honorius, had been sent away from Italy, with her sons Valentine and Honorius, by the Western emperor, a short time before his death, and she took refuge at Constantinople. The throne of the West was usurped by Joanna, who declared herself emperor. Theodosius refused to acknowledge the usurper, and sent against him a force commanded by Ardaburius. The usurper was taken in Ravenna, and his head was cut off, A.D. 425. Theodosius was enjoying the games of the Circus at Constantinople when the news came, and he showed his piety, as Tillemont remarks, by stopping the entertainment, and inviting all the people to go to the church with him, to return thanks to God for the death of the tyrant. Whether Theodosius had no ambition to keep the empire of the West, or those who governed him determined his conduct, he resolved to confer it on his youthful cousin Valentinian. Eudocia, the daughter of Theodosius, was betrothed to the young emperor, and she was married to him in A.D. 437.

The reign of the younger Theodosius was not free from the religious troubles which had distracted the reign of his grandfather Theodosius. The great dispute which originated with Nestorius, who was made patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 428, and ended in the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, is described at length under Nestorius.

The Huns had ravaged the eastern provinces in the reign of Arcadius, and in the reign of Theodosius; and they now the formidable neighbours of the empire on the frontier of the Danube. In A.D. 441 the Huns, under Attila and his brother Bleda, crossed the Danube, and took Vinimiancum in Moesia; they broke through the Ilyrian frontier, the fortresses of which offered only a feeble resistance, destroyed Sirmium, Singidumum (Belgrade), Sardien, and other towns, and extended their ravages into Thrace. Theodosius recalled the troops from Sicily which he had sent against Genseric king of the Vandals, and collected from Asia and Europe all the men that he could muster; but his generals were unable to direct this force efficiently, and after several defeats they retreated towards Constantinople, which alone, of all the cities between the Archipelago and the Buxine, remained for the protection of the emperor. The history of the ravages of Attila comprehends several years, and they were apparently interrupted by intervals of peace, for it was not till A.D. 447, the year of the great earthquake which destroyed part of the walls of Constantinople and threw down fifty-seven towers, that the Huns approached the capital, and peace was finally made.

In A.D. 447 or 448 Theodosius concluded a disgraceful peace with the king of the Huns, to whom was given up a territory on the Danube extending from Singidumum to Novae, in the diocese of Thrace, and fifteen days' journey in breadth. The annual subsidy that had hitherto been paid to Attila, was increased from seven hundred pounds of gold to twenty-one hundred, and six thousand pounds of gold were to be paid on the spot. Theodosius had exhausted his treasury by extravagant expenditure, and his unfortunate subjects, who had been pillaged by the Huns, were pillaged again by this unwarlike and feeble emperor, to supply the demands of the barbarian conqueror. Attila, who had sent all the deserters from his camp to be given up, and he claimed back, without any ransom, all his men who had been taken prisoners.

In A.D. 448 or 449 Theodosius sent an embassy to Attila, at the head of which was Maximin. The ambassador was accompanied by the historian Priscus, who has left a most interesting account of the domestic habits of Attila. [Priscus.] The proposed object of the embassy was to maintain the good understanding between the emperor of the East and the king of the Huns; but Theodosius had a private object to accomplish, the execution of which was entrusted only to Vigilius, the interpreter; and this was the assassination of Attila. The ambassador passed through Sardica, and crossed the Danube; and in some place north of this river he had his first interview with Attila, whom he was obliged to follow in his progress northwards before he could conclude the business on which he was sent. The narrative of Priscus leads us to infer that the place in which the king of the Huns gave his final reception to the ambassador was in the plains of northern Hungary. The proposal to assassinate Attila had been made at Constantinople by the eunuch Chrysaphius, who then reigned in the name of Theodosius, and made to Edecon, a chiefman of the Scyrri. Vigilius was the medium of communication between Chrysaphius and Edecon, who was to receive for his reward some of the wealth on which he had gazed with admiration at Constantinople. The scheme was communicated to the emperor when he refused it. The emperor's conduct was rendered more disgraceful by the fact that Maximin, his ambassador, was exposed to all the danger of the discovery of this treachery, and, being kept in ignorance of it, had not even the choice of refusing to conduct the embassy. Edecon
THEODOSIUS.

The Theodosian Code has been preserved in an epitome contained in the Breviarium which was made by order of Alaric II., king of the Visigoths, in A.D. 506, but several constitutions and some entire titles are omitted in this epitome. It has also been preserved in the MSS. of the original Code, yet only in an incomplete form, and we have consequently to refer to the Breviarium for a considerable part of the Theodosian Code. The constitutions in the Code of Justinian, which belong to the period comprised in the Theodosian Code, are taken from the Code of Theodosius, but have undergone considerable alterations. All the constitutions in the Breviarium were published in 3 Vols. folio, Paris, 1686. The foundation for the text of the last ten books of the Code was the MSS. of the original Code; but for the first five books and the beginning of the sixth book (tit. 1, and the beginning of title 2) the text of the epitome in the Breviarium was the foundation. The best of these editions, after the time of Cujaciu, and that which is invaluable for the commentary, is that of J. Gothofredus, which was edited after his death by A. Marville, Lyon, 1665, 6 vols. folio; and afterwards by Ritter, Leipzig, 1736—1745, fol.

Recent discoveries have added to the last eleven books, and furnished considerable and most important additions to the first five books. The first discoveries which furnished materials for the text of the Code, were made by A. Peyron, at Turin, in a palimpsest: these discoveries have enabled us to make considerable additions to the first five books. These discoveries were made by Peyron in 1823. In 1825 Clossius discovered, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, a MS. of the Breviarium, into which the copyist has transferred various pieces from a MS. of the original Code: they were published by Clossius in 1824. Wencck published in 1825, Leipzig, 8vo, the first five books of the Code, as we now possess them, with critical and explanatory notes.

The last and most complete edition of the text of the Theodosian Code is that by Händel in the Corpus Juris Ante-justinianicum, published at Bonn, 1837.

The Theodosian Code, by its adoption in the Western Empire, established a uniformity of law in the East and the West. But as new laws would occasionally be necessary, and it was desirable to maintain this uniformity, it was agreed between the Eastern and the Western emperors, that future constitutions, which might be published in one part of the empire, should be forwarded to the other, and promulgated there also. The new constitutions were called Novellæ Leges, or simply Novellæ. In A.D. 447 Theodosius sent a number of such Novellæ to Valentinian, who in the following year confirmed and promulgated them in the Western Empire. These Novellæ form the first collection of Novellæ which followed the compilation of the Theodosius. (Gibbon, Hist. vol. v. vi. 8vo. ed.; Tite-lemon, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.; and as to the Theodosian Code, Puchta, Instit. vol. i.; and Böcking, Inst. i. p. 50.)

THEODOSIUS III., was compelled, perhaps, against his will, to be proclaimed emperor of the East in a.d. 716, by the fleet, which also declared that Anastasius, his predecessor, was unfit to reign. Theodosius filled the unimportant office of a collector of the revenue when he was taken to Constantinople to be crowned Emperor of the East. In January 716, he was proclaimed emperor, and in the following year was unpredictably abdicated, and left the throne for Leo the Isaurian, who commanded the troops in the East. Theodosius spent the rest of his life in the tranquil retirement of a monastery.

THEODOSIUS, literary. 1. Of Bithynia, a mathematician, who is referred to by Vitruvius (ix. 9. 8. § 1, Schneid.) as the inventor of a universal sun-dial (κοινογρίῳ πρὸς πάν κλίμα). Strabo (xii. p. 566) mentions him as the eminent native of Bithynia, and informs us that his sons were also mathematicians. He must have lived before the time of Augustus, and therefore he cannot be, as some have supposed, the same person as Theodosius of Tripolis, who appears to have flourished later than the reign of Trajan. (See No. 2.)

2. Of Tripolis, a mathematician and astronomer of some distinction, was a philosopher of the sect of the Sceptics, or, to speak more exactly, a follower of Pyrrhon, whose philosophy, Theodosius himself contended, ought not properly to be called sceptical (Diog. Laërtr. ix. 70). Among other works of his, Suidas (s. v.) mentions a Commentary on the κεφαλαία of Theodas, which appears from another passage of Diogenes (ix. 116) to have lived not very long before the time of Sextius Empiricus, and therefore about the reign of Trajan. Suidas also enumerates σκεπτικα κεφαλαια among the works of Theodosius (s. v. and also s. v. Πολυμονίων), and the same work is mentioned by Diogenes (ix. 70). Of the ancient mathematicians, Ptolemy does not refer to Theodosius, but his works are quoted by Theon, in his Commentary on Ptolemy, by Pappus, in his συναιστηη, and by Proclus, in his Hypothesis Astronomica, p. 7.

Suidas mentions the following as his mathematical and astronomical works:—σφαιρικα ἐν βελεῖον τριγλον, Περί θυσαρα καὶ νυκταν διο, ὑπομνης εἰς τὸ Ἀρχαίουσαν Ἐβδομον, Διαγραφας οἰκίων ἐν βελεῖον γ', Ἀστρολογικα, Περί οἰκήσων. Of these works, some have been printed.

Of the work on the Sphere, which is a treatise on the properties of the sphere, and of the circles described on its surface, was first published in an ancient Latin version, edited by John Vogelin, Paris, 1529, 4to.; and other Latin versions were published by F. Maurolycus, with the Sphaerica of Menelaus, and the work of Autolycus on the Sphere, Messanae, 1538, fol.; by Jos. Auria, with Autolycus, from six MSS. in the Vatican, 1588, 4to.; by Dr. Isaac Barrow, in his edition of Archimedes, Lond. 1675, 4to.; and by And. Celsius, Upsal. 1738, 12mo. The first edition of the Greek text was published by Ioannes Pena, the royal mathematician of France, Bellov. 1558, 4to.; many of the demonstrations, which are defective in the work of Theodosius, were supplied by Pena from Euclid's Elements, and other geometrical works, both ancient and modern. Another edition, founded on that of Pena, with the further aid of some MSS. at Oxford, from which, however, no readings of consequence were obtained, was published by Joseph Hunt, Oxon. 1707, 8vo. There are also translations of the work into English, by Edward Sherbourne, as an appendix to his version of the Sphaerica of Manilius, Lond. 1675, fol., and into German, by E. Nizze, whose notes are of high value, Stralsund, 1526, 8vo.

His work περὶ θυσαρων καὶ νυκτων, de Dielos et Notios, was published from a MS. in the Vatican, in Latin only, with ancient Scholia, and figures, by Jos. Auria, Romae, 1591, 4to.; the propositions, without demonstrations, having been previously edited by Conrad Dusypodium, Argen- torat. 1572, 8vo. Fabricius states that the book Περὶ σκεπτικων was also published in Latin, by Jos. Auria, Romae, 1587, 4to.; but the edition is not mentioned in Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliothecarum. In the great collection of the works of the ancient mathematicians, planned by Edward Bernard, after whose death the synopsis of the intended edition was published by Thomas Smith, Lond. 1704, 8vo., the known works of Theodosius were to have had a place in the seventh volume. There are many MSS. of the above three works, in the principal libraries of Europe, in Greek, Latin, and Arabic. The other works of Theodosius appear to be entirely lost. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. pp. 21—23, 213; Menag. ad Diag. Laëtr. ix. 70.)

3. Another native of Tripolis of this name, is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) as the author of an heroic poem on the Spring, and of various other works (Ἐγγεία δι’ έπαινο εἰς τὸ έαρ, καὶ ἑτερα διάφορα). Eudocia (p. 229) identifies him with the preceding.

4. A Neo-Platonist, the disciple of Ammonius, and the father-in-law of Zethus, the disciple of Plotinus. (Porphyry. Vit. Plot. 7.)

5. Of Alexandria, a grammarian, whose Commentary on the τέχνη γραμματική of Dionysius Thrax, as well as a work by him περὶ διον, and other grammatical works, and also a Commentary on Theodisus himself, by Georgius Choroeboscus, exist in MSS. in various libraries. A full account of these MSS. is given by Fabricius and Harless (Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. pp. 301, 306, 350). He is supposed to have lived about the time of Constantine the Great. His chief grammatical work, the commentary on Dionysius, amplified by the additions of later Byzantine grammarians, was published by C. G. Götting, under the title of Theodosii Alexandrini Grammatica, Lipsi, 1822, 8vo.; the Prooemium having been published before in Osann's Phleumonis Grammatici quae supersunt, Berol. 1821, 8vo., and a portion of the work, under the title of Theodori Grammatici Alex. Canones de Declinatione Nominum et Conjugatione Verborum, by Imn. Bekker, in the third volume of his Anecdota, Berol. 1821, 8vo. (Hoffman, Lexicon Biblioth. Scriptor. Graecorum.)

6. Respecting Theodosius, surnamed δ μωρος, a supposed Epitographer of Dio Cassius, but apparently in fact only a copyist, see Harless's additions to the notice of him by Fabricius. (Bibl. Græc. vol. v. p. 142.)

7. Melitinius, a Byzantine historian, a MS. copy of whose Chronicle was brought from Constantinople to Tübingen by Stephen Gerlach, a fragment of which, respecting the marriage of the emperor
Theotheus with Theodora of Paphlonia, in A. D. 830, was appended to the epitome of the Aeithiopica of Heliodorus, published by Martin Crusius at Frankfurt, 1584. The entire work has never been printed. There is also a MS. in the royal library at Munich. (Fabric. *Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 472; Vossius, *de Hist. Græc. p. 504, ed. Westermann; Tafel, de Theodosio Melitino, inedita Historiae Byzantinae scriptoribus, ex Codice Tabugensi Notitia Liberis, Prog. Acad. Tubing. 1826, 4to. )

8. Another version of the history of the later Roman empire, was a Syracusan monk, in the tenth century of our era. He wrote an account of the taking of Syracuse by the Spanish Arabs, in the form of a letter to Leo Diaconus, a Latin version of which, by the monk Josaphat, or Josaphat, has been published in a more or less complete form in the various collections of works on the history of Italy (Muratori, Script. Rer. Ital. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 257, a. ) The Greek text was first published, with a new Latin version and notes, by C. B. Hase, in his edition of Leo Diaconus, Paris, 1819, fol. (Vossius, *de Hist. Græc. p. 504, ed. Westermann; Hoffmann, Lexicon. Bibliograph. Scriptor. Graecorum, s. u. Theodosii et Leo. )

9. Diaconus, a third Byzantine historian, who appears to have lived about the same time as the preceding, was the author of five ἐξερεύνησεις in iambic verse, on the subject of the expedition of Nicephorus Phocas to Crete, in A. D. 961, which was first published in Graecia by F. Cornelius in his Cretæ Sauri, Venet. 1755, 4to. ; again, by P. F. Fogginius, in his Nova Appendix Corporis Historiae Byzantini, Romae, 1771, fol. ; and lastly, with notes and a vocabulary peculiar to the author, by F. Jacobs, in his edition of Leo Diaconus, in the Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant. Bonn. 1828, 8vo. (Fabric. *Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 533; Vossius, *de Hist. Græc. l. c.; Hoffmann, Lexicon, l. c. )

10. A monk, the titles of whose answer to the arguments against the resurrection of the body, and another work in refutation of John Philoponus, are given by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 23, comp. Cod. 22. )

THEODOTIUS (Θεόδωτος), a physician, who must have lived in or before the fifth century after Christ, as he is quoted by Aëtius (ii. 2. 54, p. 276). He is perhaps the same person who is quoted by Rhazes. (See Haller’s Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. i. p. 354. )

THEODOTUS (Θεόδωτος), an Athenian count, and one of the most celebrated persons of that class in Greece (Lilian. vol. i. p. 582), is introduced as a speaker in one of the dialogues in Xenophon’s Memorabilia (iii. 11), where some information is given respecting her. (Comp. Ath. v. p. 220, f.) She at last attached herself to Alcibiades, and, after his murder, she performed his funeral rites. (Ath. xiii. p. 574, f; Cobet, Prosop. Xenoph. p. 83, foll. )

THEODOTIUS (Θεόδωτιος), the author of a medical formula, quoted by Alexander Trallianus (xl. i. p. 310), who is called by him ὁ Φιλάνθρωπος. He may perhaps be the same person who is called Theodotus. The word occurs in several other passages of Alexander Trallianus and of Aëtius, but probably in each it is the name of a medicine, and not of a man. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 329, xii. 692, xiii. 433, ed. vct. )

THEODOTUS (Θεόδωτος), historical. 1. A Macedonian in the service of Antigonus, king of Asia. In B.C. 315 he commanded a fleet with which he was preparing to join Antigonus, when he was surprised by Polycleitus, the admiral of Ptolemy, on the coast of Lycia, all his ships captured, and he himself mortally wounded. (Bibl. xix. 64.)

2. An officer who was entrusted by Lysimachus with the important charge of the citadel of Sardes, in which he for a time defied all the efforts of the Greeks to get him out, was still, with the same, proclaimed a reward of 100 talents for the head of Theodotus, rendered the latter so suspicious of his own followers, that he himself secretly opened the gates of the fortress to Seleucus. (Polyæn. iv. 9. § 4.)

3. A Rhodian to whose judicious advice in regard to the management of his elephants Antiochus I. king of Syria was mainly indebted for the great victory over the Gauls, to which he owed the security of his throne and kingdom (Lucian, *Zeuxis, 9, 10; Droysen, Illelentum. vol. ii. p. 232. )

4. Surnamed Hemiolus (Ημιioticος, probably as suggested by Schweighäuser from his unusual stature), was a general in the service of Antiochus the Great, by whom he was sent in B.C. 222 together with Xenon against Molon, who had raised the standard of revolt in the eastern provinces of the monarchy [Molon.]*

The two generals were however unable to cope with the rebel soldiers, and withdrew within the walls of the cities, leaving him in possession of the open country, (Polyb. v. 42, 43.) After the final defeat of Molon by Antiochus himself, Theodotus was selected by that monarch to take the command in Coele Syria, while he himself undertook to reduce Seleucia. What Theodotus accomplished at this time we know not, but the next year (B.C. 219) we find him serving under the immediate command of Antiochus himself, and bearing an important share in the action against Nicolaus the general of Ptolemy, near Porphyreon, as well as shortly after at the siege of Rabatatama. On both these occasions he was associated with Nicarchus, with whom he also shared in the command of the phalanx at the memorable battle of Raphia, B.C. 217.

After that great defeat he was chosen by Antiochus as one of the ambassadors whom he sent to Ptolemy to sue for peace. (Ivd. v. 59, 60, 69, 71, 73, 81, 87.)

5. An Aetolian, who at the accession of Antiochus the Great (B.C. 223) held the command of the important province of Coele Syria for Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt. He was an able general, and repulsed with ease the first attack made by the king of Syria upon his government, but instead of being rewarded by Ptolemy for his services, he was recalled to Alexandria, where he nearly fell a victim to the intrigues of some of the courtiers and favourites of the king. Disgusted with this treatment, and despising the vices and luxury of Ptolemy, when he was again suffered to resume the command in Coele Syria (B.C. 219) he conceived the design of betraying that province into the hands of Antiochus. His overtures were readily welcomed, and he surrendered the two important fortresses of Tyre and Ptolemais to the Syrian monarch, whom he immediately joined with the forces under his command. Nicolaus however prevented his design from taking full effect, and retained a part of the Syrian provinces under the allegiance of Egypt. (Polyb. v. 40, 46, 61, 62.) From this time Theodotus enjoyed a high place in the favour of the Syrian king. In the campaign of b. c. 217 we find him commanding a body of 10,000 select troops, and just before the battle of Raphia he gave a singular proof of daring by penetrating with only two companions into the heart of the Egyptian camp, in order to assassinate Ptolemy himself. Mistaking the king's tent, he slew his physician instead, but effected his escape in safety, and returned to the Syrian camp. (Id. v. 66, 79, 81.) Again in b. c. 215 we find him exhibiting equal audacity in supporting the daring project of Lagoras to scale the walls of the city of Sardes, the success of which seems to have been in great measure owing to his skill and ability. (Id. vii. 16—18.)

6. A Syracusan who joined in a conspiracy against the life of the tyrant Hieronymus. Being seized and put to the torture, he concealed the names of all his real accomplices, and accused Thrason, the leader of the opposite party, who was put to death in consequence. (Liv. xxiv. 7.) It is difficult to conceive that the life of Theodotus himself would be spared, but we find him (or another person of the same name) mentioned shortly after as one of the conspirators who assassinated Hieronymus at Leontini, in b. c. 214. On that occasion he hastened with Sosis to Syracuse (Id. xxv. 21), and his name is associated with the latter during the transactions that followed (Sosis). His subsequent fate is unknown.

7. A Thessalian of the city of Phene, who was an exile from his native country and settled at Stratus in Aetolia. He was one of the deputies sent by the Aetolians to Rome in b. c. 198. (Polyb. xvii. 10.)

8. An Epieiro, who during the war between the Romans and Persæus, king of Macedonia, zealously espoused the cause of the latter, and in conjunction with Antinous succeeded in inducing his countrymen the Molossians to abandon the Roman alliance for that of Persæus. In b. c. 170 he conceived the design, which was only frustrated by accident, of intercepting the consul A. Hostilius Mancinus on his passage through Epieiros, and betraying him into the hands of the Macedonian king. After the defeat of Persæus, when the Roman praetor L. Anicius invaded the Molossian territories, Theodotus and Antinous shut themselves up in the fortress of Passaron, but finding the inhabitants disposed to surrender, they sallied forth, attacked the Roman outposts, and perished fighting bravely. (Polyb. xxvii. 14, xxx. 7; Liv. xiv. 26.)

9. A rhetorician of Samos, or, according to others, of Chios, who was the preceptor of the infant king of Egypt, Ptolemy XII. He appears to have exercised much political influence, and when after the battle of Pharsalia (n. c. 48), Pompey sought refuge in Egypt, it was Theodotus who was the first to suggest that the illustrious fugitive should be put to death. By this base advice he hoped to gain the favour of Caesar, and when the conqueror arrived in Egypt, hastened to meet him, bearing the head and signet ring of his rival. But Caesar turned from him with disgust, and would have put him to death, had he not succeeded in making his escape. At a subsequent period he was less fortunate, being apprehended and executed in Asia, by order of M. Brutus in b. c. 43. (Liv. Epit. cxiii.; Plut. Pomp. 77, 80; Appian. B. C. ii. 84, 90). [E. H. B.]

THEODOTUS I. and II., kings of Bactria. [DODOTUS.]

THEODOTUS (Θεόδωρος), literary. 1. A disciple of Socrates, who, in his Defence, according to Plato, speaks of him as already dead. He was the son of Theodotides, and the brother of Nico- stenus. (Plat. Apol. p. 35, ed.)

2. A Phoenician historian, who lived before Josephus, and wrote a history of his native country, in the Phoenician tongue, which was translated into Greek by a certain Laetus, if we adopt the correction of Reinesius in the passage of Tatian, where the MSS, give Θαῖρος or Αἴατος (Tatian, adv. Graec. 58, p. 128, ed. Worth; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 23; Euseb. Praep. Ev. x. 11; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 504.)

3. A poet, from whose poem upon the Jews (ἐν τῷ πεπί ιουδαίων) some verses respecting the city of Sichem are quoted by Eusebius. (Praep. Ev. ix. 22.)

According to a scholiast on Ovid (R. 467) there was a poet of this name who was cruelly put to death by the tyrant Mnesarchus, and to whose fate Ovid alludes (b. c.); but this is evidently mere guesswork. (See Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 324, vol. x. p. 516.)

4. A sophist and rhetorician, who flourished under M. Aurelius Antoninus, by whom he is spoken of as ἀγνώστης τῶν πολιτικῶν λόγων καὶ ἡγομένως δρέαλος. He was at first a hearer of Lellenius and Herodes Atticus, and afterwards their rival. He taught at Athens by the express appointment of M. Antoninus, from whom also he received 10,000 drachmae as his remuneration. His life is related by Philostratus. (Vit. Soph. ii. 2, pp. 566, foll.)

6. Of Byzantium, a tanner and heresiarch, in the second century of our era, from whom the sect of the Theodotiani took their name. The heresy of Theodotus related to the person of Christ. For particulars respecting him and his followers, see Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 124, foll., pp. 149, 180, vol. x. p. 515), Cave (Hist. Litt. s. a. 192, p. 87, ed. Basili), and the authors quoted by those writers.

8. Bishop of Ancyra, in Galatia, an ecclesiastic of some distinction in the fifth century. He was present at the council of Ephesus, in a. d. 431, and vehemently supported Cyril in his attacks upon Nestorius. He was the author of numerous homilies and controversial works, the titles of which it is not worth while to insert here; they are fully given by Fabricius. Of these works some are published in the Acts of the Councils, some exist in MS, and others are wholly lost. Cave praises the ease and clearness of his style, and his controversial powers. (Cave, Hist. Litt. a. a. 430, p. 415; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. pp. 512, foll.)

THEODOTUS.

Valesius, Tillemont, and Graving named M. Schom., a valuable Martyrol. of the workmanship, of the head, of the walls, of the houses in Pompeii and Herculeanum, and of those to Juvenal refers in the line (Sat. viii. 157):

"Eponam et facies olis et praepeia picta;"

and the artist may be classed with those painters of vulgar subjects whom the Greeks called πραγματικοὶ or παραγματικοὶ, or with our sign painters. (See Pyrricus, and Dict. of Antig. s. v. Pictura, p. 912, a. 23 ed.; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 418, 417; and, especially, the full discussion of this comparatively unnoticed fragment of Naevius, by Panofka, in the Rhein. Mus. for 1846, vol. iv. pp. 139—138; there is no ground for Bothe's alteration of the painter's name to Theodorus."

THEODUNUS, the name given by Pococke (in his Latin Version of Abū-l-Panjar, Hist. Dynast. p. 128) to a Greek physician in the service of Hājaj Ibn Yūsuf, the general of the chaff 'Abdu-l-Malek Ibn Merwān, in the seventh century after Christ. He is called in Arabic تأثر، which Wüstenfeld renders Theodon (Gesch. der Arab. Aeerzt., p. 9), but neither Theodon nor Theodunus seems to be a genuine Greek name. He left behind him a sort of medical compendium which he compiled for the use of his son, and which is probably not extant in any European library. One of the anecdotes told by Ibn Abī’l-Malek is about the Abū-l-Panjar referred to Theodunus. [W. A. G.]

THEOGENES (Θεογένης). 1. An Athenian, who, in n. c. 425, was appointed together with Cleon to repair to Pylos, and investigate the truth of the tidings, which had been brought thence, as to the difficulties of the blockade of Spáthectría. Cleon, however, prudently persuaded the people to abandon the proposed inquiry. (Thuc. iv. 27) [CLZON.] It is possible that this Theogenes should be identified with the person who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Vesp. 1189), and who, the scholar tells us, was an Athenian (Arnold, ad Thuc. L.c.). A man of the same name is satirized also by Aristophanes (Par. 894) for his swellish propensities. (See also Arist. Av. 822, 1127, 1295, Lys. 63, with the Scholia.)

2. One of the Athenian ambassadors who set forth on their way to Dareius Nothus, in n. c. 406, under promise of a safe conduct from Pharnabazus. The satrap however detained them in custody at the instance of Cyrus, and he could not obtain leave to release them till the lapse of three years. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 8, 9, 13. 4. §§ 6, 7; Plut. Alc. 31.) Whether this was the same Theogenes who was appointed one of the 30 tyrants in n. c. 404 (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2) we have no means of deciding. [E. E.]

THEOGENETUS (Θεόγεντός), an athlete of Aegina, who is recorded as having gained the preserved by Festus (s. v. Penem antiqui codam vocabant, p. 250, ed. Muller, p. 204, ed. Lindemann): —

"Theodotum appellas, qui aras Complutibus Sedens in cella circumoctus tegibus Lares ludentes peni pinxit bubulo."
Theognis.

The year 853 brings the prizes for wrestling at the Olympic games. His statue at Olympia is noticed by Pausanias, (Pind. Pyth. viii. 50; Paus. vi. 9.) [E. E.]

Theognis (Thègonı̂s). 1. Of Thebes, a poet, of unknown date, to whom some of the ancient scribes ascribed the θεόδος λόγος, which others attributed to Orpheus. (Suid. s. v. Ἀρπεδαί; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 161.)

2. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, whose plays, entitled Θεόδος και Φιλάργυρος, Φιλός και Κένταυρος, and Κένταυρος, are mentioned by Suidas, on the authority of Athenæus. (Comp. Eustoch. p. 223.) In Aitnæus himself we find no mention of the Κένταυρος, but we have a fragment of ten lines from the Φιλάργυρος (Ath. xiv. p. 616, a.), and one of four lines from the Θεόδος και Φιλάργυρος. (Ath. iii. p. 104, b., xv. p. 671, a.) There is some reason to suppose that Plautus borrowed his Moselle from the latter play. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 500; Meineke, Fragmenta Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 437, vol. iv. p. 549.) [P. S. G.]

Theognis (Thègonı̂s). 1. Of Megara, an ancient elegiac and gnomic poet, whose reputed works form the most extensive collection of gnomic poetry, that has come down to us under any one name; but, unfortunately, the form in which these remains exist is altogether unsatisfactory. Most of our information respecting the poet's life is derived from his writings.

He was a native of Megara, the capital of Megar (Harpocrat. s. v.; Suid. s. v.), not of Megara Hylbnea, in Sicily; as Harpocrat (l. c.) justly argues from a line of his poetry (v. 783), in which he speaks of his going to Sicily, evidently as to a country which was not his native land, and as appears also from other passages of his writings. (See especially vv. 773, foll.) Harpocrat is, however, in error, when he charges Plato with having fallen into a mistake, in making Theognis a citizen of Megara in Sicily (Leg. i. p. 630, a.); for we can have no hesitation in accepting the explanation of the Scholion on Plato, that Theognis was a native of Megara in Greece, but received also the citizenship as an honour from the people of Megara Hybnea, whom he is known to have visited, and for whom one of his elegies was composed, as is proved by internal evidence. From his own poems also we learn that, besides Sicily, he visited Euboea and Lacedaemon, and that in all these places he was hospitably received (vv. 783, foll.). The circumstances which led him to wander from his native city will presently appear.

The time at which Theognis flourished is expressly stated by several writers as the 58th or 59th Olympiad, b. c. 548 or 544. (Cyril. adv. Julian. i. p. 13, a., vii. p. 225, c.; Euseb. Chron.; Suid. s. v.) It is evident, from passages in his poems, that he lived till after the commencement of the Persian wars, b. c. 490. These statements may be reconciled, by supposing that he was about eighty at the latter date, and that he was born about b. c. 570. (Clinton, F. H. s. a. 544.) Cyril (l. c.) and Suidas (s. v. Φυλακίσσης) make him contemporary with Phocylides of Miletus.

Both the life and writings of Theognis, like those of Alcaeus, are inextricably connected with the political events of his time and city. The little state of Megara had been for some time before the poet's birth the scene of great political convulsions. After shaking off the yoke of Corinth, it had remained for a time under the nobles, until about the year b. c. 630, when Theagenes, placing himself at the head of the popular party, acquired the tyranny of the state, from which he was again driven by a counter revolution, about b. c. 600 (Theagenes). The popular party, into whose hands the power soon fell again, governed temporarily for a time, but afterwards they oppressed the noble and rich, entering their houses, and demanding to eat and drink luxuriously, and enforcing their demand when it was refused; and at last passing a decree that the interest on any money lent should be refunded (παλαιστρικα, Plut. Quaest. Græc. 18, p. 293). They also banished many of the chief men of the city; but the exiles returned, and restored the oligarchy. (Aríst. Polit. v. 4 § 3.) Several such revolutions and counter-revolutions appear to have followed one another; but we are not informed of their dates. (Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 60.) Theognis was born and spent his life in the midst of these convulsions, to which a large portion of his poetry relates, most of that portion having evidently been composed at a time when the oligarchical party was oppressed and in exile. To this party Theognis himself belonged, and in its fates he shared. He was a noble by birth; and all his sympathies were with the nobles. They are, in his poems, the θυγατέρι and θεόλαθσ, and the commons the κακολ and θεόλαθσ terms which, in fact, at that period, were regularly used in this political significance, and not in their later ethical meaning.

It would seem that, in that particular revolution, from which Theognis suffered, there had been a division of the property of the nobles, in which he lost his all, and was cast out as an exile, barely escaping with his life, "like a dog who throws everything away in order to cross a torrent;" and that he had also to complain of treachery on the part of certain friends in whom he had trusted. In his verses he pours out his indignation upon his enemies, "whose black blood he would even drink." He laments the folly of the bad pilots by whom the vessel of the state had been often wrecked, and speaks of the common people with unmeasured contumely. Amidst all these outbursts of passion, we find some very interesting descriptions of the social change which the revolution had effect. It had rescued the country population from a condition of abject poverty and servitude, and given them a share in the government. "Cyr. * For a full illustration of the meanings of these words, see Welchcr's Προλογοσ τον Θεογνην, and an excellent note in Grote's History of Greece, vol. iii. p. 62: "The ethical meaning of these words is not absolutely unknown, yet rare, in Theognis: it gradually grew up at Athens, and became popularized by the Socratic school of philosophers as well as by the orators. But the early or political meaning always remained, and the fluctuation between the two has been productive of frequent misunderstanding. Constant attention is necessary, when we read the expressions of θεόλαθσ, θεόλαθσ, κακόλαθσ, καλόλαθσ, καθαρεύω, &c., on the one hand, of θεόλαθσ, κακολ, &c., to examine whether the context is such as to give them the ethical or the political meaning." Mr. Grote also illustrates the similar use of λόις, μαλι, optimates, and optimus quiesque, from Sullust (Hist. Frag. i. p. 935, Cor., and Cicero (De Rep. i. 34, pro Scip. 45).
nus," he exclaimed, "this city is still a city, but the people are others, who formerly knew nothing of courts of justice or of laws, but wore goat-skins about their ribs, and dwelt without this city, like timid deer. And now they are the good (ἀγαθοὶ) and those who were formerly the (ἄγαθοι) are now the mean (δεμαῖοι): who can endure to see these things?" (υν. 53—58, ed. Bergk.) The intercourse of common life, and the new distribution of property, were rapidly breaking down the old aristocracy of birth, and raising up in its place an aristocracy of wealth. "They honour riches, and the good marries the daughter of the bad, and the bad the daughter of the good, wealth confounds the race (ἐμίτε γέροι). Thus, wonder not that the race of citizens loses its brightness, for good things are confounded with bad." (υν. 189—192.)

These complaints of the debasement of the nobles by their intimate mixture with the commons are embittered by a personal feeling; for he had been rejected by the parents of the girl he loved, and she had been given in marriage to a person of far inferior rank (πολλάκις ἐμοῦ κατ'εὐκυ), but Theognis believes that her affections are still fixed on him (υν. 261—266). He distrusts the instability of the new order of things, and points to a new despotism as either established or just at hand.

Most of these political verses are addressed to a certain Cyrus, the son of Polyxus; for it is now generally admitted that the name Πολυκαίδης, which has been sometimes supposed to refer to a different person, is to be understood as a patronymic, and as applying to Cyprus. From the verses themselves, as well as from the statements of the ancient writers, it appears that Cyrus was a young man towards whom Theognis cherished a firm friendship, and even that tender regard, that pure and honourable παρεπαρτια, which often bound together men of different ages in the Dorian states (υν. 253, foll., 655, 820, 1051, foll.; Συν. s. v. Θεογνίς; Phot. Lex. s. v. Κύρος). From one passage (803, foll.) it appears that Cyrus was old enough, and of sufficient standing in the city, to be sent to Delphi as a sacred envoy (Θεωρῆς) to bring back an oracle, which the poet exhorts him to preserve faithfully. This is an entirely political fragment, as well as of a political character, but in a different tone, addressed to a certain Simonides; in which the revolution itself is described in guarded language, which indicates the sense of present danger; while in the verses addressed to Cyrus the change is presupposed, and the poet speaks out his feelings, as one who has nothing more to fear or hope for.

The other fragments of the poetry of Theognis are of a social, most of them of a festive character. They "place us in the midst of a circle of friends, who formed a kind of eating society, like the philaistis of Sparta, and like the ancient public tables of Megara itself." (Müller, p. 123.) All the members of this society belonged to the class whom the poet calls "the good." He addresses them, like Cyrus and Simonides, by their names, Onomacritus, Clearistus, Democles, Demonax, and Tima-goras, in passages which are probably fragments of distinct elegies, and for which an imitation is made to their various characters and adventures; and he refers, as also in his verses addressed to Cyrus, to the fame conferred upon them by the introduction of their names in his poems, both at other places, where already in his own time his elegies were sung at banquets, and in future ages. A good account of these festive elegies is given in the following passage from Muller: —"The poetry of Theognis is full of allusions to symposia: so that from it a clear conception of the outward accompaniments of the elegy may be formed. When the guests were satisfied with eating, the cups were filled for the solemn libation; and at this ceremony a prayer was offered to the gods, especially to Apollo, who in many districts of Greece was expanded into a panas. Here began the more joyous and noisy part of the banquet, which Theognis (as well as Pindar) calls in general καίμος, although this word in a narrower sense also signified the tumultuous throng of the guests departing from the feast. Now the Comos was usually accompanied with the flute: hence Theognis speaks in so many places of the accompaniment of the flute-player to the poems sung in the intervals of drinking; while the lyre and cithara (or phorminx) are rarely mentioned, and then chiefly in reference to the song at the libation. And this was the appropriate occasion for the elegy, which was sung by one of the guests to the sound of a flute, being either addressed to the company at large, or (as is always supposed in Theognis) to a single individual (p. 124.) Small towns were often possessed by no less distinct a style and spirit of those portions of the poems of Theognis, which he composed in his youth and prosperity, and those which he wrote in his mature age, and when misfortunes had come upon him.

As to the form in which the poems of Theognis were originally composed, and that in which the fragments of them have come down to us, there is a wide field for speculation. The ancients had a collection of elegiac poetry, under his name, which they sometimes mention as ἔλεγχα, and sometimes as ἔπιτη, and which they referred as chiefly, if not entirely, of a gnostic character. (Plat. Mem. p. 93, d.) Xenophon says that "this poet discourses of nothing else but respecting the virtue and vice of men, and his poetry is a treatise (σύγγραμμα) concerning men, just as if any one skilled in horsemanship were to write a treatise about horsemanship." (Xenoph. op. Stob. Florye, Ixxxviiii.) To the same effect Isocrates mentions Hesiod, Theognis, and Phocylides, and adds, that he had been given the best advice respecting human life (καὶ τὰ πάντα φανέρα μὲν ἁριστῶν γενεσίαν συν- βούλων τῷ βίῳ τῶν ἀνθρώπων); and from the context, it may be inferred that the works of these poets were used in Greek education (Isocr. ad Nicoc. 42, p. 23, b.). Suidas (s. v.) enumerates, as his works, an Ελεγχεῖς τού ποιητῶν ἡμέρας Σω- κονοῦν ἐν τῇ πολιτείᾳ (see Welcker, Proleg. p. xiv.); Τυρτοι Ελεγχείς, to the amount of 2800 verses (γραμμα ντί νέλεγιας ἐπὶ βάτ); a Κονομολογία in elegiac verse, and other hortatory counsels, addressed to Cyprus (καὶ πός Κύρος, τῶν αὐτῶν ἐφρόμουν, Γυμνολογίαν τε δηλεγείοι καὶ ἑπίκου ὀποικίας πα- ρανεκτίας). Suidas adds, that these poems were all of the epic form (τα πάντα ἐπίκας), a phrase which can only be explained by taking the word epic in that wide sense, of which we have several other examples (Men. p. 175, 176, d.), which has been noticed above, as including poems in the elegiac verse; for all the remains of Theognis which we possess are elegiac, and there is no sufficient reason to suppose that he wrote any epic poems, properly so called, or even any gnomic poems in hexameter verse. Had he done so, the fact would surely have been indicated by the occasional appearance of con-
Theognis.

Accurate hexameters in the gnomic extracts from his poems. The passage of Plato (l.c.), sometimes quoted to show that he wrote epic poetry, seems to us to prove, if anything, the very opposite. The poems, which have come down to us, consist of 1399 equal verses, consisting of gnomic sentences and paragraphs, of one or more couplets; which vary greatly in their style and subjects, and which are evidently extracted from a number of separate poems. Even in the confused account of Suidas we trace indications of the fact, that the poetry of Theognis consisted of several distinct elegies. In what state the collection was in the time of Suidas, we have not sufficient evidence to determine; but, comparing his article with his well-known method of putting together the information which he gathered from various sources, we suspect that the work which he calls Γραμματι δι' ἐλεγελας εἰς ἐκη βδα, was a collection similar to that which has come down to us, though more extensive, and with which Suidas himself was probably acquainted, and that he copied the other titles from various writers, without caring whether the poems they referred were included in the great collection. Xenophon, in the passage above cited, refers to a collection of the poetry of Theognis; though not, as some have supposed, to a continuous gnomic poem; and it is evident that the collection referred to by Xenophon was different from that which has come down to us, as the lines quoted by him as its commencement are now found in the MSS. as vv. 183—190.

The manner in which the original collection was formed, and the changes by which it has come into its present state, can be explained by a very simple theory, perfectly consistent with all the facts of the case, in the following manner.

Theognis wrote numerous elegies, political, convivial, affective, and occasional, addressed to Cyrus, and to his other friends. In a very short time these poems would naturally be collected, and arranged according to their subjects, and according to the persons to whom they were addressed; but at what precise period this was done we are unable to determine: the collection may have been partly made during the poet's life, and even by himself; but we may be sure that it would not be left undone long after his death.

In this collection, the distinction of the separate poems in each great division would naturally be less and less regarded, on account of the uniformity of the metre, the similarity of the subjects, and—in the case especially of those addressed to Cyrus—the perpetual recurrence of the same name in the different poems. Thus the collection would gradually be fused into one body, and, first each division of it, and then perhaps the whole, would assume a form but little different from that of a continuous poem. Even before this had happened, however, the decidedly gnomic spirit of the poems, and their popularity on that account (see Isoc. l.c.), would give rise to the practice of extracting from them couplets and paragraphs, containing gnomic sentiments; and these, being chosen simply for the sake of the sentiment contained in each individual passage, would be arranged in any order that accident might determine, without reference to the original place and connection of each extract, and without any pains being taken to keep the passages distinct. Thus was formed a single and quasi-continuous body of gnomic poetry; which of course has been subjected to the common fates of such collections; interpolations from the works of other gnomic poets, and omissions of passages which really belonged to Theognis; besides the ordinary corruptions of critics and transcribers. Whatever questions may be raised as to matters of detail, there can be very little doubt that the so-called poems of Theognis have been brought into their present state by some such process as that which has been now described.

In applying this theory to the restoration of the extant fragments of Theognis to something like their ancient arrangement, Welcker, to whom we are indebted for the whole discovery, proceeds in the following manner. First, he rejects all those verses which have the positive authority of ancient writers for assigning to other poets, such as Tyrtaeus, Minnermus, Solon, and others; provided, of course, that the evidence in favour of those poets preponderates over that on the ground of which the verses have been assigned to Theognis. Secondly, he rejects all passages which can be proved to be merely parodies of the genuine poems of Theognis, or at least with which he discusses with great skill (pp. lxxx. fol). Thirdly, he collects those passages which refer to certain definite persons, places, seasons, and events, like the epigrams of later times; of these he considers some to be the productions of Theognis, but others manifest additions. His next class is formed of the convivial portions of the poetry; in which the discrimination of what is genuine from what is spurious is a matter of extreme difficulty. Fifthly, he separates all those paragraphs which are addressed to Polypaides; and here there can be no doubt that he has fallen into an error, through not perceiving the fact above referred to, as clearly established by other writers, that that word is a patronymic, and only another name for Cyrus. Lastly, he removes from the collection the verses which fall under the denomination of οἰκίσκει, for which Suidas censures the poet; but, if we understand these passages as referring to the sort of intercourse which prevailed among the DORIANS, many of them admit of the best interpretation and may safely be assigned to Theognis, though there are others, of a less innocent character, which we must regard as the productions of later and more corrupt ages. The couplets which remain are fragments from the elegies of Theognis, mostly addressed to Cyrus, and referring to the events of the poet's life and times, and the genuineness of which may, for the most part, be assumed; though, even among these, interpolations may very probably have taken place, and passages actually occur of a meaning so nearly identical, that they can hardly be supposed to have been different passages in the works of the same poet, but they seem rather to have been derived from different authors by some compiler who was struck by their resemblance.

The poetical character of Theognis may be judged of, to a great extent, from what has already been said, and it is only necessary to add that his genuine fragments contain much that is highly poetical in thought, and elegant as forcible in expression.

The so-called remains of Theognis were first printed in the Aldine collection, Venet. 1495, fol., mentioned under Theocritus (p. 1034, b.), then in the several collections of the gnomic poets published during the 16th century. (See Hoffmann, Diceopolis mentions, as one of his miseries, that, when he was sitting in the theatre, gaping for a tragedy of Aeschylus, the crier shouted, "Theognis, lead in your chorus!": in another, illustrating the connection between the characters of poets and their works, Aristophanes says (Thesm. 168),

and in the third, he describes the fragile character of his compositions by the witticism, that once the whole of Thrace was covered with snow, and the rivers were frozen, at the very time when Theognis was exhibiting a tragedy at Athens (Acharn. 138).

This joke is no doubt the foundation for the statement of the scholiast that Theognis was so frigid a poet as to obtain the nickname of Χίων (Schol. ad Acharn. 11; copied by Suidas, s. v.). It would seem from a passage of Suidas (s. v. Νικήχαυς) that, on one occasion, Theognis gained the third prize, in competition with Euripides and Nico- machus. It is stated by the scholiast on Aristophanes, by Harpocration (s. v.), and by Suidas (s. v.), on the authority of Xenophon, in the 2d Book of the Hellenics, that Theognis was one of the Thirty Tyrants; and perhaps, therefore, the name Θεόγνης, in the passage of Xenophon referred to (Hell. ii. 3. § 52), should be altered to Θεώνης. According to these statements Theognis began to exhibit tragedies before the date of the Acharnians, b. c. 425, and continued his poetical career down to the date of the Thesmophoriazusae, b. c. 411, and was still conspicuous in public life in b. c. 404. Two lines are referred to by some writers, as quoted from a tragedy of Theognis, entitled Θεώνης, by Stobaeus (xii. 5); but a careful examination of the passage shows that it refers to the Thesmophoriazusae. We have, however, one line from Theognis, quoted by Demetrius (de Eloc. 85):

Παραπαίτειται τὸ τόξον, φορύμυρ' ἄκρωκον.

The metaphor in this line is referred to by Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 11), in conjunction with an equally bold one from Timotheus which Aristotle mentions also in other passages (Rhet. iii. 4; Polt. xxi. 12); whence Timotheus, Hermann, and Ritter (ad Arist. Poet. l. c.) have fallen into the error of ascertaining the former metaphor also to Timotheus, instead of Theognis. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 324; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 1006, 1007; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Graec. pp. 325, 326; Wagner, Frag. Trag. Graec. pp. 92, 93, in Didot's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum).

THEOGNOSTUS (Θεόγνωστος). 1. A Christian writer, a native of Alexandria, the author of a work entitled τοῦ μακάρου Θεογνωστοῦ Αἰαλαρ- θίου, καὶ ἔννοιην ἕποντος, Photius, who speaks in very disrespectful terms of him, gives a brief account of the contents of the work. (Cod. 106.) It seems, from what he says, that Theognostus closely followed Oribenes. The style is described by Photius as being of a very inferior description. Athanasius, however, speaks in much higher terms of Theognostus. (Fabric. Bibliogr. Graec. vol. x. p. 709.)

2. A Byzantine grammarian, who lived at the beginning of the ninth century after Christ. He was the author of a work on prosody, which is still extant in manuscript, addressed to the emperor Leo, the Armenian. He also wrote a history of the reign of Michael II., which is also extant in manuscript, addressed to the successor of Leo. (Villoison, Anecd. Graec. vol. ii. p. 127; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 350.) [C. P. M.]

THEOLYTUS (Θεόλυτος), of Methymna, in Lesbos, an epic poet of an unknown, but certainly an early period, who is mentioned once by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, and twice by Athenaeus. The latter author, in one passage (vii. p. 296, a, b.) quotes three lines from his Bacchylid, πονημάτον ἔσθε τόν Τιτώνον, that is, an epic poem on the adventures of Dionysus, to whose contest with the sea-god Glaucus, his rival in the love of Ariadne, the lines quoted by Athenaeus refer. The other reference to Theolytus is a quotation from him, ἐν δευτέρῳ Πονήρων (Ath. vi. p. 470, c), not Πονήρων, as the reading was before Schweighäuser, who shows that, and in other references to similar works, the genitive is not that of Πονήρων, but of Πονήρῳ, a word of the same meaning as Πονήρων, but used in the plural in the specific sense of Annals. (See Liddell and Scott, and Seiler and Jacobitz, s. v.) Another correction made by Schweighäuser in this latter passage is the restoration of the true form of the poet's name, which Casaubon had altered to Θεόλυτος. (Plehn. Lesbiana, p. 201.) [P. S.]

THEOMEDON (Θηομέδων), a physician who accompanied Eudoxus the astronomer and physician in his first visit to Athens, about the year B.C. 386, and who supported him while he was attending Plato's lectures in that city. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 8, § 86.) [W. A. G.]

THEOMESTOR (Θεομέστωρ), a Samian, son of Andromadas, commanded a vessel in the Persian fleet at Salamis (n. c. 480), and for his services in that battle was made tyrant of Samos by Xerxes. (Herod. viii. 85, ix. 90.) [E. E.]

THEOMNASTUS, one of the instruments of Verres in his oppression of the Sicilians. (Cic. Verr. ii. 21, 31, 4v. 66.)

THEOMNASTUS (Θεόμναστος), one of the Greek writers on veterinary surgery, who may perhaps have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. None of his works remain, but some fragments are to be found in the collection of writers on veterinary surgery, first published in Latin by John Ruellius, 1530, fol. Paris, and afterwards in Greek by Simon Grynaeus, 1587, 4to. Basil. [W. A. G.]

THEOMNASTUS (Θεόμναστος), artist. 1. A statuary of Sardis, of unknown time, who made the statue of the Olympic victor Ageles of Chios. (Paus. vi. 15, § 2.) He may safely be identified with the Theomnastus mentioned by Pliny among those who made άτλετες και αρμάτας και γενάτορας συναίσθησιν γενείς (H. N. xxxiv. 8, 19, § 34).

2. A sculptor, the son of Theotimus, flourished in Chios, under the early Roman emperors, as we learn from a Chian inscription, in which his name occurs as the maker, in conjunction with Dionysus, the son of Astis, of the monument erected to the memory of Claudius Aelopis, a freedman of the emperor Vespasian, to Phoebus Apollo, (Murator. vol. ii. p. xxxiv. 11; Boeckh, Corp. Insér. No. 2241, vol. ii. p. 210; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 417, 418, 2d ed.)

3. A painter, contemporary with Apelles. All that is known of him is contained in the statement of Pliny, that Mnason, the tyrant (of Eleaetia), gave him one hundred minae apiece for certain pictures, each of which represented a single hero. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 10, s. 36. § 24.) [P. S.]

THEON (Θεων). Of three of this name whose writings yet remain, two are mathematicians who are often confounded together. The first is Theon the elder, of Smyrna, best known as an arithmetician, who lived in the time of Hadrian. The second is Theon the younger, of Alexandria, the father of Hypatia, best known as an astronomer and geometer, who lived in the time of Theodosius the elder. Both were heathens, a fact which the date of the second makes it desirable to state; and each held the Platonism of his period. The confusions would probably be avoided, if they were named after their leaders in science: they would then be called Theon the Pythagorean, and Theon the Ptolemaist.

The date of "Theon of Smyrna the philosopher," to quote in full the account which Suidas gives of him, depends upon the assumption (which there seems no reason to dispute) that he is the Theon whom Ptolemy and the younger Theon mention as having made astronomical observations in the time of Hadrian. Theon of Smyrna certainly wrote on astronomy. On the assumption just made, Ptolemy has preserved his observations of Mercury and Venus (a. d. 129—133). Boulliau supposes that it is Theon of Smyrna to whom Proclus alludes as having written on the genealogies of Solon and Plato, and Plutarch as having written on the lunar spots. (See Boulliau's prefacc, or the quotations in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 33.)

All that we have left is a portion of a work entitled, τον κατὰ μαθηματικὴν χρησιμον εἰς τὴν τῶν Πλάτωνος ἀνάγκαιον. The portion which now exists is in two books, one on arithmetic, and one on music; there was a third on astronomy, and a fourth Περὶ τῆς ἐν κόσμῳ ἀρμοδίας. The work on arithmetic is of the same character as that of Nicomachus; and as both these writers name Thrasylus, and neither names the other, it may be supposed that the two were nearly contemporary. The book on music is on the simplest application of arithmetic. The two books were published by Boulliau, from a manuscript in De Theon's library, Paris, 1644, quarto (Gr. Lat.). The book on arithmetic has been recently published, with Boulliau's Latin, various readings, and new notes, by Professor J. J. de Gelder, Leyden, 1827, 8vo: the preface is the fullest disquisition on Theon which we exist. We may refer to it for an account of the bust which was found in Smyrna by Fouquier, with the inscription ΘΕΟΝΑΠΑΤΩΝ ΙΩΝΙΑΙΟΑΟΙΘΟΝΙΕΡΕΘΕΙΛΙΝΙΑΤΕΡΑ, now in the museum at Rome. There are scattered notices (for which see De Gelder) by which it seems that Theon had written other works: a manuscript headed Θεολογογιμεα is mentioned as attributed to him, which is probably only the work known under that name, with an assumed authorship. Boulliau mentions an astronomical fragment which he found; and also the assertion of Isac Yossius, made to him, that an astronomical treatise existed in the Ambrosian library at Milan.

Of the life of Theon of Alexandria, called the younger (described as διὰ τοῦ μωσαίου), nothing is known except the melancholy history of his daughter Hypatia. We shall now take the various writings to which his name is attached, in order.

1. Scholia on Aratus. Of these there are at least two sets, the second first printed by Buhle, in his edition, as emendationes. Grozis is of opinion that the first are not the work of Theon, but of several hands; this he infers from their containing repetitions and contradictions, which is not a very safe premise for the conclusion. Kuster (Suidas, s. ɔ.) attributes them, without reason given, rather to Theon the sophist. That they are unworthy of the astronomer, is true enough; but rejections made on such a ground are dangerous things. These scholia were printed in the Aldine* edition of Aratus, in that of Valder's collection [Ptolemaeus, p. 573], in Morell's edition, Paris, 1553, 4to., in Telf., Oxford, 1672, 8vo., and also in Buhle's. Halma, in his edition (Gr. Fr.) Paris, 1822, 4to, has given selections, which his critics have asserted to be very ill chosen. (Hoffman, Lecic. Bibliogr. vol. i. p. 233.)

2. Edition of Euclid. Of the manner in which Theon is asserted to have edited Euclid we have already said enough. (Euclidides, pp. 68, 69, b, 70, a.)

3. Eis tìn τòv Πτολεμαίου μεγάλων σύνταξις ὑσομυησάτων Βεβιλία α'. This is the great work of Theon, the commentary on the Almagest, addressed to his son Epiphanius. But the Almagest has thirteen books, while Theon's commentary is marked as having only eleven. The commentary on the third book has not come down to us with the name of Theon, but with that of Nicolas Cabacilla; and those on the tenth and eleventh books are joined together. The commentary on the later books is obviously mutilated by time; for a circumstance connected with that on the fifth book, see Pappus. On this commentary, Delambre (who has given a full account of it, Hist. Astron. Anc. vol. ii. pp. 550—616) passes the following judgment: "Theon commences by announcing that he will not follow the example of ordinary commentators, who show themselves very learned on passages which offer no difficulty, and are silent upon all which would give trouble to understand or to explain. He has not always kept this promise; I have often referred for information, and I have only found Ptolemy's words faithfully copied or slightly modified. It is a paraphrase which may give some explanation of methods, but which really presents nothing which a little attention would not find in the text, none of those lost traditions, which must then have existed at the Observatory of Alexandria, nothing new upon the instruments or the method of using them. Theon seems to know no one but Ptolemy and Pappus. This commentary is not what could have been made then, nor even what could have been made now."

We have mentioned in the article Ptolemaeus all the editions of the commentary which accompany those of the text. The only separate edition (if it be right so to call it) is that of Halma, forming a continuation of the four volumes already mentioned in Ptolemaeus. It includes only the commentary on the first and second books (Gr. Fr.) in two volumes, quarto, Paris, 1821 and 1822.

4. Commentary on the Manual tables of Ptolemy. Knowledge of this work is very recent, and as it involves a work of Ptolemy himself which we have not mentioned in its place, a few words of explanation will be necessary. It was long known that certain unpublished tables (as they were called) of Theon existed in manuscript: and there is in Fabricius and others a frequent confusion of these tables with the chronological table presently mentioned. Not but what accurate information might have been found. Kuster, speaking of an emendation of Suidas, who attributes to Theon a work eis τòv Πτολεμαίου πρόχειρον κανόνα, says that Theon proposed to reconstitute on the canons of Ptolemy, which canon existed in manuscripts in the Imperial library. Delambre found a manuscript in the Royal Library at Paris, which he has described (Hist. Astr. Anc. vol. ii. p. 616) under the head Θεώνος 'Αλεξανδρίως κάνονες πρόχειροι. Tables manuelles de Théon d'Alexandrie. This work was afterwards published by Halma, but under the title "Commentaire de Théon... sur les tables manuelles astronomiques de Ptolémée," in three parts, Paris, 1822, 1823, 1825, 4to. Having only very recently seen this last work, we have only as recently known that there is a distinct work of Ptolemy himself, the κάνονες πράξειροι, Ptolemy's part is addressed to Syrus; Théon's to his son Epiphanius. The contents are, prolegomena, tables of latitude and longitude, and a collection of astronomical tables, somewhat more extensive than those in the Syntaxis. The prolegomena are separately headed; one set is given to Ptolemy, another to Théon. But the tables themselves are headed Ptolemaion Θεώνος, κανόνες πράξειροι. Théon's part is called Ptolemaei. THO Procedures. Dod well had previously printed a fragment of the prolegomena in his "Dissertationes Cyriano," Oxford, 1684, 8vo.

5. The continuation of the regal canon [Ptolemaeus, p. 572] down to his own time is attributed to Theon. In the manual tables it is carried down to the fall of the Eastern empire with the heading Πτολεμαϊος, Θεώνος, κ. τ. λ. A very full dissertation on this canon is to be found in an anonymous work "Observaciones in Theonis Fastes Graecos priores." Amsterdam 1735, quarto.

The list of works attributed to Theon of Alexandria by Suidas is Mathematika, Aristophanes, *Peri σημειων καὶ σκοπίων ὀρθῶν καὶ τῆς τῶν κοράκων φωνῆς, Peri τῆς τοῦ κοόρος ἐπίτοιχης, Peri τῆς τοῦ Νεάνιον ἀναδόσεως, Eἰς τὸν Πτολεμαίου πρόχειρον κανόνα, Eἰς τὸν πυρὸν Ἀστρολαβίων ὑπομνήματος, in the last, Fabricius proposes to read ἀστρολαβίων.* In the first five books only is there a commentary on the collection of minor writers. The title is usually given in the name of the lesser Syntaxis. (Fabricius, Halma, Delambre, &c. op. cit. edit. citat.)

*This Aldine edition, Venice, 1499, folio, is not a separate work, but part of what is frequently catalogued as Scriptores Astronomici Vetræ, containing Julius Firmicus, Manilius, &c. as well as Aratus.*

THEON, Theon (literary). 1. A grammarian, who taught at Rome in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius, and was succeeded by Apion. (Suid. s. v. Απίων.) He was the author of a Lexicon to the Greek comedians (Κομικαὶ λέξεις), which is quoted by Hesychius in the Prooemium to his Lexicon. (Also, s. v. Σαῦλος; see Ruhnken, Patr. ad Hesych., pp. ix. foll.) It is doubtful whether he was the author of the comic lexicon quoted by the Scholastik to Apollonius Rhodius (iv. pp. 380, 305). He is one of the authors from whose works the

Scholea to Aristophanes were derived. A Commentary on the Odyssey by a certain Theon is quoted in the Elygogicium Magni (s. v. πόσιος). In one of the Schoela on Aristophanes (Nub. 397), the genuineness of which, however, is doubtful (see Dindorf, Annot. ad loc.), Theon is mentioned as one of the commentators on Apollonius Rhodius. It is very possible, however, that one or both of these Commentaries on Homer and Apollonius, should be assigned to Aelius Theon, of Alexandria, No. 5, below. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. i. p. 525, vol. ii. p. 500, vol. vi. p. 390.)

2. A later grammarian, the contemporary and friend of Plutarch, in whose Questions Conviviales he is often mentioned.

3. Of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher, who flourished under Augustus, later than Arrieus, and wrote a Commentary on Apollodorus's Introduction to Physiology, τῷ Απολλώνιῳ φυσιολογίας εἰσ-αγωγῆς ὑπόθεσις, and three books on Rhetoric, περὶ τεχνῶν ρητορικῶν βιβλία γ'. (Suid. s. v.)

4. Of Antioch, a Stoic philosopher, wrote a Defence of Socrates, Ἀπολογία Σωκράτους. (Suid. s. v.)

5. Aelius Theon, of Alexandria, a sophist and rhetorician, wrote a treatise on Rhetoric (τέχνη), a work περὶ προγυμνασμάτων (or, as some scholars read the text of Suidas, the words τέχνη περὶ προ-γυμνασμάτων form only one title), Commentaries on Xenophon, Isocrates, and Demosthenes, Rhetorical Themes (προγυμνασματίκαι θέματες), Questions respecting the Composition of Language (γρήγορα περὶ συντάξεως λόγων), and numerous other works (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 291). The Προγυμνασματα is still extant. It is an excellent and useful treatise on the proper system of preparation for the profession of an orator, according to the rules laid down by Hermogenes and Aphiithon. It was first printed, in Greek only, by Angelus Barbatisus, Romae, 1592, 4to; again, with an amended text and a Latin version, by Joachim Camerarius, Basle. 1541, 8vo; by Dan. Heinius, from the Elzevir press, Lugd. Bat. 1626, 8vo; by Joahn. Schefferus, with the Προγυμνασματικα of Aphiithon, Upsal.

1670 or 1680, 8vo.; and recently, with the Schoela, Notes, and Indices, by C. E. Finkch, Stuttgart. 1834, 8vo. and also in Walz's Rhetores Graeci, vol. i. pp. 137, foll. Küster (ad Suid. s. v.) thinks that Aelius Theon was the author of the Commentary on Apollonius, mentioned above (No. 1), and also of the extant Schoela on Aratus, which others refer to the father of Hypatia. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 97, 98; Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliogr. Scriptor. Graecorum, s. v.)

6. Valerius Theon, a sophist, who wrote a Commentary on Andocide (Suid. s. v.), from which the suspicion arises, that he is the same person as the preceding, and that there is some confusion between the names Aelius and Valerius.

7. Of Sidon, a son of the sophist Gymnasius, and himself a sophist, taught in his native city, under Constantine the Great, who conferred upon him the dignities of consul and praefect. (Suid. s. v.)

8. A sophist and rhetorician, who was the instructor of Damascius in oratory. (Phot. Bibli. Cod. 181, p. 126, b. 40, ed. Bekker.) He must therefore have flourished at the end of the fifth and the beginning of the sixth centuries of our era. Some particulars respecting him are preserved, from Damascius, by Photius (Cod. 242, p. 339, b. 7), and by Suidas (s. v.), who tells us that Theon was the descendant of S. Marcella, and the son and pupil of Eecilius. The passage of Damascius, quoted by Photius, is to the effect that Theon was naturally somewhat obtuse, but so fond of learning and so laborious was he, that he acquired the most perfect knowledge of the ancient poets and orators, and the most thorough technical acquaintance with the art of both; but he was never able, though very desirous, to reduce his knowledge to practice, and to write either poems or orations. His only work known to Suidas was a Treatise on Rhetoric, τέχνη ρητορική.

A list of some other persons of this name is given by Fabricius. (Bibli. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 98, 99.)

THEON (Θεόν), the name of three physicians: — 1. A native of Alexandria (Galen, De Sac. Th. iii. 3, vol. vi. p. 192), who was originally an athlete, and afterwards a gym-nastus (ibid. ii. 4. p. 114;) and who wrote two works on the subject of gymnastics, one entitled Περὶ τῶν κατὰ Μέρος Γυμναστικῶν, De Particularibus Exercitii, the other Περὶ τῶν Γυμναστικῶν, De Gymnastice (ibid. iii. 8. pp. 208, 209). These works are several times mentioned by Galen, but are not now extant. With respect to Theon's date, it can only be positively determined that he lived after Hippocrates (ibid. ii. i. p. 105), and before Galen; but, as Galen does not speak of him as having lived shortly after his own time, he may perhaps be placed in the third or second century B.C.

2. A physician who acquired some reputation in Gaul in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. (Eunap. Vit. Ioniect.)

3. A physician of Alexandria, who wrote a comprehensive medical work entitled Ανθρώπων, "Man," in which he treated of diseases in a systematic order, beginning with the head, and then descending to the feet, and also of pharmacy. As Photius calls him (Bibl. § 220) by the title of "Archierat," he must have lived after the beginning of the Christian era, and as Galen does not mention him, he may be supposed to have lived later than the second century. If (as is not improbable) he is the same physician, one of whose medical formulae is quoted by Aelius (i. 3. 58. p. 127), he must have lived before the sixth century. Haller places him in the reign of Theodosius, that is, in the fourth century (Bibl. Medic. Pract. vol. i. p. 287), which may be quite correct, but he does not state the reason for his assigning so precise a date.

Theon, the commentator on Nicander mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. e. Keparos), is recognized as a physician by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 434) and Haller (l. c. p. 139), but it is perhaps more probable that he was a grammarian by profession, as he appears to have written a commentary also on Apollonius Rhodius and on Lycophron. [W. A. G.]

THEON of Samos, is mentioned by Quintilian (xii. 10. § 6) as one of those painters who flourished from the time of Philip to that of the successors of Alexander, the age of Pamphilus and Melanthius, Apelles and Protogenes. The peculiar merit of Theon was his prolific fancy (concipiendis visionibus, quaes varietatibus vocant), a characteristic denoting that excessive refinement in which the decline of art was already commencing, and which is still more strongly exhibited in the description given by Aelian (V. H. ii. 44) of Theom's picture of a soldier rushing to the battle. If we may believe Aelian, Theon even transgressed the limits of his own art in his attempt to produce a striking effect; for he never exhibited the picture without first causing a charge to be sounded on trumpets, and when the excitement produced by the music was at its highest, he drew up the curtain, and showed the warrior as if he had suddenly started into the presence of the spectators. Pliny places Theon among the painters who were "primiti proximi, and mentions two of his works, namely, Orestes insania, and Thamyrus citharoedus (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 40). The former picture is also mentioned in the treatise of the Pseudo-Plutarch, de Audieniss Poetis, p. 18, from which we learn, what might be inferred from Pliny's words, that it represented Orestes slaying his mother. (See further, respecting this picture, R. Rochette, Monum. Ined. p. 177.)
THEOPHANES.

THEONDAS, the chief magistrate in Samothrace at the time of the defeat of Perseus, in B.C. 163. (Liv. xlv. 5.)

THEOPHANE (Theophanes) 1. A daughter of Protesilaus and Patamha, who is said to have been in love with Canobus, the helmsman of Menelaus, who died in Egypt, in consequence of the bite of a snake. She is also called Eido or Eidothen. (Eurip. Helen. 11; Aristoph. Theas. 897; Plat. Cratyl. p. 407; Hom. Od. iv. 363.)

2. A daughter of Thestor. (Thestor.) [L. S.]

THEOPHANE (Theophanes), a daughter of Bysaltes, who, in consequence of her extraordinary beauty, was beleaguered by lovers, but was carried off by Poseidon to the isle of Criniass. As the lovers followed her even there, Poseidon metamorphosed the maiden into a sheep and himself into a ram, and all the inhabitants of the island into animals. As the lovers began to slaughter these animals, he changed them into wolves. The god then became by Theophane the father of the ram with the golden fleece, which carried Phrixus to Colchis. (Hygin. Fab. 192.)

THEOPHANES (Theophanes), literary. 1. A writer on painting, mentioned by Diogenes Laëritius (iii. 104).

2. Of Byzantium, one of the writers of the Byzantine history, flourished most probably in the latter part of the sixth century of our era. He wrote, in ten books, the history of the Eastern Empire (Istoriówá λαού δήκα), during the Persian war under Justin II., beginning from the second year of Justin, in which the truce made by Justinian with Chosroes was broken, A.D. 567, and going down to the tenth year of the war, which, according to Mr. Clinton, was not A.D. 577, but A.D. 581, because the war did not begin till A.D. 571, although the history of Theophanes may have commenced with A.D. 567.

Photius (Bibl. Cod. 64) gives an account of the work of Theophanes, and he repeats the author's statement that, besides adding other books to the ten which formed the original work, he had written another work on the history of Justinian. It well deserves mention that, among the historical statements preserved by Photius from Theophanes is the discovery, in the reign of Justinian, of the fact that silk was the production of a worm, which had not been before known to the people of the Roman empire. A certain Persian, he tells us, coming from the land of the Seres, brought to Constantine the seed "(τό σκέρμα, the eggs, of course) of the silk-worm, and these "seeds" being hatched in the spring, and the worms fed with mulberry leaves, they spun their silk, and went through their transformations.

3. ISAURUS, also surmamed Isaacius*, from his father's name, and also Confessor, or Confessor Imaginum, from his sufferings in the cause of image worship, was rewarded by his name as the author of a Chronicon in continuation of that of Syncellus, lived during the second half of the eighth century of our era, and the first fifteen years of the ninth.

He was of noble birth, his parents being Isaacius, the praefect of the Aegeopolitae, and Theodota. He was born in A.D. 856, and soon after, by the death of his father, he became a ward of the emperor Constantinus Copronymus. While quite a youth, he was compelled by Leo the patrician to marry his daughter; but, on the wedding-day, Theophanes and his wife agreed that the marriage should not be consummated; and, on the death of Leo, in A.D. 780, his daughter retired into a convent, and her husband Theophanes, who had in the meantime discharged various public offices, entered the monastery of Polychronium, near Singriana, in lesser Mysia. He soon left that place, and went to live in the island of Colynumus, where he converted his paternal estate into a monastery. After a residence of six years there, he returned to the neighborhood of Singriana, where he purchased an estate, called by the simple name of Agri (Σαρίνι), and founded another monastery, of which he made himself the abbot. In A.D. 787, he was summoned to the second Council of Nicaea, where he vehemently defended the worship of images. We have no further details of his life until A.D. 813, when he was required by Leo the Armenian to renounce the worship of images, and, upon his refusal, though he was extremely ill, and had been bed-ridden for five years, he was carried to Constantinople, and there, after a further period of resistance to the command of the emperor to renounce his principles, he was cast into prison, at the close of the year 815 or the beginning of 816; and, after two years' imprisonment, he was banished to the island of Samothrace, where he died, only twenty-three days from his arrival. His firmness in resisting, by his party, not only with the title of Confessor, but also with the honours of canonization.

Theophanes was the personal friend of Georgius

* There appears to be no authority for calling him, as Vossius does, Georgius. The mistake probably arose from some accidental confusion of his name with that of Georgius Syncellus.
Synelius, by whose desire he continued the Chronicon, which was broken off by the death of Synelius. The work of Theophanes, which is still extant, begins at the accession of Diocletian, in A.D. 277, and embraces a period of 524 years, down to A.D. 811; this is almost up to the very period when the career of Theophanes was ended by his imprisonment. It consists, like the Chronica of Eusebius and of Synelius, of two parts, a history arranged according to years, and a chronological table, of which the former is very superior to the latter. We possess the original Greek, and an ancient Latin translation, badly executed, by Anastasius Bibliothecarius. It has been published, with an improved Latin version, and with the Notes of Gorr and Combells, in the Parisian and Venetian Collections of the Byzantine writers, Paris, 1635, fol., Venet. 1729, fol., and in Nieu-buhr's Corpus Scriptorum Historiarum Byzantinae, Bonn, 2 vols. 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 459, foll.; Cave, Hist. Litt. S. a. 792, vol. i. p. 641, ed. Basili; Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 840, ed. Westermann; Hankis, Byz. Rev. Script. i. 11, pp. 200, 340.)

4. CERAMEUS. [Cerameus, Theophanes.] Some less worthy writers and ecclesiastics of this name are noticed by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 218—222.

There is one epigram in the Greek Anthology, under the name of Theophanes, but its authorship is very uncertain. (See Jacobs, Bibl. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 958.)

THEOPHANES GRAPHTUS. [Graptus.] THEOPHANES NONNUS. [Nonnus.]

THEOPHANES, CN. POMPEIUS, of Mytilene in Lesbos, a learned Greek, was one of the most intimate friends of Pompey, whom he accompanied in many of his campaigns, and who frequently followed his advice on public as well as private matters. (Caes. B.C. iii. 18; Strab. xiii. p. 617.) He was not a freedman of Pompey, as some modern writers have supposed (Burmam, ad Vitell. Pat. ii. 18; but the Roman general appears to have made his acquaintance during the Mithridatic war, and soon became so much attached to him that he presented to the Greek the Roman franchise in the presence of his army, after a speech in which he eulogised his merits. (Cic. pro Arch. 10; Val. Max. viii. 14. § 3.) This occurred in all probability about B.C. 62, and Theophanes must now have taken the name of Pompeius after his patron. Such was his influence with Pompey, that, in the course of the same year, he obtained for his native city the privileges of a free state, although it had espoused the cause of Mithridates, and had given up the Roman general M. Aquilius to the king of Pontus. (Plut. Pompey 42.) Theophanes came to Rome with Pompey after the conclusion of his wars in the East. There he adopted, before he had any son, L. Cornelius Balbus, of Gades, a favourite of his patron. (Cic. pro Balbo. 25; Capitol. Balb. 2.) He continued to live with Pompey on the most intimate terms, and we see from Cicero's letters, that his society was courted by many of the Roman nobles, on account of his well-known influence with Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 5, 12, 17, v. 11.) On the breaking out of the civil war he accompanied Pompey to Greece, who appointed him commander of the Fabri, and chiefly consulted him and Lucceius on all important matters in the war, much to the indignation of the Roman nobles. (Plut. Cic. 39; Caes. B.C. iii. 18; Cic. ad Att. ii. 3, 11.) After the battle of Pharsalia Theophanes fied with Pompey from Greece, and it was owing to his advice that Pompey went to Egypt. (Plut. Pompey 76, 78.) After the death of his father and patron, Theophanes took refuge in Italy. He was per- domin'd by Caesar, and was still alive in B.C. 44, as we see from one of Cicero's letters (ad Att. xv. 19). After his death the Lesbians paid divine honours to his memory. (Tac. Ann. vi. 18.) Theophanes wrote the history of Pompey's campaigns, in which he represented the exploits of his hero in the most favourable light, and did not hesitate, as Plutarch more than hints, to invent a false tale for the purpose of injuring the reputation of an enemy of the Pompeian family. (Plut. Pompey 37, et alibi; Strab. xi. p. 503, xiii. p. 617; Cic. pro Arch. l.c.; Val. Max. l.c.; Capitol. l.c.)

Theophanes left behind him a son, M. Pom- peius Theophanes, who was sent to Asia by Augustus, in the capacity of procurator, and was at the time that Strabo wrote one of the friends of Aelius. This latter emperor, however, permitted his descendants to death towards the end of his reign, A.D. 23, because their ancestor had been one of Pompey's friends, and had received after his death divine honours from the Lesbians. (Strab. xiii. p. 617; Tac. Ann. vii. 18; comp. Drummian, Geschichte Rome, vol. iv. pp. 551—553; Vossius, De Hist. Graec. pp. 190, 191, ed. Westermann.)

THEOPHILUS, a Rhodian, who com- manded the fleet sent by his countrymen to the assistance of Attalus, king of Pergamus, against Philip, king of Macedonia, B.C. 201. He bore an important part in the great sea-fight off Chios, which was brought on by his advice, and in which he mainly contributed to the victory, both by his skill and personal valor. But having been led by his ardour too far into the midst of the enemy's fleet, his own ship was assailed on all sides, and he extricated her with great difficulty, having lost almost all his crew, and himself received new wounds, of which he died shortly after. The highest honours were paid to his memory by the Rhodians. (Polyb. xvi. 2, 5, 9.)

THEOPHILUS (Θεόφιλος), emperor of Constantinepole A.D. 829—842, was the son and suc- cessor of Michael II. Balbus, with whom he was associated in the government as early as 821 (Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 240.) He was engaged in war with the Saracens during the greater part of his reign, but notwithstanding his valour and energy he was generally unsuccessful against these formidable foes, and hence obtained the surname of the Unfortunate. At the end of his fifth cam- paign he had the mortification of seeing the city of Amorium in Phrygia, which was the birth-place of his father, and which he had adorned with public buildings, levelled to the ground by the caliph Motassem. Like most of the other Byzantine emperors, Theophilos took part in the religious disputes of his age. He was a zealous iconoclast, and persecuted the worshippers of images with the utmost severity; but notwithstanding his heresy, the ancient writers bestow the highest praise upon his impartial administration of justice. He died in 842, and was succeeded by his infant son Michael III., who was left under the guardianship of his mother, the empress Theodora. [MICHAEL III.] (Zonar. xv. 25—29; Cedrenus, pp. 513— 533; Continuator Theoph. lib. iii.; Ducas, Pa-THEOPHILUS. (Θεόφιλος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet, most probably of the Middle Comedy, as Meineke shows from the extant titles and fragments of his plays. In a passage of Poly-hron (ix. 15), in which he is mentioned as one of the poets of the New Comedy, most of the MSS. have the name of Diphilus, instead of Theophilus.

The following titles of his plays are preserved by Athenaeus (passim) and Suidas (s. v.), except the first, which is quoted by the Scholast to Dionysius Thrax (p. 724. 26): Ἀνδόνιμος, Βωστία, Ἐπιδαρ-ρος, Ιστρός, Κιθαροδότος (Meineke, vol. iii. p. 628), retracts the doubt which he had raised as to this being a true title of a drama, Νεοστόλεμος, Παγκρατιάτης, Ποτηρίδες, Φιλανδος. (Fabric.

2. An historian and geographer, if at least the passages about to be quoted refer to one and the same person. He is mentioned by Josephus (c.

Aριων. i. 23) among those writers, who had noticed the Jews. The third book of his work on Italy (τὰ Ἅλλατε), and the second of that on the Peloponnesus (Τὸ Ἡλευρέον), are quoted by Plutarch (Parallola Minora, 13, 32, pp. 309, a., 313, d). Ptolemy (Geogr. i. 9. § 3) quotes a statement from some geographical work by Theophilus, the title of which he does not mention, but which is no doubt the same as the Περιφήγος, the eleventh book of which is referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. n. Παλική), Plutarch also (de Flux. 24) cites the first book of a work of Theophilus περὶ Νήμων. (Vossius, de Hist. Gracc. p. 504, ed. Westermann.)

3. A writer on agriculture, whom Varro (R. R. i. 1 § 9), and Columella (i. 1. § 11) mention in their lists of authorities, but about whom they give us no further information.

4. Bishop of Antioch, in the latter part of the second century of our era, and the author of one of the early apologies for Christianity which have come down to us. The common opinion concerning his time, derived from Eusebius, Jerome, and Nicephorus, has been elaborately canvassed by Dodwell and others, whose arguments are fully examined, and satisfactorily answered by Cave (Hist. Litt. s. a. 169), and Harless (ed Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. vii. p. 102).

In the eighth (Hieron. Chronic. s. a. 2184) or tenth (Euseb. Chronic. s. a. 2186; Synecell. p. 352, d.) year of Marcus Antoni-minus (A. D. 169 or 172), he succeeded Eros in the see of Antioch, of which he was the sixth bishop (Euseb. H. E. iv. 29; Hieron. de Vir. Ill., 25), or, including S. Peter, the seventh (Hieron. Algas. vol. iii. p. 318; Niceph. Chronic. p. 417, c.), and he held that office for thirteen years, that is, till A. D. 181 or 183 (Niceph. L. c.). Having been originally a heathen,* as he tells us himself (Ad Autolyce. i. p. 78), he was converted to Christianity by the study of the sacred Scriptures, and, besides other religious works, he wrote an apology for the Christian faith, in the form of a letter to a friend, named Autolycus, who was still a heathen, but a man of extensive reading and great learning, and an earnest lover of truth (Theoph. ad Autolyce. L p. 69, b. iii. pp. 119, a., 127, b. 138, d.). This work must have been written, or, at least, finished, shortly before the death of Theophilus, for there is an allusion towards the close of it, which fixes the composition of that part after the death of Marcus Antoninus, in A. D. 169; and according to the preceding testimomies, Theophilus did not live later than A. D. 183, or perhaps than A. D. 181. The work is cited by various titles, either simply πρὸς Ἀὐτόλυκον βιβλία γ', or with the addition πρὸς τῶν Χριστιανῶν πτερωτῶν, of, as Eusebius has it (H. E. iv. 24), τρία τὰ πρὸς Ἀὐτόλυκον στοιχεόντα συγγράμματα, implying that the object of the work was to teach Autolycus the elements of Christian truth; and again, in a MS. in the Paris library, the title is given with an addition which states the object of the work to be, to prove "that the divine oracles in our possession are more ancient and more true than the statements of Egyptian and Grecian and all other historians." It is quoted by Lactantius (iii. 28), by the title of De Temporibinis, and it is mentioned by Gennadius (33) who erroneously ascribes it to Theophilus of Alexandria.

* Respecting the opinion that he was not a heathen, but a Jew and a Sadducee, see Harless, L. c., p. 101.

The work shows much learning and more simplicity of mind; in its general structure, it resembles the work of Tatian, in A. D. 169, and other early apologists; but it contains a more detailed examination of the evidence for Christianity derived both from Scripture and from history. Some of the arguments are fanciful, not to say puerile, in the extreme; for example, he interprets ἐν ἀρχῇ, in Genesis i. 1, as meaning by Christ. He indulges much in allegorical interpretations: thus, the three days, preceding the creation of the sun and moon, are typical of the Trinity of God and his Word and his Wisdom; a passage, by the way, which is believed to contain the earliest instance of the use of the word Trinity in the writings of the Fathers. The work, however, contains much valuable matter; and its style is clear and good.

The three books of Theophilus to Autolycus were first published in the collection of the monks An-tonius and Maximus, entitled Sententiarum sive Capitum, Theologiorum proculque, ex saeculis et profanis libris, Torni tres, and containing, besides the work of Theophilus, the Confessio of Maximus and the Oration ad Graecos of Tatian, edited by Conrad Gesner. Tiguri, 1546, fol.: again with the Latin version of Conrad Clauiser, in the collections of the Scriptores Sacri, or Orthodographi, published in 1555 and 1559, fol. (see Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr.): with the editions of Justin Martyr, 1615, 1636, 1686, 1742, 1747, fol.: with notes by Fronto Ducasenae, in the Auctar. Biblioth. Patrum, Paris, 1624, fol.: with a revised text and notes, by John Bell, bishop of Oxford, Oxon. 1684. 12mo: the most complete edition is that of Jo. Christoph. Wolf. Hamburg. 1724, 8vo. It has been translated into English by Joseph Betty, Oxf. 1722, 8vo., and into German by G. C. Hosmann, Hamib, 1729, 8vo.

Theophilus was the author of several other works, which were extant in the times of Eusebius and Jerome (Euseb. Chronic. Arm. l. c.; Hieron. Chronic. l. c.; Sync. l. c.) Among these were works against the heresies of Marcion and Hermogenes, in the latter of which the Apocalypse was quoted. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 24; Hieron. de Vir. Illust. 25.) Jerome also mentions a Commentary on the Gospels, which seems to have been a sort of harmony, and of which he made use in his own Commentaries, but which he thinks not equal in style to the other works of Theophilus. (V. I. l.c.; Praef. in Matt.; Algas. vol. iii. p. 316.) There are still extant, in Latin only, under the name of Theophilus, four books of allegorical commentaries on various passages of the Gospels, which the best critics pronounce to be undoubtedly an original Latin work, of a period much subsequent to the time of Theophilus, although very probably his commentary may have been used in its compilation. This commentary is published in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1575, 1598, 1609, 1654, Colon. 1618, Ludg. 1677. Eusebius further mentions certain catechetical works by him (καὶ ἑρῴα δὲ τινὰ κατηγορικὰ αὐτοῦ βίβλια, H. E. iv. 24; breves elegantesque tractatus ad edificationem ecclesiae pertinentes, Hieron. V. I. l. c.); and Jerome (l. c.) refers to his Commentaries on the Proverbs, in connection with his Commentaries on the Gospels, and with the same qualification as to their style. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 168, pp. 69—71; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 101—106; Lardner, Credibility; Mosheim, Eccles. Hist. Murdock’s Note, vol. i. p. 155, Engl. ed.; Clinton, Fasti Rom. s. a. 171, 181.)

6. Bishop of Alexandria, in the latter part of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries of our era, is distinguished for his persecutions of the Origenists, for his hostility to Chrysostom, and as being altogether one of the most violent and unscrupulous even among the ecclesiastics of the fifth century. His life belongs rather to ecclesiastical than to literary history, and therefore only a very brief account of it is required here. He succeeded Timotheus, as bishop of Alexandria, in A.D. 385 (Socin. H. E. v. 12; not 387, as the date is given by Theophanes, p. 60, b, and Sozomen, H.E. vit. 14; see Clinton, Fasti Rom. s. a. 387). Soon after his elevation to the episcopal throne, he secured the favour of the emperor by a most characteristic manoeuvre. When the fate of the empire was suspended on the battle which was to decide between Maximus and Theodosius, A.D. 388, he sent his legate, Iadius, to Rome, provided with letters to both, the one or the other of which he was to deliver, with certain presents, according to the issue of the battle (Sozom. H. E. viii. 2). He also emulated the zeal of Theodosius against heathenism; and in A.D. 391 obtained the emperor’s permission to take severe measures with the pagans in his diocese, he proceeded to destroy their temples, and to seize their property, until, after Alexandria had been troubled with insurrection, the emperor forbade the execution of these decrees, and they were driven out of Egypt (Sozom. H. E. v. 16). How little this religious zeal proceeded from the dictates of conscience or of calm judgment may be seen by the pains which Theophilus afterwards took to force the bishopric of Cyrene upon Synesius, in spite of his avowed devotion to the heathen Greek philosophy. [SYENESIUS.]

His behaviour to the different sects, into which the Christians of his diocese were divided, was marked by the same unscrupulous inconsistency. He appears to have passed a part of his early life among the monks of Nitraria, who were divided among themselves upon the chief controversy of the day, some being Origenists, and others Anthropomorphites. The ignorance of the latter party he must therefore have well known, and he was far too strong-minded to share their prejudices; while, on the other hand, he was quite capable of appreciating the works of Origen, with which it is evident that he was well acquainted. At first, he declared himself decidedly against the Anthropomorphites, and in opposing them he sided openly with the Origenists, and drew his arguments from the works of Origen. When, however, it became evident that the majority of the Egyptian monks were Anthropomorphites, and that this party had shown their strength by the tumults which they stirred up, about A.D. 399, Theophilus went over to their side, condemned the writings of Origen, and commanded all his clergy to condemn them, and commenced a cruel persecution of the monks and others who opposed the Anthropomorphites; and all this, while he himself continued to read the works of Origen with admiration. In A.D. 401, he issued his famous pastoral, and an encyclical letter, in which he condemned the writings of Origen, and threatened his adherents; and in the following year he sent forth another letter of the same character, to the unbounded delight of Jerome, who had been long intimate with Theophilus, and who writes to him on the occasion in terms of exultation and flattery, which are absolutely disgusting (Epist. 57, ed. Mait., 66, ed. Vallars.). By these proceedings, and by his general character, Theophilus well earned the name of Ἀμφιλὰζ, which we find applied to him (Pallad. ap. Montfauc. vol. xiii. p. 20). The persecuted monks of the Origenist party fled for refuge to Constantinople, where they were kindly received by Chrysostom, against whom Theophilus already had a grudge, because Chrysostom had been made bishop of Constantinople in spite of his opposition. The subsequent events, the call of Theophilus to Constantinople by the emperor Eudoxus, and his success in procuring the deposition and banishment of Chrysostom (A.D. 403), are related under CHRYSTOSTOMUS [Vol. I. p. 704, a.] During the tumult which followed the deposition of Chrysostom, Theophilus made his escape secretly from Constantinople, and returned to Alexandria, where, in the following year (A.D. 404) he issued a third pastoral letter against the Origenists, and where he closed his turbulent career in A.D. 412.

The works of Theophilus mentioned by the ancient writers are:—one against the Origenists, which is quoted by Theodoret (Dial. 2, p. 191), under the title of προσωρωσιτων υψά τοις φησινουτα τα δεργενης, and which Gennadius (335) calls Αδερσου οριγενεμ σεμεμ ετε γενηρεμε; a Letter to Porphyrius, bishop of Antioch, quoted in the Acta Concil. Ephes. pt. i. c. 4; the three Paschal Letters, or episcopal charges, already mentioned, and one more; and some other important orations, letters, and controversial works. The Paschal Letters are still extant in a translation by Jerome, and are published in the Antidot. contra divers. omnium seculorum heresias. Basil. 1528, fol.; and the whole of his extant remains are contained in Gallandii Biblioth. Patr. vol. vii. pp. 603, foll.; Socin. H. E. vi. 7—17; Sozom.
THEOPHILUS.

[Stephanus, Theophilus.]

THEOPHILUS (Θεόφιλος), was one of the lawyers of Constantinople who were employed by Justinian on his first Code, on the Digest and on the composition of the Institutes (De NovoCodice faciendo, § 1, De Justiniano Codice conformando, § 2, De Confirmatione Digestorum, Tanta, &c., § 9, Instit. D. Justiniani Prooenimium, § 3). In A. D. 528 Theophilus was comes sacri consistorii and juris doctor at Constantinople. In A. D. 529 he was ex magistro and juris doctor at Constantinople; and in A. D. 592 he had the titles of Illustri, Magister and Jurisconsultus at Constantinople. This Theophilus is the author of the Greek translation or paraphrase of the Institutes of Justinian, a fact which is now universally admitted, though some of the older critics supposed that there were two Theophilus, one the compiler of the Institutes, and the other the author of the Greek version.

The Greek paraphrase was made perhaps shortly after the promulgation of the Institutes A. D. 533; and it was probably in A. D. 534 that, as professor of law at Constantinople, Theophilus read upon the Latin text of the Institutes, the commentary in Greek entitled "a Greek Paraphrase of the Institutes," and which was intended for the first year's course of legal studies. It may have been about the same time that Theophilus explained to his class the first part, or first four books (πρώτα), of the Digest, some fragments of which are preserved in the scholia on the Basilica; this explanation completed the first year's course of study. We also infer from the same scholia that, in A. D. 555, Theophilus explained to his class the second part, or the seven books (De Judicis), for the same scholar have preserved passages from his commentary on this part of the Digest. There are also fragments of his commentary on the third division (De Rebus). His labours, apparently, did not extend beyond A. D. 535, and he may have died in A. D. 536, as it is conjectured, Thaleleus, one of his colleagues, in the school of Constantinople, speaks of him as dead; and probably Thaleleus wrote about A. D. 537.

The title of the paraphrase of Theophilus is Ιωανναίος Θεόφιλου Αυτικέναρας, Instituta Theophil Antecensoris. It became the text for the Institutes in the East, where the Latin language was little known, and entirely displaced the Latin text. It maintained itself as a manual of law until the eighth and tenth centuries, though others were subsequently published by the Greek emperors. This text was employed, as we see, on all occasions where the Institutes were used, even to the time of the Hexabiblos of Harenus, the last Greek juristconsult. It is conjectured, however, that there was a literal Greek version of the Institutes, for in some of the scholia (Basil. ed. Heimbach, i. p. 611, schol. 2) the text of the Institutes, which is cited several times, is not that of Theophilus. It is also conjectured that Theophilus was not the editor of his own paraphrase, but that it was drawn up by his pupils, after the explanation of the professor; and the ground for this opinion is that certain barbarous expressions are found in it, that the variations of the manuscripts are very numerous, and that several passages are repeated. The paraphrase is, however, of great use for the study of the text of the Institutes, many passages in which would be unintelligible without it.

The first edition of the paraphrase was by Viglius Zuichenus, Basle, 1531, fol.; and it was followed by several others, among which that of Fabrot was the best. But the most complete edition is that by G. O. Reitz, Haag, 1751, 2 vols. 4to. There is a German translation by Wüstemann, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo. (Mortreuil, Histoire du Droit Byzantin, &c., Paris, 1843.)

THEOPHILUS (Θεόφιλος), physicians.

1. Apparently a contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ, who gives an account of his delirium during an illness. (De Symptom. Dol. c. 4, vol. vi. p. 60.)

2. "A Comes atque Jurisconsultus," mentioned by St. Chrysostom in a letter to Olympia (vol. iii. p. 571, ed. Bened.), written about A. D. 407, as having attended on himself. He may possibly be the same person who is quoted by Aetius (see No. 3).

3. The author of one or two medical formulae quoted by Aetius (ii, 3. 41, 42, 110, pp. 318, 319, 356), must have lived some time in or before the sixth century after Christ. It is not known whether he is the same person who is quoted by Rhazes (Cont. i. 3, p. 6, ed. 1506), and who appears to have written a work De Membris Dolentibus (ibid. ibid. v. 1, p. 100).

4. THEOPHILUS PROTOPHARIUS (Πρωτοπαθαρίου), the author of several Greek medical works, which are still extant, and of which it is not quite certain whether some do not belong to Philaretus [Philaretus] and Philotheus [Philothereus]. Every thing connected with his titles, the events of his life, and the time when he lived is uncertain. He is generally called "Protopharius," which seems to have been originally a military title given to the colonel of the body-guards of the emperor of Constantinople (Σταυριάς, or Σαμαστραφακές); but which afterwards became also a high civil dignity, or was at any rate associated with the government of provinces and the functions of a judge. (See Dr. Greenhill's Notes to Theoph., or Penny Cyclopaedia, art. Theophilus, and the references there given.)

With respect to the personal history of Theophilus, if, as is generally done, we trust to the titles of the MSS. of his works, and so endeavour to trace the events of his life, we may conjecture that he lived in the seventh century after Christ; that he was the tutor to Stephanus Atheniensis; (Stephanus, p. 907); that he arrived at high professional and political rank; and that he ended his life in monastic life. All this is, however, quite uncertain; and with respect to his date, it has been supposed that some of the words which he uses belong to a later period than the seventh century; so that he may possibly be the same person who is addressed by the title "Protospatharius" by Photius (Epist. 123, 193, pp. 164, 292, ed.

Lond. 1651) in the ninth. He appears to have embraced in some degree the Peripatetic philosophy; but he was certainly a Christian, and expresses himself on all possible occasions like a man of great piety: in his physiological work especially he every where points out with admiration the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, as displayed in the formation of the human body.

Five works are attributed to him, of which the longest and most interesting is an anatomical and physiological treatise in five books, entitled Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Ἀνθρώπου Κατασκευῆς, De Corporis Humani Fabrica. It contains very little original matter, as it is almost entirely abridged from Galen's great work, "De Usm Partium Corporis Humani," from which however Theophrus now and then differs, and which he sometimes appears to have misunderstood. In the fifth book he has inserted large extracts from Hippocrates "De Geniturâ," and "De Natura Pueri." He recommends in several places the dissection of animals, but he does not appear ever to have examined a human body: in one passage he advises the student to dissect an ape, or else a bear, or, if neither of these animals can be procured, to take whatever he can get, "but by all means, adds he, "let him dissect something." (v. 11. § 3.)

The work was first published in a Latin translation by J. P. Crassus, Venet. 1536, 8vo., together with Hippocrates "De Medicamentis Purgantibus," This translation was several times reprinted, and is inserted by H. Stephens in his "Medicinæ Artis Principes," Paris, 1567, fol. The MS. which Crassus used is probably lost, as none of those which are now known to exist agree with his translation.
The original text was first published by Guil.
Morell, without Latin translation, preface, or notes, Paris, 1535, 8vo., from a MS. at Paris, which appears to be more defective than that used by Crassus, though even that was not quite complete.
Morell's edition is now become scarce, and was inserted by Fabricius in the twelfth vol. of his "Bibliotheca Graeca," together with the Latin translation by Crassus. Two long passages which were missing in the fourth and fifth books were published from a MS. at Venice by Andr. Mustoxides and Demetr. Schiins in their collection, titled Συλλογὴ Αποστολαμάτων Ανεκδότων Ἑλληνικῶν, Venet. 1817. 8vo. The last and most complete edition is that by Dr. Greenhill, Oxon. 1842, 8vo., containing a corrected text, the Latin version by Crassus, various readings, notes, and indices.

II. His treatise Περὶ Οἴσωρος, De Urinis, in like manner contains little or nothing that is original, but is a good compendium of what was known on the subject by the ancients, and was highly esteemed in the Middle Ages. It first appeared in a Latin translation by Pontius (or Ponticus) Vir-nius (or Virmus) in several early editions of the collection known by the name of the "Articella."
It was first published in a separate form in a new Latin translation by Albanus Torinus, Basil. 1533, 8vo., together with the treatise "De Pulsibus," which version was reprinted in 1535, Argent. 8vo., and is inserted by H. Stephens in his "Medicinæ Artis Principis, "The Greek text was first published without the name of Theophrus, under the title of "Iatrosophistae De Urinis Liber Singularis," Paris, 1608, 12mo., with a new Latin translation by Fed. Morell; which edition was inserted entire by Chartier in the eighth vol. of his edition of Hippocrates and Galen. The best edition is that by Thom. Guidot, Lugd. Bat. 1703 (and 1731) 8vo., containing an improved text, a new Latin version by the editor, and copious and learned prolegomena and notes. The Greek text only, from Guidot's edition, is inserted by J. L. Ideler in the first volume of his "Physici et Medici Graeci Minores," Borcl. 1841, 8vo.

III. A short treatise Περὶ Διαγωγιμάτων, De Erecemtione Alcinia, was first published by Guidot in Greek with a Latin translation by himself, at the end of his edition of the "De Urinis." and the Greek text alone is republished by Ideler in his "Phys. et Med. Graeci Min."

IV. A Commentary on the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates, which is sometimes attributed to a person named Philodorus, is noticed under that name, p.
331.

V. A short treatise Περὶ Σφυμῶν, De Pulsibus, was first published by F. Z. Ermerins in his "Anecdota Medicæ Graeca, "Lugd. Bat. 1840, 8vo., with a Latin translation by the editor, various readings, and a few notes. It appears to be quite different from the work on the same subject by Philaretus, which has been sometimes attributed to Theophrus [Philaretus]. (See Penny Cyclop. art. Theophrastus, and the references there given, from which work the present article has been abridged.)

THEOPHILUS, an artist in metal, was the maker of the celebrated iron helmet of Alexander, which glittered like polished silver, and the neck-chain of which was studded with precious stones.
(Plut. Alex. 32.) Plutarch does not expressly tell us that the helmet was chased, but it can hardly be supposed that its magnificence consisted only in its polish; and therefore we do not hesitate to place Theophrus among the most distinguished of the Greek caelatores. (Comp. Dict. of Antiq.
v. v. Caelato, 2d ed.; R. Rocheote, Lettre à M.
Scoura, p. 410, 2d ed. ;)

THEOPHRASTUS (Θεόφραστος), the Greek philosopher, was a native of Eresus in Lesbos.
(Stраб. xiii. p. 618 ; Diog. Laêrct. v. 36, &c.)

Before he left his native city the bent of his mind was directed towards philosophy by Leucippus or Alcippus, a man of whom we know nothing further. Leaving Eresus, he betook himself to Athens, where he attached himself at first to Plato, but afterwards to Aristotle. (Diog. Laêrct. l. c.)
The story that the latter changed the name of this, his favourite pupil, from Tyrtamus to Theophrastus (for the purpose, as is stated, of avoiding the cashophy, and of indicating the fluent and graceful address of the young man; Strabo, l. c.; Diog.
Laêrct. v. 38, ib. Menag. ;) is scarcely credible.
Nor can we place more reliance on the accounts that this change of name took place at a later period.
(He is already called Theophrastus in Aristotle's will; see Diog. Laêrct. v. 12, &c.) The authorities who would lead us to suppose this express them-sew very indistinctly. (Cic. Orat. 19; Signidum et Theophrastus diviniae locundi nomen inveniit ; Quintil. Inst. Orat. xi. 1, in Theophrasto tam est elegundus nitor ille divinus ut ex eou nomen quoque traisse dicitur.) It is much more likely that the proper name itself, which occurs elsewhere (Steph. Theaur. Ling. Graec. ed. nov. Paris), suggested attempts to connect it with the elogium which so eminently distinguished the Eresian. To prove the love of Aristotle for Theophrastus we do not need to betake ourselves to the above story, or to the doubtful expression of the former with respect to the latter, that "he needed the rein, not the spur," an expression which Plato is also said to have made use of with respect to Aristotle (Diog. Laërt. v. 39, ib. Menag.); it is proved in a much more indubitable manner by the will of the Stagirite, and by the confidence which led him, when removing to Chalcis, to designate Theophrastus as his successor in the presidency of the Lyceum (Diog. Laërt. v. 36; comp. A. Gall. Noct. Att. xiii. 5). It is not unlikely, moreover, that Theophrastus had been the disciple of Aristotle during the residence of the latter in Stageira, while engaged in the education of Alexander: at all events Theophrastus, in his will, mentions an estate that he possessed at Stageira (Diog. Laërt. v. 52), and was on terms of the most intimate friendship with Callisthenes, the fellow-pupil of Alexander (Diog. Laërt. v. 44, ib. Menag.). Two thousand discipulès are said to have gathered round Theophrastus, and among them such men as the comic poet Menander. (Diog. Laërt. v. 37, 36). Highly esteemed by the kings Philippos, Cassander, and Poltemaena, he was, in the latter part of his life, the object of the regard of the Athenian people, as was decisively shown when Agonis ventured to bring an impeachment against him, on the ground of impuity (i.e. 37; comp. Aelian, V. H. iv. 19). Nevertheless, when, according to the law of Sophocles (Ol. 118. 3), the philosophers were banished from Athens, Theophrastus also left the city, until Philo, a disciple of Aristotle, in the very next year, brought Sophocles to punishment, and procured the repeal of the law. (Diog. Laërt. v. 38, ib. Menag.; comp. C. G. Zumpt, Ueber den Bestand der philosophischen Schulen in Athen, &c., Berlin, 1843, p. 17.) Whether Theophrastus succeeded Aristotle without opposition, and also came into possession of the house and garden where the former taught in the Lyceum (not far from the present royal palace in Athens), is uncertain. In the will of Aristotle no express directions were left on this point. Still there is nothing at variance therewith in the statement that Theophrastus, after the death of Aristotle, with the assistance of Demetrius Phalereus, obtained a garden of his own. (The words of Diogenes Laërtius, v. 39, are very obscure; the καλ in the words λέγεται δ' αυτόν καὶ κήπῳ σχεῖν μετα τήν 'Αριστοτέλους τελευτήν, Δημητρίου τοῦ Φαλερίου . . . τοῦτο συμφέρατον, appears rather to refer to a previous possession than to exclude it.) That the executor of the will of Aristotle instituted a sale of the estate, respecting which no directions had been left in the will, and that Demetrius interfered, in order to secure a permanent possession for the head of the school, we cannot, with Zumpt (l. c. p. 8), conclude from the above words. The garden, provided with houses, colonnades, walks, &c., whether it was exclusively the private property of Theophrastus, or was, at least, inherited in part by him from Aristotle, is made over by the former in his will to Strato and his other friends, provided they had a mind to philosophize together, as a common and inalienable possession (Diog. Laërt. v. 51, &c.). A similar testamentary disposition of the property was made by Strato and Lycon, the succeeding heads of the school. (Diog. Laërt. v. 61, &c., 70.)

THEOPHRASTUS.

Theophrastus reached an advanced age; whether that of eighty-five years (Diog. Laërt. v. 40) or more (Hieronymus, Epist. ad Nepotiam. even speaks of 107 years), we leave undecided. But the statement contained in the letter to Polycees, prefixed to his Characteres, according to which this book was written in the ninety-ninth year of the author, although Tacitus (Hist. ix. 94) already read it so, may very well rest on a clerical error (comp. Casaubon, ad Theophr. Charact. Proleg. p. 85); and if Theophrastus was the head of the school for thirty-five years (Diog. Laërt. v. 36, 58), he would, even had he only reached his hundredth year, have been older than Aristotle. If he reached the age of eighty-seven, he was ten years younger, and was born Ol. 101. 3. Theophrastus is said to have closed his life, which was devoted to restless activity (Diog. Laërt. v. 36; comp. Suid.), with the complaint respecting the short duration of human existence, that it ended just when the insight into its problems was beginning. (This complaint, expressed in different forms, we read in Cicero, Tusc. iii. 23; Hieron. i.e.; Diog. Laërt. v. 41.) The whole people took part in his funeral obsequies. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.) His faithful affection for Aristotle, which he had transferred to Nicomachus, the son of Aristotle, is also shown in the directions in which he respected the preparation and preservation of the statues or busts of the Stagirite and his son (Diog. Laërt. v. 51, 52); and still more in the way in which he exerted himself to carry out the philosophical endeavours of his teacher, to throw light upon the difficulties contained in his books, to fill up the gaps in them, and, with respect to individual dogmas, to amend them.

II. The preceding statement finds its confirmation in the list of the writings of the Eresian given us, though with his usual haste, by Diogenes Laërtius, but probably borrowed from authorities like Hermippos and Andronicus (Schol. at the end of the Metaphysics of Theophrastus), and the statements respecting them contained in other writers, which Menage has already, at least in part, collected in his notes. Thus Theophrastus, like Aristotle, had composed a first and second Analytic (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, ib. Menag.), and, at least in the case of the former, had connected his treatise with that of his great predecessor, in the manner indicated above (see below, section III.). He had also written books on Topics (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 45, 50), and on the refutation of fallacies (ib. 42, 45); the former again, at all events, with a careful regard to the Topica of Aristotle. The work of Theophrastus "On Affirmation and Denial" (περὶ καταφάσων καὶ ἀκαταφάσων, Diog. Laërt. v. 44) seems to have corresponded to that of Aristotle "On Judgment" (περὶ ἐπιμέλειας). To the books of Aristotle on the "Principles of Natural Philosophy" (Physis Arcausculatio), on Heaven, and on Meteorological Phenomena, Theophrastus had had regard in corresponding works. (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 45, 47.) Further, he had written on the Warm and the Cold (Diog. Laërt. v. 44, ib. Menag.), on Water, Fire (Diog. Laërt. v. 45, the Sea (ib.), on Conspagation and Melting (περὶ τιρέων καὶ τερόων), on various phenomena of organic and spiritual life (Diog. Laërt. v. 45, ib. Menag., 43, 46, 49, 43, 44);
THEOPHRASTUS.

on the Soul and Sensuous Perception (ib. 46), not without regard to the corresponding works of Aristotle, as may at least in part be demonstrated. In like manner we find mention of monographs of Theophrastus on the older Greek physiologists, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Archelaus (Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 43), Diogenes of Apollonia, Democritus (ib. 43), which were not frequently made use of by Simplicius; and also on Xenocrates (ib. 47), against the Academics (49), and a sketch of the political doctrine of Plato (ib. 43), which shows that the Eresians followed his master likewise in the critico-historical department of inquiry. That he also included general history within the circle of his scientific investigation, we see from the quotations in Plutarch's lives of Lycurgus, Solon, Aristides, Pericles, Nicias, Alcibiades, Lysander, Agesilaus, and Demosthenes, which were probably borrowed from the work on Lives (περὶ Βιων ὁ, Diog. Laërt. v. 42). But his principal endeavours were directed to the supplementation and continuation of the labours of Aristotle in the domain of natural history, and that work is testified not only by a multitude of treatises on individual subjects of zoology, of which, besides the titles, but few fragments remain, but also by his books on Stones and Metals, and his works on the History, and on the Parts of Plants, which have come down to us entire. In politics, also, he seems to have trodden in the footsteps of Aristotle. Besides his books on the State, we find quoted various treatises on Education (ib. 42, 50), on Royalty (ib. 47, 45), on the Best State, on Political Morals, and particularly his works on the Laws, one of which, containing a recapitulation of the laws of various barbaric as well as Greek states (Νῦνων κατὰ στοιχεῖα κῆ, Diog. Laërt. v. 44, ib. Menag.), was intended to form a pendant to Aristotle's delineation of Politics, and must have stood in close relation to it. (Cic. de Fin. v. 4.)

Of the books of Theophrastus on oratory and poetry, almost all that we know is, that in them also Aristotle was not passed by without reference. (Cic. de Invent. i. 35.)

Theophrastus, without doubt, departed farther from his master in his ethical writings (ib. 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, 49, 50), as also in his metaphysical investigations respecting motion, the soul, and the Deity. (ib. 47, 48.)

Besides the writings belonging to the above-mentioned branches of science, Theophrastus was the author of others, partly of a miscellaneous kind, as, for instance, several collections of problems, out of which some things at least have passed into the Problems which have come down to us under the name of Aristotle (Diog. Laërt. v. 45, 47, 48; comp. Plu. Hi. N. xxvii. 6; Arist. Prob. xxxii. 12), and commentaries (Diog. Laërt. v. 48, 49, comp. 40), partly dialogues (Basil. Magn. Epist. 167), to which probably belonged the Εποπτικα (Diog. Laërt. v. 43; Athen. xvi. 288; xvi. 2) Megacles (Diog. Laërt. 47), Callisthenes (3 Περὶ πνεύματος, Diog. Laërt. v. 44; Cic. Tusc. iii. 10; Alex. Aphrod. de Anima ii. extr., and Μεγαπαυκος (Diog. Laërt. v. 44), and letters (Diog. Laërt. v. 46, 50), partly books on mathematical sciences and their history (ib. 42, 46, 48, 50).

Besides the two great works on botany (περὶ πάνω χτοπία, in ten books, written about Ol. 118; see Schneider, Theop. Opp. iv. p. 588; and αὐτὰ φυσικά, in six books), we only possess some more or less ample fragments of works by Theophrastus, or extracts from them, among which the ethical characters, that is, delineations of character, and the treatises on sensuous perception and its objects (περὶ αληθησέως καὶ αληθήσεως) are the most considerable, the first important as a contribution to the ethical history of that time, the latter for a knowledge of the doctrines of the more ancient Greek philosophers respecting the subject indicated. With the latter class of works we may connect the fragments on smells (περὶ ςμην), on fatigue (περὶ κόπων), on giddiness (περὶ ἄλυγχων), on sweat (περὶ ἤθελων), on swooning (περὶ λειτοψυχίας), on piles (περὶ παλάκωντες), and on honey (περὶ μέλιτος). To physics, in the narrower sense of the word, belong the still extant sections on fire (περὶ φως), on the winds (περὶ ἄνεμων), on the signs of waters, winds, and storms (περὶ σημείων ὀβάτων καὶ πνευμάτων καὶ ἱχθυών καὶ εὐβιών), probably out of the fourth book of the Meteorology of Theophrastus: περὶ μετατροπῆς; see Plut. Quast. Gr. vii.; comp. Schneider, iv. p. 719, &c.). To the zoology belong six other sections. Also the treatise on the meteorological phenomena in Diog. Laërt. v. iii. 116, 2, see Schneider, l. c. iv. p. 585, and on metaphysics (τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά), are only fragments, and there is no reason for assigning the latter to some other author because it is not noticed in Hermippus and Andronicus, especially as Nicolaus (Danaeus cenus) had already mentioned it (see the schoiia at the end of the book). But throughout the text of these fragments and extracts is so corrupt that the well-known story of the fate of the books of Aristotle and Theophrastus [ARISTOTELES] might well very well admit of application to them. The same is the case with the books on colours, on indivisible lines, and on Xenophanes, Gorgias, and Melissus, which may with greater right be assigned to Theophrastus than to his master, among whose works we now find them. (Respecting the first of these books——περὶ χρωμάτων——see Schneider, l. c. iv. p. 864; respecting the second, Diog. Laërt. v. 42, 15, Menag.) Much superior to the older editions of Theophrastus (Aldine, 1493, Basileae,s, 1541, Camotiana, Venet. 1552, that of Daniel Heinsius, 1613, &c.) is that by J. G. Schneider (Theophrasti Eresii quae supersunt opera, Lips. 1818—21, 5 vols.), which, however, still needs a careful revision, as the piecemeal manner in which the critical apparatus came to his hands, and his own ill health compelled the editor to append supplements and corrections, twice or thrice, to the text and commentary. Fried. Wimmer has published a new and much improved edition of the history of plants, as the first volume of the entire works of Theophrastus. (Theophrasti Opera quae supersunt omnia emendata edidit cum apparatu critico Fr. Wimmer, Tomus primus historiam plantarum continiuit, Vratislaviae, 1842. 8vo.)

For the explanation of the history of plants considerable contributions were made before Schneider by Bodeaus a Stapel (Amstelod. 1644, fol.) and J. Stackhouse. (Theophr. Eres. de historia plantarum libri X. præceps cum syllabo generum et specierum glossario et notis, curante Joh. Stackhouse, Oxon. 1813. 2 vols. 8vo.)

III. How far Theophrastus attached himself to the Aristotelic doctrines, how he defined them more closely, or concealed them in a different form, and what additional structures of doctrine he formed upon them, can be determined but very partially to the scantiness of the statements which we have, and what belongs to this subject can be merely indicated in this place. In the first place, Theophrastus seems to have carried out still further the grammatical foundation of logic and rhetoric, since in his book on the elements of speech (ἐν τῷ περὶ τῶν λόγων στοιχείων, 1, ἐν τῷ περὶ τῶν τοῦ λόγου στοιχείων), which again others had written, he distinguished the main parts of speech from the subordinate parts, and, again, direct (κυπριὰ λέξις) from metaphorical expressions, and treated of the affections (πάθος) of speech (Simplic. in Categ. s. 4, Basilius, and further distinguished a twofold reference of speech (χώρας) — to things (πρᾶγματα), and to the hearers, and referred poetry and rhetoric to the latter (Ammon. de Interpr. 5; Schol. in Arist. p. 108. 37). In what he taught respecting judgment (ἐν τῷ περὶ κατάδοσεως [καὶ ἀπόδοσεως] — de affirmatione et negatione) he had treated at length on its oneness (Alex. in Anal. Pr. f. 128, 124; Schol. in Arist. p. 184. 24, 183, b. 2; Boëth. de Interpr. pp. 291, 327), on the different kinds of negation (Ammon. in Arist. de Interpr. 128, b. 129, 134; Schol. in Arist. p. 121. 18), and on the difference between unconditioned and conditioned necessity (Alex. l. c. f. 12. 6; Schol. in Arist. p. 149. 44). In his doctrine of syllogisms he brought forward the proof for the conversion of universal affirmative judgments, differed from Aristotle here and there in the laying down and arranging the modes of the syllogisms (Alex. l. c. 14, 72, 73, 82, 22, b. 35; Boëth. de Syll. categ. ii. 504. 5, f. 603, 615), partly in the proof of them (Alex. l. c. 39, b.), partly in the doctrine of mixture, i.e. of the influence of the modality of the premises upon the modality of the conclusion (Alex. l. c. 39, b. &c. 40, 42, 56, b. 82, 64, b. 51; Joh. Ph. xxixii, b. &c.). Then in two separate works he had treated of the reduction of arguments to the syllogistic form (ἀναγκάζων λόγων εἰς τὰ σχήματα) and on the resolution of them (περὶ ἀναλογίων συναγωγῶν, Alex. 115); further, of hypothetical conclusions (Alex. in Arist. Anal. Pr. 109, b. &c. 131, b.; Joh. Phil. lx. &c. lxxv.; Boëth. de Syll. hypoth. p. 606). For the doctrine of proof, Galenus quotes the second Analytic of Theophrastus, in conjunction with that of Aristotle, as the best treatises on that doctrine (de Hippop. et Plat. Dogm. ii. 2. p. 215, Lips. 234, Basilius). In different monographs he seems to have endeavoured to expand it into a general theory of science. To this too may have belonged the proposition quoted from his Topica, that the principia of opposites (τῶν έναντίων) are themselves opposed, and cannot be deduced from one and the same genus. (Simplic. in Categ. f. 5; Schol. p. 89. 15; comp. Alex. in Metaph. p. 342. 30, Bonitz.) For the rest, some considerable deviations from the Aristotelic definitions are quoted from the Topica of Theophrastus. (Alex. in Top. 5, 68, 72, 25, 31.) With this treatise, that upon ambiguous words or ideas (περὶ τῶν σοσχών, π. τ. σολλαχῶν. Alex. ib. 63, 189), which, without doubt, correspond to the book E of Aristotle's Metaphysics, seems to have been closely connected.

Theophrastus introduced his Physics with the proof that all natural existence, being corporeal, that is composite, presupposes principia (Simplic. in Phys. f. 1, 6; in Schneider v. 7), and before everything else, motion, as the bases of the changes common to all (ib. 5, 6; Schneid. ib. 6). Denying the subsistence of space, he seems to have been disposed, in opposition to the Aristotelic definition, to regard it as the mere arrangement and position (τάξις and στάσις) of bodies (Simplic. l. c. 149, b. 141; Schneid. p. 213, f. 9, 8). Time he designated as an accident of motion, without, as it seems, conceiving it, with Aristotle, as the numerical determination of motion. (Simplic. f. 67, b.; Joh. 213. 4.) He departed more widely from his master in his doctrine of motion, since on the one hand he extended it over all categories, and did not limit it to the doctrine of the corporeal (Simplic. in Phys. 94, 201, 202; l. Schneid. 214. 10); and on the other hand, while he conceived it, with Aristotle, as an activity, not carrying its own end in itself (άρκετός), of that which only exists potentially (Simplic. l. c. and f. 94, l. Schneid. 11), and therefore could not allow that the activity expended itself in motion, he also recognised no activity without motion (Simplic. in Catycl. Schneid. 212. 2), and so was obliged to refer all activities of the soul to motion, the desires and affections to corporeal motion, judgment (περίπατος) and contemplation to spiritual motion. (Simplic. in Phys. 225; Schneid. 215. 13.) The conceivableness of a spirit entirely independent of organic activity, must therefore have appeared to him very doubtful; yet he appears to have contended himself with developing his doubts and difficulties on the point, without positively rejecting it (Thet. in Arist. Nat. 12, b. 91, b; Schneid. to those laid down by Aristotle, Protrept. Hipp. 215. 13). Other Peripatetics, as Dicusarchus, Aristoxenus, and especially Straton, more unrestrainedly and unconditionally gave a sensualistic turn to the Aristotelic doctrine. Theophrastus seems, generally speaking, where the investigation overstepped the limits of experience, to have shown more acuteness in the development of difficulties than in the solution of them, as is especially apparent in the fragment of his metaphysics. In a penetrating and unbiased conception of phenomena, in acuteness of reflection and combination bringing them together and within limits, in compass and certainty of experimental knowledge, he may have stood near Aristotle, if he did not come quite up to him: the incessant endeavour of his great master to refer phenomena to their ultimate grounds, his profundity in unfolding the internal connections between the latter, and between them and phenomena, were not possessed by Theophrastus. Hence even in antiquity it was as a subject of complaint that Theophrastus had not expressed himself with precision and consistency respecting the Deity, and had understood thereby at one time Heaven, at another an (enlivening) breath (πνεύμα, Clem. Alex. Protrep. p. 44, b; Cie. de Nat. Deor. 1. 13); that he had not been able to comprehend a happiness resting merely upon virtue (Cic. Acad. i. 10, Tusc. v. 9), or, consequently, to hold fast by the unconditional value of morality, and, although blameless in his life, had subordinated moral requirements to the advantage at least of a friend. (A. Gell. N. A. l. 1, § 23, and had admitted in prosperity the existence of an influence injurious to them. (In particular, fault was found with his expression in the Callisthenes, viatam regi fortuna non sopietate, Cic. Tuscul. iii. 10; comp. Alex. Aphrod. de Ars, ii. extr.) That in the definition of pleasure, likewise, he did not coincide with Aristotle, seems to be indicated by the titles of two of his writings, one of which treated of pleasure...
THEOPHYLACTUS.

... generally, the other of pleasure, as Aristotle had defined it (Diog. Laërt. v. 44, peri ἴδιως ὁς 'Ἡρώς τοὺς ἀνδρεύσεις'); and although, like his teacher, he preferred contemplative (theoretic) to active (practical) life (Cic. ad Att. ii. 16), he was at the same time disposed to set the latter free from the fetters of family life, &c. in a manner of which the former would not have approved (Hieron. adv. Jovinian. i. 189, Bened.). Respecting Theophrastus's treatment of botany in his two chief works, see J. G. Schneider, "de Anctoritate, Integritate, Argumento, Ordine, Metodo et Preetio Librarium, de Historia et Causis Plantarum" (Theophyr. Opp. v. p. 227—264.) Comp. R. THEOPHYLACTUS (Θεοφύλακτος). I. Sthocatta (ἐν Σιμόκαττος, Σιμόκαττος, Σιμόκατα, or Σιμοκάτσος, for all these forms of the name are found), was an Egyptian by descent, but a Locrinian by birth; and flourished at Constantinople, where he held some public offices (ἐν ἑκατέρω καὶ ἄνω χαρᾶδρε, Phot.) under Heraclius, about a.d. 610—660. He was a native, and before this period, probably in retirement. His chief work was a history of the reign of the emperor Maurice, in eight books, from the death of Tiberius II. and the accession of Maurice, in a.d. 582, down to the murder of Maurice and his children by Phocas in a.d. 602. There are various indications in the work itself, that Theophylact was living and writing in retirement during the reign of Phocas, and it seems probable that he had been personally acquainted with Maurice. Thus, he contrasts the depressed state of literature under Phocas with the favour it enjoyed under Heraclius, in a Dialogue between Philosophy and History, which is prefixed to his work. After the death of Phocas in a.d. 610, he read in public from an elevated position the passage of his history describing the death of Maurice, and the people were moved to tears by the recital. This statement, which we have on the authority of Theophylact himself (viii. 12) proves that his work was partly written during the reign of Phocas; while on the other hand, he mentions in the same chapter the conclusion of the Persian war, by the death of Chosroes II. in a.d. 628, so that the work could not have been completed till that year or the next, in which Theophylact appears to have died.

The history of Theophylact, which is known by the Latin title of Historiae Mauriæ Tiberii Imperatoris Libri VIII., seems to be the same work which is quoted by Eustathius (ad Dionys. Perig. 730) by the title of τοιαύτης οἰκουμενῆ, which seems to refer to the fact, that it was not confined to the affairs of Constantinople, but contained notices of events occurring in all parts of the known world. Besides the work itself, we have an epitome of it by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 65), who relates some particulars respecting the author, and characterises his style very minutely, as being not destitute of grace, but often frigid and puerile through the frequent occurrence of figures and allegorical turns of expression, and tiresome from the interruptions of moral reflections inserted out of season. The other works of Theophylact are (2) Eighty-five Letters, consisting of the three classes of Morales, twenty-nine in number, Romanæ, twenty-eight, and Amaxariae, twenty-eight; and (3) Problems in Physics (Ἀξιώματα Φυσικα, Quaestiones Physicae), respecting the nature of animals, and especially of man.

2. ARCHBISHOP OF BULGARIA, flourished about a.d. 1070 and onwards, and is celebrated for his commentaries on the Scriptures, and some other works. There are scarcely any particulars of his life which have come down to us. He appears to have been a native of Constantinople, and a deacon in the principal church there, and to have been appointed to the archbishopric of Bulgaria, the chief city of which was Acria, between a.d. 1070 and 1077. Here he suffered much from the uncivilised state of the people of his province, and tried in vain to lay down his office. He appears to have lived down to a.d. 1112, or later.

His Commentaries upon the Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, and the Minor Prophets, are founded on the commentaries of Chrysostom, and are of considerable value. He also wrote a treatise on royal education (Παιδεία Basilewv, Institudio Regia) for the use of the prince Constantinus Porphyrogennetus, the son of Michael V.; seventy-five Letters; one Homily, and Orations, and a few other small treatises. A splendid edition of all his works in Greek and Latin was published by J. F. Bernard Maria de Rabois, Venet. 1754—1763, 4 vols. folio, with a Preliminary Dissertation, containing all that is known of the life and writings of Theophylact, with an elaborate analysis of his works and his opinions. (See also Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 1077, p. 153; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 586—589; Schröck, Christ. THEOPOMPUS.

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος), king of Sparta, and 9th of the Eurypontids. His name is connected with two important but obscure events in Spartan history, viz. the establishment of the power of the ephors, and the first Messenian war. With respect to the former, it was about 130 years, according to Plutarch, after the legislation of Lycurgus, that the popular party obtained the enfranchisement from Theopompus, as a check on the oligarchy; on which occasion he was reproached by his wife for his tameness in surrendering so large a portion of the royal power. He defended himself by alleging that its limitation would ensure its continuance. (Plut. Lyc. 7; Aristot. Pol. v. 11, ed. Bekk.) From Plutarch, however, we also learn that Theopompus and his colleague Polydorus gave additional stringency to the Rheta, which enjoined that the popular assembly should simply accept or reject the measures proposed by the senate and the kings, without introducing any amendment or modification of them; and from the oligarchical character of this act of Theopompus, Müller argues that the extended political power of the ephors could not have originated in his time. More satisfactory, however, is the explanation of Platner and Arnold, that the people obtained the institution of ephors by way of compensation for the Rheta in question, and that "the king was obliged to confirm those liberties, which he had vainly endeavoured to overthrow." (Plut. Lyc. 6, comp. Cleom. 10; Müller, Dor. hist. 5, § 5, 7, 8; C. F. Hermann. Pol. Justin. 2, 4; Grote. Th. vol. i. App. 2; G. C. Lewis, in the Philol. Museum, vol. ii. pp. 51, 52.) As to the first Messenian war, much appears from Tyrtaeus, that Theopompus was mainly instrumental in bringing it to a successful issue, though the inference of Pausanias, that he lived to complete the actual subjugation of Messenia, is more than the words of the poet warrant. They are, however, inconsistent with the date which Eusebius assigns to the death of Theopompus, viz. b. c. 740. Clinton gives, for the duration of his reign, about b. c. 770—720. But we can arrive at no certainty in the chronology of this period. According to the Messenian account, Theopompus was slain, not long before the end of the war, by Aristomenes, while the Spartan tradition was, that he was only wounded by him. We are accustomed, indeed, to regard Aristomenes as the hero of the second war; but this, after all, is a doubtful point. (Paus. 4, 6, &c. Plut. Agis. 21; Müller, Dor. Ann. 45, Ch. 4, p. 67. Harl. vol. ii. App. ch. 3; Grote's Greece vol. ii. pp. 558, 559.) [E. E.]

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet, of the Old, and also of the Middle Comedy, was the son of Theodectes or Theodorus, or Tiasmenus. (Suid. s. v. ; Aelian. op. Suid. s. l. and s. v. ; Pappus, § 16., Phld.) According to Suidas, he was contemporary with Aristophanes; and the fragments and titles of his plays give evidence that he wrote during the later period of the Old Comedy, and during the Middle Comedy, as late as b. c. 380. Of his personal history we have no information, except a story, of a fabulous appearance, about his being cured of a disease by Aesculapius, which Suidas (ll. c.) copies from Aelian, with a description of a piece of statuary in Parian marble, which was made in commemoration of the cure, and which represented Theopompus lying on a couch, by the side of which the god stood, handing medicine to the poet; there was also a boy standing by the couch.

The number of dramas exhibited by Theopompus is differently stated at seventeen (Anon. de Com. p. xxiv.) and twenty-four (Suid., Eudoc.). We possess twenty titles, namely, Ἀρισταίος, Ἀλκάδα, Ἀρισδομή, Βαρθία, Εἰρήνη, Ἡδύχηρα, Ὀθρέα, Κάλλαυρος, Καστηλίδα, Μίδας, Νεμάτα, Ὑδόσσεος, Παίδης, Παμφιλία, Πανταλέως, Πετροδώρα, Σεσίρια, Ἐρακτίδωτες, Τύμφιωμε, Φίλικς. Three other plays, besides those which are merely variations of the above, were also attributed to Theopompus, namely, Ἐπασωτία, Πλάνα, Τρικάρνος. The extant fragments of Theopompus contain examples of the declining purity of the Attic dialect. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 501—503; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 236—244, vol. ii. pp. 792—823; Editio Minor, pp. 441—457; Clinton, F. II. vol. ii. Introd. pp. xlii., xlvii.]

2. Of Sinope, the author of a work on earthquakes, quoted by Photien (de Reb. Mirab. 19).

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος), of Chios, the historian, was the son of Damastistratos and the brother of Caecalus, the rhetorician. He accompanied his father into banishment, when the latter endeavoured to espouse the interests of the Lacedaemonians, but was restored to his native country in the forty-fifth year of his age, after the death of his father, in consequence of the letters of Alexander the Great, in which he exhorted the Chians to recall their exiles (Phot. Cod. 176, p. 120, b. ed. Bekker). But as these letters could not have been written at the earliest till after the battle of Granicus, we may place the restoration of Theopompus in b. c. 333, and his birth in b. c. 378. Suidas assigns a much earlier date to Theopompus, stating that he was born at the same time as Ephorus, during the anarchy at Athens in the 93d Olympiad, that is in b. c. 404; but as we know that Theopompus was alive in b. c. 305, we may safely conclude that Suidas is in error, and that the date in Photius is the correct one. In what year Theopompus quitted Chios with his father, can only be matter of conjecture; and the various suppositions of the learned on the point are not worth repeating here. But we know, however, that before he left his native country, he attended the school of rhetoric which Isocrates opened at Chios, and he profited so much by the lessons of his great master, that he was regarded by the ancients as the most distinguished of all his scholars. (Plut. Vit. dec. Orat. p. 827, b.; Phot. Cod. 260; Dionys. Ep. ad Ca. Pomp. c. 6.) Ephorus the historian was a fellow-student with him, but was of a very different character; and Isocrates used to say of them, that Theopompus needed the bit and Ephorus the spur. (Cic. Brut. 56, ad Att. vi. 1. § 12.) In consequence of the advice of Isocrates, Theopompus did not devote his oratorical powers to the pleading of causes, but gave his chief attention to the study and composition of history. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 13, 22.) Like his master Isocrates, however, he composed many orations of the kind, called Epicdité by the Greeks, that is, speeches on set subjects delivered for display, such as eulogiums upon states and individuals, and similar subjects. He himself tells us that there was no important city of Greece, in which he had not remained some time, and where he had not obtained great glory by the public exhibition of his oratorical powers. One instance of the kind is recorded. In b.c. 332 he contended at Halicarnassus with Naucrates and his master Isocrates for the prize of oratory, given by Artemisia in honour of her husband, and gained the victory (Gell. x. 13; Plut. Vit. dec. Orat. p. 633, b; Euseb. Præp. Ev. x. 3.) The other places which he visited are not mentioned; but it appears from his own account, to which we have already referred, that he spent the greater part of the time of his exile in travelling, and in the acquisition of knowledge. He was able to pursue this mode of life in consequence of his possessing a large fortune, which released him from the necessity of working for his livelihood, like Isocrates, by writing speeches for others, and giving instruction in oratory. (Phot. Cod. 176; Dionys. Ep. ad Cn. Pomp. c. 6; Athen. iii. p. 85, b.) On his return to his native country in b.c. 333, Theopompus, from his eloquence, acquirements and wealth, naturally took an important position in the state; but his vehement temper, haughty bearing, and above all his support of the aristocratical party, which he had inherited from his father, soon raised against him a host of enemies. Of these one of the most formidable was the sophist Theocritus, who had also been a pupil of Isocrates, and who likewise attacked Alexander and Aristotle in the bitterest manner. (Stob. xiv. p. 645.) As long as Alexander lived, his enemies dared not take any open proceedings against Theopompus; and even after the death of the Macedonian monarch, he appears to have enjoyed for some years the protection of the royal house. But when he lost this support, he was expelled from Chios as a disturber of the public peace. He fled to Egypt to king Ptolemy. (Phot. l. c.) Ptolemy did not assume the title of king till b.c. 306, and consequently if the expression of Photius is to be taken literally, we may place the arrival of Theopompus in Egypt in b.c. 305, when he was seventy-five years of age. Photius adds that Ptolemy not only refused to receive Theopompus, but would even have put him to death as a dangerous busibody, had not some of his friends interceded for his life. Of his further fate we have no particulars, but he probably died soon afterwards.

The following is a list of the works of Theopompus, none of which have come down to us. 1. Ἐπίτομα τῶν Ἱστορίων τοῦ Πλιοτίου. An Epitome of the History of Herodotus. This work is mentioned by Suidas, and in a few passages of the grammarians; but it has been questioned by Vossius whether it was really drawn up by Theopompus, on the ground that it is improbable that a writer of his attainments and skill in historical composition would have engaged in such a task. It has therefore been supposed that it was executed by some later writer, who prefixed to it the well-known name of Theopompus. It is, however, not impossible that Theopompus may have made the Epitome at an early period of his life as an exercise in composition.

2. Ἑλληνικά ἱστορία τοις Ἰωναίασι Ἐλληνικάνων. A History of Greece, in twelve books, was a continuation of the history of Thucydides. It commenced in b.c. 411, at the point where the history of Thucydides breaks off, and embraced a period of seventeen years down to the battle of Cnidus in b.c. 394 (Diod. xii. 42, xiv. 84; Marcellin. Vit. Thucyd. 45). Only a few fragments of this work are preserved.

3. Φιλανδικά, also called Ἰστορία (κατὰ ἔροτν), The History of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, in fifty-eight books, from the commencement of his reign b.c. 360, to his death b.c. 336. (Diod. xvi. 3; Phot. Cod. 176.) Schweighaeuser supposed that the Hellenics and the Philippics formed one work, which was called the History of Theopompus, but this opinion has been satisfactorily refuted by Clinton. (Pusti Hall. vol. ii. pp. 374, 373, 28 ed.) Wherever the History of Theopompus is quoted by the ancient writers without any distinguishing name, the Philippics are always meant, as this was the more important work; when the Grecian history is meant, it is cited by the title of Hellenics. Moreover, as Clinton justly remarks, these two works cannot be said to form one corpus historicum; they did not proceed in one unbroken series, for the first work terminated in b.c. 394, and the second began in b.c. 360, thus leaving a space of thirty-four years between them, which did not belong to either. The great length of the Philippics was not so much owing to the minute account which it gave of the life and reign of Philip, as to the numerous digressions of all kinds with which it abounded. For as it was the original intention of Theopompus to write a history of the whole of Greece (comp. Polyb. viii. 13), he eagerly availed himself of every opportunity that occurred to give an account of other Greek states. Such a digression sometimes occupied several books, as we learn from Diodorus (xxi. 71), who informs us that the 41st, 42d, and 43d books were devoted to the history of Sicily. Moreover in these digressions Theopompus did not confine himself to contemporaneous events, but frequently ascended to fabulous times. The digressions in fact formed by far the larger part of the work; and Philip V. king of Macedonia, was able, by omitting them and retaining only what belonged to the proper subject, to reduce the work from fifty-eight books to sixteen. (Phot. l. c.) Fifty-three of the fifty-eight books of the original work were extant in the ninth century of the Christian era, and were read by Photius, who has preserved an abstract of the twelfth book. (Phot. l. c.) The five books lost in the time of Photius were the 6th, 7th, 9th, 29th, and 30th, and these were, without doubt, the same five books, which were not included in the time of Theopompus. The Hellenics probably perished earlier, as they were less celebrated: Photius, at least, appears not to have read them. The two works, the Hellenics and Philippics, contained together, according to Theopompus's own statement, 150,000 lines (Phot. l. c.) The Philippics are constantly quoted by the ancient writers, and many fragments of them are preserved.

4. Orationes, which were chiefly Panegyrics, and what the Greeks called Συμβουλευτικὸν ἅγαν. Besides the Panegyric on Mausolus, which has been already alluded to, Theopompus wrote Paneg. pp. 9, 105; Suidas, s. e. "Εφόρων"). Of Συμβουλευτικὸν ἅγαν, one of the most celebrated was addressed to Alexander on the state of Chios, and is variously cited by the ancients under the titles of Συμβουλὴ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον (Athen. vi. p. 230, f.), Συμβουλευτικὸς πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον (Cic. ad Att. xii. 40), and Ἑμνηστικῇ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον (Athen. xii. p. 585).

5. Κατὰ Πλάτωνος διαπρῖθη (Athen. xi. p. 503, ε; Diog. Laërt. iii. 40), was perhaps a digression in his Philippics; and the same appears to have been with his work which is cited under the title of

6. Περὶ εὐσεβείας (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 1534; Porphyr. de Ablatin. ii. 16).

The work which Anaximenes published under the name of Theopompos, in order to injure his rival, is spoken of in the life of the former. [Vol. i. p. 166, b.]

Theopompos is praised by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (l. c.) as well as by other ancient writers for his diligence and accuracy; but he is at the same time blamed by most writers for the extravagance of his praises and censures. He is said, however, to have taken more pleasure in blaming than in commending, and many of his judgments respecting events and characters were expressed with such acrimony and severity that several of the ancient writers speak of his malignity, and call him a reviler (Corn. Nep. Alex. c. 11; Clem. Alex. i. p. 115; Lucian, Quaest. Histor. conserv.; Plut. Lysand. c. 30; Polyb. viii. 12). It would seem that the vehemence of the temper of Theopompos frequently overcame his judgment, and prevented him from expressing himself with the coldness and impartiality of an historian. The ancients also blame Theopompos for introducing innumerable fables into his history (Cic. de Leg. i. 1; Aelian, V. H. iii. 18).

The style of Theopompos was formed on the model of Isocrates, and possessed the characteristic merits and defects of his master. It was pure, clear, and elegant, but deficient in vigour, loaded with ornament, and in general too artifical. It is praised in high terms by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (l. c.), but is spoken of in very different language by other critics. (Longin. de Subd. c. 45; Demetr. Phal. περὶ ἑρμοῦ § 75; Plut. Pseudo. gen. Reip. c. 6, p. 803, b.)

Theopropsus (Θεόπρος), a statue of Aegina, who made a bronze bull, which was dedicated by the Corcyreans at Delphi, as a tithe of their profits from a shoal of fish, which they discovered by means of a bull, according to the story related by Pausanias (x. 9. § 2. s. 3. 4). The reading of the name is doubtful; the common text has Θεόπρος, but other MSS. give Θεόπροσον, or θεοπρόσων, the latter of which readings is approved by Schultar and Wale, and adopted by Thiersch. (Ejrochen, p. 197.) [P. S.]

THEOSEBIA (Θεοσέβη), the writer of an epigram in the Greek Anthology upon the physician Abalibus, was the sister of the philosopher Zosimus of Thbes, who dedicated to her his work on chemistry, and who appears to have lived under Theodosius II., about A. D. 420. (Snid. s. v. Ζωσύμος; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 497, new ed., and vol. xii. p. 753, old ed.; Brunn, Anab. vol. ii. p. 450; Jacob, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 156, vol. xii. p. 961.)

THEOPTIMUS (Θεόπτιμος), a Greek writer of unknown date, wrote upon Italy (Plut. Parall. min. c. 8), Cyrene (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 61, v. 33), and the Nile (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. vii. 33). Athenaeus (xiii. p. 611, b.) speaks of a stoic philosopher of the name of Theotimus, but in that passage Diotimus ought probably to be substituted. [DIOTIMUS, No. 5.] (Comp. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 503, ed. Westermann.)

THEOPTUCHUS (Θεόπτουχος).

THEOXENA (Θεοξένα). 1. The last wife of Agathocles, king of Syracuse, to whom she bore two children. She is called by Justin an Egyptian princess, but her parentage is unknown. Droysen, however, conjectures that she was a daughter of Berenice by her first husband. According to Justin, Agathocles, when he felt his death approaching, sent away Theoxena and her two children to Egypt, but the whole of his narrative is subject to grave difficulties. (Justin. xxiii. 2 Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. pp. 560, 602.)

2. A daughter of Herodicus, a noble Thessalian, who had been put to death by Philip V. king of Macedonia. Many years afterwards, the increasing suspicions and cruelty of that monarch having led him to contemplate the destruction of the children of all those whom he had previously executed, Theoxena sought to make her escape by sea with her husband Pors and her two nephews, whom she had adopted; but the ship being driven back, in order to avoid falling into the hands of the king's emissaries, she slew her nephews with her own hand, and then threw herself with her husband into the sea. (Liv. xl. 4.) [E. H. B.]

THEOXENIUS (Θεοξένος), a surname of Apollo and Hermes. (Paus. vii. 22; § 2; Schol. ad Pind. Od. vol. 146, Nem. x. 32.) Respecting the festival of the Theoxenia, see Dict. of Antiqu. s. v. [L. S.]

THEOXENIUS (Θεοξένιος), commanded the Achaean troops, who assisted the Rhodians in B. C. 197. (Liv. xxxiii. 18.)

THEOXOTUS, the maker of a very beautiful painted vase, found at Vulci, and now in the collection of M. Durand. It is painted black, with decorations in white and violet, and bears the inscription ΘΕΟΧΟΤΟΣ ΜΗΝΟΕΙΣΘΑΙ, that is, Θεοχότος με ἔναρξε, according to the interpretation of De Witte (Cab. Durand. No. 894), and Raoul-Rochette (Lettres à M. Schorn, p. 60, 2d ed.); but Panofka and others read the name Θεοχοστος, or the first syllable of Θεοχοστος, comparing the form with the kindred name Θεόχοστης, which occurs in Plato and Demosthenes. (Ulcin. Mus. 1846, vol. iv.)
THERAMENES.

pp. 135, 136; Paep, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.)

THERAMENES (Θεράμην). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was sent in B.C. 412 to conduct to Astyochus (the Spartan admiral on the coast of Asia) a reinforcement of 55 ships from the Peloponnesians and the Sicilian Greeks. This armament by its opportune arrival saved Miletus, which the Athenians were preparing to besiege; and it then assisted Tissaphernes in the reduction of Iassus, and the capture of Amorges. After this it returned to Miletus, where, in the disputes with Tissaphernes about the amount of pay which he was to furnish, Theramenes, as not being admirial, seems to have been far too compliant. A second treaty, however, more stringent than the former, was made with the satrap, after which Theramenes delivered up the fleet to Astyochus, and sailed away in a small vessel; and the language of Thucydides seems to mean that he was drowned on the voyage. (Thuc. viii. 26—29, 31, 36, 38, 43; Arnold, ad Thuc. viii. 38; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 22, note 1.)

2. An Athenian, son of Hagnon, and of the demus of Steiria in the tribe Pandionis. According, however, to other statements, he was a native of Cos, and Hagnon only adopted him (Plut. Nic. 2; Schol. ad Arist. Rov. 541, 908; Suid. s. v. Δενισ). On his return from the voyage, he was hailed in question as the same as the Athenian founder of Amphipolis; but he must have been at any rate a man of high repute, since we find it mentioned (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 30), that Theramenes first acquired notice and respect from the character of his father. In B.C. 411, he became prominent as an oligarchical revolutionist, and a leading member of the new government of the 400 (Thuc. viii. 68; Xen. Hell. l.c.). In this, he does not appear to have occupied as eminent a station as he had hoped to fill, while at the same time the declaration of Alcibiades and of the army at Samos against the oligarchy made it evident to him that its days were numbered. Acting accordingly with Aristocrates and others, each of whom, like himself, hoped for the foremost place in a restored democracy, he withdrew from the more violent aristocrats and began to cabal against them; professing however to desire, not the overthrow of the existing constitution, but its full establishment, and demanding therefore that the promised assembly of the 5000 should be no longer a name, but a reality. Of this opposition, in fact, Theramenes was the life. He exclaimed against the fortification by the oligarchs of Eetioneia (the mole at the mouth of the Peiraeus), as part of a design for admitting the enemy into the harbour; for a confirmation of his suspicions he pointed to the fact that the oligarchical ambassadors who had been sent to negotiate peace with Sparta, had returned without having come to any agreement that could be openly avowed; and he insisted that a Peloponnesian fleet, which made its appearance not long after in the Saronic gulf, professedly on its way to help Euboea, was connected with the plot that he was denouncing. He seems also to have instigated the mutiny of the soldiers, who were employed on the works at Eetioneia, and when charged with this by his colleagues in the council, he stoutly denied it, and offered to go down himself and quell the tumult. On his arrival at the scene of disturbance he affected at first to rebuke the mu-tiners; but, when they called upon him to declare whether he considered the fortification to be for the public good, he consented to its destruction. In the subsequent deposition of the 400, Theramenes of course took a prominent part, and in particular came forward as the accuser of Antiphon and Archeptolemus, who had been his intimate friends, but whose death he was now the mean and base-minded instrument in procuring (Thuc. viii. 90—98; Lys. c. Evrat. p. 126; Diod. xii. 99). In B.C. 410, Theramenes was sent with 30 ships to prevent the construction of the mole and the bridge, which the Euboeans and Boeotians were building over the Euripus, to connect Euboea with the mainland, and so to render it more defensible against the Athenians. He was unable, however, to interrupt this work; and he then proceeded to cruise among the islands, where he exacted contributions, strengthened the democratic factions, and overthrew the oligarchical government at Paros (Diod. xii. 47; comp. Strab. ix. pp. 400, 403, x. p. 407). In the same year he went with a squadron to aid Archelaus, king of Macedon, in the reduction of Pydna [ARCHELAUS]; but, the siege lasting a long time, he sailed away to Thrace to join the fleet under Thrasybulus, and they then cruised about and levied money until they were called away by a despatch from the Athenian navy at Cardia. The fleet back at Chalcis in Sicyon was, in which Theramenes commanded one of the three divisions of the Athenian force, the other two being under Alcibiades and Thrasybulus respectively (Xen. Hell. i. 1. §§ 12, &c.; Diod. xiii. 49—51). Theramenes also shared in the further successes of Alcibiades, and early in B.C. 408, in particular, he took a main part in the siege of Chaledon, and the reduction of Byzantium. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 2, &c.; Diod. xiii. 64, 66, 67.)

At the battle of Arginusae, in B.C. 406, Theramenes held a subordinate command in the right wing of the Athenian fleet, and he was one of those who, after the victory, were commissioned by the generals to repair to the scene of action and save as many as possible of the disabled galleys and their crews. A storm, it is said, rendered the execution of the order impracticable; yet, instead of trusting to this as his ground of defence, Theramenes thought it safer to divert the popular anger from himself to others, and accordingly came prominently forward to accuse the generals of the neglect by which so many lives had been lost; and it appears to have been chiefly through his machinations that those of their number who had returned to Athens, were condemned to death. In his notice of this transaction, Diodorus tells us that the victorious generals endeavoured in the first instance to fix the blame on Theramenes, and thus incurred his enmity; and Theramemes himself, when taxed afterwards by Critias with his base treachery in the matter, is reported by Xenophon to have excused his conduct by a similar allegation. A truly wretched apology at the best; but even the statement on which it rests is contradicted by Xenophon's narrative, and it seems quite possible (according to bishop Thirlwall's suggestion) that, over and above the cowardly motive of self-preservation, Theramenes may have been, throughout the whole affair, the agent of an oligarchical conspiracy to get rid of some of the most eminent and formidable opponents of that faction. (Xen. Hell. i. 6. §§ 35, 7. §§ 4, &c. ii. 3. §§ 32, 35; Diad. 4 A 4.
from this time certainly up to the establishment of the thirty tyrants, we find him the unscrupulous confederate of the oligarchs, and from Lysias (c. \textit{Agor.} p. 130), we learn that the people on one occasion rejected him from the office of general on the ground of his being no friend to the democratic government. This would probably be early in B.C. 405, when three new commanders were appointed (\textit{Xen. Hell.} ii. 1. § 16) as colleagues to Conon, Adeimantus, and Philocles. But during the siege of Athens by Lysander in the same year, and after the failure of the Athenian embassy, which had proposed to capitulate on condition of keeping their walls and the Peirameus, Theramenes offered to go himself to Lysander and learn the real intentions of the Lacedaemonians, promising to lay the same time to obtain peace without the necessity of giving hostages, or demolishing the fortifications, or surrendering the ships; while he held out vague and mysterious hopes besides of some further favour to be obtained from the enemy by his means. His offer, after some considerable opposition, was accepted, and he set forth on his mission, determined not to return till his countrymen should be so weakened by famine as to be ready to assent to any terms that might be imposed on them. After an absence accordingly of three months in the Lacedaemonian camp, he again presented himself in Athens, and declared that Lysander, having detained him so long, had at length desired him to go to Sparta with his proposals, as he himself had no authority to settle any thing. To Sparta therefore the traitor was sent, with nine colleagues, and the terms which they brought back with them, and which the Athenians had now no alternative but to accept, were such as to lay their country prostrate at the feet of Lacedaemon (\textit{Xen. Hell.} ii. 2. §§ 16, &c.; \textit{Lys. c. Erat.} p. 126, c. \textit{Agor.} pp. 130, 131; \textit{Plut. Lys.} 14). In the following year, b. c. 404, Theramenes took the foremost part in obtaining the decree of the assembly for the destruction of the old constitution and the establishment of the Thirty, in the number of whom he was himself included. The measure indeed was not carried without opposition, but this was overborne by the threats of Lysander, whose presence Theramenes had taken care to secure. The whole transaction is grossly misrepresented by Diodorus, who, choosing to be the panegyrist of Theramenes, informs us that he protested against the innovation in the government, but was obliged to give way to the menaces of Lysander, and that the people then elected him one of the Thirty, in the hope that he would continue to be their leader. (\textit{Diod. xiv.} 3. §§ 1, 2; \textit{Lys. c. Erat.} pp. 126, 127, c. \textit{Agor.} p. 131; \textit{Plut. Lys.} 15; \textit{Diod. xiv.} 3, 4). As a matter of fact, indeed, he did endeavour to do so; for, if not virtuous enough to abhor the reign of terror which they introduced, he had sufficient sagacity to perceive that their violence would be fatal to the permanence of their power. His remonstrances, however, and his opposition to their tyrannical proceedings had no effect in restraining them, but only induced the desire to rid themselves of so troublesome an associate, whose former conduct moreover had shown that no political party could depend on him, and who had earned, by his trimming, the nickname of \textit{Kóðhoroos},—a boot which might be worn on either foot. He was therefore accused by Critias before the council as a traitor, and an enemy of the oligarchy, and when his nominal judges, favourably impressed by his able defence, exhibited an evident disposition to acquit him, Critias introduced into the chamber a number of men armed with daggers, and declared that, as all who were not included in the privileged Three Thousand might be put to death by the sole authority of the Thirty, he struck the name of Theramenes out of that list, and condemned him with the consent of all his colleagues. Theramenes then rushed to the altar, which stood in the council-chamber, but was dragged from it and carried off to execution. When he had drunk the hemlock, he dashed out the last drops from the cup as if he were playing the game of the \textit{Kóðrados}, exclaiming, "This to the health of the lovely Critias!" Diodorus tells us that Theramenes was a disciple of Socrates, and that the latter strove to prevent the eleven from dragging him away to death, which seems to be merely a different version of the story in the \textit{Pseudo-Plutarch} (\textit{Vit. X. Or. Isocr. ad Init.}), that Isocrates, who was a pupil of Theramenes in rhetoric, was the only person who stood up to help him in his extremity, and desisted only on Theramenes saying that it would increase his distress, should any of his friends involve themselves in his calamity. Both Xenophon and Cicero express their admiration of the equanimity which he displayed in his last hour; but surely such a feeling is sadly out of place when directed to such a man. (\textit{Xen. Hell.} ii. 3; \textit{Diod. xiv.} 4, 5; Cic. \textit{Tusc. Quaest.} i. 40; \textit{Arist. Ranum.} 541, 965—966; Suid. s. v. \textit{Theraménas}; \textit{Val. Max.} iii. 2. Ext. 6. \textit{Hirnrichs, de Theram. Crit. et Thrac. relin et ingen.} xi. 3).
De suis Virtutibus contra Therrnum, which is cited by Festus (pp. 182, 234), and other grammarians. Meyer (Ibid. p. 45, foll.) supposes that Cato accused Therrmus in B.C. 189, and that this oration was spoken in this year; but this is improbable, as we know that Therrmus served under Scipio Asiaticus in this year in the war against Antiochus. He and his brother Lucius were sent by Scipio to receive the oath of Antiochus to the treaty which was concluded at the end of the war. In the course of the same year he was nominated by the senate one of the ten commissioners to settle the affairs of Asia. He was killed in the following year, while fighting under Marcus Valerius Vulo against the Thracians. (Appian, Syr. 39; Polyb. xxii. 26; Liv. xxxvii. 55, xxxviii. 41, 46.)

2. L. MINICIUS THERRMUS, brother of the preceding, served under Scipio Asiaticus, and along with his brother received the oath of Antiochus to the treaty concluded in B.C. 189. In b.c. 178 he served as legatus under the consul A. Manlius Vulo, in Istria. (Polyb. xxii. 26; Liv. xili. 8.)

3. MINICIUS THERRMUS, accompanied the consul L. Valerius Flaccus into Asia, in B.C. 86, and was there left by him in command of the troops in the following year. He was, however, deprived of the command by Fimbria shortly afterwards. (Appian, Mithr. 82; Dion Cass. Fragm. 129, p. 52, 31, ed. Reimar.)

4. M. MINICIUS THERRMUS, proprietor in B.C. 81, accompanied L. Murena, Sulla's legate, into Asia. Therrmus was engaged in the siege of Mytilene, and it was under him that Julius Caesar served his first campaign, and gained his first laurels (Suet. Caes. 2). [CAESAR, p. 539, b.] This Therrmus has frequently been confounded with No. 3; but it must be observed that they were in Asia at different times, and moreover that No. 3 must have been an adherent of Marius, while No. 4 belonged to Sulla's party. (Comp. Drumm, Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 132, note 96.)

5. A. MINICIUS THERRMUS, was twice defended by Cicero in B.C. 59, and on each occasion acquitted. It is not stated of what crime he was accused. (Cic. pro Flacc. 39; comp. Drumm, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. p. 619.) As Cicero says that the acquittal of Therrmus caused great joy among the Roman people, we may conclude that he had previously filled some public office, and thus he may be the same as the Therrmus who, when curator in Flaminia, sued for the consulship in b.c. 65. (Cic. ad Att. i. 1.)

6. Q. MINICIUS THERRMUS, was proprietor in B.C. 51 and 50 in Asia, where he received many letters from Cicero, who praises his administration of the province (ad Fam. xiii. 53—57, comp. ad Att. v. 13, 20, 21, § 14, vi. 1. § 13). On the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the side of Pompey, and was sent with five cohorts to occupy Iguvium; but on the approach of Curio with three cohorts, he fled from the town. In B.C. 43 he was sent by M. Lepidus as ambassador to Sex. Pompeius. He appears afterwards to have followed the fortunes of Sex. Pompeius, for he is mentioned among the distinguished adherents of Pompeius, who deserted the latter in b.c. 35, who, on the march to Spain over to Antonius. (Caes. B. C. l. 12; Cic. ad Att. vii. 13, Phil. xiii. 6; Appian, B. C. v. 139.)

death by Tiberius in A. D. 32. (Tac. Ann. vi. 7.)

3. MINICIUS THERMUS, a man of praetorian rank, was sacrificed by Nero in A. D. 66, to the hatred of Tigellinus. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 20.)

The following coin of the Minucia gens has on the obverse a woman's head, and on the reverse two men fighting over a third who has fallen. The legend, which is partly effaced in the specimen figured below, is Q. THERM. M. F. The subject of the reverse evidently refers to the preservation of the life of a Roman citizen in battle; and hence it has been conjectured with some probability that this coin may have been struck by the son of M. Thermus [No. 4], in order to commemorate the youthful exploit of Caesar, who saved the life of a Roman citizen while fighting under Thermus.

COIN OF Q. MINICIUS THERMUS.

THERON (Θηρόν). 1. The nurse of Ares, from whom he was believed to have derived the surname of Thereitas, though Pausanias thinks that this name arose from the fierceness of the god. A sanctuary of Ares Thereitas stood on the road from Sparta to Therapne, with a statue which the Discouri were said to have brought from Colchis. (Paus. iii. 19. § 8.)

2. A daughter of Phylas, became by Apollo the mother of Chaeron. (Paus. ix. 40. § 5.) [L. S.]

THERON (Θήρων), tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily, was the son of Aenesidemos, and descended from one of the most illustrious families in his native city. According to Pindar, they traced their descent from Cadmus, but his more immediate ancestors were Rhodians who had been among the colonists that founded Gela; and his great-grandfather Telemachus had distinguished himself as a leader of the revolution which overthrew the power of Phalaris. (Pind. Ol. ii. iii.; and Schol. to loc.) It is therefore certain that Theron inherited a leading place among his countrymen of Agrigentum, but of the steps by which he rose to the sovereign power we have no accurate information. Polyenus indeed tells us (vi. 51), that having been appointed by the state to superintend the erection of some extensive public buildings, he applied the money furnished him for this purpose to his own objects, and raised a body of mercenary guards, by whose assistance he established himself on the throne. Whatever credit be due to this story, we learn that he had assumed the government of his native city as early as B. C. 483, and retained it from that time, without interruption, till his death. (Diod. xi. 53.) It is probably to the early period of his rule that we may refer the attempt of his kinsmen Capys and Hippocrates to overthrow his power, which was frustrated by their defeat at the river Himera. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 173.) The next event of which we find mention is his expulsion of Terillus from Himera [TERRILLUS], which took place probably as early as B. C. 492. (Herod. vii. 165.) While he by this means united Himera to his own dominions, and thus ruled over two of the most powerful cities of Sicily, he was in close alliance with Gelon, ruler of Syracuse and Gela, to whom he had given his daughter Demarete in marriage. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. init.) Their combined strength was soon called forth to resist the formidable Carthaginian armament under Hamilcar which landed in Sicily in B. C. 490, with the professed object of restoring Terillus. Theron himself had occupied Himera with a large force, but terrified at the magnitude of the Carthaginian army, he shut himself up within the walls of the city, and sent to Gelon for assistance. In the great victory which followed, the Syracusan king appears to have borne by far the greatest part [GELON]; but Theron derived a large share of its advantages, and was not only left in undisputed possession of Himera, but received so large a number of prisoners as his share of the spoil, that by employing these in public works at Agrigentum, he raised that city to an unprecedented state of grandeur and magnificence. (Diod. xi. 20—25.)

His friendly relations with Syracuse continued unaltered until the death of Gelon, B. C. 478; for on that event the disputes between Hieron and his brother Polyzeus brought about a rupture between the former and Theron. Polyzeus had married Demarete, the widow of Gelon, and thus succeeded to the connection of the latter with the Agrigentine prince: in addition to which it appears that Theron himself was married to a daughter of Polyzeus: hence when the latter was driven into exile by the jealousy and intrigues of Hieron [POLYZEUS], he naturally sought refuge at the court of Theron. That monarch espoused his cause, and raised an army for the purpose of reinstating him, but hostilities were prevented, and a peace concluded between the two sovereigns. According to Timaeus, this was effected by the mediation of Simonides, who prevailed on Theron to give his sister in marriage to Hieron. Diodorus, on the contrary, relates that the citizens of Himera, who were oppressed by the government of Thrasylaeus, the son of Theron, having made overtures for assistance to Hieron, the latter betrayed their application to Theron, and induced him in return for this benefit to abandon the cause of his brother Polyzeus. (Timaeus ap. Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 1, 29, 37; Diod. xi. 48.) Theron had been much alarmed at the threatened revolt of Himera, and he now proceeded to establish his power in that city by the greatest severities against the disaffected party, many of whom he put to death, while he drove others into banishment. Having thus gradually thinned the population of the city, he repeopled it with settlers from all quarters, but especially of Syracusans. (Diod. xi. 48, 49.) From this period Theron appears to have reigned without dispute over both Agrigentum and Himera until his death in B. C. 472; and notwithstanding his cruelties towards the Himeraeans, he is praised for the general mildness and equity of his government. It is certain that Agrigentum enjoyed great prosperity under his rule, and that it was then adorned not only with splendid buildings, but with public works of a more useful character, such as reservoirs and conduits for water on a most stupendous scale. (Diod. xi. 23.) Like his contemporary rulers at Syracuse, he also displayed much favour towards artists and poets, and the victories he obtained at the imperial games were immortalised by Pindar.

The praises of the poet are confirmed by the more imperial testimony of Diodorus. (Pind. Ol. ii. iii.; Diod. xi. 3, x. Exc. Vales. p. 538.) A magnificent monument was erected to him in the neighbourhood of Agrigentum, at which heroic honours were paid to his memory. (Diod. l.c. and xiii. 86.)

THERON (Θέρων), a Boeotian satirist, who made the statue of the Olympic victor, Gorgus the
s. 11.)

THERSANDER (Θέρσανδρος). 1. A son of Sisyphus, and father of Haliartus and Coronus.
(Paus. ix. 34. § 5.)

2. A son of Agamidas, and the father of Litharia and Anaxandria, at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 16.

3. A son of Polyneices and Argeis, and one of the Epigoni; he was married to Demonassa, by whom he became the father of Tisamenus. After having been made king of Thebes, he went with Agamemnon to Troy, and was slain in that expedition by Telephus. His tomb was shown at Elaea in Mysia, and sacrifices were offered to him there. (Paus. iii. 15. § 4, vii. 3. § 1, ix. 5. § 7, x.
10. § 2; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 76; Dict. Cret.
ii. 2; Herod. iv. 147; Apollod. iii. 7. § 2.) Virgil (Aen. ii. 261) enumerates Thersander among the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse. Homer does not mention him.

THERSITES (Θερσίτης), a son of Agrius, the most ugly and most impudent talker among the Greeks at Troy. Once, when he had spoken in the assembly in an unbecoming manner against Agamemnon, he was chastised by Odysseus.
(Iom. Íl. ii. 212, &c.; Apollod. i. 8. § 6.) According to the later poets he pulled the eyes out of the dead body of Penthesilea, the queen of the Amazons, who had been killed by Achilles, and also calumniated Achilles, for which, however, the latter slew him. (Tzetz. ad Lyceoph. 999.) In the Lesche of Delphi he was represented by Polynotus in the act of playing at dice with Palamedes.
(Paus. x. 31. § 1; Soph. Philoct. 442.) [L. S.]

THESAEUS (Θησαῦος), the great legendary hero of Attica, is one of those mythological personages, whose legends it is by no means easy to disentangle, and represent in their original shape.
The later belief of the Athenians, adopted and strengthened by writers of authority, represented him as a very much more historical person than he really was; and, in consequence, the rationalistic archaeologists took considerable pains to draw up a narrative of his life in which the supernatural should be kept as much as possible in the back ground, and the character, in which the Athenians loved to regard him, as the founder of Attic nationality, be exhibited in as prominent a light as the received traditions allowed. This was avowedly the method upon which Plutarch proceeded.

According to the commonly received traditions Theseus was the son of Aegaeus, king of Athens, and Aethra, the daughter of Pittheus, king of Trozen [(Ἀγρεύς]. Other legends, however, maintained their ground, which represented him as the son of Poseidon by Aethra. (Plut. Thes. 6; Diod.
iv. 59; Paus. i. 17. § 3; comp. Aethra.) When he reached maturity, Theseus, by his mother's directions, took the sword and sandals, the tokens which had been left by Aegaeus, and proceeded unto Athens. Eager to emulate Hercules, he went by land, displaying his prowess by destroying the robbers and monsters that infested the country. Periphetes, Sinis, Phaeus the Crom-yonian sow, Sciron, Cercyon, and Procrustes fell before the invincible hero. Arrived at Cephusis, he was purified by the Pythialde. At Athens he was immediately recognised by Medea, who laid a plot for poisoning him at a banquet to which he was invited. By means of the sword which he carried, Theseus was recognised by Aegaeus, acknowledged as his son, and declared his successor. The sons of Pallus, thus disappointed in their hopes of succeeding to the throne, attempted to secure the succession by violence, and declared war; but, being betrayed by the herald Leos, were destroyed.
The capture of the Marathonian bull was the next exploit of Theseus [(comp. Herac.)]. It was this same enterprise, the slaying of a Loara, the son of Minos, that had perished. When the occasion returned on which the Athenians had to send to Minos their tribute of seven youths and seven maidens, Theseus voluntarily offered himself as one of the youths, with the design of slaying the Minotaur, or perishing in the attempt. When they arrived at Crete, Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, became enamoured of Theseus, and provided him with a sword with which he slew the Minotaur, and a cube of thread by which he found his way out of the labyrinth. Having effected his object, and rescued the band of victims, Theseus set sail, carrying off Ariadne. (For the variations in the story, given by Cleidemus, the reader is referred to Plut.
Thea. 19.) There were various accounts about Ariadne [(Ἀριάδνη], but most of them spoke of Theseus as having either lost or abandoned Ariadne on the island of Naxos. He was generally believed to have had by her two sons, Oenopion and Staphylus. As the vessels in which they sailed approached Attica, they neglected to hoist the white sail, which was to have been the signal that the expedition had had a prosperous issue. The neglect led to the death of Aegaeus [(Ἀγρεύς]. A vessel was in existence up to the time of Demetrios Phalerus, which it was pretended was the very ship in which Theseus had sailed to Crete. It was this vessel which was sent every year to Delos with the sacred emvos. It is worth noting, that although Homer mentions Ariadne as having been carried off by Theseus from Crete (Od. xi. 321), he says nothing about the Minotaur. All that part of the story is probably a later addition. The expedition to Crete was probably, in its original form, only one of the somewhat numerous amatory adventures of Theseus, several of which are noticed by Plutarch (Thes. 29). Soon after he landed, Theseus is said to have instituted the festival termed Osophoria (Dictionary of Antiquities, s. v.
Osophoria). The origin of the Pyanepsia, and the reinstitution of the Isthmian games, were also ascribed to Theseus.

One of the most renowned of the adventures of Theseus was his expedition against the Amazons. He is said to have assailed them before they had recovered from the attack of Hercules, and to have carried off their queen Antiope. The Amazons in their turn invaded Attica, and penetrated into Athens itself, the final battle in which Theseus overcame them having been fought in the very midst of the city. Of the literal truth of this fact Plutarch (Thes. 27) finds evidence in the names of the localities and the tombs of the fallen Amazons. Cleidemus pretended even to point out the precise position of the contending forces and the fluctuations of the combat. (Compare the remarkable passage of Aristotle, Eth. ii. c. 10.) By Theseus Theseus was said to have had a son named Hippolytus or Demophon, and after her death to have married Phaedra [HIPPOLYTUS, PHAEDRA]. These figures in almost all the ancient heroic undertakings. He was one of the Argonauts (the anachronism of the attempt of Medea to poison him does not seem to have been noticed); he joined in the Calydonian hunt, and aided Adrastus in recovering the bodies of those slain before Theseus. He contracted a close friendship with Peirithous, and aided him and the Lapithæ against the Centaurs. Aided by Peirithous he carried off Helen from Sparta while she was quite a girl, and placed her at Aphidnae under the care of Aethra. In return he assisted Peirithous in his attempt to carry off Persephone from the lower world. Peirithous perished in the enterprise, and Theseus was kept in hard durance until he was delivered by Hercules, who, it is said, had endeavoured to turn this legend into history by making Peirithous attempt to carry off Core, the daughter of Aidoneus, a king of the Molossians. (Plut. c. 31.) Montemine Castor and Pollux invaded Atica, and carried off Helen and Aethra, Academus having informed the brothers where they were to be found [ACADEMUS]. Menestheus also endeavoured to incite the people against Theseus, who on his return found himself unable to re-establish his authority, and retired to Scyros, where he met with a treacherous death at the hands of Lycomedes. The departed hero was believed to have appeared to aid the Athenians at the battle of Marathon. In B.C. 469 a skeleton of large size was found by Cimon in Scyros [CIMON], and brought to Athens. It was believed to be that of Theseus, in whose honour a temple was erected, in which the bones were deposited. A considerable part of this temple still remains, forming one of the most interesting monuments of the ancient in Scyros. By Academus Theseus was celebrated on the eighth day of each month, especially on the eighth of Pyaneposion. Connected with this festival were two others: the Connidaea, in memory of Conidas, the guardian of Theseus; and the Cybernesia, having reference to his voyage. (Dict. of Antig, s. v. Thisbe.)

There can be little question that Theseus is a purely legendary personage, as thoroughly so as his contemporary Hercules. Nevertheless, in later times the Athenians came to regard him as the author of a very important political revolution in Attica. Before his time Attica had been broken up into a number of petty independent states or townships (twelve is the number generally stated) acknowledging no head, and connected only by a federal union. Theseus, partly through persuasion, partly by force, abolished the separate council chambers and governments, did away with all separate political jurisdictions, and erected Athens into the capital of a single commonwealth. The festival of the Synoeea was celebrated in commemoration of this change. The festival which called Atenaesa was now reinstated and termed the Panathenaea (Thucyd. ii. 15). Theseus is said to have established a constitutional government, retaining in his own hands only certain definite powers and functions. The citizens generally he is said to have distributed into the three classes of Eupatridæ, Geomori, and Demuri (Plut. Thes. 24—26). That this consolidation took place sometime or another, there can be no doubt. Whether it was accomplished by Theseus or not, is another question. The authority of Thucydides has usually been allowed to settle the matter. Thucydides, however, did but follow the prevailing opinion of his countrymen; and if his belief raises Theseus to the rank of an historical king, it must also make the Trojan war a matter of history. It is a vain task now to attempt to decide whether there is any historical basis for the accounts of Theseus that were handed down, and still more so to endeavour to separate the historical from the legendary in what has been preserved. The Theseus of the Athenians was a hero who fought the Amazons, and slew the Minotaur, and carried off Helen. A personage who should be nothing more than a wise king, consolidating the Athenian commonwealth, however possible his existence might be, would have no historical reality. It has been urged that we have no ground for denying the personality of Theseus. (Plut. Thes. 24.) Theseus, then, was a personage, rather "Have we any ground for affirming it?" And for this we find nothing but the belief of the Athenians. The connection of Theseus with Poseidon, the national deity of the Ionian tribes, in various ways (the name Aegeus points to Aeae, the sanctuary of Poseidon), his coming from the Ionic town Trozen, forcing his way through the Isthmus into Attica, and establishing the Isthmia as an Ionic Panegyris, rather suggest that Theseus is, at least in part, the mythical representative of an Ionian immigration into Attica, which, adding perhaps to the strength and importance of Ionian settlers already in the country, might easily have led to that political aggregation of the disjoined elements of the state which is assigned to Theseus. It was probably from the relation in which he stood to the Athenian commonwealth as a whole, that his name was not connected with any particular phyle. (Plut. Thes. Died. i. c. i.; Grose, Hist. of Greece, vol. i. p. 134.) This is another question. Theseus and the others.

THESUS (ΘΗΣΟΣ), a Greek historian of unknown date, wrote the lives of illustrious men (βιοι ἐνδήξων) in five books, and a work on Corinth (Κορυνθιακ) in three books, in which he gave an account of the establishment of the Isthmian games. (Suidas, s. v.; Etymol. M. s. v. Άρης; Stobaeus, Floril. vii. 67, 70; Schol. ad Lycofr. 644.)

THESIMENES, [THESIMENES,]

THESMIA or THESMOPHOROS (ΘΕΣΜΙΑ, ΘΕΣΜΟΦΟΡΟΣ), that is, "the law-giver," a surname of Demeter and Persephone, in honour of whom the Thesmophoria were celebrated at Athens in the month of Pyaneposion (Herod. i. 171, 12. 16; Aristoph., Thesm. 303), and to whom sanctuaries were also erected at Megara, Troezen, Phenea, and other places. (Paus. i. 42. § 7, ii. 32. § 7, viii. 15. § 1, 16. § 3, 33. in fin.)

THESPEIA (ΘΕΣΠΕΙΑ), a daughter of Aeson, from whom the town of Thespiae in Boeotia derived its name. (Paus. i. 26. § 4.) [L. S.]

THESPIS (ΘΕΣΠΙΣ). 1. The celebrated father of Greek tragedy, has no personal history discon-NECTED FROM THE HISTORY OF HIS ART, AND IT IS THEREFORE CONSIDERED NECESSARY TO REPEAT HERE WHAT HAS ALREADY BEEN SAID WITH SUFFICIENT FULLNESS RESPECTING HIM, UNDER TRAGOEDEIA, IN THE DICTIONARY OF ANTIQUITIES.

2. OF THEBES, A PLAYER OF THE CITHARA, WHOM LUCIAN MENTIONS AS A COMPETITOR AT ONE OF THE MUSICAL CONTESTS IN THE PYTHIAN GAMES. THERE IS NOTHING TO DETERMINE HIS TIME. (LUCIAN, ADVENT. INDOCTR. IX, VOL. III, P. 108.)

THE SCHOLIAST ON A PASSAGE IN WHICH ARISTOPHANES MENTIONS THESPIS (FRAG. 1470, COMP. SUID. S. E.), STATES THAT THE THESPIS HERE MENTIONED WAS THE CITHAROEIDIC MUSICIAN, NOT THE TRAGIC POET; BUT BENTLEY MAINTAINS THAT THIS IS AN ERROR. (SECOND DISCER, ON PHADOUZ, P. 265, OR P. 190, ED. 1777.)

THE SPIRIT (ΘΕΩΣΤΟΣ), A SON OF ERECTHEUS, WHO, ACCORDING TO SOME, FOUNDED THE TOWN OF THESPIA IN BOEOTIA. (PAUS. IX, 26, § 4; DIODORUS, IV, 29; COMP. SCHOLIAD ON HOM. II, 948; APOLLONIUS, VI, 7, § 8.) HIS DESCENDANTS ARE CALLED THESPIDES (APOLLONIUS, IV, 4, § 10; SENECA, HICOR. OCT. 369), WHICH NAME IS ALSO GIVEN TO THE MUSES. (OV. MET. V, 310.)

THESSALONIC, A MACEDONIAN PRINCESS, WAS THE DAUGHTER OF PHILIP, SON OF AMYNAS, BY HIS WIFE OR CONCUBINE, NICEPOLIDIS OF PHERAE. (ATHEN. XIII, P. 557, C.; PAUSANIAS, IX, 7, § 3.)

THESSALONICE (ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΝΙΚΗ), A MACEDONIAN PRINCESS, WHOSE STEP-MOTHER OLYMPIAS, TO WHOM THE FORTUNES SHE ATTACHED HERSELF WHEN THE LATER RETURNED TO MACEDONIA IN B.C. 317, AND WITH WHOSE DEATH SHE TOOK REFUGE IN THE CASTLE OF PYDNA, ON THE ADVANCE OF CASANDER. (DIODORUS, XIX, 35; JUSTIN, XIV, 6.) THE FALL OF PYDNA THREW HER INTO THE POWER OF CASANDER, WHO EMBRACED THE OPPORTUNITY TO CONNECT HIMSELF WITH THE ANCIENT ROYAL HOUSE OF MACEDONIA BY MARRIAGE WITH HER; AND HE APPEARS TO HAVE STUDIOUSLY TREATED HER WITH THE RESPECT DUE TO HER ILLUSTROUS BIRTH. THIS MAY HAVE BEEN AS MUCH OWING TO POLICY AS TO AFFECTION: BUT THE MARRIAGE APPEARS TO HAVE BEEN A PROSPEROUS ONE; SHE BECAME THE MOTHER OF THREE SONS, PHILIP, ANTIPATER, AND ALEXANDER; AND HER HUSBAND PAID HER THE HONOUR OF CONFERRING HER NAME UPON THE CITY OF THESSALONICE, WHICH HE FOUNDED ON THE SITE OF THE ANCIENT THERMA, AND WHICH SOON BECAME, AS IT CONTINUES DOWN TO THE PRESENT DAY, ONE OF THE MOST WEALTHY AND POPULOUS CITIES OF MACEDONIA. (DIODORUS, XVII, 7, § 3; STRABO, VI, 7, § 36; P. 81, ED. KRAMER; STEPH. BYZ. S. V. ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΝΙΚΗ.)

THE DEATH OF CASANDER, THESSALONICE APPEARS TO HAVE TAKEN PLACE AFTER SHE HAD GIVEN BIRTH TO HIS THREE SONS, BUT AT LENGTH ANTIPATER, BECOMING JEALOUS OF THE SUPERIOR FAVOUR WHICH SHE SHED ON HIS YOUNGER BROTHER ALEXANDER, BARBAROUSLY PUT HIS MOTHER TO DEATH, B.C. 295. (PAUSANIAS, IX, 3; DIODORUS, XIX, II, EXC. HOECHSCHER, P. 490.)

THESSALUS (ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΣ). 1. A SON OF HAE- MON, FROM WHOM THESALY WAS BELIEVED TO HAVE RECEIVED ITS NAME. (STRABO, X, P. 443.)

3. A SON OF HENECLES AND CHALIOPE, WHO WAS THE FATHER OF PHEDIPPUS AND ANTIPHUS. (HOMER, II, 679; APOLLONIUS, VII, § 8.)

THESSALUS (ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΣ), A SON OF PEIESTRATUS BY TIMONASSA. (PEIESTRATUS, PP. 172, 174, A.)

THESSALUS (ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΣ), AN EMINENT TRAGIC ACTOR, IN THE TIME OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT, WHOSE ESPECIAL FAVOUR HE ENJOYED, AND WHOM HE SERVED BEFORE HIS ACCESSION TO THE THRONE, AND THEREAFTER ACCOMPANIED HIM ON EXPEDITION TO ASIA. (PLUTARCH, ALEX. 10, 29; ATH. XI, P. 538; FABRICE, BIBL. GROCE, VOL. II, P. 325.)

THESSALUS (ΘΕΣΣΑΛΟΣ), THE NAME OF TWO PHYSICIANS:—

1. A SON OF HIPPOCRATES, BROTHER OF DRACON I., AND FATHER OF GORGIAS*. HIPPOCRATES III. (JO. Tzetzes, CHIL. VIII, HIST. 153, IN FABRICE, BIBL. OR. VOL. XII, P. 682, ED. VET.; SUID. S. V. ΑΡΩΚΩΝ.)

HE LIVED IN THE FIFTH AND FOURTH CENTURIES B.C., AND PASSED SOME OF HIS TIME AT THE COURT OF ARCHELUS, KING OF MACEDONIA, WHO REIGNED B.C. 413—399. (GALEN, COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "DE HUMOR.", I, 1, VOL. XV, P. 5;) AND DRACON II. (SUID. S. V. ΑΡΩΚΩΝ.)

IT IS SUPPOSED, HOWEVER, THAT IN PERFORMING THE DIFFICULT TASK OF PREPARING SOME OF THE WRITINGS OF HIPPOCRATES FOR PUBLICATION AFTER HIS DEATH HE MADE SOME MODIFICATIONS OF HIS OWN (GALEN, DE DIFICIL. RESPIR., I. VII, P. 890, COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "DE HUMOR.", I. PROEM. VOL. XVI. P. 4.; COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "EPID. VI.", I. PROEM. VOL. XVII., P. 790;) WHICH WERE SOME TIMES NOT QUITE WORTHY OF THAT HONOUR. (PALLAD. SCHOL. IN HIPPOCR. "EPID. VI.", P. 3, ED. DIETZ.)

HE WAS ALSO SUPPOSED BY SOME OF THE ANCIENT WRITERS TO BE THE AUTHOR OF SEVERAL OF THE WORKS THAT FORM PART OF THE HIPPOCRATIC COLLECTION, WHICH HE MIGHT HAVE COMPILED FROM NOTES LEFT BY HIS FATHER; VIZ. "DE HUMORIBUS*" (GALEN, COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "DE HUMOR.", I. PROEM. VOL. XVI, P. 3.; "DE OFFICINA MEDIC.") (ID. COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "DE OFFIC. MED.", I. V., VOL. XVIII, P. 660, I.) THE FIRST BOOK OF THE "PRAEDICTIO" OR "PRAEHISTORICAL" (ID. COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "PRAEDICT. I.", II, 54, VOL. XVI, P. 625;) AND THE SECOND, FOURTH, FIFTH, SIXTH, ETC., OF THE "EPIDEMIC," OR "DE MORBIS POPULARIBUS*" (ID. DE DIFICIL. RESPIR., II, 8, VOL. VII, P. 855;) BUT THIS POINT IS CONSIDERED BY MODERN CRITICS TO BE VERY UNCERTAIN. AMONG THE LETTERS, &c. ATTRIBUTED TO HIPPOCRATES, THERE IS ONE WHICH PROFesses TO BE ADDRESSED BY HIM TO THESSALUS (VOL. III, P. 622;) WHICH CONTAINS NO INTERNAL MARKS OF A SPURIOUS ORIGIN, BUT WHICH IS PERHAPS HARDLY LIKELY TO BE AUTHENTIC IF ALL THE OTHER PIECES ARE APOCRYPHAL. THERE IS ALSO AN ORATION, ΠΡΟΕΘΕΤΙΚΟΣ (VOL. III, P. 831;) SUPPOSED TO BE SPEAKEN BY THESSALUS.

* SO IT IS STATED BY MAIOMINIUS (COMMENT. IN HIPPOCR. "JUGUR.", P. 7;) AND OTHER MODERN AUTHORS, BUT THE WRITER HAS HITHERTO BEEN UNABLE TO FIND ANY ANCIENT AUTHOR WHO SAYS THAT THESSALUS HAD A SON NAMED GORGIAS.
THESSALUS.

The epitaph of Thessalus is preserved in the Greek Anthology. (vii. 135, ed. Tauchn.) His name occurs in several other passages of Galen's writings, but chiefly in reference to the authorship of the different books “De Morbis Popularibus.”

2. A native of Thessaly, one of the founders of the medical sect of the Methodici (Galen, Introct. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 634.). He lived at Rome in the reign of the emperor Nero, A. D. 54—68 (Plin. H. N. xxix. 5), to whom he addressed one of his works (Galen, De Meth. Med. i. 2, vol. x. pp. 7, 8); and here he died and was buried, and his tomb was to be seen in Pliny's time on the Via Appia, with the arrogant title of ἵππος, it having been his constant boast during his life that medicine surpassed all other arts, and that he surpassed all other physicians. (Galen, ibid. p. 11.) He was the son of a weaver, and followed the same employment himself during his youth. (Galen, ibid. p. 10.) This, however, he soon gave up, and, though he had had a very imperfect general education, he embraced the medical profession, by which he acquired for a time a great reputation, and amassed a large fortune. He adopted the principles of the Methodici (Déc. de Ant. s. c. Methodici), but modified and developed them so much that he gave a new turn to the invention of them, and indeed is always considered as one of the founders of the sect. In fact he appears to have endeavoured on all occasions to exalt himself at the expense of his predecessors (Pliny, l. c.); lavishing upon the ancients the most insulting epithets, asserting that none of them had contributed anything to the advance of medical science (Galen, ibid. p. 8), and boasting that he could himself teach the art of healing in six months. (pp. 4, 5.) He is frequently mentioned by Galen, but always in terms of contempt and ridicule (De Meth. Med. i. 1, &c., vol. x. p. 4, &c.; Adv. Julian. c. 1, &c. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 247, &c.); probably this was well deserved, as it agrees with what is said of him by Pliny (l. c.), but still the gross personal abuse in which Galen indulges goes beyond all bounds, and is quite unworthy of so great a man. An account of the opinions of Thessalus may be found in Le Clerc's Hist. de la Médec., Haller's Biblioth. Med. rarior., vol. 1, and Sprengel's Hist. de la Médec. vol. ii. Perhaps it need only be noticed here that he was the inventor of what he called metamorphopliai (rendered by Caelius Aurelianus, De Morb. Acut. ii. 33, p. 173, “reorporatio”), a method which still forms our principal and most essential corpuscular means in the treatment of insanity. His object was, in obstinate chronic cases, where other remedies failed, or were not indicated, to effect a thorough commotion in the fundamental constitution of the organism (στραφώναι). To this end he commenced by the application, both internally and externally, of strong vegetable remedies, to the use of which, together with the strictest regimen and emetics administered at intervals, a period of three days was devoted. This treatment was preparatory to a system of fasting, and concluded with a course of restoratives. (See Feuchtersleben's Medical Psychology, chap. 2, p. 38.) He wrote several medical works, of which only the titles and a few sentences remain: 1. Kívov, "Canon." (Gal. De Meth. Med. iv. 4, vol. x. p. 268; De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. v. 25, vol. xi. p. 783.) 2. Περὶ τῶν Κοινωνυμῶν, "De Communaliis" (id. De Meth. Med. i. 2, vol. x. p. 7.) 3. Περὶ Χειροποιίας, "De Chirurgia," (id. ibid. iv. 4. p. 250). 4. Συνεργεία (id. ibid. p. 7), probably the work called "Comparatio" by Caelius Aurelianus. (De Morb. Acut. iii. 17, p. 247.) 5. A Letter to the Emperor Nero. (Gal. Lc. ii. 7.) 6. De Regulari, which might have been considered to be the same work as the "Canon" mentioned above, but that Caelius Aurelianus quotes it as the book "De Regulis, quas Graeci Dietae vocant" (De Morb. Acut. iii. 17, p. 247); it is therefore possibly the same work which this author elsewhere quotes as "Libri Dietaeticus" (ibid. i. 1 p. 11) or as "Libri Regularis" (De Morb. Chron. pren. p. 268), or perhaps the whole work may have been called "Canon," of which the second book was the "Libri Dietaeticus." (id. ibid. ii. 8. p. 387.) The reputation of Thessalus does not seem to have been very lasting, as, with the exception of Galen and Pliny, Caelius Aurelianus and Soranus (De Arte Obstetr. pp. 120, 210, 212), both of whom belonged to the sect of the Methodici, are perhaps the only ancient authors who mention him.

Fabricius mentions (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 436, ed. vek.) a third physician of the name of Thessalus, and refers to Justin, xii. 8; but the true name in that passage is "Medicus Thessalus," not Medicus; and Medius, not Thessalus, is the proper name. [Medius, § 2.] [W. A. G.]

THESTIUS (Θέστιος), a son of Ares and Demonice or Androide, and, according to others, a son of Agenor and a grandson of Pleuron, the king of Aetolia. He was the father of Iphialus, Euippus, Plexippus, Eurypylus, Leda, Althaean, and Hypermestra. His wife was not the same in all traditions, some calling her Lycippe or Laco- phone, a daughter of Pleuron, and others Deida- meia. (Apollod. i. 7. §§ 7, 9, 16, iii. 10. § 5; Paus. iii. 13. § 5; Hygin. Fab. 14; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 146, 201.) His daughters Leda and Althaean are sometimes designated by the patronymic Thestaeas (Eurip. Iph. Aul. 49; Aesch. Choeop. 606), and his son Iphialus by the name Thestiaedes. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 261.) [L. S.]

THESTOR (Θέστωρ). 1. A son of Idmon and Laothoë (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 139), though some ancient declaim that Idmon (the knowing) was only a surname of Thestor. He was the father of Calchas, Theoclymenus, Leucippe, and Theonoë. (Hom. II. i. 69; Hygin. Fab. 128.) His daughter Theonoë was carried off by pirates, and sold to king Iearus in Caria. Thestor, who went out in search of her, suffered shipwreck, and was taken as a prisoner to Caria. His other daughter Leucippe then consulted the Delphic oracle about her absent father and sister, and was directed to travel through all countries in the attire of a priest of Apollo. In this manner she came to Caria, where her own sister fell in love with her, and as the love was not returned, Theonoë ordered her to be killed. Thestor received the order to kill her, but when he was on the point of executing it, he recognised his children, and with presents from Iearus Thestor with his daughters returned home. (Hygin. Fab. 190.)

2. A Trojan, son of Enops, who was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. II. xvi. 401.) [L. S.]
THEUDAS or THEIODAS or THEODAS (Θεόδας or Θειόδας or Θεόδας), a physician belonging to the sect of the Empirici (Galen, De Mêth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142), who is perhaps the person mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. § 116), as being a native of Laodicea, a pupil of Antiochus of Laodicea, and a contemporary of Menodotus, about the beginning of the second century after Christ.

THIMBRON or THIBRON (Θιμμρῶν, Θι- βρῶν). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was sent out as harmost in a. c. 400, with an army of about 5000 men, to aid the Ionians against Tissaphernes, who wished to bring them into subjection. On Thimbron's arrival in Asia he collected reinforcements, among which the most important was the mass of the Cyrean Greeks at Pergamus, and he succeeded in gaining over or capturing several cities. But meanwhile he allowed his troops to plunder the country of their allies, and he was therefore superseded by Dercyllidas, and obliged to return to Sparta, where he was brought to trial, and fined.

It was said that he would have paid this penalty, and went into exile. But in c. 392 (for there is no reason to suppose this a different person) we again find him sent by the Lacedaemonians into Asia to command against Struthas. He seems, however, to have been still, as before, careless of his duties and neglectful of discipline, while he was addicted also to convivial pleasures. One day, accordingly, Struthas purposely sent some Persian cavalry to commit depredations within sight of Thimbron. The latter sallied forth in a disorderly manner to check them, and Struthas suddenly came up with a superior force, by which Thimbron was defeated and slain. (Xen. Anab. vii. § 1, § 6, § 24. Hell. iii. 1. §§ 4—6; iv. 8. §§ 17—19; Diod. xiv. 36—38; Isocr. Paneg. p. 70, 4; Polyen. i. 19.)

2. A Lacedaemonian, was a confidential officer of Harpalus, the Macedonian satrap of Babylon under Alexander the Great. According to one account it appears that Thimbron who murdered Harpalus in Crete, in B.C. 324. [HARPALUS, No. 1.] He then possessed himself of his late master's treasures, fleet, and army, and, ostensibly espousing the cause of some Cyrean exiles, sailed to Cyrene with the intention of subjugating it. He defeated the Cyreanaeans in a battle, obtained possession of their harbour, Apollonia, together with the treasures he found there, and compelled them to capitulate on condition of paying him 500 talents, and supplying him with half of their war-chariots for his expeditions. This agreement, however, they were soon induced to repudiate by Mnasicles, one of Thimbron's officers, who had deserted his standard, and gone over to the enemy. Under the able direction of Mnasicles, the Cyreanaeans recovered Apollonia, and, though Thimbron was aided by the Barcæans and Hesperians, and succeeded in taking the town of Teuchira, yet, on the whole, his fortunes declined, and he met besides with a severe disaster in the loss of a great number of his men, who were slain or captured by the enemy, and in the almost total destruction of his fleet by a storm. Not discouraged, however, he collected reinforcements from the Peloponnesus, defeated the Cyreanaeans (who were now aided by the Libyans and Carthaginians), and closely besieged Cyrene. Pressed by scarcity, the citizens quarrelled among themselves, and the chief of the oligarchical party, being driven out, betook themselves partly to Ptolemy Lagi, king of Egypt, and partly to Thibron, Ptolemy thereupon sent a large force against Cyrene under Ophelles, to whom the exiles, who had taken refuge with Thibron, endeavoured to escape, but were detected, and put to death. The Cyrenaean people then made common cause with Thibron against the new invader; but Ophelles defeated him, and he was obliged to seek safety in flight. He fell, however, into the hands of some Libyans, and was by them delivered up to Epicydes, an Olyanthian, whom Ophelles, having taken Techeira, had made governor of the town. The citizens of Techeira, with the sanction of Ophelles, sent Thibron to Apollonia, the scene of much of his violence and extortion, to be crucified, b. c. 322. (Diod. xvii. 198, xviii. 19—21; Arr. ap. Phot. cod. 92; Strab. xvi. p. 837; Just. xii. 6, 8; Orois.iii.23.)

THISBE (Θησέη). 1. A beautiful maiden at Babylon, was beloved by Pyramus. The lovers living in adjoining houses, often secretly conversed with each other through an opening in the wall, as their parents would not sanction their marriage. Once they agreed upon a rendezvous at the tomb of Ninus. Thise arrived first, and while she was waiting for Pyramus, she perceived a lioness who had come with Thibron against the new invader. While running she lost her garment, which the lioness soiled with blood. In the mean time Pyramus arrived, and finding her garment covered with blood, he imagined that she had been murdered, and made away with himself under a mulberry tree, the fruit of which henceforth was as red as blood. Thise, who afterwards found the body of her lover, likewise killed herself. (Ov. Met. iv. 55—165; comp. Anthol. Lat. i. p. 106, &c. ed. Burm.)

2. A Boeotian nymph, from whom the town of Thisbe derived its name. (Paus. ix. 32 § 2.)

THOANTEA, a surname of the Taurian Artemis, derived from Thoas, king of Tauris. (Val. Flacc. viii. 208; Or. ix. 386.)

THOAS (Θασ). 1. A son of Andromaeon and Gorge, was king of Calydon and Pleuron, in Aetolia, and went with forty ships against Troy. (Hom. II. ii. 638, iv. 329, vii. 166, xiii. 216, xv. 281; Paus. vii. 22 § 5; Hygin. Fab. 97; Tzetz. ad Lyoghy. 780, 1011; comp. Strab. vi. p. 253; Paus. x. 38 § 3.)

2. A son of Dionysus and Ariadne. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 997; Stat. Theb. iv. 769.) He was by king of Lemnos and married to Myrina, by whom he became the father of Hypsipyle and Sicius. (Hom. II. xiv. 230; Diod. v. 79; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 601; Hygin. Fab. 15, 120; Tzetz. ad Lyoghy. 1374.) When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island, Hypsipyle saved her father Thoas, and concealed him. (Apollod. i. 9 § 17.) Afterwards, however, he was discovered by the other women, and killed (Apollod. iii. 6 § 4); or he escaped to Tauris (Hygin. Fab. 15), or to the island of Oenoe near Euboae, which was henceforth called Sicius. (Schol. ad Apollon. i. 624.)

3. A son of Tauris and Perioboea, and a brother of Penelope. (Apollod. iii. 10 § 6.)

4. A son of Borythothes, and king of Tauris, into whose dominions Iphigenia was carried by Artemis, when she was to have been sacrificed. He was killed by Chryses. (Anton. Lib. 27; Hygin. Fab. 121; Eurip. Iphig. Taur.)

THOMAS.

5. A son of Ornytus or Ornyton. (Paus. ii. 4 § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 1057.)

6. A Trojan who was slain by Meneleus. (Hom. II. xvi. 311.)

[LS.]

THOAS (Θασος), an Aetolian, who was prætor of that nation in b. c. 193, and at a council held at Naespectus, took a prominent part in urging his countrymen to war against Rome, and advised them to send embassies to Philip and Antiochus. These, however, produced no effect for the moment, and the following year (b. c. 192) we find Thoas engaging on his own account in an unsuccessful attempt to reduce the important fortress of Chalcis. But circumstances now caused Antiochus to lend a more favourable ear to his overtures, and having repaired in person to join the king in Asia, he obtained great influence over his mind, and, by his magniloquent promises, was mainly instrumental in persuading him to pass over in person with his army into Greece. Here also he readily induced the Aetolians, who were assembled in council at Lamia, to conclude an alliance with Antiochus, and place themselves under his command. We do not, however, hear any thing of the services which he rendered to the king during the war that followed; while by the advice which he had given at the commencement, he had prevented Antiochus from receiving the advantage of a victory at the battle of Chalidnial. After the defeat of the Syrian monarch the Romans made the surrender of Thoas one of the conditions of the peace which they granted him: but though this demand was complied with, they were induced to set him at liberty at the intercession of Nicander and Pantaleon. At a subsequent period, however (b. c. 169), having again taken an active part against these last partisans, he fell a victim to the popular indignation, being asailed with stones by the assembly of the people. (Liv. xxxv. 12, 37, 38, 42, 45, xxxvii. 45, xxxviii. 38; Polyb. xxi. 14, xxii. 26, xxviii. 4; Diod. xxix. Exc. Legat. p. 621, Exc. Vat. p. 71.)

[El. B.]

THOMAS (Θωμᾶς). 1. Magister, a rhetorician and grammarian, who flourished about a. d. 1310. He appears to have been a native of Thessalonica, and to have lived at the court of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus L., and to have held the office of marshal (Magister Officorum) and keeper of the archives (Charibydotis); but he afterwards retired to a monastery, where he assumed the name of Theolouus, and devoted himself to the study of the ancient Greek authors. His chief work was a Lexicon of Attic Words (κατα 'Αλφάβητου ονομάτων 'Αττικῶν ἐκλογά), compiled from the works of the elder grammarians, such as Phrynichus, Ammonius, Herodian, and Moeris; but with very little judgment. The work has some value on account of its containing much from the elder grammarians, which would otherwise have been lost; but, when Thomas deserts his guides, he often falls into the most serious errors. He wrote Scholia upon Pindar, Euripides, and Aristophanes, the remains of which are merged in the collections of ancient scholia, and also lives of those authors, which are prefixed to some of the editions of their works. His other writings consist of letters and orations, the latter being partly scholastic essays, and partly composed on important political occasions on the great men of former days, such as that upon Gregory of Nazianzus, partly laudatory addresses to his contemporaries, and partly relating to passing events.
THOMAS.

His Attic Lexicon was first published by Zach. Caliarius, Rom. 1517, 8vo.; and soon after by Fr. Ascalonis, who had not seen the former edition, in the Aldine collection of Greek Lexicographers, entitled Dictionarium Graecum, Venet. 1524, fol.; reprinted 1525, fol.; then by Michael Vascosanu, with the Attic Lexicon of Phrynichus and Moschopulus. Lutet. 1532, 8vo.; the next edition was that of Nicolas Blancard, who made many rash changes in the text; a very excellent edition, enriched with a body of notes by Dan. Heininsus, J. Chr. Wolf, and many other scholars, was published by Johan. Stephan. Bernard. Lugd. Bat. 1577, 8vo. by G. B. G. B., who had an edition by Ritschel, with valuable Prolegomena, under the following title: —Thoumae Magristi sive Theodoli Monachi Ecloga Vocum Atticorum. Ex Recensione et cum Prolegomenis Frederici Ritschelii. Halis Saxon. 1831, 1832, 8vo. An edition of the Orations and Epistles, which were then known, was published in Greek and Latin, Upsal. 1693, 4to., by Laurentius Normann, who had edited the Laudatio Gregorii alone two years before, Upsal. 1691, 4to.; and two other orations, namely that to Andronicus Palaeologus de Regia Officis, and the fellow to it, de Subditorum erga Regem Officis, have been published in the Nova Collectio Veterum Scriptorum of Angelo Maio (vol. iii. pp. 145, foll., pp. 173, foll. 1827, 4to.), who gives the titles of the several unedited letters and orations of Thomas, which he promises to publish. Some Excursus from Thomas Magister are printed in the Anecdota of L. Bachmann, vol. ii. 1828, 8vo. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 1311, Appendix, p. 15, ed. Basil.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 181, foll.; Schröckh, Christl. Kirchenk. vol. xxx. p. 298; Schöffl, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. iii. pp. 152, 207; Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliogr. Script. Graec.)

2. Thomas, a monk of Crete, whose selection from the Lexicon of Suidas exists in MS. in several libraries, appears to be a different person from Thomas Magister. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 417.)

4. The Planudean Anthology also contains an epigram in praise of Demosthenes, Thucydidès, and Aristides, as the three greatest of Greek rhetoricians, by a certain Thomas Scholasticus, the same person, perhaps, as Thomas Magister, with whom Planudes was contemporary. Nay, it is possible that Thomas Patricius (No. 3) may also have been identical with Thomas Magister, who may have held the office in the circus before his retirement to the monastery. (Anth. Plenud. p. 376, Stepheh. p. 514, Wechel.; Brunck, l. c. p. 125; Jacobs, l. c. p. 95.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 497.)

A few other insignificant persons of the name are mentioned by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 719, 720. (F. S.)

THOMAS (Θωμᾶς), a physician of the emperor Julianus, who was also a privy councilor (τεργα-ντέρας, or τεργαντός), and stood high in his favour. He was put to death for the part he took in the riots at Constantinople called Nika, A. D. 532. (Chron. Pasch. pp. 333, 340.) [W. A. G.] vol. iii.

THORAX.

THOON (Θοών). 1. One of the Gigantes, was killed by the Moeræ. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2.)

2. A Trojan who was killed by Odesseus. (Hom. Ill. xi. 422.)

3. A son of Phaeoep, who, with his brother Xanthus, was slain by Diomedes. (Hom. II. v. 152.) A Phaeacian of this name occurs in the Odyssey (vii. 113). [L. S.]

THOİRANIUS, or TOIARANIUS. 1. A legate of Q. Metellus Pius in Spain, was defeated and slain by Sertorius about n. c. 77. He is called Thorius by Florus. (Plut. Sertor. 12; Flor. iii. 22, § 8.)

2. One of the Pompeian party, who was in exile in n. c. 45, and to whom Cicero addressed two letters of consolation, which are extant (ad Fam. vi. 20, 21), where the name is usually written Toranius or Toraninius.

3. C. THORANIUS or T. ORANIIUS, was the tutor or guardian of Octavius, and the colleague of his father in the aedilship, but was nevertheless proscribed by the triumvirs in n. c. 43, at the request of his son, who was anxious to obtain possession of his property. His son soon dissipated the inheritance which he had acquired by particular, was convicted of theft, and died in exile. (Appian, B. C. iv. 12, 18; Suet. Octav. 27; Val. Max. ix. 11, § 5; Oros. vi. 18.)

4. THORANIUS, tribune of the plebs in n. c. 25, placed his father by his side in the seat assigned to the tribunes in the theatre, although his father was at the time a freedman. (Dion Cass. iii. 27.)

5. THORANUS, or TOIRANIUS, a celebrated mango or slave-dealer in the time of Antony and Augustus. He is called Thoranius Flaccus by Macrobius. (Plin. H. N. vii. 10. s. 12; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 4; Suet. Octav. 69.)

THORAX (Θοράξ). 1. Of Larissa in Thessaly, and one of the powerful family of the Albanæ. Thorax and his brothers, wishing to confirm or to increase their power, were among those who urged Xerxes to invade Greece, and promised him their assistance in the enterprise. In the Persian king's retreat, after the battle of Salamis, Thorax formed one of his escort, after which he still continued to show his zeal in the cause of the invaders, and was present with Mardonius at the battle of Platea, n. c. 479. When the Persians had been finally driven from Greece, Leotychides, king of Sparta, led an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the barbarians, but the Albanæ purchased his forbearance with bribes. (Herod. vii. 72, vii. 6, ix. 1, 58.) [LEOTYCHIDES, No. 2.]

2. A Lacedaemonian, is mentioned by Diodorus (xiii. 76) as acting under Callicratidas during his operations in Lesbos, in n. c. 405, and as having been commissioned by him, after the capture of Methymna, to conduct the heavy-armed troops to Mytilene. In the following year we again find Thorax in command of the land-force which cooperated with the fleet under Lyssander in the storming of Lampsacus (Xen. Hell. ii. 1, § 16; Plut. Lys. 9); and he was left at Samos as har-mostat by Lyssander, when the latter was on his way to Athens after the battle of Aegospotami. (Diod. xiv. 3.) According to Plutarch, when the satrap Pharnabazus sent to Sparta to complain of ravages committed in his territory by Lyssander, the Lacedaemonian government put Thorax to death, as he was a friend and colleague of the accused admiral, and they had found money in his possession. (Plut. Lyc. 19.) The date and circumstances of this, however, are very doubtful. (See Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. App. iv.)

THORISMOND or TORISMOND, king of the Visigoths, A.D. 451—452. He succeeded his father Theodoric I., who fell at the battle of Châlons, in which Attila was defeated. Thorismond was also present at this battle, and distinguished himself greatly by his personal courage. Anxious to revenge the death of his father, and to follow up the advantages the Roman and Gothic army had already gained, Thorismond proposed an attack upon the king of the Huns in his camp; but Attilus, the Roman general, fearing that the extirpation of the Huns would make the Visigoths the masters of the Roman dominions, dissuaded Thorismond from his purpose, by representing to him the danger of absence from his capital at the commencement of his reign, since he had ambitious brothers who might seize both his treasures and his crown. These arguments easily persuaded the youthful monarch to return to Toulouse. In the following year (A. D. 452), if we may believe Jornandes, he defeated Attilus, who had attacked the Alani after his return from Rome; but Gregory of Tours speaks simply of the conquest of the Alani by Thorismond, without mentioning the action of Attilus. At the close of the same year Thorismond was murdered by his brothers Theodoric and Frederic, the former of whom succeeded him on the throne. (Jornandes, de Reb. Got. 41—43; Iaduus, Chron.; Greg. Tur. ii. 7; Sidon. Apoll. Ep. vii. 12; Tilmont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi.)

THO'RIUS BALBUS. [BALBUS.]

P. THRA'SEA PAETUS*, one of those distinguished Romans in the reign of Nero who were disgusted with the tyranny and corruption of the times in which they lived, and endeavoured to carry into practice the severer virtues of the Stoic philosophy. He was a native of Patavium (Padua), and was probably born soon after the death of Augustus. Nothing is related of his early years, and we only know that he was of a noble family, and inherited considerable wealth from his ancestors. In his youth he devoted himself with ardour to the study of philosophy, and he appears at an early period of his life to have made the younger Cato his model, of whose life he wrote an account. (Plut. Cat. Min. 25, 37.) At what period he settled at Rome, is uncertain, but there he became acquainted with the best spirits of his age. His house and gardens were the place in which the lovers of liberty and virtue were accustomed to assemble, and he himself became the counsellor and friend of them all, and was regarded by them with the utmost veneration and love. In his marriage he sought a wife of congenial principles. He married Arria, the daughter of the heroic Arria, who showed her husband Caecina how to die [ARRIA]; and his wife was worthy of her mother and her husband. At a later period he gave his own daughter in marriage to Helvius Priscus, who tried closely in the footsteps of his father-in-law. Thus he was strengthened in his pursuit of high and noble objects by his domestic connections as well as by the friends with whom he constantly associated.

The first time that the name of Thrasea is mentioned in connection with public affairs, is in A. D. 57, when he had already acquired considerable reputation. In that year he gave the most active support to the Cilians, in their accusation of their late governor Cossutius Capito, who, in consequence, gave up his intention of defending himself, and was condemned, and who thus became one of Thrasea's bitterest enemies. (Comp. Tac. Ann. xiii. 35, with xvi. 21, sub fn.) In the following year (A. D. 58) Thrasea spoke in the senate on a matter tripping in itself, but which is recorded by the historian (Ann. xiii. 49) on account of the censure which Thrasea received in consequence from the friends of the court. Shortly after this, in March, A. D. 58, Thrasea acted in a manner far more offensive to the emperor. In this year the tyrant had killed his mother Agrippina, to whom he owed the throne, and sent a letter to the senate, informing them that she had conspired against his life, and had received the punishment that was her due. The obsequious senators, with their usual acquiescence to the will of the despot, voted to proceed to the matricide all kinds of honours. This was more than the noble spirit of Thrasea could endure. He had been accustomed to give his assent in silence or with a few words to the former acts of adulation displayed by the senate towards their imperial master; but now, as soon as he had heard the emperor's letter, he rose from his seat and quitted the house without waiting till it came to his turn to give his opinion. Nero took no public notice of the conduct of Thrasea at the time, but he did not forget it, and only waited for a convenient opportunity to gratify his revenge.

In A. D. 62 Thrasea gave another instance of courage in the senate. The proconsul Messala had been accused of writing libellous verses against Nero, and the consul elect, to please the emperor, had proposed that the offender should be put to death. Thrasea, on the contrary, maintained that this punishment was too severe, and proposed in its place confiscation of property and banishment to an island. The freedom of Thrasea broke the spell of slavery. The majority of the senate voted in favour of his proposition; and although Nero expressed his displeasure at the sentence, Thrasea would not yield, and the senate followed his noble example. In the course of the same year Thrasea spoke in the senate on occasion of the trial of Claudius Timarchus, of Cretae, with great applause, denouncing some of the causes of the evils of the provincial administration, and pointing out their remedy.

In A. D. 63 Thrasea received a public expression of Nero's hatred. At the beginning of that year the senate went in a body to Antium, to congratulate Nero upon his wife Poppaea having recently given birth to a daughter; but Thrasea alone was forbidden to enter the imperial presence, an intimation of his approaching fate which he received with his usual calmness, for he had often been ac-

* The gentle name of Thrasea is not mentioned by any ancient writer, and has given rise to some dispute. Lipsius (ad Tac. Ann. xvi. 21) suspected that it might be Valerius, because we find in an inscription, a L. Valerius Messalla Thrasea, who was consul in A. D. 196, but we have no evidence that this person was a descendant of Thrasea, Paetus, and the name of Thrasea occurs in other gentes. It has been conjectured, with more probability, by Hase (in Erasch and Gruber's Encyclopadie, art. Patos), that Fannius was the gentle name of our Thrasea, since his daughter was called Fannia, and not Arria, like her mother and grandmother.
customed to say in the language of the Stoic school, "Nero can kill me, but cannot injure me." He did not, however, court his fate. During the next three years he retired almost entirely from public life, and was hardly ever seen in the senate. But Nero could neither forget nor forgive him; and accordingly, after he had put to death so many distinguished men on occasion of Piso's conspiracy, he resolved, to use the words of Tacitus (Ann. xvi, 21), to murder Virtue herself, by the execution of Thrasea and his friend Barea Soranus. The accusation, condemnation, and death of Thrasea, are related by Tacitus, with more than his usual power; and we must refer our readers for the details of the tragic scene to the masterly pages of the great historian. The accusation against Thrasea was placed in the hands of his old enemy Cossutianus Capito, and of Eprius Marcellus. One of his friends, Arulenus Rusticus, who was then tribune of the people, offered to put his name to the act of the senate, but Thrasea would not allow him thus to sacrifice his life. On the day of his impeachment the temple of Venus, where the senate assembled, was surrounded by soldiers, and bodies of troops were stationed in all the public buildings and open places of the city. The senators had no alternative but submission or death. They gratified the wishes of the emperor by condemning Thrasea and Barea Soranus to death, and Helvidius Priscus, Thrasea's son-in-law, to banishment. Thrasea was allowed the choice of his own death. It was late in the day when the senate pronounced its sentence; and the consul forthwith sent his quaestor to carry the fatal news to Thrasea. He was in his gardens conversing with his friends, and was at that moment more particularly engaged in conversation with the Cynic philosopher Demetrius; and the subject of their discussion, as far as could be gathered from the few words that were overheard, appeared to be the immortality of the soul. The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of Domitian Caecilianus, one of Thrasea's most intimate friends, who informed him of the senate's decision. Thrasea forthwith dismissed his friends, that they might not be involved in the fate of a condemned person; and when his wife wished to follow the example of her mother, and die with her husband, he entreated her to preserve her life for the sake of their daughter. He then went into a colonnade, where he awaited the arrival of the quaestor. When the latter had delivered to him the decree of the senate, he retired into his chamber with Demetrius and Helvidius Priscus, and there had the veils of both his arms cut. As the blood gushed forth, he said "Let us offer a libation to Jupiter the Deliverer," and then, addressing a few words to the quaestor, he calmly awaited the approach of death. His last words were spoken to Demetrius, but these, unfortunately, are not preserved, as the existing MSS. of the Annals of Tacitus break off at this point. Thrasea perished in A.D. 66, two years before the death of Nero. His panegyric was written by his friend and admirer, Arulenus Rusticus, who was in consequence put to death by Domitian. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 49, xiv. 12, 48, 49, xv. 20—22, xvi. 21—35, Hist. ii. 91, iv. 5, Agric. 2; Dion Cass. lxi. 15, lixi. 26; Suet. Ner. 37, Dom. 10; Plin. Ep. vii. 19, viii. 22; Plut. Phraelep. Resp. Gerend. c. 14, p. 810, a.; Arrian, Dissert. i. 1. § 26; Mart. i. 9; Juv. v. 36.)

THRASEA PRISCUS, a man of noble birth and great acquisitions, was slain by Caracalla in A.D. 212. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 5.) We learn from the Fasti that his full name was L. Valerius Messalla Thrasea Priscus, and that he was consul along with C. Domitius Dexter in A.D. 196, under Septimius Severus.

THRA'SIUS (Opados). 1. A soothsayer who is also called Phrairus. (Hygin. Fab. 56; Ov. Art. Am. i. 649; Apollod. ii. 5. § 11.)

2. A Trojan who was killed by Achilles. (Hom. ll. xxi. 210.)

THRASON, a statuary, mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 641), who saw several of his works in the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and, among them, statues of Penelope and Euryclides. He is probably the same artist whose name occurs in Pliny's list of those who made athletics et armatas et venatores sacrificandos. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. 19. § 34.)

There is an extant inscription in which mention is made of a statue dedicated to Artemis, the work of Straton of Pellaene. From the form of the letters of the inscription, Böckh supposes its date to be not earlier than the reign of Trajan or of Hadrian, in which case, of course, the artist must have been a different person from the Thrason mentioned by Strabo and Pliny. (Böckh, C. I. N. 1923, vol. ii. p. 9; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 413, 2d. ed.)

THRASONIDES (Opasávònís), a Stoic philosopher, whose conduct on a certain occasion is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, in illustration of the definition of love given by the Stoics. (Diog. vii. 130; copied by Suidas, s. v. "Epos." [P. S.]

THRA'SYAS (Opávias), an eminent herbalist, a native of Mantinea in Arcadia, the tutor of Alexias, who is said to have been able to drink hellebore with impunity. He lived shortly before the time of Theophrastus, and therefore probably about the middle of the fourth century B.c. (Theophr. Hist. Plant. ix. 16. § 8; 17. §§ 1, 2.) It is uncertain whether he is the same person who was the author of some medical formulae mentioned by Scribonius Largus (De Compos. Medicam. c. 208 (78)), and Astius (ii. 4. 57, iii. 1. 65, pp. 415, 426).

THRASYBULUS (Opávovoulov). 1. Tyrant of Mileta, was a contemporary of Periander and Alyattes, the king of Lydia. We do not learn when he became tyrant, but from the expression of Herodotus (i. 22) it rather seems that he was tyrant during the whole of the eleven years' war carried on by Sadyattes and Alyattes against Mileta. It was in the twelfth year of that war that the temple of the Assessian Athena was burnt down, after which Alyattes fell sick, and the Delphic oracle, when consulted by him, refused to give a response till the temple was rebuilt. Periander, who was intimately connected with Thrasylus, got to know the reply that had been given, and sent word to Thrasylus, who, when the herald of Alyattes came to demand a truce till the temple should be rebuilt, gave directions that the greatest possible ostentation of plenty should be made, to induce the belief that the Milesians had still abundance of provisions. The stratagem produced the desired effect. Alyattes, who had expected to find the people reduced to the last extremity, hastily concluded a peace, b. c. 612. (Herod. i. 29—22.)

According to Herodotus (vi. 92) his intercourse 4 n 2

with Thrasybulus had an injuries effect upon the character and policy of Periander, rendering him cruel and suspicious. For the story of the mode in which Thrasybulus gave his advice to Periander as to the best means of securing his power, the reader is referred to the article PERIANDER [Vol. II. p. 190]. A different version of the story is given by Aristotle (Pol. iii. 13, v. 10), according to whom the advice was given by Periander to Thrasybulus.

2. An Athenian, the son of Thraso. He was an enemy of Alcibiades, and after the battle of Notium, went to Athens, for the purpose of laying accusations against Alcibiades, in consequence of which the latter was removed from his command. (Plut. Alc. 36.)

3. An Athenian, the son of Lycurgus, of the deme Steiria. He was zealously attached to the democratic party, and was a warm friend of Alcibiades. The first occasion on which we find him mentioned is in connexion with the affair of a galley in the Athenian fleet at Samos, and took an active part in the suppression of the oligarchical conspiracy (Thuc. viii. 73). When the news arrived of the establishment of the Four Hundred at Athens, Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus were among the most active in urging resistance to the oligarchy, and exacted a solemn oath from the Athenians of the fleet that they would maintain the democracy, and persevere in the war with the Peloponnesians. In an assembly held soon after in the camp, some of the suspected generals were removed, and others appointed in their room. Among the latter was Thrasybulus. Through the influence of Thrasybulus a decree was passed by the camp-assembly, by which Alcibiades was pardoned and recalled. Thrasybulus himself sailed to fetch him from the court of Tissaphernes. Shortly afterwards he set out towards the Hellespont with five galleys, when news arrived of the revolt of Erechus. After his junction with Alcibiades, he was surprised at the battle of Cynossema, in which Thrasybulus commanded the right wing, and by a sudden attack upon the Peloponnesians, who had gained a partial success, turned the fortune of the day. (Thuc. vii. 75, 76, 81, 100, 104, &c.) Just before the battle of Cyzicus Thrasybulus joined Alcibiades with twenty galleys, having been despatched on an expedition to collect money from Thasos and other places in that quarter. (Xen. Hellen. i. 1. § 12.) In 407 he was sent with a fleet of thirty ships to the coast of Thrace, where he reduced most of the revolted cities to submission. (Xen. Hellen. i. 4. § 9; Demosth. adv. Lept. p. 474; Diod. xiii. 72.) He was about the same time elected one of the new generals, together with Alcibiades. While engaged in fortifying Phocaea, he received a visit from Alcibiades, who had left his fleet at Notium. (Xen. l.c. i. 5. § 6.) After the unfortunate battle of Notium took place, he was involved in the disaster, and was superseded in his command, but still continued to serve in the fleet. He was one of the subordinate officers at the battle of Arginusae, and was one of those charged with the duty of taking care of the wrecks. (Xen. i. 6. § 55.) He is said to have had a dream before the battle, which portended the victory and the death of the generals (Diid. xiii. 97). On the establishment of the Thirty Tyrants he was banished, and was living in exile at Thebes when the rulers of Athens were perpetrating their excesses of tyranny. Being aided by the Thebans with arms and money, he collected a small band, and seized the fortress of Phyle, where he was rapidly reinforced, and after repulsing an attack made upon the fortress, he defeated the forces placed to check the incursions of the garrison. Four days afterwards he descended with a body of 1000 men and marched into Peiraeus, taking up a strong position on the hill of Munychia, where he was joined by most of the population of Peiraeus. The forces of the tyrants were immediately despatched against them, but were defeated, though with no great loss. The Ten, who were appointed in place of the Thirty, however, showed no less disposition to overpowered Thrasybulus and his party, who strengthened themselves as much as possible, and made foraging excursions every day from Peiraeus. In consequence of the application of the oligarchs Lysander and Libys were sent to blockade Peiraeus. The exiles however were delivered from their perilous position through the machinations of Pausanias. After they had sustained a severe defeat, Pausanias secretly sent to them, directing them to send an embassy to him, and suggesting the kind of language that they should hold. An armistice was concluded with them, and deputies were despatched by them to plead their cause at Sparta. The issue was a general reconciliation, accompanied by an amnesty, and the exiles entered the city in triumph, and offered a sacrifice to Athene on the Acropolis. Soon afterwards the oligarchical exiles at Eleusis, who were preparing to renew the civil war, were overpowered, and a new act of amnesty was passed with respect to them, the credit of which seems to have belonged to Thrasybulus and his friends. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. §§ 2—43; Diod. xiv. 32, 33; Paus. i. 29, § 3, iii. 5, § 1; Plut. Lyz. 27.) In the year 395 we find Thrasybulus moving the decree for an alliance between Thebes and Athens, when the former was menaced by Sparta, and being made the leader of the Athenian army in the passage of the Hellespont. (Xen. Hellen. iii. 5. § 4; Xen. Hellen. iii. 5. § 16, xc.) In the year 390 Thrasybulus was sent with forty ships to aid the democratic Rhodians against Teleutias. Not finding that he could be of any service at Rhodes, he sailed away to Thrace, where he reconciled two Odrysian princes, Amadocus and Seuthes, and brought them to enter into alliance with Athens. Seuthes offered to give him his daughter in marriage. He then proceeded to Byzantium, where by the aid of Archelaus and Herculeides he established the democratic party, and restored the Athenian interest. He also brought Chalcedon into alliance with Athens. In the island of Lesbos he reduced Methymna and some other towns. From Lesbos he sailed southwards, and having anchored in the Eurymedon near Aspendus, the inhabitants of this place fell upon him in the night and killed him in his tent. (Diod. xiv. 94, 99; Xen. Hellen. iv. 8, &c.; I. H. adv. Lept. p. 475.) His tomb was on the road leading to the Academy, near those of Pericles, Chabrias, and Phormion. (Paus. i. 29, § 3.)

4. Son of the preceding, had for some offence or other a fine of ten talents inflicted on him. (Demosth. de fals. Lez. p. 431.)

5. An Athenian, a native of the deme Colyttus, was one of the companions of Thrasybulus the Steirian at Phyle and Peiraeus. In the year 388 he was in command of eight ships off the coast of Thrace. We learn that nevertheless he was twice condemned and thrown into prison. (Xen. Hellen. v. 1 § 26; Demost. adv. Timoc. p. 742.)

6. An Elean, the son of Aeneas. He was a soothsayer, in which capacity he foretold to the Mantinians their victory over Agis and the Lacedaemonians, and himself took part in the battle. (Paus. vii. 2 § 4, viii. 10 § 5 ; comp. vi. 13 § 11, vi. 14 § 9.)

7. Brother of Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse. On the death of Hieron, Thrasybulus succeeded him in the government. It does not appear distinctly whether he assumed the tyranny because the son of Gelon was not yet old enough, or, as the language of Aristotle (Polit. v. 8) indicates, though called tyrant, and possessing the substance of power, was in fact little more than the minister or favourite of his nephew, whom he is said to have corrupted, that he might afterwards supplant him. Aristotle's version of the matter also represents the resistance offered by the friends of the rightful heir, as leading to the overthrow of the dynasty. It is possible enough, as Dr. Thirlwall suggests (Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 224), that Thrasybulus became the guardian of his nephew on the death of Polyzephyrus, and before the death of Hieron; and that, having rendered the youth odious and contemptible, he found no difficulty, when Hieron died, in setting him aside, and usurping his authority. This supposition, however, still leaves unexplained Aristotle's statement about the expulsion of the dynasty, which is one of the most important features of his account. Little, therefore, is gained by any endeavour to reconcile the two versions. According to the more detailed narration of Diodorus (xi. 67), Thrasybulus directly succeeded Hieron, and soon provoked a revolt by his rapacity and cruelty. With the aid of foreign mercenaries, and some troops from Acetna and Catana, amounting altogether to 15,000 men, he maintained his ground for some time in Acraedina and the Island. The Syracusans entrenched themselves in the quarter called Tyche, and sent for assistance to Gela, Agrigentum, Selinus, Himera, and the inland cities of Sicily. They readily lent their aid on the death of Polyzephyrus, and before he was sufficiently reinforced by sea and by land. He thereupon entered into a negotiation with his revolted subjects, and was allowed to abdicate his authority and retire into exile. He withdrew to Locri, in Italy, and there ended his days. His dynasty ended with him.

8. Son of Xencrates, and nephew of Therom tyrant of Agrigentum. He is mentioned on more than one occasion by Pindar. (Pyth. vi., Isthm. ii., Fragm. 89. 1.)

THRASYBULUS (Θρασύβουλος), a friend and contemporary of Galen, in the latter half of the second century after Christ. Galen addressed two of his works to him, viz. De Optima Secta (vol. i. p. 106) and Utrum Medicinae sit an Gymnasieae Hygieiae (vol. v. p. 606); but it does not seem certain that he was a physician. (W. A. G.)

THRASYDAEUS (Θρασύδαιος). 1. A citizen of Elis, and leader of the democratic party there. When the Spartans under Agis invaded the Elean territory, in b. c. 400, the oligarchs of Elis, led by Xenis, made an attempt to overpower their political adversaries, and killed, among others, a man, whom, from the likeness between the two, they mistook for Thrasydaenus. The democratic party were hereupon much disheartened, but the mistake was soon discovered, and Thrasydaeus, who, at the beginning of the outbreak, was sunk in sleep from the influence of wine, put himself at the head of the people, and completely conquered the oligarchs. Agis, however, when he retired from Elis, left a Lacedaemonian garrison in Epitumium, and the Eleans were so harassed by the ravages it committed, that Thrasydaeus, in the following year (b. c. 399), was compelled to sue to Sparta for peace, and to purchase it by absolute submission. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2 §§ 27—30; Paus. iii. 8.) We may perhaps identify with the subject of the present article the Thrasydaeus of Elis, who is mentioned as having been persuaded by his friend Lysias, the orator, to supply two talents to the Athenian patriots under Thrasybulus, in aid of their enterprise against the Thirty Tyrants, b. c. 403 (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Orot. Lys.).

2. Of Elis, an eunuch, who, instigated by a private injury, murdered Evagoras, king of Salamis in Cyprus, in b. c. 374. (Theopomp. op. Phot. p. 120, a, b; comp. Arist. Pol. v. 10, ed. Bekk.; Diod. iv. 47; Wess. ad loc.) (Evangor. No. 1.)

THRASYDAEUS (Θρασύδαιος), son of Agrigentum, was the son and successor of Therom. Already during his father's lifetime he had been appointed to the government of Himera, where, by his violent and arbitrary conduct, he alienated the minds of the citizens, so that they were on the point of breaking out into revolt. But having applied for support to Hieron of Syracuse, that ruler betrayed their application to Therom, who, in consequence, put to death the leaders of the disaffected party, and effectually re-established his authority. (Diod. xi. 48.) Whether Thrasydaeus retained his position at Himera after this, we know not: but on the death of Therom he succeeded without opposition in the sovereignty of both cities. His tyrannical and violent character soon displayed itself, and rendered him as unpopular at Agrigentum as he had been at Himera. But his first object was to renew the war with Hieron, against whom he had already taken elarge part during his father's lifetime. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 29.) He therefore assembled a large force of mercenaries, besides a general levy from Agrigentum and Himera, and advanced against Hieron, but was defeated after an obstinate and sanguinary struggle; and the Agrigentines immediately took advantage of this disaster to expel him from their city. He made his escape to Greece, but was arrested at Megara, and publicly executed. (Diod. xi. 53.) Diodorus assigns the whole of these events to the year b. c. 472, in which Therom died; but there are some difficulties in this chronology. (See Bckh. ad Pind. vol. iii. p. 209; and Brunet de Presle, Recherches sur les Etablissements Grecs en Sicile, p. 145, note.)

THRASYLLA ENNIA. [Ennii.]

THRASYLLUS or THRASYLUS (Θρασύλους, Θρασύλος). 1. An Argive, was one of the five generals of the commonwealth when Argiva was invaded by the Lacedaemonians under Agis II., in b. c. 418. Agis succeeded in placing a division of his army between the Argive forces and Argos, thus cutting them off from their city, while their flank and rear were threatened by his two other divisions. Thrasyllus perceived the danger of this position, and, together with Alciphron (one of 4 B 3 of his fellow-citizens and a progenus of Lacedaeomen), obtained an interview with Agis, and induced him by the hope of a permanent peace to grant them a truce for four months. Thrasyllus and Alciphron, however, had taken this step without being authorized; and the Argives, who imagined that they had been on the point of gaining an easy victory over the Lacedaemonians, shut in as the latter were between them and the city, were highly exasperated, and began to stone Thrasyllus in the military court which was always held just outside the walls of Argos after an expedition.
He saved his life only by taking refuge at an altar, and he was punished by the confiscation of his property. (Thuc. x. 59, 60.)

2. An Athenian, was serving as a hoplite in the army at Samos, in b. c. 411, and was one of those who persuaded the soldiers and sailors to aid the Samian people against the expected attempt of the oligarchical conspirators to put down democracy in the island. The consequence was the defeat of the revolutionists. Shortly after, when Charrares had brought to Samos an exaggerated account of the tyranny and violence of the 400 at Athens, Thra-ysyllus and Thrasybulus bound the army by an oath to be faithful to democracy, zealously in the war with the Peloponnesians, and ever hostile to the revolutionary government at home; and, in the election of new generals which ensued, these two were included in the number. In the same year,
b. c. 411, Thrasyllus commanded the left wing of the fleet at the battle of Cynossema, in which the Athenians defeated the Peloponnesians; and somewhat later, after the victory gained by the Athenians over the Lacedaemonian fleet near Abydos, he was despatched to Athens to bear the good news and to ask for supplies. Some time after his arrival, Agis having, in a forny from Deceleia, advanced too near the walls of the city, Thrasyllus led out the Athenians against him and obtained a slight advantage, in consequence of which his countrymen the more readily voted him a reinforcement both of men and ships. With these he sailed early in b. c. 409 to Samos, whence he proceeded to the coast of Asia and attacked the town of Pygela without success. Within a few days, however, Colophon surrendered to him, and he then advanced into Lydia, and having ravaged the country, proceeded by sea against Ephesus, but here he was defeated and driven back to his ships by the forces of the Ephesians, united with those of Tissaphernes and the Sarcusans; and after ailing to Notium where he buried his dead, he seized his course for Lesbos. Here, while anchored in the Sardian squadron sailing by, whereupon he attacked it, captured four ships with their crews, and chased the rest back to Ephesus. He then continued his voyage to Sestus, where he joined the force under Alcibiades, and the whole fleet crossed over together to Lampsacus; but the troops of Alcibiades, who had not sustained any defeat, refused to serve in the same ranks with those of Thrasyllus, conquered as they had been at Ephesus; nor was this feeling taken away till their common success in the ensuing summer against Pharnabazus near Abydos. In
b. c. 408 Thrasyllus was engaged with Alcibiades in the successful operations at Chalcedon, which Induced Pharnabazus to accept terms of accommodation from the Athenians. He probably shared also in the siege and reduction of Byzantium in the same year, and in b. c. 407 he led home to Athens a portion of the triumphant armament. Not long after, his was one of the generals who were appointed to supersede Alcibiades after the battle of Notium, and was present in that capacity at Arginusae in
b. c. 406. After the battle it was he who proposed to leave 47 galleys behind to save the men from the wrecks, while the main body of the fleet should seil against the ships of the enemy, which were blockading Mytilene. He was also among the six generals who returned to Athens and were shamefully put to death by the people through the intrigues of Thersamenes. It should be observed that Diodorus, in his account of several events, substitutes, by an error, the name of Thrasyllus for that of Thrasyllus. (Thuc. viii. 73, 75, 76, 104, 105; Xen. Hell. i. §§ 8, 33, 34, 2, §§

THRASYYLUSS (Θρασύλλος), a musician of Phlius, is mentioned by Plutarch (de Mus. 21, p.
1137, f), in connection with Tyrtaeus of Mantiniea and Andreas of Corinth, as having purposely abstained from many of the artificial refinements which were introduced at an early period into Greek music. From the way in which he is mentioned by Plutarch, he seems to have lived in the early part of the fifth century B. C. [P. S.]

THRASYLUS, was a celebrated astrologer at Rhodes, with whom Tiberius became acquainted during his residence in that island, and ever afterwards held in the highest honours. It was said that Tiberius had intended to kill him after resulting him respecting his future destinies, but that Thrasyllus, when he had predicted the empire to Tiberius, said that he perceived from the ob- servation of the stars that his own death was near at hand, by which announcement he so convinced Tiberius of the truth of his art, that Tiberius not only gave up his intention of murdering him, but admitted him to his intimate friendship. Thrasyllus accompanied Tiberius to Rome, when he was recalled by Augustus, and appears to have always lived with him. He died in A. D. 36, the year before Tiberius, and is said to have saved the lives of many persons whom Tiberius would otherwise have put to death by falsely predicting for this very purpose that the emperor would live ten years longer. (Tic. Ann. vi. 20—22; Dion Cass. iv 11, ivii. 15, iviiii. 27; Setl. Aug. 93, Tib. 14, 6c.
Cal. 19; Schol. ad Jue. vi. 576; Julian. Ep. ad Theod. p. 265, Spanh.) The son of this Thrasyllus preserved the same success in his son; and is said to have predicted the empire to Nero. (Tic. Ann. vii. 22, comp. xiv. 9; Dion Cass. lxi. 2.)

THRASYMALCHUS (Θρασύμαλχος), a native of Chalcodon, was a sophist, and one of the earliest cultivators of the art of rhetoric. He was a contemporary of Gorgias. (Cic. Orat. 12, 13, 52; Quintil. iii. 1. § 10.) He is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Politic, and is referred to several times in the Phaedrus.
Like Prodicus and Protagoras, he discoursed and spoke on subjects of natural philosophy (Cic. de Orat. iii. 32. § 128; Plutarch. Symp. p. 616, d.)
mentions a work by him on Illustrious Men ("Τρασύμαλχος"). Quintilian speaks of him as one of the first who wrote on common places

THUCYDIDES. 1111

[From E. E.]

THUCYDIDES (Θοικύδης), historical. 1. An Athenian, of the family Alcmeon, son of Melesias, and related to Cimon, to whom he is said to have been inferior in military talent, though he possessed more skill as a political tactician. After the death of Cimon, in b. c. 449, Thucydides became the leader of the aristocratic party, which he concentrated and more thoroughly organized in opposition to Pericles. With all his ability, however, and all his family influence, he was no match for his great adversary either in eloquence or address; and this is said to have acknowledged himself, when king Archidamus II. of Sparta asked whether he or Pericles was the better wrestler. "When I throw Pericles," was the answer, "he always contrives to make the spectators believe that he has had no fall." The line of attack also, which Plutarch represents Thucydides as adopting, does not appear to have been the most judicious, for he inveighed against the prodigious expenditure of Pericles in public works, by no means the least popular feature in the great statesman's administration, and not long after this the struggle came to an end by the ostracism of Thucydides in b. c. 444.

(Plut. Per. 6, 8, 11, 14, 16.) From an allusion in Aristophanes (Fesp. 947) we learn that, when he was in danger of this banishment, and rose to make his defence, he utterly broke down and was unable to open his mouth. According to the scholia on the same passage of Aristophanes, the historian Philochorus assigned as the cause of his exile some alleged misconduct during a command which he held in Thrace; while Idomeneus related that he was not ostracized merely, but sentenced to perpetual banishment with confiscation of his property, and that he fled to Artaxerxes, king of Persia. Here, however, the scholar appears to have confounded Thucydides with Themistocles; [posed ναύς.] (Comp. Arist. Aeth. 668, 673.) That he retired to Sparta is in itself probable enough, and is in some measure confirmed by the anecdote, above related, of his conversation with Archidamus. But the usual term of ostracism, viz. ten years, seems to have been abridged in his case, since we hear of him in b. c. 440 (at least there is good reason to suppose it the same person) as united with Hagnon and Phormion in the command of forty ships, which were sent to reinforce Pericles, then engaged in the siege of Samos. The arrival of these vessels, together with other reinforcements, compelled the Samians to capitulate (Thuc. 1. 117; comp. Thirwall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 53, note 1). Aristotle, according to Plutarch (Nic. 2) classed Thucydides with Nicias and Themistocles as the "most eminent and distinguished by an hereditary feeling of good will towards the people. He left two sons, Melesias and Stephanus; and a son of the former of these, named Thucydides after his grand-father, was a pupil of Socrates. (Plat. Men. p. 94, Theag. p. 130, Lach. p. 179; Athen. vi. p. 234, c.)

2. A Pharsalian, was a proponent of the Athenians and happened to be at Athens in b. c. 411, during the usurpation of the Four Hundred. When the tumult against the government broke out in the Peiraeus, and Themistocles had gone thither with the promise of quelling it, Thucydides with some difficulty restrained the adherents of the oligarchs in the city from marching down to attack the rioters, representing the mischief attendant on civil discord while the Lacedaemonians were so close at hand. (Thuc. vii. 92.)

3. A lieutenant of Martius Verus, by whom he was sent to establish Soemone on the throne of Armenia, in the reign of M. Aurelius Antoninus. Thucydides accomplished his mission. (Suid. s. v. Máριον; see above, Vol. i. p. 363, a.) [E. E.]

THUCYDIDES (Θουκυδίδης), the historian, belonged to the demes Halimus, and Halimus belonged to the phyle Leontis. He simply calls himself an Athenian (Thuc. i. 1). His father's name was Olorus (iv. 104). Marcellinus, and some other later writers, say that the name was Orolus. The two forms are easily confounded, and we assume the true name to be Olorus. Herodotus (v. 39) mentions a Thracian king called Olorus, whose daughter Hegesipyle married Miltiades, the conqueror of Marathon, by whom she became the mother of Cimon. The ancient authorities speak of consanguinity between the family of Cimon and that of Thucydides, and the name of the father of Thucydides is the presumption of a connection with this Thracian king. The mother of Thucydides was also named Hegesipyle, though Marcellinus is the only authority for his mother's name. It is conjectured that Hegesipyle may have been a granddaughter of Miltiades and Hegesipyle, but there is no evidence to show who the mother of Thucydides was, nor how his father was connected with the family of Miltiades. It is also said that there was consanguinity between the family of Thucydides and the Peisistratidæ; but this also cannot be satisfactorily explained.

A statement by Pamphilus, which is preserved by Gallus (xx. 25), makes Thucydides forty years of age at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war or n. c. 431, and accordingly he was born in n. c. 471. The historian says that he lived to see the end of the war, and the war ended in n. c. 404. Krüger attempts to show, on the authority of Marcellinus, that Thucydides was one of the twenty or thirty years of age at the commencement of the war; but he relies too much on his own interpretation of certain words of Thucydides, which are by no means free from ambiguity (v. 26, αἴσθημα μεν ἐγώ ἔχω). There is a story in Lucian's Herodotus or Aetion of Herodotus having read his History at the Olympic games to the assembled Greeks; and Suidas (s. v. Θουκυδίδης) adds that Thucydides, then a boy, was present, and shed tears of emulation; a presage of his own future historical distinction. This story was first doubted by Bredow, and has since been critically discussed by others, and most completely by Dahlman (Hérodot, §c) who rejects it as a fable. The truth of the story is maintained at great length, and with greater tediousness, by Krüger. It is of little importance what any man thinks of the story: it is enough to remark that the direct evidence in support of it is very weak, and there are many plausible objections to be urged against it. Krüger has collected in his essay on Thucydides all that he could say in support of the story.

Antiphon of Rhammus, the most distinguished orator of the time, is said to have been the master of Thucydides in the rhetorical art; and as Antiphon was a contemporary of Thucydides and older, there is no internal improbability in the statement. But the evidence for it, as Krüger shows, is really nothing more than this, that Caecilius in his life of Antiphon conjectures that Thucydides must have been a pupil of Antiphon's, because he praises Antiphon. Cicero, in his Brutus (c. 12), speaks of the eloquence of Antiphon, and cites Thucydides as evidence, and it seems very unlikely that, if he knew Thucydides to have been a pupil of Antiphon, he would not have mentioned it. Anaxagoras also is named by Marcellinus, on the authority of Antyllus, as one of the teachers of Thucydides, as to which we may observe that it is possible that he was, for Anaxagoras was some time at Athens, and Thucydides might have had the advantage of his instruction.

That Thucydides, an Athenian, of a good family, and living in a city which was the centre of Greek civilisation, must have had the best possible education, may be assumed; that he was a man of great ability and cultivated understanding his work clearly shows. He informs us that he possessed gold mines in that part of Thrace which is opposite to the island of Thasos, and that he was a politician of the Thasian side; that he was associated in some way with Thasos and Thracia; and that he was a member of the Athenian squadron on the islands, and he might have had the advantage of his instruction.

Suidas says that Thucydides left a son, called Timotheus; and a daughter also is mentioned, who is said to have written the eighth book of the History of Thucydides. Thucydides (ii. 48) was one of those who suffered from the great plague of Athens, and one of the few who recovered.

We have no trustworthy evidence of Thucydides having distinguished himself as an orator, though it is not unlikely that he did, for his oratorical talent is shown by the speeches that he has inserted in his history. He was, however, employed in a military capacity, and he was the commander of an Athenian squadron of seven ships, at Thasus, n. c. 424, when Eucles, who commanded in Amphipolis, sent for his assistance against Brasidas, who was before that town with an army. Brasidas, fearing the arrival of a superior force, offered favourable terms to Amphipolis, which were readily accepted, for there were few Athenians in the place, and the rest did not wish to make resistance. Thucydides arrived at Eion, at the mouth of the Strymon, on the evening of the same day on which Amphipolis surrendered; and though he was too late to save Amphipolis, he prevented Eion from falling into the hands of the enemy (iv. 102, &c.).

In consequence of this failure, Thucydides became an exile, probably to avoid a severer punishment, that of death, for such appears to have been the penalty of such a failure as his, though he may have done the best that he could. According to Marcellinus, Cleon, who was at this time in great favour with the Athenians, excited popular suspicion against the unfortunate commander. Thucydides (v. 26) simply says that he lived in exile twenty years after the affair of Amphipolis, but he does not say whether it was a voluntary exile or a punishment. If it was voluntary, we may assume that he did not return to Athens, because he knew what fate awaited him. There are various untrustworthy accounts as to his places of residence during his exile; but we may conclude that he could not safely reside in any place which was under Athenian dominion, and as he kept his eye on the events of the war, he must have lived in those parts which belonged to the Spartan alliance. His own words certainly imply that, during his exile, he spent much of his time either in the Peloponnesus or in places which were under Peloponnesian influence (v. 26); and his work was the result of his own experience and observations. His minute description of Syracuse and the neighborhood leads to the probable conclusion that he was personally acquainted with the localities; and if he visited Sicily, it is probable that he also saw some parts of southern Italy, and an anonymous biographer speaks of Thucydides having been at Syracuse. But it is rather too bold a conjecture to make, as some have done, that Olorus and his son Thucydides went out in Thucydides' time, B.C. 444, which was the year when Thrasylus of Athens, as quoted by Marcellinus, says that Thucydides during his exile lived in Italy; but if he means during all the time of his exile, his statement cannot be accepted, for it would contradict the inference which may be fairly derived from a passage in Thucydides that has been already referred to. Timaeus, and other authorities also, affirmed that Thucydides was buried at Thurii; as to which Krüger ingeniously argues, that if he lived there for some time, there is nothing strange in a story being invented of his having been buried there, especially as he might have had a tomb built with the intention of occupying it.

Thucydides says that he lived twenty years in exile (v. 29), and as his exile commenced in the beginning of B.C. 428, he may have returned to Athens in the beginning of B.C. 408, and therefore at or about the time when Thrasylus is mentioned (X. Hellen. ii. 4. §§ 22—38.). It may accordingly be conjectured that Thucydides joined Thrasylus, and in company with him effected his return to his native country. Pausanias indeed (i. 23. § 9) states that Thucydides was recalled by a psophism proposed by Oenobius, but this account creates some difficulty, because it appeared from a critical enumeration of the authorities cited by Marcellinus, that there was a general permission for all the exiles to return after the conclusion of peace with the Laedaeonians, B.C. 404. Thucydides himself says that he was twenty years in exile, and therefore he did not return till B.C. 403, unless we assume that his "twenty years" was merely a round number used to signify nineteen years and somewhat more; or unless we assume that he did not return as soon as he might have done, but a few months later, so that the full term of twenty years was completed.

There is a general agreement among the ancient authorities that Thucydides came to a violent end; Zopyrus and Didymus, quoted by Marcellinus, affirm this; and Plutarch (Cimon 4), and Pausanias (i. 23. § 9) tell the same story. But there is a great diversity of evidence as to the place where he died; and it is doubtful whether it was Thrace or Athens. Plutarch says, it is reported that he was killed in Scaetyle in Thrace, but that his remains were carried to Athens, and his tomb is pointed out in the burial-place of Cimon, by the side of the tomb of Elenice, the sister of Cimon. Pausanias, who was well acquainted with Athens, says that his tomb was then not far from the Pylae Melitides; and that he was assassinated after his return (δις κατασκευασας τον τάφον); words which seem to imply that he did not long survive his restoration. Marcellinus, on the authority of Antyllus, quotes the inscription on his tomb at Athens: ΘΕΟΚΛΗΤΗΣ 'ΟΛΩΡΟΥ (ΟΡΩΛΟΥ) 'ΑΛΛΙΑΚΩΝΙΟΣ (ΈΥΘΑΔΕ ΚΕΣΙΑΙ).

We cannot doubt that there was a tomb of Thucydides at Athens, and he probably died there: the testimony of Timaeus that he died in Italy, is of little value.

The question as to the time of the return of Thucydides to Athens, and of the place of his death and interment, is discussed by Krüger with a wearisome minuteness, and with uncertain results. As to the time of the death of Thucydides, it has been conjectured that it could not be later than the end of the second or the middle of the 94th Olympiad, that is, in any event not later than B.C. 401. His own direct testimony (v. 26) simply shows that he was living after the war was ended (B.C. 404). Dodwell argues that the third eruption of Aetna, which Thucydides (iii. 116) alludes to was the eruption of B.C. 399 or the 95th Olympiad; but Thucydides means to say that the eruption, of which he does not fix the date, was prior to the two eruptions (B.C. 425 and 475) of which he does fix the dates. There is no doubt about the true interpretation of this passage.

The time when he composed his work is another matter of critical inquiry. He was busy in collecting materials all through the war from the beginning to the end (i. 22); but we do not know from his own evidence whether he wrote any portion of the work, as we now have it, during the continuance of the war, though he would certainly have spent some time during his exile to compose the earlier part of his history. Plutarch says that he wrote the work in Thrace; and his words mean the whole work, as he does not qualify them (τον πόλεμον των Πελοποννησίων καὶ Αθηναίων εν Θρᾴκῃ περὶ τῆς Σκαετύλης θάνατον ἔγραψεν), and this is consistent with Plutarch's statement that he died in Thrace. Marcellinus says that he gave the work its last polish in Thrace; and that he wrote it under a plane tree: this is very particular, and it is not improbable that he might write under a shady tree in fine weather, but such particularities are very suspicious. The most probable opinion is that he was engaged on the work till the time of his death. In the very beginning of his history (i. 18) he mentions the end of the war in a passage which must have been written after B.C. 404. A passage in the first book (i. 39), when rightly interpreted, shows us that it was written after the wall round the Pelaeus was pulled down (Xen. Hellen. ii. 2). In the second book (ii. 65) he speaks of the Sicilian expedition, and the support which Cyrus gave to the Laedaeonians, and of the final defeat of the Athenians in this war; all which passages consequently were written after the events to which they refer. A passage in the fifth book also (v. 26), mentions the end of the war, the duration of which, he says, was twenty-seven years. Thucydides undoubtedly was collecting his materials all through the war, and of course he would register them as he got them; but the work in the shape in which we have it, was certainly not finished until after the close of the war.

A question has been raised as to the authorship of the eighth and last book of Thucydides, which breaks off in the middle of the twenty-first year of the war (a.c. 411); and with the remark that, "when the winter which follows this summer shall have ended, the one and twentieth year of the war is completed." It differs from all the other books in containing no speeches, a circumstance which Thucydides, as we have seen, attributed to his own winter's illness, and it has also been supposed to be inferior to the rest as a piece of composition. Accordingly several ancient critics supposed that the eighth book was not by Thucydides; some attributed it to his daughter, and some to Xenophon or Theopompus, because both of them continued the history. The words with which Xenophon's Hellenica commence (μετά δὲ ταῦτα) may chiefly have led to the supposition that he was the author, for his work is made to appear as a continuation of that of Thucydides: but this argument is in itself of little weight; and besides, both the style of the eighth book is different from that of Xenophon, and the manner of treating the subject, for the division of the year into summers and winters, which Thucydides has observed in his first seven books, is continued in the eighth, but is not observed by Xenophon. The rhetorical style of Theopompus, which was the characteristic of his writing, renders it also improbable that he was the author of the eighth book. It seems the simplest supposition to consider Thucydides himself as the author of this book, since he names himself as the author twice (viii. 6, 60). Cratippus, a contemporary of Thucydides, who also collected what Thucydides had omitted, ascribes this book to Thucydides, remarking at the same time that he has introduced no speeches in it. (Dionys. De Thucyd. c. 16, ed. Hudson.) Marcellinus and the anonymous author of the life of Thucydides also attribute the last book to him. The statement of Cratippus, that Thucydides omitted the speeches in the last book because they impeded the narrative and were wearisome to his readers, is probably merely a conjecture. If Thucydides, after writing speeches in the first seven books, discovered that this was a bad historical method, we must assume that if he had lived long enough, he would have struck the speeches out of the first seven books. But this is very improbable; a man of his character and judgment would hardly begin his work without a settled plan; and if the speeches were struck out, the work would certainly be defective, and would not present that aspect of political affairs, and that judgment upon them, which undoubtedly it was the design of the author to present. Some reasons why there should be no speeches in the eighth book, in accordance with the general plan of Thucydides, are alleged by Kriger; and the main reason is that they are not wanted. Whatever may be the reason, the only conclusion that a sound critic can come to is, that the eighth book is by Thucydides, but that he may not have had the opportunity of revising it with the same care as the first seven books.

A saying (λέγεται) is preserved by Diogenes that Xenophon made the work of Thucydides known (εἰς δόξαν θηγαγὼν), which may be true, as he wrote the first two books of his Hellenica, or the part which now ends with the second book, for the purpose of completing the history. The statement in Diogenes implies that the work of Thucydides might have been lost or forgotten but for Xenophon's care; and if the statement is true, we may conclude that the manuscript of Thucydides in some way came into his possession, and probably the materials which the author had collected for the completion of his history.

The work of Thucydides, from the commencement of the second book, is chronologically divided into summers and winters, and each summer and winter is marked off, and it has also been supposed to be inferior to the rest as a piece of composition. Accordingly several ancient critics supposed that the eighth book was not by Thucydides; some attributed it to his daughter, and some to Xenophon or Theopompus, because both of them continued the history. The words with which Xenophon's Hellenica commence (μετά δὲ ταῦτα) may chiefly have led to the supposition that he was the author, for his work is made to appear as a continuation of that of Thucydides: but this argument is in itself of little weight; and besides, both the style of the eighth book is different from that of Xenophon, and the manner of treating the subject, for the division of the year into summers and winters, which Thucydides has observed in his first seven books, is continued in the eighth, but is not observed by Xenophon. THUCYDIDES.

A HISTORY WHICH TREATS OF SO MANY EVENTS, WHICH TOOK PLACE AT REMOTE SITES, COULD ONLY BE WRITTEN IN THE TIME OF THUCYDIDES, BY A MAN WHO TOOK GREAT PAINS TO ASCERTAIN FACTS BY PERSONAL INQUIRY. IN MODERN TIMES FACTS ARE MADE KNOWN BY PRINTING AS SOON AS THEY OCCUR; AND THE PRINTED RECORDS OF THE TIME, NEWSPAPERS AND THE LIKE, ARE OFTEN THE ONLY EVIDENCE OF MANY FACTS WHICH BECOME HIDDEN. WHEN WE KNOW THE CARELESS WAY IN WHICH FACTS ARE NOW REPORTED AND RECORDED BY VERY INCOMPETENT PERSONS, OFTEN UPON VERY INDIFFERENT HEARSAY TESTIMONY, AND COMPARE WITH SUCH RECORDS THE PAINS THAT THUCYDIDES TOOK TO ASCERTAIN THE CHIEF EVENTS OF A WAR, WITH WHICH HE WAS CONTEMPORARY, IN WHICH HE TOOK A SHARE AS A COMMANDER, THE OPPORTUNITIES Which His MEANS ALLOWED, HIS GREAT ABILITIES, AND SERIOUS EMINENT CHARACTER, IT IS A FAIR CONCLUSION THAT WE HAVE A MORE EXACT HISTORY OF A LONG EVENTFUL PERIOD BY THUCYDIDES THAN WE HAVE OF ANY PERIOD IN MODERN HISTORY, EQUALLY LONG AND EQUALLY EVENTFUL. WE ARE DECEIVED AS TO THE VALUE OF MODERN HISTORICAL EVIDENCE, WHICH DEPENDS ON THE EYE-SIGHT OF WITNESSES, BY THE FACILITY WITH WHICH IT IS PRODUCED AND DISTRIBUTED IN PRINT. BUT WHEN WE COME TO EXAMINE THE AUTHORITY FOR THAT WHICH IS PRINTED, WE SELDOM FIND THAT THE ORIGINAL WITNESS OF AN IMPORTANT TRANSACTION IS A THUCYDIDES; STILL LESS SELDOM DO WE FIND A MAN LIKE HIM WHO HAS DEVOTED SEVEN AND TWENTY YEARS TO THE CRITICAL ENUMERATION OF THE EVENTS OF AS MANY YEARS. A LARGE PART OF THE FACTS IN THUCYDIDES WERE DOUBTFUL DERIVED FROM THE TESTIMONY OF OTHER EYE-WITNESSES, AND EVEN IN SOME CASES NOT DIRECTLY FROM EYE-WITNESSES; AND THAT IS ALSO TRUE OF ALL MODERN HISTORIES, EVEN CONTEMPORARY HISTORIES; BUT AGAIN, HOW SELDOM HAVE WE A THUCYDIDES TO WEIGH THE VALUE OF TESTIMONY EITHER DIRECT OR INDIRECT (I. 22). HIS WHOLE WORK SHOWS THE MOST SCRUPULOUS CARE AND DILIGENCE IN ASCERTAINING FACTS; HIS STRICT ATTENTION TO CHRONOLOGY, AND THE IMPORTANCE THAT HE ATTACHES TO IT, ARE ADDITIONAL PROOF OF HIS HISTORICAL ACCURACY. HIS NARRATIVE IS BRIEF AND CONCISE: IT GENERALLY CONTAINS BARE FACTS EXPRESSED IN THE FEWEST POSSIBLE WORDS, AND WHEN WE CONSIDER WHAT PAINS IT MUST HAVE COST HIM TO ASCERTAIN THESE FACTS, WE ADMIRE THE SELF-DENIAL OF A WRITER WHO IS SATISFIED WITH GIVING FACTS IN THEIR NAKED BREVITY WITHOUT ORNAMENT, WITHOUT ANY PARADE OF HIS PERSONAL IMPORTANCE, AND OF THE TROUBLE THAT HIS MATERAL COST HIM. A SINGLE CHAPTER MIGHT SOMETIMES HAVE REPRESENTED THE labour OF MANY DAYS AND WEEKS. SUCH A PRINCIPLE OF HISTORICAL COMPOSITION IS THE EVIDENCE OF A GREAT AND ELEVATED MIND. THE HISTORY OF THUCYDIDES ONLY MAKES AN OCTAVO VOLUME OF MODERATE SIZE; MANY A MODERN WRITER WOULD HAVE SPANNED IT OUT TO A DOZEN VOLUMES, AND SO HAVE OUTLASTED IT. A WORK THAT IS FOR ALL AGES MUST CONTAIN MUCH IN LITTLE COMPASS.

HE SELDOM MAKES REFLECTIONS IN THE COURSE OF HIS NARRATIVE; OCCASIONALLY HE HAS A CHAPTER OF POLITICAL AND MORAL OBSERVATIONS, ANIMATED BY THE KEENEST PERCEPTION OF THE MOTIVES OF ACTION, AND THE MORALE CHARACTER OF MAN. MANY OF HIS SPEECHES ARE POLITICAL ESSAYS, OR MATERIALS FOR THEM; THEY ARE NOT MERELY IMAGINATIONS OF HIS OWN FOR Rhetorical EFFECT; THEY CONTAIN THE GENERAL SENSE OF WHAT WAS ACTUALLY DELIVERED AS NEARLY AS HE COULD ASCERTAIN, AND IN MANY EXAMPLES HE HAD GOOD OPPORTUNITIES OF KNOWING WHAT WAS SAID, FOR HE HEARD SOME SPEECHES DELIVERED (I. 22). HIS OPPORTUNITIES, HIS TALENTS, HIS CARACTER, AND HIS SUBJECT ALL COMBINED TO PRODUCE A WORK THAT STANDS ALONE, AND IN ITS KIND HAS NEITHER EQUAL NOR RIVAL. HIS PICTURES ARE SOME- TIMES STRIKING AND TRAGIC, AN EFFECT PRODUCED BY SEVERE SIMPLICITY AND MINUTE PARTICULARITY. SUCH IS THE DESCRIPTION OF THE PLAGUE OF ATHENS. SUCH ALSO IS THE INCOMPARABLE HISTORY OF THE ATHENIAN EXPEDITION TO SICILY, AND ITS MELANCHOLY TERMINATION.

A MAN WHO THINKS PROFOUNDLY WILL HAVE A FORM OF EXPRESSION WHICH IS STAMPED WITH THE CHARACTER OF HIS MIND; AND THE STYLE OF THUCYDIDES IS ACCORDINGLY CONCISE, VIGOROUS, ENERGETIC. WE FEEL THAT ALL THE WORDS WERE INTENDED TO HAVE A MEANING, AND HAVE A MEANING: NONE OF THEM ARE IDLE. YET HE IS SOMETIMES HARSH AND OBSCURE; AND PROBABLY HE WAS SO, EVEN TO HIS OWN COUNTRYMEN. SOME OF HIS SENTENCES ARE VERY INVOLVED, AND THE CONNECTION AND DEPENDENCE OF THE PARTS ARE OFTEN DIFFICULT TO SEIZE. CICERO, UNDOUBTEDLY A GOOD GREEK SCHOLAR, FOUND HIM DIFFICULT (ORATOR, C. 9): HE SAYS THAT THE SPEECHES CONTAIN SO MANY OBSCURE AND IMPENETRABLE SENTENCES AS TO BE SCARCELY INTELIGIBLE; AND THIS, HE ADDS, IS A VERY GREAT DEFECT IN THE LANGUAGE OF POLITICAL LIFE (IN ORATIONE CIVILI).

THE FIRST THING THAT IS REQUIRABLE IN READING THUCYDIDES IS TO HAVE A GOOD TEXT ESTABLISHED ON A COLLATION OF THE MSS.; AND THIS WE OWE TO I. BEKKER. THOSE WHO WERE ACCLIMATIZED TO READ THUCYDIDES IN SUCH A TEXT AS DUKER'S, CAN ESTIMATE THEIR OBLIGATIONS TO BEKKER. FOR THE UNDERSTANDING OF THE TEXT, A SOUND KNOWLEDGE OF THE LANGUAGE AND THE ASSISTANCE OF THE BEST CRITICS ARE NECESSARY; AND PERHAPS NEARLY ALL HAS BEEN DONE IN THIS DEPARTMENT THAT CAN BE DONE. BUT AFTER ALL, A CAREFUL AND REPEATED STUDY OF THE ORIGINAL IS NECESSARY IN ORDER TO UNDERSTAND IT. FOR THE ILLUSTRATION OF THE TEXT A GREAT MASS OF GEOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL KNOWLEDGE IS NECESSARY; AND HERE ALSO THE CRITICS HAVE NOT BEEN IDELE. TO DERIVE ALL THE ADVANTAGE FROM THE WORK THAT MAY BE DERIVED FOR POLITICAL INSTRUCTION, WE MUST STUDY IT; AND HERE THE CRITICS GIVE LITTLE HELP, FOR POLITIK IS A THING THEY SELDOM MIDDLE WITH, AND NOT OFTEN WITH SUCCESS. HERE A MAN MUST BE HIS OWN COMMENTATOR; BUT A GREAT

THUY'GENIDES.

The Greek text was first published by Aldus, Venice, 1502 fol., and the Scholia were published in the following year. The first Latin translation, which was by Valla, was printed before 1500, and reprinted at Paris, 1513, fol., and frequently after that date. The first edition of the Greek text accompanying that of Latin version was that of H. Stephens, 1564, fol.: the Latin version is that of Valla, revised by Stephens. This well printed edition contains the Scholia, the Life of Thucydides by Marcellinus, and an anonymous Life of Thucydides. The edition of I. Bekker, Berlin, 1821, 3 vols. 8vo. forms an epoch in the editions of Thucydides, and, as regards the text, renders it unnecessary to consult any which are of prior date. Among other editions are that of Poppe, Leipzig, 10 vols. 8vo., 1821—1838, of which two volumes are filled with prolegomena; of Haack, with selections from the Greek Scholia and short notes, Leipzig, 1820, 2 vols. 8vo.; of Gölzer, 2 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1826; and of Arnold, 3 vols. 8vo., Oxford, 1830—1835.

The translations into modern languages are numerous. It was translated into French by Claude Seyssel, Paris, 1527, fol. The English version of Thomas Nicolls, London, 1550, fol. was made from the version of Seyssel. The Biographie Universelle mentions an anonymous English version, published at London in 1525. The English version of Hobbes appears to be mainly founded on the Latin versions, as a comparison of it with them will show. Hobbes translated it for the political instruction which it contains. Thucydides was afterwards translated by W. Smith, 1753, whose translation is generally exact; and again by S. T. Bloomfield, London, 1821. The most recent German translation is by H. W. Klein, Munich, 1826, 8vo. Thucydides was translated into French by Levesque, Paris, 1795, 4 vols. 8vo.; and by Gall, 1807, &c. Gall published the Greek text of Thucydides, the Scholia, the variations of thirteen manuscripts of the Bibliothèque du Roi, a Latin version corrected, and the French version already mentioned, with notes historical and philological. The French version of Gall has been printed separately, 4 vols. 8vo.

The authorities for the Life of Thucydides have been generally referred to, and they are all mentioned and criticised in the Untersuchungen über das Leben des Thucydides, Berlin, 1832, by K. W. Krüger. The "Annales Thucydidet et Xenophonici," &c. of Dodwell, Oxford, 1702, 4to., may also be consulted. The criticism of Dionysius of Halicarnassus on Thucydides has itself been much criticised: most of his censure will not receive the approbation of scholars. [G. L.]

THY'DIPPUS. (Θυδίππος), a contemporary of Phocion, of whom Plutarch relates one or two particulars. (Phoc. cc. 35, 36.)

THY'/GENIDES. (Θυγενίδης), a comic poet of unknown age, whose name is only found in a few passages of the grammarians, in most of which it has been corrupted into Thugeides. The remains of his poetry consist of one title, Δικαστήρια, one complete line, and a few words (Suid. s. v. τραχύηνα, and perhaps s. v. ἀντιστάχειν; Phot. Lex. s. v. μη νόμος, τραχύηνα; Pollux, vi. 38; Zonar. Lex. s. v. Λεονίδης; Antist. p. 114. 22; Pierson, ad Moerin, p. 334; Porson, ad

THY'MOCLIES.

THU'RO (Θύρω), a daughter of Phylas, became by Apollo the mother of Charon, the founder of Thrinia. (Paus. ix. 40. § 3.) [L. S.]

THY'AS (Θύας), a name of the female followers of Dionysus, is the same as Ἐὔδρα. (Lycoch. C. 143, 305; Or. Fast. vi. 514; Catull. 64, 332; comp. Thylia.) [L. S.]

THY'ESTES (Θυεστής), a son of Pelops and Hippodameia, was the brother of Atreus and the father of Agisthus. (Hom. Il. ii. 107; Aeschyl. Agam. 1242; Eurip. Or. 1009; comp. Atreus; Pelops; Agamemnon.) [L. S.]

THY'IA (Θύεια). 1. A daughter of Castalia or Cephissus, became by Apollo the mother of Delphus. (Paus. x. 6 § 2; Hevid. vii. 178.) She is said to have been the first to have sacrificed to Dionysus, and to have celebrated orgies in his honour. Hence the Attic women, who every year went to Mount Parnassus to celebrate the Dionysiac orgies with the Delphian Thyiades, received themselves the name of Thyades or Tyiades. (Paus. l. c. x. § 4, 22, § 5; comp. 29, § 2; Lobeck, Agrapoph. p. 285.)

2. A daughter of Decuallion, and, by Zeus, the mother of Macedon. (Hes. Fragm. 26, ed. Götting; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μακεδονία.) [L. S.]

THY'I'LUS. (Σατυρος, literary, No. 4.)

THY'LACUS. (Οναιριός)

THYMB'RAEUS (Θυμβραῖος). 1. A surname of Apollo, derived from a place in Troas called Thymbra, where he had a temple in which Achilles was wounded, or from a neighbouring hill of the same name. (Strab. xiii. p. 598; Steph. Byz. s. v. Θυμβραῖος; Eurip. Alc. 224; Serv. ad Aen. liii. 85; Hom. II. x. 430.)

2. A Trojan who was slain by Diomedes. (Hom. L. xi. 320.) [L. S.]

THY'MELE, a celebrated mima or female actress in the reign of Dionitian, with whom she was a great favourite. She frequently acted along with Latinus. (Juv. i. 35, vi. 66, viii. 197.) [Latinus.]

THY'MILUS (Θυμίλος), a statutory or sculptor, whose group of Eros and Dionysus standing together was seen by Pausanias in the temple of Dionysus at Athens. (i. 20. § 1.) [P. S.]

THY'MO'CHARES or THY'MO'CHARIS (Θυμόχαρης, Θυμόχαρις), an Athenian, was placed in command of the squadron which was sent in haste to Euboea to oppose the Peloponnesian fleet under Hegesandridas, the appearance of which off the coast had excited so much alarm at Athens. Thymocharis was defeated near Eretria, and the whole of Euboea, except Oreus, revoluted to the enemy. b. c. 411. (Thuc. viii. 95.) [Hegesandridas.] Later in the same year, soon after Hegesandridas had sailed from Euboea to act in concert with Mindarus in the north, Thymocharis was sent from Athens in the same direction with a few ships. A battle ensued between the squadron of Hegesandridas and the portion of the Athenian navy to which Thymocharis had brought reinforcements, and the Peloponnesians proved victorious. (Xen. Hell. i. 1 § 1.) [E. E.]

THY'MOCLES (Θυμόκλης), the author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology, which is

[\textit{P. S.}]

THYMOETES (Θυμωτής). 1. One of the elders of Troy. (\textit{Hom. II.} i. 146.) A soothsayer had predicted, that on a certain day a boy should be born, by whom Troy should be destroyed. On that day Paris was born to Priam, and Minippus to Thymoetes. Priam ordered Minippus and his mother Clyta to be killed. Hence Aeneas, in Virgil (\textit{Aen.} ii. 31), says, that it was doubtful whether Thymoetes, in order to revenge himself, advised to draw the wooden horse into the city.

2. Thymoetes was the father of Thyrsus, a son of Oxyntas, and king of Attica. One of the Attic demes (Thymoetiadæ or Thymaetiadæ) derived its name from him. (\textit{Suid. s. v.}; \textit{Paus.} ii. 18, § 7.)

3. A Trojan and a companion of Aeneas, who was slain by Turnus. (Virg. \textit{Aen.} xii. 364.)

[\textit{L. S.}]

THYMONDAS (Θυμόνδας), a son of MENTOR the Rhodian, and nephew of MENDED. In b. c. 333, he was sent down into Lycia by king Darius to commission Pharnabazus to succeed Menedon in the command of the fleet. (\textit{Pharnabazus}, No. 3.) The land-force, consisting apparently of Greek mercenaries, Thymondas was himself to receive from Pharnabazus, and to lead up to Syria to meet the king.

At the battle of Issus, in the same year, Thymondas with his mercenaries occupied the centre of the Persian army, and did great service. After the battle, together with Aristomedes, Amyntas, and Bucias, and a large body of troops, he made his way over the mountains to Tripolis in Phoenicia. Here they found the ships which had conveyed their men over from Lesbos, and, having launched as many as they needed and burnt the rest, they sailed for Cyprus, and thence crossed over to Egypt. Whether Thymondas took part there in the attempt of Amyntas to possess himself of the sovereignty, we have no means of deciding. (Arr. \textit{Anab.} ii. 2, 8—10, 13; Curt. iii. 8, iv. 1.) (\textit{Amyntas}, No. 5.)

[\textit{E. E.}]

THY'O'NE (Θυώνη), the name of Semele, under which Dionysus fetched her from Hades, and introduced her among the immortals. (Hom. \textit{Hymn.} v. 21; Apollod. iii. 5, § 3, \textit{Cic. de Nat. Deor.} iii. 23; \textit{Pind. Pyth.} iii. 99; \textit{Diod. Sic.} iv. 25; Apollon. \textit{Rhod.} i. 636.)

[\textit{L. S.}]

 THY'O'NEUS (Θυώνευς). 1. A surname of Dionysus which has the same meaning as Thymo, both being formed from \textit{θύω}, "to be inspired," (\textit{Ov. Met.} iv. 13; Horat. \textit{Carm.} i. 17, 23; Oppian, \textit{Cyneget.} i. 27; Hesych. s. v. \textit{Θυώνευς}.)

2. A son of Dionysus in Chios, and father of Thoas. (\textit{Acrón, ad Horat. Carm.} i. 17, 23.)

THYPIETIDES, the maker of a painted vase discovered at Vulci, and now in the collection of M. Durand, under each handle of which is the inscription, \textit{ΕΠΟΙΕΣΕΝ ΟΥΘΕΙΤΙΔΕΣ}. (\textit{Cub. Durand.} No. 893; R. Rochette, \textit{Lettre à M. Schorn.} pp. 60, 61, 2d ed.)

[\textit{P. S.}]

THYRSUS (Θύρσος), a freedman of Octavia, whom the latter sent to Cleopatra at Alexandria, after the battle of Actium. Dion Cassius relates that Octavian made love to Cleopatra by means of Thyrsus, who induced her to betray Antony; but Plutarch simply states that Thyrsus, through his frequent interviews with Cleopatra, excited the suspicions of Antony, who seized and whipped him, and sent him back to Octavian. (\textit{Dion Cass.} ii. 8, 9; \textit{Plut. Ant.} 73.)

THYRUS or THYS (Θύρος, Θύς), a prince of Paphlagonia, who rebelled against Artaxerxes II. (Mnedon.) Datames, who was his first cousin, endeavoured to persuade him to return to his allegiance; but this had no effect, and on one occasion, when Datames had sought a friendly conference with him, Thyrs laid a plot for his assassination. Datames escaped the danger through a timely warning given him by his mother, and, on his return to his own government, declared war against Thyrs, subdued him, and made him a prisoner together with his father and children. He then arranged to murder him in all the insignia of his royal title, dressed himself in hunter's garb, and, having fastened a rope round Thyrs, drove him before him with a cudgel, and brought him in this guise into the presence of Artaxerxes, as if he were a wild beast that he had captured. Cornelius Nepos describes Thyrsus as a man of huge stature and grim aspect, with dark complexion, and long hair and beard. Aelian notices him as conspicuous for his voracity, while Theopompos related that he was accustomed to have 100 dishes placed on his table at one meal, and, when he was imprisoned by Artaxerxes, he continued the same course of life, which drew from the king the remark that Thyrsus was living as if he expected a speedy death. (\textit{Corn. Nep. Datam.} 2, 3; \textit{Theop. op. Ath.} iv. pp. 144, 145, a. x. p. 415, d; \textit{Ael. V. H.} ii. 27.)

TIBERIUS I., emperor of Rome, \textit{A. D.} 14—37. His full name was \textit{TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS NERO CAESAR.} He was the son of T. Claudius Nero [\textit{Nero, No. 7}] and of Livia, and was born on the 16th of November, b. c. 42, before his mother married Augustus. Tiberius was tall and strongly made, and his health was very good. His face was handsome, and his eyes were large. He was carefully educated according to the fashion of the day, and became well acquainted with Greek and Latin literature. He possessed talent both as a speaker and writer, but he was fond of employing himself on trivial subjects, such as at that time were comprehended under the term Grammar (grammatica). His master in rhetoric was Theodorus of Gadara. He was a great purist, and affected a wonderful precision about words, to which he often paid more attention than to the matter. Though not without military courage, as his life shows, he had a great timidity of character, and was of a jealous and suspicious temper; and these qualities rendered him cruel after he had acquired power. He had more penetration than decision of character, and he was often irresolute. (\textit{Tac. Ann.} i. 80.) From his youth he was of an unsociable disposition, melancholy and reserved, and this character developed itself more as he grew older. He had no sympathies nor affections, was indifferent about pleasing or giving pain to others: he had all the elements of cruelty, a suspicious and implacable temper, and power gave him the opportunity of gratifying his long nourished schemes of vengeance. In the latter years of his life, particularly, he indulged his lustful propensities in every way that a depraved imagination could suggest: lust and cruelty are not strangers. It is said, too, that he was addicted to excess in wine: he was not originally avaricious, but he became so. He affected a regard to decency and to externals. He was the prisoner of hypocrize; and the events of his reign are little more than the exhibition of his detestable character. [Tacitus.]

Tiberius was about thirteen years of age when he accompanied Augustus in his triumphal entry into Rome (B. c. 29) after the death of M. Antonius: Tiberius rode on the left of Augustus and Marcellus on his right. Augustus conferred on Tiberius and his brother Drusus titles of dignity, while his grandparents, Caius and Lucius, were still living: but besides Caius and Lucius, Marcellus, the nephew of Augustus, had superior claims to the succession, and the prospect of Tiberius succeeding to the power of his mother's husband seemed at one time very remote. The death of Agrippa made way for Tiberius being employed in public affairs, and Augustus compelled him, much against his will, to divorce his wife Vipsania Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, by whom he had three sons. (Vell. Pat. ii. 10.) Tiberius, on the contrary, entreated the emperor to let Julia keep whatever he had given her.

Tiberius was employed in various military services during the lifetime of Augustus. He made his first campaign in the Cantabrian war as Tribunus Militem. In B. c. 20 he was sent by Augustus to restore Tigranes to the throne of Armenia. Artabazus, the occupant of the throne, was murdered before Tiberius reached Armenia, and Tiberius had no difficulty in accomplishing his mission. (Dion Cass. liv. 9.) It was during this campaign that Horace addressed one of his epistles to Julius Florus (i. 12), who was serving under Tiberius. In B. c. 15, Drusus and his brother Tiberius were engaged in warfare with the Rhneti, who occupied the Alps of Tridentum (Trento), and the exploits of the two brothers were sung by Horace (Carm. iv. 4, 14; Dion Cass. cxxvii. 22.) In B. c. 10 Tiberius was consul with P. Quinctilius Varus. In B. c. 11, the same year in which he married Julia, and while his brother Drusus was fighting against the Germans, Tiberius left his new wife to conduct, by the order of Augustus, the war against the Dalmatians who had revolted, and against the Pannonians. (Dion Cass. liv. 31.) Drusus died (B. c. 9) owing to a fall from his horse, after a campaign against the Germans between the Weser and the Elbe. On the news of the accident, Tiberius was sent by Augustus, who was then at Pavia, to Drusus, whom he found just alive. (Dion Cass. iv. 2.) He conveyed the body to Rome from the banks of the Rhine, walking all the way before it on foot (Sueton. Tiber. 7), and he pronounced a funeral oration over his brother in the forum. Tiberius returned to the war in Germany, and crossed the Rhine. In B. c. 7 he was again in Rome, was made consul a second time, and celebrated his second triumph. (Vell. Pat. ii. 97.)

In B. c. 6 he obtained the tribunitia potestas for five years, but during this year he retired with the emperor's permission to Rhodes, where he spent the next seven years. Tacitus (Ann. i. 53) says that his chief reason for leaving Rome was to get away from his wife, who treated him with contempt, and whose licentious life was no secret to her husband: probably, too, he was unwilling to stay at Rome when the grandsons of Augustus were attaining years of maturity, for there was mutual jealousy between them and Tiberius. During his residence at Rhodes, Tiberius, among other things, employed himself on astrology, and he was one of the dupes of this supposed science. His chief master in this art was Thrasylus, who predicted that he would be emperor. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 21.) Augustus had not been very ready to allow Tiberius to retire to Rhodes, and he was not willing to let him come back; but, at the instance of Caius Caesar, Tiberius was allowed to return, A. D. 2. He was relieved from one trouble during his absence, for his wife Julia was banished to the island of Pandataria (B. c. 2), and he never saw her again. (Dion Cass. iv. 10.) Suetonius says that Tiberius, by letter, entreated the emperor to let Julia keep whatever he had given her.

Tiberius was employed in public affairs until the death of L. Caesar (A. D. 2), which was followed by the death of C. Caesar (A. D. 4). Augustus, now being without a successor of his own blood, adopted Tiberius as his son, and Tiberius married his widow Livia, with the view of leaving to him the power that he had himself acquired; and at the same time he required Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, though Tiberius had a son Drusus by his wife Vipsania. (Sueton. Tiber. 15; Vell. Pat. ii. 103.) Augustus was not ignorant of the character of Tiberius, but, like others in power, he left it to a man whom he did not like, and could not esteem, rather than allow it to go out of his family. Augustus had indeed adopted Postumus Agrippa, the brother of C. and L. Caesares, but there was nothing to hope for from him; and Germanicus was too young to be adopted by Augustus with a view to the direct succession.

From the year of his adoption to the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, Tiberius was in command of the Roman armies, though he visited Rome several times. He was sent into Germany A. D. 4, and the historian Velleius Paterculus accompanied him as praefectus equitum. Tiberius reduced all Illyricum to subjection A. D. 9; and in A. D. 12 he had the honour of a triumph at Rome for his German and Dalmatian victories. Tiberius displayed military talent during his transalpine campaigns; he maintained discipline in his army, and took care of the comforts of his soldiers. (In A. D. 14 Augustus held his last census, in which he had Tiberius for his colleague.)

Tiberius being sent to settle the affairs of Illyricum, Augustus accompanied him as far as Beneventum, but as the emperor was on his way back to Rome he died at Nola, on the 19th of August, A. D. 14. Tiberius was immediately summoned home by his mother Livia, who managed affairs so as to secure the power to her son, so far as such precaution was necessary. If nothing more had been known of Tiberius than his conduct during the lifetime of the emperor, he might have descended to posterity with no worse character than many other Romans. His access to power developed all the qualities which were not unknown to those who were acquainted with him, but which he hitherto had not been allowed their full play. He took the power which nobody was prepared to dispute with him, affecting all the while a great reluctance; and he declined the name of Pater Pandataria, and only took that of Augustus when he wrote to foreign princes. He began his reign by putting Postumus Agrippa to death, and he alleged that it was done pursuant to the command of Augustus (Tacit. Ann. i. 6.)

His conduct in other respects was marked by moderation and prudence; he rejected all flattery from the senate; he conferred offices according to merit, and he allowed persons to grow old in them. He endeavoured to relieve the scarcity of bread, a kind of complaint at Rome, which occurred at intervals, notwithstanding, and perhaps, in consequence of, the efforts of the government to secure it, and to throw it on the mariners. His mode of life was frugal, and without ostentatious display, and there was little to find fault with in him. (Dion Cass. iv. 2, &c.) He had got rid of Agrippa, who was the nearest rival, and who, if he had possessed merit, would have seemed to have a better title to the imperial power than Tiberius, for he was the son of Julia. Germanicus was the son of his younger brother, and had a less direct claim than Tiberius; but Tiberius feared the virtues and the popularity of Germanicus, and so long as he felt that Germanicus might be a rival, his conduct was exceedingly circumspect. (Tacit. Ann. i. 14, 15.) When he felt himself sure in his place, he began to exercise his craft. He took from the popular assembly the election of the magistrates, and transferred it to the senate, for this is what Tacitus means in the passage of the Annals just referred to: the popular assembly still enacted laws, though the consults of the senate were the ordinary form of legislation from the time of the accession of Tiberius. The emperor limited himself to the recommendation of four candidates annually to the senate, who of course were elected; and he allowed the senate to choose the rest. He also nominated the consuls.

The news of the death of Augustus roused a mutiny among the legions in Pannonia, which was quelled by Drusus, the son of Tiberius, aided by the terrors of an eclipse which happened very opportunely (27th September, A. D. 14). The armies on the Rhine under Germanicus showed a disposition to reject Tiberius, and a mutinous spirit, and if Germanicus had been inclined to try the fortune of a campaign, he might have had the assistance of the German armies against his uncle. But Germanicus restored discipline to the army by his firmness, and maintained his fidelity to the new emperor. Tiberius, however, was not yet free from his fears, and he looked with suspicion on Germanicus and his high-spirited wife Agrippina, who was also disliked by Livia, the mother of Tiberius. The first year of his reign was marked by the death of Julia, whom Augustus had removed from Pandataria to Rhegium; her husband deprived her of the allowance that she had from her father, and allowed her to pine away in destitution. One of her lovers, Sempronius Gracchus, who was living in exile in a small island on the coast of Africa, was by the order of Tiberius put to death. (Tacit. Ann. i. 53.)

Germanicus (A. D. 15) continued the Germanic war, though with no important results, but Agrippina's courage on atrying occasion aroused the emperor's suspicion, and he had now a man about him, Sejanus, who worked on the emperor's suspicious temper for his own sinister purposes [Sejanus]. It became common at this time to listen to informations of treason or lese majestas against the emperor; and persons were accused not of acts only, but words, and even the most indifferent matters were made the ground of such charges. Thus was established a pestilent class of men, under the name of Delatores, who became a terrible means of injustice and oppression (Tacit. Ann. i. 73), and enriched themselves at the expense of their victims by encouraging the cruel suspicions of the emperor. In the lifetime of Augustus, Tiberius had urged the emperor to punish those who spoke disrespectfully of the emperor, but his more prudent step-father, content with real power and security, allowed the Romans to indulge their taste for satire and parasitism, which the age of Augustus had fostered. Tiberius followed this wise advice for a time, and made great profession of allowing liberty of speech, but his real temper at last prevailed, and the slightest pretence was sufficient to found a charge of lese majestas (Sueton. Tiber. c. 28). He paid unwillingly and tardily the legacies left by Augustus to the people, and he began his payment with an act of cruelty, which was not the better for being seasoned with humour (Sueton. Tiber. c. 57; Dion Cass. iv. 14, tells the same story).

Vonones, the son of Phraates, once a hostage at Rome, had been invited back to his Parthian kingdom in the time of Augustus, but Artabanus of the royal house of the Arsacidae drove him out (A. D. 16), and he sought refuge in Armenia, which being then without a king accepted Vonones. The new king however was unable to maintain himself against a threatened attack of Artabanus. Tiberius did not wish to get into a quarrel with Artabanus, by giving Vonones aid, and the exiled king took refuge with Creticus Silanus, governor of Syria. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 12.) Germanicus was carrying on the war with success in Germany, and Tiberius, who had long been jealous of his rising fame, recalled him to Rome under the pretext of giving him a triumph. It seems somewhat inconsistent that Tiberius who was addicted to astrology and divination should have allowed this class of impostors to be banished from Italy (Tacit. Ann. ii. 32); this, however, was one of the events of this year.

Germanicus enjoyed (26th of May A. D. 17) the triumph which had been decreed. Tiberius added to the Roman empire the kingdom of Cappadocia, the last king of which, Archeleans, had been summoned to Rome, and died there, probably of old age and grief combined, after being accused of some frivolous matters before the senate. Tiberius was enabled by the produce of the new province to reduce the tax of one per cent. on auctions to one half per cent. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 42.) The state affairs in the East, where the kingdoms of Commagene and Cilicia were disturbed by civil disensions and Syria and Judæa were uneasy at the weight of taxation, gave Tiberius an opportunity of removing Germanicus from Rome by conferring on him by a decree of the senate the government of the East. Drusus, the son of Tiberius, was sent into Illyricum. This year is memorable for the great earthquake in Asia, the greatest on record at the time when it happened, and the more destructive from having happened by night. Twelve cities were damaged or destroyed, the earth opened and swallowed up the living, and even southern Italy and Sicily felt the terrific shock. Sardes suffered the most of the twelve cities. The emperor alleviated the calamity by his bounty, and in the case of Sardes by a remission of all payment to the aerarium or fiscus for five years. It is just to commemorate his refusal to take testimonial bequests, when not made by persons who were on terms of intimacy with him; but the emperor did not want money, nor yet prudence; and it was not prudent to be taking money from every body, even those of no character. In this year died Titus Livius, the historian, and Ovid in his exile at Tomi.*

Germanicus restored quiet to Armenia (A. D. 18) by crowning with his own hands Artaxias as king in the city of Artaxata. His administration of the East was prudent and successful, but he died in Syria A. D. 19, and the dislike of Tiberius and the enmity of Gnaeus Piso, the governor of Syria, gave credence to the report that Germanicus was poisoned. About this time Marobodus, king of the Suevi, being driven from his states by Roman intrigues, crossed the Danube, came to Italy and settled at Ravenna. A Thracian king Rhescuporis, who had married and his nephew Cotys, who was king of part of Thrace, wrote to Tiberius to inform him that Cotys had been punished for his treachery. Tiberius artfully got Rhescuporis into his power, and had him brought to Rome, where he was convicted by the senate, and Thrace was divided between the son of Rhescuporis and the children of Cotys. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 64.)

A regard to external decency was one of the characteristics of the reign of Tiberius, and a decree of the senate was made against certain classes of women who professed the occupation of courtesans. (Sueton. Tiber. c. 35; Tacit. Ann. ii. 85.) But religious tolerance was not one of the merits of the time of Tiberius; a senatus consultum imposed penalties on those who practised the ceremonial of the Egyptian or Jewish worship, though this was not the first example of the kind of intolerance at Rome. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 85; compare Seneca, Ep. 108.) This year was memorable for the appearance of an apparition of the city near Delos. (Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 87.)

In the spring of A. D. 20 Agrippina landed at Brundisium with the ashes of her husband. The remains of Germanicus received a public interment, but Tiberius and Livia did not show themselves, for which Tacitus assigns a reason, which may be true or false. (Ann. iii. 3.) Piso, who came to Rome, was accused before the senate of having taken the life of Germanicus. There was strong suspicion, but little or no proof; yet Piso, seeing that Tiberius gave him no support, released himself by a voluntary death, or was put to death by order of Tiberius. His wife Plancina, who was guilty if her husband was, escaped through the influence of Livia. There is certainly strong reason to believe that in this matter of the death of Germanicus as well as of Piso, Tiberius was guilty (Tacit. Ann. iii. 16), though Tacitus does not pronounce a positive opinion. Tiberius gave Julia, the daughter of his son Drusus, in marriage to Nero, the eldest son of Germanicus, which was a popular measure. He also moderated the penalties which the Lex Papia, passed in the time of Augustus, imposed on unmarried persons, with the double purpose of encouraging matrimony and filling the aerarium. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 25.)

The year A. D. 21 was the fourth consulship of Tiberius, and the second of his son Drusus Caesar, but it was considered a bad omen for Drusus, because all those who had been his father's colleagues in the consulship had come to a violent death. A great revolt broke out this year headed by Julius Florus, at Trèves on the Mosel, and by Julius Sacrovir, among the Aedui. The alleged grounds of the revolt were the heavy taxation, and the oppression of the Roman governors. Sacrovir mustered forty thousand men at Autun (Augustodunum), eight thousand of whom were furnished with the arms of the legionary soldiers, which had been secretly fabricated, and the rest had staves, knives, and other implements of the huntsman. The rising was not unlike the style of insurrection that has often shown itself in France since 1789. The rebellion was put down; and Florus and Sacrovir only escaped from the Romans by dying by their own hands. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 40.)

The principle of treason against the princes (aesa majestas) was already established under Tiberius in its utmost extent, for C. Lutarius Priscus was condemned by the senate for having written a poem upon the death of Drusus, in anticipadeath of Germanicus, and again when his mother Livia died. Tiberius allowed the cities of Asia to erect a temple to himself and his mother at Smyrna, the first instance of this flattery which he had permitted. But when the province of Hispania Ulterior asked permission to do the same thing, the emperor refused, and stated his reason in an oration to the senate, which is characterised by modesty and good sense. This singular man had a sound judgment, and if we formed our opinion of him from his words only, we should place him among the wisest and best of the Roman emperors. His measures too were often prudent and beneficial; and yet such was his insincerity, that we can hardly know when to give him credit even for a good action.

Tacitus, who had given the Romans so much trouble, was at last defeated and killed by the proconsul P. Cornelius Dolabella (A. d. 24); but Dolabella did not obtain the triumphal honours, though with inferior forces he had accomplished that which his predecessors had in vain attempted: this was owing to the influence of Sejanus, who was unwilling that the glories of his uncle Blaesus should be eclipsed by honours conferred on Dolabella. The system of delations was now in full activity, and Rome witnessed the scandalous spectacle of a son accusing his father, Q. Vibilius Sernus, of a conspiracy against the emperor, without being able to prove any thing against him. The abject senate condemned Sernus to death, but Tiberius used his tribunitian power to prevent the execution of the capital sentence, and the man against whom nothing could be proved even by putting his slaves to the torture, was banished to the island of Amorgus. Sexilius Cornelius, who had been charged with being an accomplice of Sernus, committed suicide. On this occasion a motion was made in the senate for giving no reward to informers, if the person accused of treason should die by his own hand before sentence was pronounced; but Tiberius, seeing that this would weaken one of his engines of state-craft, in harsh terms, and contrary to his practice, openly maintained the cause of the informers; such a measure as the senate proposed would, he said, render the laws ineffectual and put the state in jeopardy; they had better subvert all law than deprive the law of its guardians. Tiberius, always fearing enemies, thought his safety consisted in encouraging informers; here he spoke out fairly, and revealed one of his secrets of governing. Cremutius Cordus had written Annals, in which he had condemned Brutus and Cassius: he was accused, and as he had made up his mind to die, he spoke boldly in his defence. After going out of the senate house he starved himself to death; the senate ordered the aediles to search for his works and burn them, but all the copies were not discovered, and his Annals were extant when Tacitus wrote (Ann. iv. 35).

In the year A. d. 26 Tiberius left Rome, and never returned, though he came sometimes close to the walls of the city. He left on the pretext of dedicating temples in Campania, but his real motives were his dislike to Rome, where he heard a great deplorable that was disagreeable to him, and his wish to indulge his sensual propensities in private. Sejanus may have contributed to this resolution of leaving Rome, as it is said, but Tiberius still continued to reside out of Rome for six years after the death of Sejanus. (Tacit. Ann. iv. 57.) A great accident happened at Eideae in the following year: a man named Attilus built a temporary amphitheatre, for the exhibition of a show of gladiators, but being ill-constructed, it fell down during the games, and twenty thousand people, it is said, were killed (Tacit. Ann. iv. 62; compare Sueton. Tiber. 40). Attilus was banished. About this time a great conflagration destroyed all the buildings on the Mons Caelius, and the emperor liberally relieved the sufferers in proportion to their losses, a measure which procured him the good-will of the people. His dislike of publicity was shown during his residence in Campania, by an edict which commanded the people not to disturb his retirement, and he prevented all assemblages of people by placing soldiers in various posts. In order, however, to secure the retirement which he loved, he sent (A. d. 27) to the island of Capri (Caprean), which is about three miles from the promontory of Surrento. This retreat was further recommended by having an almost inaccessible coast. A poor fisherman, who had caught a large mullet, with difficulty made his way up the rocks to present it to the emperor, who rewarded him by ordering his face to be well rubbed with the fish. (Sueton. Tiber. c. 60.)

The new year (A. d. 28) was opened with the death of Titus Sabinus, a friend of Germanicus, whom Latinius Latialis had inveigled into very strong expressions against Sejanus and Tiberius, while he had placed persons in secret to be witnesses. The villains informed Tiberius of the words of Sabinus, and at the same time of their own treachery. The emperor let the senate know his wishes, and this servile body immediately put Sabinus to death, for which they received the thanks of Tiberius. (Tacit. Ann. iv. 68.) In this year Tiberius married Agrippina, a daughter of Germanicus, to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and the result of this union was the emperor Nero [Nero]. The death of Livia (A. d. 29), the emperor's mother, released Tiberius from one cause of anxiety. He had long been tired of her, because she wished to exercise authority, and one object in leaving Rome was to be out of her way. He did not visit her in her last illness, nor come to the funeral, being, as he said, overwhelmed with public affairs, who neglected all important affairs, and devoted himself to his solitary pleasures. (Tacit. Ann. v. 2; Dion Cass. livii. 2.) Livia's death gave Sejanus and Tiberius free scope, for Tiberius never entirely released himself from a kind of subjection to his mother, and Sejanus did not venture to attempt the overthrow of Livia's influence. The destruction of Agrippina and her children was now the chief purpose of Sejanus, who had his own ambitious projects to serve, as it is shown in his life [SEJANUS; AGRIPPINA]; he finally got from the tyrant the reward that was his just desert, an ignominious death.

In A. d. 32 Latinius Latialis, the infamous accuser of Sabinus, was executed. Cotta Messalinus, a notorious scoundrel, was accused before the senate, but Tiberius wrote to them in his favour. This memorable letter (Tacit. Ann. iv. 6) began with an admission, the truth of which will not surprise any one; but it is somewhat singular, that so profound a dissenter as Tiberius could not keep to himself the consciousness of his own wretchedness: "What to write to you, P. C., or how to write, I know not; and what not to write at this time, may all the gods and goddesses torment me more, than I daily fear that I am suffering, if I do know." This artful tyrant knew how to submit to what he could not help: M. Terentius was charged before the senate with being a friend of Sejanus, and he boldly avowed it. His course saved him from death, his accusers were punished, and Tiberius approved of the acquittal of Terentius (Dion Cass. vili. 19). The emperor also prudently took no notice of an insult of the praetor L. Sejanus, the object of which was to ridicule the emperor's person. [Sejanus, L.] Tiberius now left his retreat for Campania, and he came as far as his gardens on the Vatican; but he did not enter the city, and he placed soldiers to prevent any one coming near him. Old age and debauchery had bent his body, and covered his face with ugly blotches, which made him still more unwilling to show himself; and his taste for obscene pleasures, which grew upon him, made him court solitude still more.

One of the consuls of the year A. D. 33 was Serv. Sulpicius Galba, afterwards emperor. A great number of informers in this year pressed for the prosecution of those who had lent money contrary to a law of the dictator Caesar. The Romans never could understand that money must be treated as a commodity, and from the time of the Twelve Tables they had always interfered with the free trade in money, and without success. The law of Caesar was enforced, but as many of the senators had violated it, eighteen months were allowed to persons to settle their affairs, so as to bring them clear of the penalties of the lex. The consequence was great confusion in the money market, as every creditor was pressing for payment, and people were threatened with ruin by a forced sale of their property, to meet their engagements. The emperor relieved this distress by loans of public money, on security of land, and without interest. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 17.)

The death of Sex. Marius, once a friend of Tiberius, is given by Dion Cassius (ivi. 22), as an example of the emperor's cruelty. Marius had a handsome daughter, whom he removed to a distance, to save her from the lust of his imperial friend. Upon this he was accused of incestuous commerce with his own daughter, and put to death; and the emperor took possession of his gold mines, though they had been declared public property. The prisons, which were filled with the friends or supposed friends of Sejanus, were emptied by a general massacre of men, women, and children, whose bodies were thrown into the Tiber.

About this time, when the emperor was returning to Capreae, he married Claudia, the daughter of M. Silanus, to C. Caesar, the son of Germanicus, a youth whose early years gave ample promise of what he would be and what he was, as the emperor Caligula. Asinius Gallus, the son of Asinius Pollio, and the husband of Vipsania, the divorced wife of Tiberius, died this year of hunger, either voluntarily or by constraint. Drusus, the son of Germanicus, and his mother Agrippina, also died at this time. The death of Agrippina brought on the death of Flaccina, the wife of Cn. Piso, for Livia being dead, who protected her, and Agrippina, who was her enemy, there was now no reason why justice should not have its course; yet it does not appear what evidence there was against her. Planina escaped a public execution by voluntary death. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 26.)

In the year A. D. 33 Jesus Christ suffered under Pontius Pilatus, in Judæa. [Pontius Pilatus.]

It became the fashion in the time of Tiberius either for the accused or the accuser to be punished; and there was perhaps justice in it at such a time. Abudius Rufus made it a charge against L. Gaetulicus, the son of whom he had served, that Gaetulicus had designed to give his daughter to the son of Sejanus, and Abudius was banished from the city. Gaetulicus was at that time in command of the legions in Upper Germany, and he is said to have written a letter to Tiberius, from which the emperor might learn that a general at the head of an army, by whom he was beloved, was not to be treated like a man who was within the walls of Rome.

Artaxias, whom Germanicus had placed on the throne of Armenia, was now dead, and Artabanus, king of the Parthians, had put his eldest son, Arsaces, on the throne. But Artabanus had enemies around him, who sent a secret message to Rome to ask the emperor to send them Phraates for their king, whom his father Phraates had given as a hostage to Augustus. Phraates was sent, but he died in Syria, upon which Tiberius nominated Tridates, who was of the same family, and he sent L. Vitellius to direct affairs in the East (A. D. 33). It was the policy of Tiberius to give employment to Artabanus by raising up enemies against him at home, rather than by employing the arms of Rome against him. [Tridates; Artabanus.]

Rome was still the scene of tragic occurrences. Vibulenus Agrippa, who was accused before the senate, after his accusers had finished their charge against him took poison in the senate-house, and fell down in the agonies of death; yet he was dragged off to prison, and strangled though life was already extinct. Tigranes, once king of Armenia, who was then at Rome, was also accused and put to death. In the same year (A. D. 36) a conflagration at Rome destroyed a part of the Circus to the Aventine hill, and the houses on the Aventine also; but the emperor paid the owners of property to the full amount of their losses.

Tiberius, now in his seventy-eighth year, had hitherto enjoyed good health; and he was about to put an end to the career of publicans, and to ridicule those who, after reaching the age of thirty, required the advice of a doctor to tell them what was useful or injurious to their health. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 46.) But he was now attacked with a slow disease, which seized him at Astura, whence he travelled to Circeii, and thence to Misenum, to end his life in the villa of Lucullus. He concealed his sufferings as much as he could, and went on eating and indulging himself as usual. But Charicles, his physician, took the opportunity of feeling the old man's pulse, and told those about him that he would not last two days. No successor was yet appointed. Tiberius had a grandson, Tiberius Nero Gemellus, who was only seventeen, and too young to direct affairs. Caligus, the son of Germanicus, was older and beloved by the people; but Tiberius did not like him. He thought of Claudius, the brother of Germanicus, as a successor, but Claudius was too weak of understanding. Accordingly, says Tacitus, he made no declaration of his will, but left it to fate to determine his successor. Dion Cassius says (ivi. 23) that he named C. Caligula, because he knew his bad disposition; but this is always Dion's fashion. Suetonius (Tiber. c. 76) says that he made a will two years before his death, in which he instituted Caius and Tiberius Gemellus his coheredes, with mutual substitution; and this will might be a disposition of the empire as well as of his private property. Caius had for some time employed all his artifices to win the favour of the emperor, and also that of Macro, who was now all-powerful with the emperor. It seems that Tiberius certainly did not like Caius, and if he had lived longer, he would probably have put him to death, and given the empire to his grandson.

On the sixteenth of March a. d. 37, Tiberius had a fainting fit, and was supposed to be dead, on which Caius came forth and was saluted as emperor; but he was alarmed by the intelligence that Tiberius had recovered and called for something to eat. Caius was so frightened that he did not know what to do, and was every moment expecting to be put to death; but Macro, with more presence of mind, gave orders that a quantity of clothes should be thrown on Tiberius, and that he should be left alone. Thus Tiberius ended his life. Suetonius, quoting Seneca, gives a somewhat different account of his death. Tiberius reigned twenty-two years, six months, and twenty-six days. His body was taken to Rome, and his funeral ceremony was conducted with the usual pomp. His successor Caligula pronounced the oration, but he spoke less of Tiberius than of Augustus, Germanicus, and himself. Tiberius did not receive divine honours, like Augustus. Tacitus (Ann. vi. 51) has given, in a few words, his character, the true nature of which was not fully shown till he was released from all restraint. He was probably one of those men who, in a private station, might have been as good as most men are, for it is fortunate for mankind that few have the opportunity and the temptation which unlimited power gives.

In the time of Tiberius lived Valerius Maximus, Velleius Paterculus, Phaedrus, Fenestella, and Strabo; also the jurist Mæsiurus Sabinius, M. Coccio sur, Nerva, and others.

Tiberius wrote a brief commentary of his own life (Sueton. Tiber. c. 61), the only book that the emperor Domitian studied: Suetonius made use of it for his life of Tiberius. Suetonius also made use of various letters of Tiberius to princes and others, and his Orationes to the senate. Tiberius made several public orations, such as that on his father, delivered when he was nine years old, but this we must assume to have been written by somebody else; the funeral oration of Augustus; that on Maroboduus, delivered before the senate a. d. 19, was extant when Tacitus wrote (Ann. ii. 63). Tiberius also wrote Greek poems, and a lyric poem on the Death of L. Caeser.

COIN OF TIBERIUS.

TIBERIUS II., emperor of the East a. d. 570—572. His full name was ANIUSIUS THRAX, FLAVUS CONSTANTINUS. He was captain of the guards to the emperor Justinus II., whom he elevated to the rank of Caesar or Augustus, a. d. 574. He was a native of Thrace, whence he has the addition of Thrax to his name. He assumed the name of Constantinus after he became emperor. The date of his birth is uncertain. He was brought up at the court of Justinian, and employed by Justinian II., who succeeded Justinian a. d. 565. In a. d. 573 Tiberius commanded the imperial troops against the Avars, in the neighbourhood of the Save and the Danube. He lost one battle against them, but he soon recovered this failure, and secured for the empire the possession of Sirmium, near the junction of the Save and the Danube. Justinian, seeing himself incompetent for the labour of administration, associated Tiberius with him, and it is said that the infirmity of Sophia, who admired the hands-ome captain, contributed to determine the emperor's choice. The speech which the emperor addressed to Tiberius on this occasion is preserved by Theophylactus Simocatta, and has been translated by Gibbon: it contained wise advice, and Tiberius followed it. Justinian survived this ceremony four years, during which the weight of administration fell on Tiberius alone.

The Longobards were now in Italy, but a war with Persia prevented Tiberius from directing all his attention to the situation. Yet he maintained his authority in the exarchate of Ravenna, and in other parts of Italy, and he saved Pelagius II., the pope of Rome, and the Roman citizens, from the Longobards, by a timely supply of provisions, which were forwarded by a fleet. To check the progress of the Longobards in the north of Italy, he concluded an alliance some years later with Chosroes the Great King of the Franks. The war with Chosroes, king of Persia, demanded all the resources of Tiberius. In a. d. 576, Justinian, who was in command of the armies of the Eastern Empire, crossed the Bosporus with a force of 150,000 men, to relieve Theodosiopolis in Armenia, which was defended by Theodorus, a Byzantine general. This force comprehended a great number of Germans and Slavoni-ans. A battle was fought with Chosroes near Meliteine in Armenia, in which the Persians were defeated, and many of them perished in the En- phrates. An immense booty, carried by twenty-four elephants, was brought to Constantinople. Justinian is said to have advanced into the very centre of the Persian empire, and was about concluding a treaty with Chosroes, but it was interrupted by some advantage gained over Justinian by one of the generals of Chosroes. Justinian was recalled, and Mauricius, afterwards the successor of Tiberius was appointed to command in his place. Mauricius secured himself against sudden attacks by adopting the old Roman plan of never resting, except in an entrenched camp. The winter (a. d. 577—578) Mauricius spent in Mesopotamia.

Justinus died on the fifth of October a. d. 578, and Tiberius was now sole emperor. Sophia, it is said, hoped to become the wife of Tiberius, but when the people in the Hippodrome called for the new empress, Tiberius produced as his wife Ana-stasis, to whom he had been for some time secretly married. Sophia, though treated with respect by the new emperor, and enjoying an ample allowance, could not forget her disappointment, and she is said to have induced Justinian to conspire with her to overthrow the man whom she had loved. The plot was discovered: Sophia was deprived of all power of doing further mischief, and Justinian, who was pardoned, became a faithful friend of Tiberius.

In A.D. 579 Chosroes, the Persian, was succeeded by Hormisdas, and the war began again. Mauricius defeated the Persians, overran a large part of Persia, and in a bloody contest on the Ephrates, A.D. 589, gave the forces of Hormisdas a most signal defeat; and again in the following year. In Africa, which had long been disturbed by the natives, Gennadius, the exarch of Ravenna, defeated (A.D. 580) Gasmul, king of the Mauritani. Mauricius enjoyed a triumph at Constantinople for his Persian victories, A.D. 581, and in August of that year, Tiberius, whose health was rapidly failing, raised him to the dignity of Caesar, having no sons of his own. He also gave him his daughter Constantina in marriage. Tiberius died on the 14th of August, A.D. 582, and was succeeded by Mauricius.

Tiberius was universally regretted. By an economical administration he diminished the taxation of his subjects, and always had his treasury full. There were at least six constitutions of the emperor Tiberius; three of which (Nos. 1, 163, 164) form part of the collection of 168 known, one is found by itself in the Venice manuscript, the fifth is lost, and the sixth only exists in Latin. The constitution (No. 163, Per Io kouftamian ovtos, of the Diminution of Taxes,) expresses a human desire to relieve the people from their burdens, combined with a prudent regard to supply the necessary demands of the state. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. 45, who also gives the references to the authorities for the reign of Tiberius; Morreuil, Hist. du Droit Byzantin, vol. i. p. 81.) [G. L.]

TIBERIUS ABSIMARUS, who held the command of the Cibyrates in the fleet of Leontius II., was proclaimed emperor by the mutinous soldiers and sailors, and, returning to Constantinople, he usurped the throne and put Leontius in prison, A.D. 686. [Leontius II.] The usurper added to his name Absimarus, the respected name of Tiberius. His brother Hencius, whom he appointed to conduct the war against the Arabs, invaded Syria (A.D. 695-700), and treated the inhabitants with the most inhuman cruelty. The events of this usurper's reign are unimportant. The strangeness of his rise was only equalled by the suddenness of his fall, and by the restoration to the imperial throne of Justinian II. (A.D. 704), who had been expelled by Leontius [Justini- anus II.,] as Leontius was expelled by Tiberius. [G. L.]

TIBERIUS ALEXANDER. [ALEXANDER.] TIBERIUS, literary. 1. A philosopher and sophist, of unknown time, the author of numerous works on grammar and rhetoric, the titles of which are given by Suidas, and of commentaries on Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Demosthenes. One of his works, on the figures in the odes of Demosthenes (περὶ τῶν παρὰ δημοσθείνου σχημάτων), is still extant, and has been published in the Rhetorica Graeci of Thomas Gale, Oxford, 1676, 8vo., Lips. 1773, 8vo.; and separately by Bois- sonade, Lond. Valpy, 1815, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. p. 118; Classical Journal, No. 23, pp. 198—204.)

TIBERIUS, a veterinary surgeon, who may perhaps have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. He wrote some works, of which only fragments remain, which are to be found in the collection of writers on veterinary surgery, first published in Latin in J. Rueillus, Paris, 1530. fol., and in Greek by S. Gryneuus, Basil. 1537. 4to. [W. A. G.]

TIBODETES (Tibodret), an uncle of Prusias I., king of Bithynia, was living in Macedonia in the early part of the reign of Prusias, and was sent for by the Byzantines in c. c. 220, as they wished to set him up as a competitor for the throne of Bithynia; but he died on his journey from Macedonia. (Polyb. iv. 50—52.)

TIBULUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

TIBULUS, ALBIUS (his praenomen is unknown), was of equestrian family. The date of his birth is uncertain: it is assigned by Voss, Passow, and Dissen to n. c. 59, by Lachman and Paldamus to n. c. 54; but he died young (according to the old life by Hieronymus Alexanderinus, in flor. juventutis) soon after Virgil (Domitius Marsus in Epigrammate).

"Te quoque Virgili comitem non aequa, Tibulle, Mors juvenem campos misit ad Elysiam."

But as Virgil died n. c. 19, if Tibullus died the year after, n. c. 18, he would even then have been 36. The later date therefore is more probable. Of the youth and education of Tibullus, absolutely nothing is known. His late editor and biographer, Dissen, has endeavoured to make out from his writings, that according to the law, which compelled the son of an equest to perform a certain period of military service (formerly ten years), Tibullus was forced, strongly against his will, to become a soldier. This notion is founded on the tenth elegy of the first book, in which the poet expresses a most un-Roman aversion to war. He is dragged to war, "Some enemy is already girt with the arms with which he is to be mortally wounded (l. 13.) Let others have the fame of valour; he would be content to hear old soldiers recite their campaigns around his hospital board, and draw their battles on the table with their wine." (l. 29, 32.) But this Elegy is too perfectly finished for a boiyash poem; by no means marks its date in any period of the poet's life; and intimates rather that he was, at the time when it was written, quietly settled on his own patrimonial estate.

That estate, belonging to the equestrian ancestors of Tibullus, was at Pedum, between Tibur and Praeneste. This property, like that of the other great poets of the day, Virgil and Horace, had been either entirely or partially confiscated during the civil wars; yet Tibullus retained or recovered part of it, and spent there the better portion of his short, but peaceful and happy life. He describes most gracefully, in his first elegy, his reduced fortunes. "His household gods had once been the guardians of a flourishing, they were now of a poor family (l. 19, 20.). A single lamb was now the sacrifice of that household, which used to offer a calf chosen from among countless heifers. On this estate he had been brought up, as a child he had played before the simple wooden images of the same Lares.”

The first elegy shows likewise Tibullus already on intimate terms with his great patron Messala, to whom he may have owed the restoration in part of his paternal estate. But in his love of peace, and the soft enjoyments of peace, he declines to follow Messala to war, though that war was the strife for empire between Octavian and Antony, which closed with the battle of Actium.

But when Messala immediately after that victory (in the autumn of B. C. 31), was detained by Caesar to prevent a formidable insurrection which had broken out in Aquitaine, Tibullus overcame his repugnance to arms, and accompanied his friend or patron in the honourable post of contubernalis (a kind of aide-de-camp) into Gaul. Part of the glory of the Aquitanian campaign (described by Appian, B. C. iv. 33) for which Messala four years later (B. C. 27) obtained a triumph, and which Tibullus celebrates in language of unwonted loftiness, redounds, according to the poet, to his own fame. He was present at the battle of Atax (Aude in Languedoc), which broke the Aquitanian rebellion. Messala, it is probable, went round the province to receive the submission of all the Gaulish tribes, and was accompanied in his triumphant journey by Tibullus. The poet invokes, as witnesses of his fame, the Pyrenean mountains, the shores of the sea in Xaintonge, the Saone, the Garonne, and the Loire, in the country of the Carnutii (near Orleans). In the autumn of the following year (B. C. 30) Messala, having pacified Gaul, was sent into the East to organise that part of the empire under the sole dominion of Octavian. Tibullus set out in his company, but was taken ill, and obliged to remain in Corecyra (Eleg. ii. 3), from whence he returned to Rome.

So ceased the active life of Tibullus: he retired to the peace for which he had yearned; his life is now the chronicle of his poetry and of those tender passions which were the inspiration of his poetry. The first object of his attachment is celebrated under the poetic name of Delia; it is supposed (Apul. Apolog. 106, but the reading is doubtful) that her real name was Plancia or Plautia, or, as has been plausibly conjectured, Plinia, of which the Greek Delia was a translation. To Delia are addressed the first six elegies of the first book. She seems to have belonged to that class of females of the middle order, not of good family, but above poverty, which answered to the Greek hetairae.

The poet’s attachment to Delia had begun before he left Rome for Aquitaine. His ambition seems to have been to retire with her, as his mistrees, into the country, and pass the rest of his life in quiet enjoyment. But Delia seems to have been faithless during his absence from Rome; and admitted other lovers. On his return from Corecyra, he found her ill, and attended her with affectionate solicitude (Eleg. i. 5), and again hoped to induce her to retire with him into the country. But first a richer lover appears to have supplanted him with the inconstant Delia; and afterwards there appears a husband in his way. The second book of Elegies is chiefly devoted to a new mistress named Nemesis. Besides these two mistresses (Christian morals command silence on another point) Tibullus was enamoured (his poems have all the signs of real, not of poetic passion) of a certain Glycera. He wrote elegies to soften that cruel beauty, whom there seems no reason to confound either with Delia, the object of his youthful attachment, or with Nemesis. Glycera, however, is not known to us from the poetry of Tibullus, but from the ode of Horace, which gently reproves him for dwelling so long in his plaintive elegies on the pitiless Glycera. Ovid, on the other hand, writing of the poetry of Tibullus, names only two objects of his passion:

Amor. iii. 9.

The poetry of his contemporaries shows Tibullus as a gentle and singularly amiable man. He was beautiful in person: Horace on this point confirms the strong language of the old biographers. To Horace especially he was an object of warm attachment. Besides the ode which alludes to his passion for Glycera (Hor. Carm. i. 33), the epistle of Horace to Tibullus gives the most full and pleasing view of his poetical retreat, and of his character: it is written by a kindred spirit. Horace does homage to that perfect purity of taste which distinguishes the poetry of Tibullus; he takes pride in the candid but favourable judgment of his own satires. The time of Tibullus he supposes to be shared between the finishing his exquisite small poems, which were to surpass even those of Cassius of Parma, up to that time the models of that kind of composition, and the enjoyment of the country. Tibullus possessed, according to his friend’s notions, all the blessings of life—a competent fortune, favour with the great, fame, health; and seemed to know how to enjoy all those blessings.

The two first books alone of the Elegies, under the name of Tibullus, are of undoubted authenticity. The third is the work of another, a very inferior poet, whether Lygdamus be a real or fictitious name or not. This poet was much younger than Tibullus, for he was born in the year of the battle of Matina, B. c. 43. The lines which convey this information seem necessary in their place, and cannot be considered as an interpolation. (Eleg. iii. 5. 17.) The hexameter poem on Messala, which opens the fourth book, is so bad that, although a successful elegiac poet may have failed when he attempted epic verse, it cannot well be ascribed to a writer of the exquisite taste of Tibullus. The smaller elegies of the fourth book have all the inimitable grace and simplicity of Tibullus. With the exception of the thirteenth (of which some lines are hardly surpassed by Tibullus himself) these poems relate to the love of a certain Sulpicia, a woman of noble birth, for Cerinthus, the real or fictitious name of a beautiful youth. Sulpicia seems to have belonged to the intimate society of Messala (Eleg. iv. 8). Nor is there any improbability in supposing that Tibullus may have written elegies in the name or by the desire of Sulpicia. If Sulpicia was herself the poetess, she approached nearer to Tibullus than any other writer of elegies.

The first book of Elegies alone seems to have been published during the author’s life, probably soon after the triumph of Messala (B. C. 27). The birthday of that great general gives the poet an occasion for describing all his victories in Gaul and in the East (Eleg. i. 7). In the second book he celebrates the cooptation of Messalina, the son of Messala, into the college of the Quinqueviri. But this second book no doubt did not appear till after the death of Tibullus. With it, according to our conjecture, may have been published the elegies of his imitator, perhaps his friend and associate in the society of Messala, Lygdamus (if that be a real name), i.e. the third book: and likewise the fourth, made up of poems belonging, as it were, to this intimate society of Messala, the Panegyric by some nameless author, which, feeble as it is, seems to belong to that age; the poems in the name of Sul-picia, with the conclusion one, the thirteenth, a fragment of Tibullus himself.

I. The first edition of Tibullus, with Catullus, Propertius, and the Silvae of Statius, 4to. maj., was printed at Venice by Vindelini de Spira, 1472.

II. The second, likewise, of these four authors at Venice, by John de Colonius, 1475.

III. The first of Tibullus, with only the Epistle of Ovid from Sappho to Phaon, by Florentius de Argentina, Venice (?) about 1472.

Of modern editions, that (VI.) of Vulpius, VII. that of Brookhuisus, were surpassed by the VIII. Tibullus à Heyne, 1st ed. Lipsiae, 1755. The second and third improved editions, 1777—1798.

We have selected these last from several other modern editions published in Germany. [H.H.M.]

L. TIBULLIUS, a centurion in the civil war b. c. 48. (Caes. B. C. iii. 19.)

TICCHONIUS. [Tyconius.]

L. TICIDA, one of Caesar's officers, was taken prisoner along with Q. Cominius in b. c. 46. (Hirt. B. Afr. 44, 46.) [Cominius, No. 7.]

TICIDA, a Roman poet, who wrote epigrams in which he spoke of his mistress under a fictitious name. (Ov. Trist. ii. 432; Suet. Gramm. 11.)

P. TICI'NIUS MENA, was the first person who introduced barbers into Italy from Sicily in the 454th year after the foundation of the city. (Varr. R. R. ii. 11, § 10; Plin. H. N. vii. 59.)

TIGELLI'NIUS, SOPH'O-NIUS, the son of a native of Agrigentum, owed his rise from poverty and obscurity to his handsome person and his unscrupulous character. He was banished to Scylia- ceum (Squillace) in Bruttii (A. D. 39—40), for an intrigue with Agrippina [AGrippina. No. 2] and Julia Livilla [Julia, No. 8], sisters of Caligula, and respectively the wives of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus [No. 10] and M. Vinicius, cos. A. D. 30. (Vet. Schol. in Juv. i. 155; Dion Cass. lxx. 23.)

Tigellinus was probably among the exiles restored by Agrippina, after she became empress, since early in Nero's reign he was again in favour in court, and on the death of Burrus ('A. D. 63) was appointed praetor- rian prefect jointly with Fenius Rufus. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 46, 52.) Tigellinus ministered to Nero's worst passions, and of all his favourites was the most obnoxious to the Roman people. He inflamed his jealousy or his avarice against the noblest members of the senate and the most plant dependants of the court. C. Rubellius Plantus—[Vol. II. p. 411], Cornelius Sulla, Minucius Thermus, and C. Petri- nius, Nero's master of the ceremonies, were successively his victims (Tac. Ann. xiv. 57, xvi. 18), and he actively promoted the emperor's divorce from Octavia and his marriage with Poppea, a. D. 63. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 60—64; Dion Cass. lxxi. 13.) In a. D. 68, Tigellinus entertained Nero, with his Aemilii, at a banquet, and was suppositiously unmasked even in that age, and in the same year shared with him the odium of burning Rome, since the conflagration had broken out on the scene of the banquet. (Tac. Ann. xv. 37—40; Dion Cass. lxxi. 15.) In the prosecutions that followed, the discovery of Piso's conspiracy in the following year, Nero found in Tigellinus an able and merciless agent for his revenge. Tigellinus attached himself to Poppea's faction, and it was said commonly in Rome, that the imperial privy-council (Tac. Ann. xv. 61) contained only three members, the praetorian prefect, Nero and his wife. The cruelty and rapacity of Tigellinus filled all ranks with dismay. "Pone Tigellinum," says Juvenal (i. 155) using his name proverbially, and the stake and faggot will be your portion. Annaeus Melius, the younger brother of Seneca the phil-osopher, was one only of many persons who be-queathed a large share of his property to Tigel- linus and his son-in-law, Cossumius Capito, that the residue might be secured to the rightful heirs (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17; Dion Cass. lxxii. 27), and those who escaped from the real or imputed guilt of conspiring with Piso owed their exemption, not to their innocence, but to their bribes. (Dion Cass. ib. 28.) It was probably about this time that Apollonius of Tyana was brought before Tigellinus on a charge of having traduced the emperor. But the philosopher managed to impress his judge with such a dread of his supernatural powers that he was dismissed unharmed. (Philostr. Ap. Tyan. iv. 42—44.) The history of Tigellinus is so inwoven with that of his master, that we may refer to the life of Nero and briefly add, that the minister pres- ided at the emperor's nuptials with Sporus, that he accompanied him to Greece, and distinguished himself everywhere by his vulgarity, his shame- lessness, and his rapacity. (Tac. Ann. xv. 58; Dion Cass. lxxi. 11, 12, 13.) He encouraged Nero to degrade the imperial dignity as a public singer on the stage, and contributed to his downfall as much by his own unpopularity as by pampering his master's vices. (Dion Cass. ib. 21.) Tigel- linus returned to Rome in a. D. 68, and shortly afterwards Nero was dethroned by the indignant legions and the long-suffering senate and people. In his deepest distress (Suet. Ner. 48) the em- peror retained some faithful adherents, but Tigel- linus was not of the number. He joined with Nymphidius Sabinius, who had succeeded Fenius Rufus as praetorian prefect, in transferring the allegiance of the soldiers to Galba. By large bribes to T. Vinius, Galba's freedman, and to Vinius's daughter he purchased a reprieve from the sentence which, on all occasions, the Roman people clamorously demanded, and he even obtained from Galba a decree relaxing the populace for their petition, and informing them that Tigellinus was sinking rapidly under consumption. On the accession of Otho, however, in January, a. D. 70, his doom was no longer to be eluded. A centurion and his company were despatched to Sinuessa, and Tigellinus, in the lap of luxury, and surrounded by the victims and ministers of his excesses, after a vain attempt to corrupt his executioners, perished by his own hand. (Tac. Hist, i. 72; PLut. Gall. 2, 13, 17, 19, 23, 29, Oth. 2; Dion Cass. ixiv. 3 Joseph. B. J. iv. 9, § 2; Suét. Gall, 15.) [W. B. D.]

TIGELLINIUS HERMOCÆNÆS. [HERMO-GENÈS,]

TIGRANES (Tryphænas), was the name of several kings of Armenia, of whom the first and greatest is also frequently reckoned among the kings of Syria. The Armenian or native form of the name is Dikran.

Tigranes I. was a descendant of Artaxias, the founder of the Armenian monarchy. According to Appian (Syri. 48) his father’s name was Tigranes, but no king of that name preceded his accession, and the native historians represent him as a son of Araxes or Artaxes. [Arsacidæ, Vol. i. p. 365.]

The statement of Plutarch that he had reigned twenty-five years when he received the first embassy of Lucullus in B. C. 71 (Plut. Lucull. 21), would fix the date of his accession in B. C. 96, but Appian (Midir. 15), perhaps inadvertently, alludes to him as already on the throne in B. C. 96. Of the early events of his reign we have very imperfect information. But it appears that he successively conquered Araxes or Aranes, king of Sophene, and several other petty princes, so that he united under his sway not only all Armenia, but several of the neighbouring provinces, and thus raised himself to a degree of power far superior to that enjoyed by any of his predecessors. Towards the commencement of his reign he appears to have been worsted by the Parthians, and was compelled to purchase a peace from those formidable neighbours by the cession of a considerable extent of territory. But at a later period he was not only able to recover possession of these districts, but invaded Parthia in his turn, and carried his arms as far as Ninus and Arbela, while he permanently annexed to his dominions the important provinces of Aratopetna and Gordyene. Inflicted by these successes, he assumed the pompous title of king of kings, and always appeared in public accompanied by some of his tributary princes as attendants (Strab. xi. p. 532; Plut. Lucull. 21; Appian, Syri. 48).

His power was at the same time greatly strengthened by his alliance with Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married at an early period of his reign. (Appian, Midir. 15; Plut. Lucull. 22.)

An additional field was now opened to his ambition by the dissensions which divided the Seleucidian princes of Syria. That country had been so long distracted by civil wars, that a large part of its inhabitants appear to have welcomed, if they did not invite, the foreign invader; Antiochus Eusebes was able to offer little opposition, and Tigranes made himself master without difficulty of the whole Syrian monarchy from the Euphrates to the sea, together with the dependent province of Cilicia. B. c. 83 (App. Syri. 48; Justin. xl. 1). He was now at the summit of his power, and con-vertic his retreat into a disorderly flight (Plut. Lucull. 22—23; Appian, Mithr. 84). But not withstanding this reverse, the mighty host which he was soon able to gather around his standard, inspired him again with the same overweening confidence, and he hastened to attack Lucullus in order to avert the fall of Tigranocerta. The event was decisive; the army of the Armenian king, though amounting according to the most authentic statement, to 55,000 horse and 150,000 regular infantry, besides light-armed troops, was totally routed by the small force under Lucullus; the king himself fled almost unattended from the field, and Tigranocerta was surrendered to the victorious general. (Plut. Lucull. 26—28; Appian, Mithr. 83, 86; Memnon, 56; Liv. Epit. xviii.; Eutrop. vi. 9; Oros. vi. 3.)

During the ensuing winter, while Lucullus was engaged in Gordiv, several of the neighbouring princes hastened to throw off the yoke of the Armenian king, and tender their submission to the Roman general. Among others, Antiochus (surnamed Asiaticus), the son of Antiochus Eu-sebes, presented himself to claim the throne of his fathers, and was reinstated, apparently without opposition, in the possession of the whole of Syria, where the yoke of Tigranes had long been odious to his Greek subjects (App. Syr. 49; Strab. xi. p. 552). Meanwhile Tigranes, in concert with Mithridates (with whom his disasters had brought him into closer relations), was using every exertion to assemble a fresh army, while they both endeavoured, though without success, to induce Phraates, king of Parthia, to make common cause with them (App. Mithr. 67; Dion Cass. xxxv. 3; Epist. Mithr. ap. Sull. Hist. iv. p. 238, ed. Gerlach). Failing in this they awaited the approach of Lucullus among the bleak highlands of Armenia, where he was not able to penetrate until late in the summer of 68. The two kings met him on the river Arasians, with an army less numerous, but better disciplined than that of the preceding year, but with equal ill success: they were again totally defeated, and it was only a mutiny among the troops of Lucullus that prevented him from making himself master of Arta-xta, the ancient capital of Armenia. But the spirit of disaffection which had by this time pervaded the Roman troops, hampered all the proceedings of their commander; and though in the ensuing winter Lucullus reduced the strong fortress of Nisibis in Mesopotamia, which was held by Guras, the brother of Tigranes, his subsequent movements were completely paralysed by the disobedience of his own soldiers. The two kings took advantage of this respite, and while Mithridates sought to recover his own dominions, Tigranes regained great part of Armenia, and defeated the Roman lieutenant L. Fabius, whose army was only saved by the arrival of Lucullus himself to his relief (Dion Cass. xxxv. 4—8; Plut. Lucull. 31—34). In the following year, also (n. c. 67), he was able to pour his troops into the provinces of Armenia Minor and Cappadocia without opposition, and Lucullus was unable to punish his audacity. (Dion Cass. xxxv. 14—15.)

The arrival of Pompey (n. c. 66) soon changed the face of events, and Mithridates, after repeated defeats, was again compelled to seek a refuge in Armenia. Meanwhile, a new enemy had arisen to the Armenian king in his own son Tigranes, who, having engaged in a conspiracy against the life of his father, and finding himself detected, fled for refuge to the Parthian king, Phraates. That monarch, who had recently concluded a treaty of alliance with Pompey, readily lent his support to the fugitive prince, and invaded Armenia with a large army, with which he advanced as far as Ar-taxata. But he was unable to reduce that city, and as soon as the Parthian king withdrew, Tigranes easily drove out his rebel son. It was at this juncture that Mithridates, after his final defeat by Pompey, once more threw himself upon the support of his son-in-law: but Tigranes, who suspected him of abetting the designs of his son, refused to receive him, and even set a price upon his head, while he himself hastened to make overtures of submission to Pompey. That general had already advanced into the heart of Armenia, and was approaching Arta-xata itself, under the guidance of the young Tigranes, when the old king repaired in person to the Roman camp, and presenting himself as a suppliant before Pompey, laid his tiara at his feet. By this act of humiliation he at once conciliated the favour of the conqueror, who treated him in a friendly manner, and left him in possession of Armenia Proper with the title of king, depriving him only of the provinces of Sophene and Gordyene, which he erected into a separate kingdom for his son Tigranes. The elder monarch was so overjoyed at obtaining these unexpectedly favourable terms, that he not only paid the sum of 6000 talents demanded by Pompey, but added a large sum as a donation to his army, and continued ever after the steadfast friend of the Roman general (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 33—36; Plut. Pompey. 32, 33; Appian, Mithr. 104, 105, Syr. 49; Vell. Pat. ii. 37). He soon reaped the advantage of this fidelity, as in n. c. 65 Pompey, on his return from the campaign against Oroesces, finding that the Parthian king Phraates had wrongfully occupied the province of Gordyene, sent his lieutenant Afranius to expel him, and restored the possession of it to Tigranes. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 5.)

The next year (n. c. 64) we find him again at war with the king of Parthia, but after several engagements with alternations of success, their differences were arranged by the mediation of Pompey, and the two monarchs concluded a treaty of peace (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 6, 7; App. Mithr. 106). This is the last event recorded to us of the reign of Tigranes: the exact date of his death is unknown, but we find him incidentally mentioned by Cicero (pro Sess. 27) as still alive and reigning in the spring of n. c. 56, while we know that he was succeeded by his son Artavasdes before the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians in n. c. 54 (Dion Cass. xl. 16). His death must therefore have occurred in this interval. The character of Tigranes seems to have in no respect differed from that of many other Eastern despots. It was marked by the most extravagant pride and overweening confidence in prosperity, as well as by the most abject humiliation in misfortune. He alienated not only his Greek subjects and dependent princes by his violent and arbitrary acts, but extended his cruelties even to his own family. Of his sons by the daughter of Mithri-dates, he put to death two upon various charges, while the civil wars in which he was engaged with the third have been already mentioned. Yet he seems not to have been altogether without a tincture of Greek cultivation; for we learn that he TIRIANNES.

TIRIANNES II., king of Armenia, was a son of ArTAVANDES I., and grandson of the preceding. He was living an exile at Rome, when a party of his countrymen, discontented with the rule of his elder brother, Artaxias, sent to request that he should be placed on the throne. To this Augustus assented, and Tiberius was charged with the duty of accomplishing it; a task which he effected apparently without opposition. Tigranes was put to death by some of the Armenians themselves. Tiberius placed the crown on the head of Tigranes with his own hand (b. c. 20), and then withdrew from Armenia (Tac. Ann. ii. 3; Dion Cass. liv. 9; Suet. Tib. 9; Mon. Anecr. pp. 35, 107, ed. Franz.; Joseph. Ant. xv. 4, § 3). No particulars are known of his reign, which was of short duration. (Tac. i. c.; Orell. ad loc.)

TIRIANNES III., king of Armenia, appears to have been a son of the preceding, and to have succeeded him on the throne for a short time: but the accounts transmitted to us of the revolutions of the Armenian monarchy at this period are very confused and unsatisfactory. (See Visconti, Iconographia Greca, iii. p. 30; and Orell. ad Tac. Ann. ii. 3.) According to a fragment of Dion Cassius, quoted by Visconti (l. c.) he perished in a war against the neighbouring barbarians.

TIRIANNES IV. Another king of this name who was placed on the throne by Augustus, after the death of Artavasdes, would seem to have been distinct from the preceding, as Augustus himself only terms him "a certain Tigranes who belonged to the royal family." (Mon. Anecr. p. 107.) He is not mentioned by any other historian.

For the later kings of Armenia of this name, see ARACDACAE. [E. H. B.]

TIRA'GNES (Trypios). 1. A son of the Armenian king who was conquered by Cyrus the Elder. According to Xenophon he had been a schoolfellow of Cyrus, and by his intercourse with that monarch, procured the pardon of his father, whose fidelity he thenceforth guaranteed. His name is afterwards repeatedly mentioned in the Cyropaedia among the friends and attendants of the Persian king (Xen. Cyrop. iii. 1, 2, v. 1, 3, viii. 3, § 25, 4, § 1.). In the Armenian historians Tigranes assumes a much more conspicuous characafforded protection to the Athenian rhetorician Amphiarctides, and had assembled a company of Greek players to celebrate the opening of a theatre in his new capital of Tigranocerta. (Plut. Lucull. 21, 22, 29; Appian, Mithr. 104.)

The coins of Tigranes, which were probably struck in Syria and bear Greek inscriptions, represent him with a tiara in the Oriental fashion, instead of the simple diadem of the Seleucidae.

COIN OF TIRIANNES.

2. A Persian of the royal race of the Achaemenidae, who commanded the Median troops in the army of Xerxes, with which he invaded Greece b. c. 480. After the defeat of the Persian king, Tigranes was appointed to command the army of 60,000 men, which was destined to maintain possession of Ionia. (Herod. vii. 62, ix. 96.)

3. One of the sons of Tigranes I., king of Armenia. He had at first enjoyed a high place in his father's favour, so that the latter had even bestowed on him the titles and ensigns of royalty. At a later period, however, he was gained over by the party disaffected to the old king, and joined in their intrigues; but the plot being discovered, he sought safety in flight, and took refuge with Phraates king of Parthia. That monarch readily embraced the opportunity, gave him his daughter in marriage, and invaded Armenia with a large army in order to place him on the throne. But the Parthian king was unable to reduce Artaxata, the capital of Armenia, and after some time returned into his own dominions, leaving a part only of his forces under Tigranes, who was quickly defeated by the superior arms of his father. He now however sought a refuge in the camp of Pompey, who was at this time (a. c. 66) in full advance upon Artaxata, and who welcomed the young prince with open arms. But when the elder Tigranes came in person to humble himself before the conqueror, Pompey was easily moved to clemency, and instead of placing the son upon his father's throne, left the latter in possession of the greater part of his dominions, while he erected the provinces of Sophene and Gordyene into a subordinate kingdom for the younger Tigranes. The prince had the imprudence to display openly his dissatisfaction with this arrangement; and not only absented himself from the festival which Pompey gave on the occasion, but soon after openly disobeyed the orders of the Roman general in regard to the disposal of his treasures. Hereupon Pompey caused him to be immediately arrested and detained as a prisoner. A few years later we find him among the captive princes who adored the triumph of the Roman conqueror, b. c. 61. (Appian, Mithr. 104, 105, 117; Dion Cass. xxxiii. 33–36; Plut. Pomp. 33, 45.) [E. H. B.]

TILLIUS CIMBER. [CIMBER.]

TILPHIUS (Τιλφούς). 1. The nymph of the well Tilphusa in Boeotia, which was sacred to Apollo. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 247; Strab. ix. p. 410, &c.; Apollod. iii. 7, § 8.)

2. A surname of the Erinnyes by whom Arés became the father of the dragon which was slain by Cadmus. (Müller, Orchom. p. 142, 23 ed.) [L. S.]

TIMAFEA (Τιμάφεα), wife of Agis II., king of Sparta. [Agis II.]

TIMAE'NEUS (Τιμαίνεως), a painter, whose picture of a wrestler, in the chamber of the left of the propylaea of the Acropolis at Athens, is mentioned by Pausanias (i. 22, § 7). [P. S.]

TIMAFUS (Τιμαύος). 1. Of Tauromenium in Sicily, the celebrated historian, was the son of Andromachus, who collected the Naxian exiles, after their city had been destroyed by Dionysius, and settled them in the town of Tauromenium, which had been recently founded, and of which he became the tyrant, or supreme ruler, v. c. 358 (Diod. xvi. 7, comp. xiv. 59, with Wesseling's note). Andromachus received Timoleon at Tauromenium, when he came to Sicily in v. c. 344, and he was almost the only one of the tyrants whom Timoleon left in possession of their power (Plut. Tim. 10 ; Marcellin. Vit. Tim. § 42). We do not know the exact date of the birth or death of Timaeus, but we can make an approximation to it, which cannot be very far from the truth. We know that his history was brought down to v. c. 264 (Polyb. i. 8), and that he attained the age of ninety-six (Lucian, Macrob. 22). Now as his father could not have been a very young man between v. c. 358 and 344, during which time he held the tyranny of Tauromenium, we probably shall not be far wrong in placing the birth of Timaeus in v. c. 352, and his death in v. c. 256. We learn from Suidas that Timaeus received instruction from Philiscus, the Milesian, a disciple of Isocrates; but we have not further particulars of his life, except that he was banished from Sicily by Agathocles, and passed his exile at Athens, where he had lived fifty years when he wrote the thirty-fourth book of his history (Diod. Exc. ex lib. xxii. p. 560, Wess. ; Polyb. Exc. Vet. pp. 389, 383 ; Plut. de Exil. p. 605, c). We are not informed in what year he was banished by Agathocles, but it may have been in the year that the latter crossed over to Africa (v. c. 310), since we are told that the tyrant, fearing an insurrection in his absence, either put to death or drove into exile all the persons whom he suspected to be hostile to his government. (Diod. xx. 4.)

Timaeus wrote the history of Sicily from the earliest times to v. c. 264, in which year Polybius commences the introduction to his work (Polyb. i. 5). This history was one of great extent. Suidas quotes the thirty-eighth book (s. v. & το ιθώρυν πύρ), and there were probably many books after this. It appears to have been divided into several great sections, which are quoted with separate titles, though they in reality formed a part of one great whole. Thus Suidas speaks of Ἰταλικά καὶ Σικελικά in eight books, and of Ἐλληνικά καὶ Σικέλικα in five books. It has been conjectured that the Italics and Sicellas were the title of the early portion of the work, during which period the history of Sicily was closely connected with that of Italy; and that the second part of the work was called Sicellas and Hellenica, and comprised the period during which Sicily was brought more into contact with Greece by the Athenian invasions as well as by other events. The last, five books contained the history of Agathocles (Diod. p. 561, Wess.). Timaeus wrote the history of Pyrrhus as a separate work (Dionys. i. 6 ; Cic. ad Fam. v. 12) ; but, as it falls within the time treated of in his general History, it may almost be regarded as an episode of the latter.

The value and authority of Timaeus as an historian have been most vehemently attacked by Polybius in many parts of his work. He maintains that Timaeus was totally deficient in the first qualifications of an historian, as he possessed no practical knowledge of war or politics, and never attempted to obtain by travelling a personal acquaintance with the places and countries he described; but on the contrary confined his residence to one spot for fifty years, and there gained all his knowledge from books alone. Polybius also remarks that Timaeus had so little power of observation, and so weak a judgment, that he was unable to give a correct account even of the things he had seen, and of the places he had visited; and adds that he was likewise so superstitious, that his work abounded with old traditions and well-known fables, while things of greater importance were entirely omitted (Polyb. lib. xii. with the Fragmenta Paliacerni of his work). His ignorance of geography and natural history appears to have been very great, and Polybius frequently mentions his errors (e. g. Polyb. i. 18, xii. 3, 5). But Polybius brings still graver charges against Timaeus. He accuses him of frequently stating wilful falsehoods, of indulging in all kinds of calumnies against the most distinguished men, such as Homer, Aristotle, and Theophrastus, and of attacking his personal enemies, such as Agathocles, in the most atrocious manner. These charges are repeated by Diodorus and other ancient writers, among whom Timaeus earned so bad a character by his slanders and calumnies, that he was nick-named Epitimaeus (Ἐπιτήμαιος), or the Fault-Finder (Athen. vi. p. 273, b ; comp. Diod. v. 1, xiii. 90, Exc. xx. p. 561, Wess. ; Strab. xv. p. 649). Lastly, Polybius censures the speeches in the history of Timaeus, as unsuitable to the speakers, and the times at which they are represented as delivered, and as marked by a scholastic, verbose, and inflated style of oratory.

Most of the charges of Polybius against Timaeus are founded upon statements of other writers, and from the fragments which we possess of Timaeus's own work, we are led to conclude that Polybius has greatly exaggerated the defects of Timaeus, and omitted to mention his peculiar excellencies. Nay, several of the very points which Polybius regarded as great blemishes in his work, were, in reality, some of its greatest merits. The rationalizing Polybius quite approved of the manner in which Ephorus and Theopompus dealt with the ancient myths, which they attempted, by stripping them of all their miracles and marvels, to turn into sober history; but it was one of the great merits of Timaeus, for which he is loudly denounced by Polybius, that he attempted to give the myths in their simplest and most genuine form, as related by the most ancient writers. There can be little doubt that if the early portion of the history of Timaeus had been preserved, we should be able to gain a more correct knowledge of many points than from the histories of Theopompus and Ephorus, and also collected the materials of his history with the greatest diligence and care, a fact which even Polybius is obliged to admit (Exc. Vat. p. 402, init.). He likewise paid very great attention to chronology, and was the first writer who introduced the practice of recording events by Olympiads, which was adopted by almost all subsequent writers of Greek history (Diod. v. 1). For this purpose he drew up a list of the Olympic conquerors, which is called by Suidas Ὀλυμπιωνίκαι ἡ χρονικα πραξις. Cicero formed a very different opinion of the merits of Timaeus from that of Polybius. He says (de Orat. ii. 14) :—Timaeus, quantum judicaret possim, longe eruditissimus, et rerum copia et sententiarum varietate abundantisimus, et ipsa...
TIMAEUS.

compositione verborum non impolutis, magnam eloquentiam ad scriniumum attulit, sed nullum usum foresenem." (Comp. Cle. Brut. 93.)

In addition to the Sicilian history and the Olympiads, Suidas assigns two other works to Timaeus, neither of which is mentioned by any other writer, namely, An Account of Syria, its cities and kings, in three books (περὶ Συρίας καὶ τῶν ἀυτῆς πόλεων καὶ βασιλεῶν βιβλία τρειά), and a collection of rhetorical arguments in sixty-eight books (Συλλογὴ ῥητορικῶν ἀφορμῶν), which was more probably written, as Ruhnken has remarked, by Timaeus the sophist.

The fragments of Timaeus have been collected by Göller, in his De Sita et Origine Syracusarum, Lips. 1818, pp. 209—306, and by Car. and Theod. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historiorum Graecorum, Paris, 1841, pp. 193—233, both of which works also contain dissertations on the life and writings of Timaeus. (Compare Vossius, De Historicis Graecis, pp. 117—120, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. pp. 499, 500.)

Of the work of Timaeus, which was a Pythagorean philosopher, is said to have been a teacher of Plato. (Cic. de Fin. v. 29, de Re Publ. i. 10.) There is an extant work, bearing his name, written in the Doric dialect, and entitled περὶ δύσης κόσμου καὶ φύσεως; but its genuineness is very doubtful, and it is in all probability nothing more than an abridgment of Plato's dialogue of Timaeus. This work was first printed in a Latin translation by Valla, along with several other works, Venice, 1488 and 1498. It was first printed in Greek at Paris, 1555, edited by Norgarola. It is also printed in many editions of Plato, and in Gale's Opercula Mythologica, Physica et Ethica, Cambridge, 1671, and Amsterdam, 1683. The Greek text was published with a French translation by the Marquis d'Argens, Berlin, 1762. The last and best edition is by J. J. de Gelder, Leyden, 1836. (Comp. Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. iii. p. 98, foll.) Suidas says (s. c.) that Timaeus was the father of the Locrians, but as no other writer mentions such a work by the Locrian Timaeus, it is not improbable that this life of Pythagoras was simply a portion of the history of Timaeus of Tauromenium, who must have spoken of the philosopher in that portion of his work which related to the early history of Italy.

5. Of Cyzicus, a disciple of Plato, endeavoured to seize the supreme power in the state (Athen. xi. p. 509, a.). Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 46) mentions Timolus of Cyzicus and not Timaeus among the disciples of Plato; and hence it has been conjectured that there is a corruption in the name, either in Athenaeus or Diogenes.

6. The Sophists wrote a Lexicon to Plato, addressed to a certain Genticus, which is still extant. The time at which this Timaeus lived is quite uncertain. Ruhnken places him in the third century of the Christian era, which produced so many ardent admirers of the Platonic philosophy, such as Porphyry, Longinus, Plotinus, &c. The Lexicon is very brief, and bears the title Τιμαίου σωφροτοῦ ἐκ τῶν Πάτατος λέξεων, from which it might have been inferred that it is an extract from a larger work, but had not Photios (Cod. 151), who had read it, described it as a very short work (βραχὺν ποιμάτιον ἐν ἐν λόγῳ). It is evident, however, that the work, as it stands, has received several interpolations, especially in explanations of words occurring in Herodotus. Notwithstanding these interpolations the work is one of great value, and the explanations of words are some of the very best which have come down to us from the ancient grammarians. It was printed for the first time, from a manuscript at Paris, edited by Ruhnken, Leyden, 1754, with a very valuable commentary, and again, with many improvements, Leyden, 1789. There are also two more recent editions by Koch, Leipzig, 1828, and 1833. The work on rhetorical arguments in sixty-eight books (Συλλογὴ ῥητορικῶν ἀφορμῶν) which Suidas assigns to Timaeus of Tauromenium, was more probably written by Timaeus, the author of the Lexicon to Plato, as has been already remarked. (Ruhnken's Preface to his edition of the Lexicon.)

7. The Mathematician, is quoted by Pliny (H. N. v. 3, xvi. 22, ii. 8). Suidas says that Timaeus (Timoleon [No. 23]) wrote Mathematician, but whether this was really the work of the Locrian, or not, cannot be determined. The fragment on the Pleiades, preserved by the Scholast in the Iliad (xviii. 486), and usually assigned to Timaeus of Tauromenium, is supposed by Göller to belong to the mathematician.

TIMAGENES (Τιμαγήνης). Three persons of this name are mentioned by Suidas. 1. Timagenes, the rhetorician (ῥηττορ), of Alexandria, the son of the king's banker, was taken prisoner by Gabinus (n. c. 55), and brought to Rome, where he was redeemed from captivity by Faustus, the son of Sulla. He taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Pompey, and afterwards under Augustus, but losing his school on account of his freedom of speech, he retired to an estate at Tusculum. He died at Dalanum, a town of Osrohene in Mesopotamia. He wrote many books, the titles of which are not given by Suidas. 2. Timagenes, the historian, wrote Peripius of the whole series in five books. 3. Timagenes or Timagenes of Milion, an historian or an orator, wrote on the Pontic Helmele and its distinguished men, in five books, and likewise epistles. Besides these three persons, we have mention of a fourth (4), Timagenes, the Syrian, who wrote on the history of the Gauls. (Plut. de Flav. c. 6.) Of these four writers it is probable that the rhetorician, the historian who wrote the Peripius, and the Syrian, are the same. (Nos. 1, 2 and 4.) Of the historian we have an account given us by the two Senecas, which differs from what Suidas says respecting the grammarian, but does not really contradict the statement of the lexicographer. It is related by the Senecas that Timagenes after his captivity first followed the trade of a cook, and afterwards of a litter or sedan bearer (locticarior), but rose from these humble occupations to be the intimate acquaintance of Augustus. He afterwards offended the emperor by some caustic remarks on his wife and family, and was in consequence forbidden the imperial palace. Timagenes in revenge burnt his historical works, in one of which he gave an account of the deeds of Augustus, and which he had probably written at the request of the emperor. Augustus, however, did not punish him any further, but allowed him to retain the protection of the powerful friends he had formerly enjoyed. He found an asylum in the house of Asinius Pollio. (M. Sene.
TIMAGENIDAS.

Controv. 34 ; L. Senec. de Ira, iii. 23, Ep. 91.) Plutarch also tells us (De Adulat. et Amico, c. 27, p. 68, b.), that Timagenes lost the friendship of Augustus by an imprudent use of his tongue. By putting together the accounts of Suidas and the Seneeas, we obtain the following particulars respecting the life of Timagenes. He was a native of Alexandria, from which place he was carried as a prisoner to Rome, where he was first employed as a slave in menial offices, but being liberated by Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, he opened a school of rhetoric, in which he taught with great reputation and success. (Comp. Hor. Ep. i. 19. 15.) His fame gained him the friendship of many distinguished men, and among others of the emperor Augustus, who induced him to write a history of his exploits. But having offended Augustus by sarcastic remarks upon his family, he was forbidden the palace, whereupon he burnt his historical works, gave up his rhetorical school, and retired from Rome to the house of his friend Asinarius Pollio at Tusculum. After he had discontinued writing a long while, he resumed his pen (Quintil. x. 1.), and composed those historical works upon which his fame was founded. How long he resided at Tusculum we do not know, nor the reason for which he quitted this retreat, but he afterwards went to the East, and died at Dahanam in Mesopotamia. It is probable that it was from the place of his death that he was called the Syrian by the author of the treatise de Fluviis (c. 6). The works of Timagenes mentioned by ancient writers are, 1. Περὶ Πίλαρου. (Suidas, s. v. Τιμαγένης.) It is probably from this work that Strabo quotes (xv. p. 711). 2. Περὶ βασιλείων, appears to have contained a history of Alexander the Great and his successors. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μάκαρ.; Curt. ix. 5. § 21; Joseph. a. Anton. ii. 6.; Plut. Pomp. c. 49.) 3. On the Gothic Wars. (Plut. I., c.; Strab. iv. p. 180.; Amm. Marc. xxv. 9. § 2.) (Bonamy, Recherches sur l'Histoire Timagenique, in the Mém. de l'Académie des Ins., vol. xiii. p. 35, foll.; Schwab, Disputatio de Libro et Timageno, historiarum scriptoribus, aemulis, Stuttgart. 1834; Vossius, De Historiae Graeciae, p. 195, foll., ed. Westermann, who makes the rhetorician, the historian and the Syrian three distinct persons; Clinton, Fast. Hellen. vol. iii. p. 624, who supposes the rhetorician and the historian to be two distinct persons, but makes the Syrian the same as the historian.)

TIMAGENIDAS or TIMAGE'NIDIS (Τιμαγενίδας, Τιμαγένης), a Theban, son of Herpyx, was one of the principal adherents of the Persian cause in the invasion of Xerxes. Shortly before the battle of Plataea, Timagenides advised Mardonius to occupy the passes of Citheron, and so to intercept the re-inforcements and supplies which were coming in through them to the enemy. The advice was taken, and the Persians succeeded in cutting off a convoy of provisions with 300,000 talents of burden. After their victory at Plataea the Greeks advanced against Thebes, and demanded that the chief traitors to the national cause, Timagenides among the number, should be given up to them. The Thebans at first refused in spite of the ravages which their land suffered, but at length they consented at the instigation of Timagenides himself. It appears that the culprits expected to be brought to an open trial, at which they hoped to recurse effectually to the expedient of bribery. To prevent this, however, Pausanias carried them off to Corinth, and there put them to death without any judicial ceremony. (Herod. ix. 38, 86—88; Paus. vii. 10.) [E. E.]

TIMAGORAS (Τιμαγόρας), historical. 1. A Tegean, was one of the ambassadors who were sent, in B.C. 430, to ask the king of Persia to aid the Peloponnesians against Athens. On their way through Thrace they were seized by Sadoecus at the instigation of the Athenian envoys at the court of Sitalces, and, having been taken to Athens, were there put to death. (Thuc. ii. 67.)

2. A citizen of Cyzicus, and son of Athenagoras. Having been driven into exile by his political opponents of the democratic party, he took refuge at the court of Pharnabazes, the satrap of the Persian provinces near the Hellespont, by whom he was sent to Lacedaemon, in B.C. 412, to urge that a fleet should be despatched to support the Greek cities in their straity in their intended revolt from Athens. (Thuc. viii. 6, 38.) [PHARNAZIDES, No. 2.]

3. An Athenian, was the colleague of Leon as ambassador from Athens, in B.C. 367, to the Persian court. [LEON, No. 6.] In this mission he spent four years, and had the address to adapt his conduct to what he perceived to be the king's inclination, separating himself altogether from Leon, and taking part with Peloas, the Theban envoy. His supple compliance and his treachery in revealing state-secrets purchased for him the bounty of Artaxerxes, but on his return home he was impeached by Leon, and put to death. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 33, &c.; Plut. Artax. 22, Pelo. 30; Demost. de Fals. Leg. pp. 303, 400; Ath. ii. p. 48, d, e; Val. Max. vi. 3, ext. 2.) Athenaeus (l.c.) speaks of a Cretan, called Timagoras, who also enjoyed the Persian king's favour and was a distinct person from the Athenian of the same name. See, however, Casanb. ad loc.

4. A Rhodian, was placed in command of five ships, which his countrymen sent to Chaloes, in B.C. 171, to co-operate with C. Lucretius in the war with Perseus. (Polyb. xxvii. 6.)

5. In the same passage of Polybius it is stated that, while these five ships sailed to Chaloes, one more was sent to Tenedus under a commander also named Timagoras, who fell in with and captured the crew of a ship which was conveying Diophanes on an embassy from Perseus to Antiochus Epiphanes. Diophanes himself escaped. [E. E.]

TIMAGORAS (Τιμαγόρας), of Chaloes, a painter, contemporary with Panaenus, whom he defeated in a contest for the prize of painting, at the Pythian games. Timagoras afterwards celebrated his victory in a poem. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.) [P. S.]

TIMANDRA (Τιμανδρα), a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and the wife of Echecus, by whom she became the mother of Euandros. (Apollod. i. 10. 3; Paus. viii. 5. § 1; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 130.) Another mythical personage of this name is mentioned by Antonius Liberalis (5). [L. S.]

TIMANTHES (Τιμανθέας), an athlete of Cleone. Pausanias relates of him that, when he had ceased to be a competitor at the games, he used still to make daily trials of his strength by bending a huge bow. At length, however, having been absent for some time from his own city, he found on his return that he was no longer able to perform the feat, whereupon he burnt himself to death through mortification. There was a statue of TIMANTHES. (Timæus). artist. i. The celebrated Greek painter, contemporary with Zeuxis and Parrhasius (about Ol. 93, B. C. 400; Plin. II. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 3), is said by Quintilian (i. 13) to have been a native of Cythnos, but Eustathius (ad II. xxiv. 163, p. 1343. 60) makes him a Sicyonian; these testimonies may be reconciled by supposing him to have been a native of Cythnos, and to have belonged to the Sicyonian school of painting. Our information respecting his personal history is confined to the facts of his having contended with Parrhasius and Colotes; the works which he painted on those occasions will be mentioned presently. Native genius, power of expression and suggestion, and entire mastery of the resources of his art, seem to have been the chief qualities which characterised Timanthes. (Plin. l. c. § 6.) His pictures were distinguished, Pliny tells us, from those of all other painters by suggesting more than they expressed; and, striking as was the art displayed in them, they showed a genius which surpassed that art. (Atque in unius hujus operibus intelligentia plus semper, quam pingitur: et cum sit ars summa, ingenium tamen ultra artem est.) Only five of his works are mentioned; but they are evidently masterpieces, and one of them involves one of the most interesting questions in the history of art.

1. The work referred to, and that which appears to have been regarded by the ancients as his masterpiece, is the celebrated picture of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, which he painted in competition with Colotes of Teos (Quintil. l. c.); and the question involved in it is, whether Timanthes displayed consummate skill, or was guilty of a mere trick, in painting Agamemnon with his face hidden in his mantle. It is evident that the ancients regarded this stroke of art with the most unbounded admiration. Pliny tells us that it was oratorum laudibus celebrata;" and it is praised also by Cicero (Orat. 22), Quintilian (l. c.), and Valerius Maximus (viii. 11. ext. 6). Unfortunately, however, these writers display in this, as in other cases, their ignorance of the true principles of art, by giving an unsound reason for their right judgment of the work. The picture, they tell us, showed Iphigenia, standing by the altar, surrounded, among the assistants, by Calchas, whose prophetic voice had demanded her sacrifice, and whose hand was about to complete it, Ulysses, who had brought her from her home, and Menelaus, her father's brother, all manifesting different degrees of grief; so that, when the artist had painted the sorrow of Calchas, and the deeper sorrow of Ulysses, and had added all his powers to express the woes of Menelaus, his resources were exhausted, and, unable to give a powerful expression to the agony of the father, he covered his head with a veil. In the present state of aesthetic criticism, it is hardly necessary to point out the absurdity of thus making out Timanthes to be the Epiceneus of painting. The very writers, who have given this false judgment, let fall expressions, borrowed doubtless from their Greek authorities, which intimate the true reason of the manner in which Timanthes painted Agamemnon: "patris ipsius vultum velavit, quem digne non poterat ostendere," says Pliny; "non reprehens quo digno modo patris vultum posset exprimere," says Quintilian. In one word, it was his knowledge of aesthetic principles, not his want of artistic power, that dictated to Timanthes this mode of representation. His conduct has been most admirably vindicated by Fuseli, in reply to the (in this case) mistaken judgment of Reynolds, and the shallow flippancy of Falconet (Reynolds, Discourse viii.; Fuseli, Lecture i. vol. ii. pp. 44—58, in Knowles's Life and Writings of Fuseli). The whole of Fuseli's remarks should be read; but the following extract will perhaps convey their spirit sufficiently. "The subject of Timanthes was the immolation of Iphigenia; Iphigenia was the principal figure, and her form, her resignation, or her anguish, the painter's principal task; the figure of Agamemnon, however important, is merely accessory, and no more necessary to make the subject a completely tragic one, than that of Clytemnestra the mother, no more than that of Priam, to impress us with sympathy at the death of Polyxena. It is therefore a misnomer of the French critic, to call Agamemnon 'the hero' of the subject.

"Neither the French nor the English critic appears to me to have comprehended the real motive of Timanthes, as contained in the words, 'decreo, pro dignitate, et digna,' in the passages of Tully, Quintilian, and Pliny; they ascribe to impotence what was the forbearance of judgment. Timanthes felt like a father: he did not hide the face of Agamemnon, because it was beyond the power of his art, not because it was beyond the possibility, but because it was beyond the dignity of expression, because the inspiring feature of paternal affection at that moment, and the action which of necessity must have accompanied it, would either have destroyed the grandeur of the character, and the solemnity of the scene, or subjected the painter with the majority of his judges to the imputation of insensibility. He must either have represented him in tears, or convulsed at the flash of the raised dagger, forgetting the chief in the father, or shown him absorbed by despair, and in that state of stupefaction, which levels all features and deadens expression; he might indeed have chosen a fourth mode, he might have exhibited him fainting and palsied in the arms of his attendant, and by this confusion of male and female character, merited the applause of every theatre at Paris." But Timanthes had too true a sense of nature to expose a father's feelings, or to tear a passion to rags; nor had the Greeks yet learnt of Rome to steel the face. If he made Agamemnon bear his calamity as a man, he made him also feel it as a man. It became the leader of Greece to sanction the ceremony with his presence, it did not become the father to see his daughter beneath the dagger's point. The same nature that threw a real mantle over the face of Timoleon, when he assisted at the punishment of his brother, taught Timanthes to throw an imaginary one over the face of Agamemnon; neither height nor depth, but propriety of expression was his aim."

The question as to whether Timanthes invented this mode of representation, or whether he borrowed it from Euripides, is altogether beside the mark; and, in raising such a question, Falconet merely showed his ignorance of the true relation between pictorial and poetic invention. It may be worth while, however, to mention that Eustathius supposed the idea to have been suggested to Timanthes by a line of the Iliad (xxiv. 163). An imitation of the picture of Timanthes was found on the wall of a house at Pompeii. (Mus. Barb. iv. 3; Pompeii, vol. ii. p. 163.) (2) With his picture of the contest of Ajax and Ulysses for the arms of Achilles, he gained a victory over Parrhasius, respecting which, and the arrogant remark of Parrhasius on the occasion, see Parrhasius, p. 126, b. (3) The picture of the death of Palamedes at Ephesus, mentioned by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 190, vol. i. p. 146, b. 27, ed. Bekker) is ascribed to Timanthes by Tzetzes (Chil. viii. 198). (4) A picture of his was preserved at Rome, in the temple of Peace, which Pliny describes in the following words: Pinxit et heroas, absolutissimi operis, arteipse complexus vires pingendi. (5) Lastly, as a striking example of his skill and invention, Pliny mentions his picture of a sleeping Cyclops, of a very small size (parvula tabula), in which the magnitude of the figure was indicated by the insertion of some satyrs, measuring his thumb with a thyrus. Timanthes is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 22) as one of the painters who used only four colours. The sense, in which this is to be understood, is explained in the Dictionary of Antiquities, s. v. Colores.

2. A painter, contemporary with Aratus. His picture of the battle of Pellence, in which Aratus defeated the Aetolians (Ol. 155. 1, b. c. 240), is praised by Plutarch (Arat. 62). TIMARCHIDES, a freedman and an accession of Verres, was one of the most villainous instruments of the oppressions of Verres. (Cic. Verr. ii. 23, 53, 54, iii. 66, v. 45.)

TIMARCHIDES and TIMOCLES (τιμάρχις, Τιμοκλῆς), of Athens, the sons of Polyicles, have already been spoken of under POLYCLINES, p. 459, a., where their statues of Asclepius and Athena are mentioned, and their date is discussed; for it is, of course, dependent on the date assigned to Polyicles. In addition to the remarks in that article, it should be observed that, in the passage of Pliny referred to (H. N. xxxvi. 5. 4. § 10), not only are Polyicles and the sons of Timarchides mentioned as the makers of statues in the portico of Octavia, but also Timarchides himself, as the maker of a statue of Apollo, holding the cithara, in his temple, which formed a part of those buildings. Moreover, it is most probable that the passage, correctly read, contains some further information about "the sons of Timarchides," who are nameless in the ordinary text, as established by Harduin. The old text had "Iam Polycles et Dionysius, Timarchia filii, &c.; and, although the first four words are not contained in the MSS. used by Harduin, who therefore rejected them, they are found, with a slight variation, in the Bamberg MS., which gives "Iam polyclus et dionysius timarchidius, filii, i. e. filiius." The last word is confirmed by the Munich MS., which has "machidius filius." Hence it would appear to be probable that the true reading is "Iam polyclus (who had been mentioned in the preceding sentence) et Dionysius, Timarchidius filius," or, as Jan proposes to read it, "Iam Polycles et Dionysius (for the latter also is mentioned in the preceding sentence), Timarchidius filius." (Silius' edition of Pliny and Jan's Supplement.)

Slight as is the difference between the two readings, they have a very different effect on the succession of this family of artists. According to the former, we have only to add to the genealogy the name of Dionysius, thus:

TIMARCHUS.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Polycles</th>
<th>Timarchides</th>
<th>Dionysius</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

But then we have the somewhat improbable result of a grandfather and grandson working together on the same statue. If, on the other hand, we adopt the reading of Jan, and combine it with the statement of Pausanias, that Timocles and Timarchides were the sons of Polyicles, and if we still identify this Polycles with the Polycles of Pliny, the result is the absurdity that "the same Polycles" was both the son and the father of Timarchides. Either, therefore, we must place another Timarchides at the beginning of the genealogy, thus:

---

Timarchides

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Polycles</th>
<th>Dionysius</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

or, we must reject the word idem or iidem (restoring, perhaps, item in its place), and thus obtain another Polycles, the brother of Dionysius: or, lastly, the identification of the Polycles of Pausanias and Pliny may be given up, and it may be supposed that we have two different and somewhat distinct portions of this artistic family, namely:

---

Timocles, Timarchides, and Timocles and Timarchides (brothers)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Polycles</th>
<th>Dionysius</th>
</tr>
</thead>

those mentioned by Pliny. In this position the question must be left for the solution of other scholars, and for the instruction of students in the difficulties of criticism. It must, however, be remembered that the text cannot be regarded as fixed by the authority of the Bamberg MS.

The works of Timarchides and Timocles at Rome were in marble. Pausanias does not specify the material of their statues which he mentions. Pliny, however, includes Timarchides in his list of those statuaries in bronze, who made athletes et armatus et venatores sacrificantes. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 34.)

[TIMARCHUS (Τιμάρχος), historical. 1. An Athenian general, who, in conjunction with Leotrophides, was sent in command of an expedition against Megara, in b. c. 403. (Diod. xiii. 63.)

2. An Athenian politician, the son of Arizelus, a contemporary of Demosthenes and Aeschines. He was an active orator, and took a conspicuous part in public affairs, being the author of a considerable number of decrees. One of these forbade the exportation of arms or marine stores for the service of Philip of Macedon, under pain of death. Timarchus was, however, a man of the most prudential and abandoned habits. He joined Demosthenes IMORASION.

in impeaching Aeschines, on the score of malversation in the embassy to Philip. Aeschines, however, anticipated him, and brought him to trial under a law of Solon, by which any one who had been guilty of such flagrant excesses as Timarchus, was forbidden to appear before the public assembly. There are different accounts as to the result of this trial. According to some, Timarchus was condemned and disfranchised; according to others, he put an end to his life even before the trial was terminated. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. Aesch.; Procm. ad Aesch. adv. Tim.) Timarchus had previously been impeached by Aristogeiton, and prevented from being entrusted with a public commission. (Suidas put)

4. A tyrant of Miletus, who was overthrown by Antiochus, the son of Antiochus Soter. The deliverance seems to have been a most welcome one, as the Milesians, in consequence of it, gave to Antiochus the surname Θεός. (Appian. Syr. 65.)

TIMARCHUS (Τιμάρχος), literary. 1. A friend and disciple of Aristotle, left by him as one of the guardians of Nician. (Diog. Laërt. v. 12.)

2. A Greek grammarian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemaeus Euergetes. (Suid. s. v. Απολλάδων.)

3. A Greek grammian, of uncertain date. Athenaeus (xx. p. 501) quotes from the fourth book of a work by him, παλί τοῖς Ερμοσανθεύος ἔρωτι. He also wrote upon Homer (Schol. ad II. p. 122), and on Euripides (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 1). If the reading in Harpocrates (s. v. Αργύς), is correct, Timarchus was a native of Rhodes, and was a writer on glosses. But as we find elsewhere mention of a Rhodian named Timachidas, who was a glossographer, some critics propose to alter the reading in Harpocrates. The reason is not a very convincing one. (Vossius, de Hist. Gr. p. 143; Ruhnken, Oppuscula, p. 205.)

TIMARCHUS, CLAUDIUS, of Crete, was accused in the senate in A. D. 62, on which occasion Pausus Thrasae made a celebrated speech, the substance of which is given by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 20).

TIMA'RETE (Τιμάρετη), a female painter, the daughter of that Micon, whom Pliny distinguishes from the celebrated painter Micon, by the epithet of minor (H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35). Pliny also tells us that she painted a panel-picture of Diana, in a very ancient style of the art (anti-

TIMA'SION (Τιμασίων), a citizen of Dardanus in the Troad, appears to have been a soldier of fortune, and served in Asia under Clearchus and Dercyllidas. He was exiled from his native city,—at what period we do not know,—and was one of those who entered the service of Cyrus the Younger. In the retreat of the 10,000, after the treacherous arrest of the five generals by Tissaphernes, Timasion was chosen commander in the guard of Clearchus, and he and Xenophon, as the youngest of the new leaders, were appointed to command the rear-guard. When the Cyrenians had reached Cotesara, and were waiting there for the transports which the Sinopian envoys had promised them, Timasion and Tharax, a Boeotian, took advantage of Xenophon's project for the establishment of a Greek colony on the Euxine, to represent to some merchants of Sinope and Heraclea that the only way to prevent it was to furnish pay as well as ships to the army. The two cities in question, on this being reported to them, not only engaged to do what was desired, but even bribed Timasion to persuade the Greeks to accept the terms, and to sail away home. Afterwards, however, when they knew that Xenophon had abandoned his project, they would not fulfil their promise of paying the soldiers, and Timasion accordingly and the other generals, who had been involved in the same intrigues with him, and had ventured to hold out to the men brilliant prospects of abundant funds, tried to persuade Xenophon to resume his design. He refused, however, to bring the question at all before the army, and they then attempted to gain over the officers of their respective divisions, but a report of what they were about spread among the troops, and their indignant opposition defeated the plan. When the Cyrenians separated into three divisions at Heraclea, Timasion continued with the one under Xenophon, and when it was advancing to rescue the Areadians from the Bithynians, whose country they had attempted to plunder, and who had hemmed them round on a hill where they had taken refuge, he was sent forward with the cavalry to reconnoitre; and shortly after we find him again commanding the cavalry in the battle in which the Greeks defeated the forces of Pharnabazus and the Bithynians. On the discovery of the inability of Coeratadas to perform the promises by which he had induced the Cyrenians to elect him as their leader, while the army was lying without the walls of Byzantium, Timasion, in opposition to the other generals, wished to cross over again to Asia, in the hope of returning to his native city with the treasures which we find he had collected in his expeditions. He entered with the rest of the army into the service of Seuthes [Seuthes, No. 2, and took part in the hard winter campaign which re-established the Thracian prince in his kingdom; and when the disputes arose about the pay, which Seuthes wished to evade, and Heracleides, the instigator of the prince, endeavoured to cause disunion among the generals, Timasion positively refused to act apart from Xenophon. He marched, not crossed over to Asia with the army, when it entered into the Spartan service; and perhaps he then took an early opportunity to return home to Dardanus. (Xen. Anab. iii. 1. §§ 47, 2. § 37, v. 6. §§ 19—37, vi. 1. § 32, 3. §§ 14, 22, 5. § 28, vii. 1. § 40. 2. §§ 1, 2. 3. §§ 18, 46, 5. §§ 4, 10.)

arisen, according to a frequent and well-known error of transcription, out of a confusion with the word Τυλικωτος just before, that the balance of probability is in favour of the common reading, and accordingly the passage is placed by Dindorf and Ahrens among the fragments of Sophocles (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 325; Welecker, die Griech. Tragöd. p. 1100; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 430; Wagner, Frag. Com. Graec. p. 146, in Didot's Bibliotheca).

2. A distinguished Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who lived at a period when the revival of political energy, in consequence of the encroachments of Philip, restored to the Middle Comedy much of the vigour and real aim of the Old, is conspicuous for the freedom with which he discussed public men and measures, as well as for the number of his dramas, and the purity of his style, in which scarcely any departures from the best standards of Attic diction can be detected. His time is indicated by several allusions in his plays, especially to the Attic orators and statesmen. Like Antiphanes, he made sarcastic allusions to the vehement spirit and rhetorical boldness of Demo- sthenes, whom he also attacked, with Hyperides, and the other orators who had received money from Harpalus. (Pseudo-Plut. Vit. X. Oral. p. 845, b.; Timoc. Herois, ap. Ath. vi. p. 234, a., Delos or Delius, ap. Ath. vii. p. 341, c.; Clinton, F. H. s. a. 343, 336, 324, where, as well as in Meineke, other such personal allusions are mentioned.) Hence the period during which he flourished ap- pears to have extended from about the middle of the fourth century B.C. till after B.C. 324, so that at the beginning of his career he was in part con- temporary with Antiphanes, and at the end of it, with Menander. (Comp. Ath. vii. p. 245, c.) There is also an allusion to one of his plays, the Iasii, in a fragment of Alexia (Ath. iii. p. 129, a). From these statements it is clear that he is rightly re- ferred to the Middle Comedy, although Pollux (x. 154) reckons him among the poets of the New (τοίς νέωτέροις), perhaps on account of the late period down to which he flourished. He is the latest of the poets of the Middle Comedy, excepting Xenarchus and Theophilus.

Suidas, who has here fallen into his frequent error of making two persons out of one, assigns to Timocrates, in his two articles upon him, nineteen drachms, on the authority of Athenaeus, in whose work are also found some titles not mentioned by Suidas, and a few more are gathered from other sources. The list, when completed and corrected, stands thus:—Αγαστίου, Αλακέιον, Δακτύλος, Δίφαλος or perhaps Δίφαλος, Δημοσπάπτος, Αυστρώτα- ιος, Διώνυσος, Δρακόντιος, Εστιοταιλά, Επιγα- ρέσακος, Ηρως, Ιεραίοι άστυροι, Κάινος, Κινταν- ρος ἢ Δεμέμνος, Κονιάκος, Λήθη, Μαραθώνιος, Νάρξα, Ορθαρδοκυλείας, Πολυγράφος, Ποι- τικός, Πορφέριος (but perhaps this belongs to Xenarchus), Ποκτητα, Σαμφα, Συμφεβίς (doubtful), Φύλακτας, Φευροβρατις. Some of these titles involve important questions, which are fully dis- cussed by Meineke. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 503, 504; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 426—433, vol. iii. pp. 590—613; Editio Minor, vol. pp. 799—811.)

3. Of Syraces, a supposed author of one of the pretended works of Orpheus, namely, the Σαρηφία, which was also ascribed to Persinus of Miletus (Suid. s. c. Ὀρφεύς; Endoc. p. 318). Nothing more is known of him. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 158; Meineke, vol. i. pp. 430, 431.)

4. There is also an almost unintelligible passage in Photius (Epist. 55, p. 111), about a certain mendacious writer of the name of Timocles. (Meineke, l. c.) [P. S.]

TIMOCRATES (Τιμοκράτης). 1. A Lacedae- monian, was one of the three counsellors (Brasidas and Lycophron being his colleagues) who were sent to assist Cnemus after his first defeat by Phormion in the Corinthian gulf, in B.C. 429. In the second battle there shortly after, Timocrates was on board of a Leucadian galley, which was one of the twenty fast-sailing ships appointed to prevent the Athenians from escaping to Naupactus. This vessel, in the pursuit, far outran the rest of the squadron, and the hindmost Athenian galley, closely chased by it, wheeled suddenly round a merchant ship which was lying at anchor, struck her pursuer in the centre, and sank her. Timocrates hereupon slew himself, and his body was washed into the harbour of Naupactus (Thuc. ii. 85—92).

2. An Athenian, was one of the commissioners for concluding the fifty years' truce between Athens and Sparta, in B.C. 421, and also the separate treaty between these states in the same year. (Thuc. v. 19, 24.) We may perhaps identify him with the father of the Athenian commander, Aristoteneles. (Thuc. iii. 105.)

3. (Unless he is to be identified with No. 2.) An Athenian, who, in B.C. 406, was a member of the Council of Five Hundred, before which the generals who had conquered at Arginusae gave in their account. Having heard it, Timo- crates made and carried a proposal that they should all be kept in custody and handed over to the judgment of the people (Xen. Hell. i. 7, § 3.)

4. A Rhodian, who was sent into Greece by the satrap Tithraustes in B.C. 395, taking with him fifty talents wherewith to bribe the leading men in the several states to excite a war against Sparta at home, and so to compel the return of Aegialus from his victorious career in Asia. Plutarch calls him Hermocrates (Xen. Hell. iii. 5. § 1; Paus. iii. 9; Plut. Artas. 20.)

5. A Lacedaemonian, was one of the ambassadors who were sent to Athens in B.C. 369, to settle the terms of alliance between the Athenians and the Spartans (Xen. Hell. vii. § 13.) [ΣΕΡΒΙΟΔΟΤΟΣ, No. 2.]

6. A Syracusan, who commanded a squadron of twelve galleys, sent by Dionysius the Younger to the aid of Sparta in B.C. 366. The arrival of this force enabled the Spartans to reduce Selasia, which had revolted from them. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 12.)

7. An Athenian, the proposer of a law providing that a public debtor should be exempt from imprisonment on his giving security for payment within a certain time. For this, Timocrates was prosecuted by Diodorus and Eucemon, and for them Demos- thenes wrote the oration (κατά Τιμοκράτον), which was delivered by Diodorus in B.C. 355 [ΑΝΔΡΟΤΙΟΝ; ΜΑΛΑΝΟΤΟΣ.] It is a question whether this Timocrates should be identified with a person of the same name, who was the first husband of the sister of Onetor, and who surrendered her to Aphobus. (Dem. c. Onet. i. pp. 665, &c.) [E. E.]

TIMOCREON (Τιμοκρέων), of Rhodes, a lyric

poet, celebrated for the bitter and pugnacious spirit of his works, and especially for his attacks on Themistocles and Simonides. From fragments of his poetry, which are preserved by Plutarch (Thera. X. 51), it appears that he was a native of Ianysus in Rhodes, whence he banished on the common charge of an inclination towards Persia (παρακολοθής); and in this banishment he was left neglected by Themistocles, who had formerly been his friend, and his connection by the ties of hospitality. According to Plutarch, the influence of Themistocles was positively employed to procure the banishment of Timocreon: but from the words of the poet himself, the offence seems to have amounted only to his neglecting to procure Timocreon’s recall from exile, when he obtained that favour for other political fugitives. This distinction Timocreon ascribes to pecuniary corruption; and, in another passage quoted by Plutarch (ibid.), he insinuates that Themistocles was not free from the guilt of the same political crime for which he himself was suffering. It is to be observed that Timocreon does not deny the charge brought against him, but he even admits it, unless the words are to be construed hypothetically. According to the statement of Thrasymachus (op. Atl. x. p. 416, a.) he was at one time living at the Persian court. Plutarch also tells us that after the exile of Themistocles, Timocreon attacked him still more violently in an ode, the opening lines of which call on the "Muse to confer fame upon this strain throughout Greece, as is fitting and just.” Hence it follows that Timocreon was still flourishing after B. C. 471.

The three fragments thus referred to by Plutarch constitute the greater part of the extant remains of Timocreon; and hence it may be conjectured that poetry was not the business of his life, but only the accidental form in which he uttered the violent emotions which political misfortunes and personal wrongs would naturally excite in a man of great vigour of mind as well as body. For that such was his constitution of body appears from the fact that he was an athlete in that combination of the contests which required the greatest strength, namely the pentathlon (Ath. x. p. 415, f.). Thrasymachus (L. c.) relates a specimen, which was exhibited at the Persian court, of Timocreon’s prodigious strength, and of the voracity by which he sustained it; and hence, as well as from the satyrlic spirit of his poetry, is derived the point of that epigram which, according to Athenaeus (L. c.), was inscribed upon his tomb:

Πολλὰ πιὰν, καὶ πολλὰ φαγόν καὶ πολλὰ καὶ αὐτῶν ἀνθρώπων, κεῖμαι Τιμοκρέων Ὄδης.

If, as modern scholars generally suppose, this epigram was written by Simonides, it does not necessarily follow that Timocreon died before Simonides; for an epitaph, as a vehicle of satire on a living person, is a species of wit of which we have many examples in the history of poetry, both ancient and modern. For the fact of the rivalry between Simonides and Timocreon, we have the testimony of Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 46), and of Suidas; and the Greek Anthology contains an epigram by Timocreon (Anth. Pal. xii. 31),

Κηλὶ με προσφέρει φλαμάρη οὐν ἐθέλοντα,
Οὐν ἐθέλοντα με προσφέρει Κηλὶ φλαμάρη, which is evidently a parody on the following epigram of Simonides (Anth. Pal. xiii. 30),

Μίβαδα μοι Ἀλκήνη ταλασσάρων ὑν ἔδει ὑν Ἀλκήνη ταλασσάρων ὑν Μίβαδα μοι καλλιστέρω.

The attacks of Timocreon on his contemporaries have led Suidas, or the writer whom he follows, to give a curious statement, that he was a comic poet of the Old Comedy, and that he wrote comedies against Themistocles and Simonides; although in the very same article we have another account of these attacks, evidently from a better source, in which the poem against Themistocles is expressly called lyric (ἐμελετοῦ). In another passage of Suidas (s. v. σκόλιον), he makes an epic poet (ἔπωτος); a mistake borrowed from a passage in the Scholia on Aristophanes (Ran. 1302), where, however, the error is manifest, as the quotation made is from a scolion by Timocreon; and, in another passage of the Scholia (Acharn. 532), where the same quotation is made, and of which indeed the former passage seems to be merely a transcript, Timocreon is rightly designated μελετοῦ. The quotation made in these passages consists of two lines from a scolion on the mischiefs caused by riches, in which the poet utters the wish “that blind Plutus had never appeared upon earth, neither upon the mainland, but had had Tartarus and Achilles for his father.” We have also some lines, which Hephaestion (p. 71) quotes, as an example of the Ionic a Minore Dimiter Catalectic or Timocreontic metre, from the commencement of what appears to have been a Sybaritic apologue, namely

Σικελίδος κομψὸς ἀντίρ
ποτὰ τὰν μητέρι ἔρα,

which are also referred to by Plato (Gorg. p. 493, a.), where we have an indication of the popularity of Timocreon’s poems at Athens, although later writers condemned the moral spirit of his compositions (Aristeid. vol. ii. p. 330, μηδὲ Τιμοκρέων τοῦ σκελετοῦ πράγμα πούμενε, and the sober judgment of modern criticism is that he gave proofs of a high degree of talent, which he abused through want of character and repose. The fragments already referred to comprise all his extant remains, except a single pentameter, quoted by Hephaestion (p. 4) from his Epiprams, and two references, which Diogenianus (Proc. p. 179, 180, ed. Schnedelius) makes to his works. There is also a chorus in the Wapfa of Aristophanes (1060, foll.), which, the Scholiast tells us, on the authority of Didymus, is a parody on an ode by Timocreon. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 144, 159, 504, vol. i. p. 498, vol. viii. p. 632; Böckh, Proem. Aen. Lect. Berol. 1833; Bernhardy, Grundriss d. Griech. TIMOLAUS (Τιμόλαος), historical. 1. A Corinthian, who was bribed by Timocrates, when the latter was sent to Greece by Tithraustes to gain over as many of the Greeks as he could, to take the side of the Parthians against Agathasis. We find him soon after in a congress, held at Corinth, of the states that were leagues against Sparta. A speech of his on the occasion is reported by Xenophon. (Xen. Hellen. iii. 5, § 1, iv. 2, § 11; Paus. iii. 9, § 8.)

2. A Theban, who is denounced by Demostenes (de Cor. p. 241, ed. Reiske) as a traitor to his country, because he took the Macedonian side. Polybius (xvii. 14. § 4) defends him from the charge. [C. P. M.]

TIMOLAUS, the son of Odenathus and Zeno-obia, the brother of Herennianus. Trebellius Pollio gives him a place in the list of the thirty tyrants [Aukelous], but has preserved no particulars with regard to his history, except that he displayed extraordinary zeal in the study of Latin literature. TIMOLAUS (Τιμόλαος), literary. 1. A native of Cyzicus, who mentioned as one of his disciples by Plato.

2. A Greek writer, a native of Larissa, and a disciple of Anaximenes of Lampscus. He exercised his ingenuity by producing an Iliad, in which each line of Homer was followed by one of his own; thus:

Μάγνη ἔδει ἐδα Πελάθαθε Ἀχιλλός ἢ ἔθετο πρὸς Ἀχάλνων κεχωλομέοις εἰνεκὰ κοινής, οὐδόθεν ἣ μὴν Ἀχιλλὸς ἔγγει μορφαίοις ἢ ἀπὸ πολίμοιοι ἀνακάπτον, πολλὰς δὲ ἱερότητας πυγιᾶς ἵνα προσαρέμεν ἑστρατος ἐν παλαιστίας δαισιμίοις ἐπὶ δουρ. (Suidas, s. v.; Eustath. Prooµ. in Od. p. 4.) Comp. Pignor. [C. P. M.]

TIMOLEON (Τιμόλεως), the son of Timo- demus or Timaeactus and Demariste, belonged to one of the noblest families at Corinth, and gained at an early age among his fellow-citizens a reputation for ability and courage. Corinth had long exercised great influence over the Greek cities in Sicily as the metropolis or mother-city of Syracuse. After the death of Dion, the most terrible disorders had prevailed throughout Sicily, and several men of enterprise and energy had succeeded in making themselves tyrants or supreme rulers in various places. Dionysius had again recovered his power in Syracuse. Hicetas had established himself as tyrant at Leontini, and Andromachus, the father of the historian Timaeus, at Taurome- nium. The friends of Dion had taken refuge either with Hicetas or Andromachus, and the for- mer was made a Parthian by Dionysius under the pretext of restoring the exiles, but in reality in hopes of making himself master of Syracuse. Meantime, the Carthaginians prepared to take advantage of the distracted condition of Sicily; and the fears of this invasion, as well as the hopes of restoring tranquillity to the island, led many of the Sicilians, and among them the Syracusan exiles, to send an embassy to Corinth to implore assistance (n. c. 344). The Corinthians immediately resolved to comply with their request, and the unanimous voice of the people selected Timoleon as the person most competent to take the command in the proposed expedition. Such a proposal was, in itself, most acceptable to the bold and enter- prising spirit of Timoleon; but there was another reason which had rendered Corinth an unwelcome place of residence to him. His older brother Ti- mophanes had not come to any decision in a war against Argos with great success; and subsequently when the state expected another attack, he had the command of four hundred mer- ceraries entrusted to him. By their means, and supported by a powerful party in the state, he resolved to obtain the supreme power in Corinth, and make himself tyrant of the city. His brother Timoleon, who was a warm lover of liberty, dis- approved of his schemes, and endeavoured by argu- ment and persuasion to turn him from his pur- pose, but when he found Timophanes inflexible, he resolved to kill his brother rather than allow him to destroy the liberty of his state. The man- ner of Timophanes' death is stated differently by the ancient writers. Diodorus says that Timoleon slew him with his own hand openly in the forum. Plutarch says that Timoleon introduced the as- sassins into his brother's house, but turned his back while the deed was done; and Cornelius Nepos states that Timoleon was not even present at the murder, though it was perpetrated at his desire. (Diod. xvi. 65; Plut. Tim. 4; Corn. Nep. Tim. 1; Aristot. Pol. v. 5, § 9.) Plutarch further relates that Timophanes was murdered twenty years before the Sicilian ambassadors arrived at Corinth, during the whole of which time Timoleon lived in solitude, a prey to sorrow and remorse; but as Xenophon in his Greek history makes no mention of the affair, which he would hardly have omitted, if it occurred in n. c. 364, we may follow in preference the narrative of Diodorus, who re- lates that Timoleon murdered his brother just before the arrival of the Sicilian ambassadors, and that at the very moment of their arrival the Corinthians placed Timoleon in the command of the Sicilian expedition, with the singular provision, that if he conducted himself justly in the command, they would regard him as a tyran- nicide, and honour him accordingly; but if other- wise, they would punish him as a fratricide.

In whatever manner, and to whatever causes Timoleon owed his appointment, his extraordinary success more than justified the confidence which had been reposed in him. His history in Plutarch reads almost like a romance; and yet of the main facts of the narrative, confirmed as they are by Diodorus and other authorities, we cannot entertain any reasonable doubt. Although the Corinthians had readily assented to the requests of the Sicilians in the appointment of a commander, they were not prepared to make many sacrifices in their favour; and accordingly it was only with ten triremes and seven hundred mercenaries that Timoleon sailed from Corinth to repel the Carthaginians, and re- store order to the Sicilian cities. It was not with- out difficulty that Timoleon could even reach Sicily. Hicetas, the tyrant of Leontini, who had ostensibly joined the other Greeks in asking assistance from Corinth, dreaded the arrival of Timoleon, and had therefore entered into secret negotiations with Hanno, the Carthaginian general, who had meantime arrived in Sicily. The interference of Corinth with Sicilian affairs could not be pleasing to the Carthaginians; and Hanno accordingly sent a squadron of twenty ships to the coast of Italy, to watch the movements of Timoleon. The latter, however, contrived to outwit the Carthaginian commander at Rhegatum, and crossed over in triumph to Tauromenium, where he was kindly received by Andromachus, the tyrant of the place, and by the Syracusean exiles. Meanwhile, Hicetas had been prosecuting the war with success against Dionysius. At the head of a considerable force he had attacked Syracuse; and, after defeating Dionysius in a decisive battle, he had made himself master of the whole city, with the exception of the island citadel, where he kept Dionysius closely besieged. Timoleon saw that it was necessary to act with promptitude; for hardly any of the Sicilian Greeks could be expected to join him till he had won their confidence and commanded their respect. Accordingly, although he could collect only twelve hundred men, he marched at once to Aegadna, the different parties in which had at the same time explored his assistance and that of Hicetas. The two generals reached the town almost at the same time; and in the battle which immediately ensued, Timoleon put Hicetas to flight, although he had nearly five times the number of men. Timoleon followed up his victory by marching against Syracuse, and before Hicetas could collect his troops, he succeeded in obtaining possession of two quarters of the city, Tyche and Epipolae. Syracuse was now in the hands of the three contending parties, Dionysius keeping the island citadel, Hicetas Neapolis and Acharnata, and Timoleon the two other quarters. Such was the state of affairs towards the end of B.C. 444. The ensuing winter was spent in negotiations with the other Greek cities in Sicily, and Timoleon’s recent success gained for him the adhesion of several important places, and among others that of Catana, of which Mancerus was tyrant. In the following spring (B.C. 443) Dionysius, despairing of success, surrendered the citadel to the Corinthian leader, on condition of his being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth. Hicetas, finding that he had to contend alone with Timoleon, first attempted to remove his rival by assassination, and, after the failure of this attempt, openly had recourse to the Carthaginians, and introduced Mago with his fleet and army into the port and city of Syracuse. Hicetas now seemed certain of success, for the Carthaginian force is said to have amounted to 50,000 men; but Timoleon did not despair, and showed himself quite equal to the emergency. He contrived to send a seasonable supply of provisions from Catana to the Corinthian garrison in the citadel at Syracuse; and while Mago and Hicetas marched against Catana with the best part of their troops, Leon, the commander of the Corinthian garrison at Syracuse, made a sudden attack upon Acharnata, and gained this important quarter of the city. This unexpected success raised the suspicions of Mago, who, fearful of treachery, resolved to quit the island, and sailed away, with all his forces, to Carthage. Notwithstanding the defection of his powerful ally, Hicetas still attempted to retain possession of the part of Syracuse that was still in his power, but he was unable to resist the attack of Timoleon, and was obliged to abandon the city, and return to Leontini.

Timoleon thus became the undisputed master of Syracuse. Although he might easily have made himself tyrant of the city, he resolved to show that neither he nor any other private person should become the irresponsible ruler; and therefore one of his first acts was to call upon the people to destroy the citadel, which had been for so many years the seat and bulwark of the power of the tyrants. His next care was to reap the city, which had become so deserted that whole streets were left without inhabitants, and grass grew in the market-place in sufficient quantity to feed the horses. He sent embassadors to Corinth, to invite persons to come and settle at Syracuse, holding out to them as an inducement a division of lands. Corinth collected in Greece ten thousand colonists, who sailed to Syracuse; and such numbers flocked to the city from different parts of Italy and Sicily, that the number of new inhabitants amounted to sixty thousand. Having thus collected a population, he proceeded to enact laws for their government. Of the details of these we are not informed. We only know that they were of a democratic nature, and that he appointed a chief magistrate, to be elected annually, who was called the Amphipolis, and whose name was to be the Olympian Zeus, with the addition of his name to the Syracusean year. The historian adds that this office continued to be in existence in his time, that is, in the reign of Augustus (Diod. xvi. 70). The arrangement of the internal affairs of Syracuse engaged the principal attention of Timoleon for the next two or three years; but during that time he did not neglect the great object to which he had now devoted his life, the expulsion of the tyrants from the cities. He compelled Leptines, who was tyrant of Apollonia and Engyum, to surrender his power, and sent him into exile at Corinth. He was not, however, so successful in an attack upon Leontini (Diod. xvi. 72), although Plutarch represents him as forcing Hicetas to demolish his strongholds, and live among the Leontines as a private person (Tim. 24). But as these expeditions did not bring his troops much booty, and it was necessary to find both employment and rewards for his mercenaries, he sent the latter into the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily, where they reaped a rich harvest, and compelled many cities to desert the Carthaginian cause.

The Carthaginians did not need this provocation to engage in war against Timoleon. The rise of a new power at Syracuse, and the union of the Sicilian Greeks, could not but excite jealousy among the Carthaginians. They had been so exasperated against Mago for his cowardly conduct in leaving Sicily, that they would have crucified him if he had not put an end to his own life; and they now resolved to send a force to Sicily sufficiently powerful to subdue the whole island. This formidable armament reached Lilybaeum in B.C. 339. It was under the command of Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, and is said to have consisted of 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and war-chariots, with a fleet of 200 ships of war, and 1000 other vessels carrying a vast quantity of provisions and military stores. Such an overwhelming force struck the Greeks with consternation and dismay. So great was their alarm that Timoleon, according to Diodorus (xvi. 78), could only induce twelve thousand men to march with him against the Carthaginians, including in that number his mercenaries, and even of them one thousand deserted him on the march. Timoleon hastened to meet the enemy with this small force, knowing that any delay, in the divided condition in which the Sicilians still were, might prove fatal to him. The Carthaginian commanders were equally anxious to bring matters to a speedy decision, confident of victory from their superior numbers. The Greeks found the Carthaginians encamped on one side of the Crimessus or Crimissus, a river which flows into the Hypsa, on the south-western coast of Sicily. Timoleon drew up his troops on the brow of a hill overlooking the Carthaginian army, who were on the further bank of the river. The Carthaginian commanders, impatient for the victory, began to cross the river in presence of the enemy. This favourable circumstance determined the movements of Timoleon. As soon as the Carthaginian army was divided by the stream, he charged them with all his forces. The Carthaginians resisted bravely, but in the hottest of the fight a dreadful storm came on, attended with lightning, hail, and rain, which beat full in the faces of the Carthaginians. Unable to bear up against the storm, and to hear the commands of their officers amidst the roar of the thunder, and the clattering of the rain and hail upon their arms, the Carthaginians began to retreat and make for the river; but pursued by the Greeks, their retreat soon became a rout; a panic spread through their ranks; and the different nations of which the vast army was composed, ignorant one of another's language, and alarmed by fear, used their swords against one another, each eager to gain the stream. Numbers were killed, and still more were drowned in the river. The victory was complete, and justly ranks as one of the greatest gained by Greeks over barbarians. It was fought in the middle of summer, B. C. 339. The booty which Timoleon and his troops gained was prodigious; and some of the richest of the spoils he sent to Corinth and other cities in Greece, thus diffusing the glory of his victory throughout the mother country.

The victory of the Crimessus brought Timoleon such an accession of power and influence, that he now resolved to carry into execution his project of expelling all the tyrants from Sicily. Of these, two of the most powerful, Hicetas of Leontini, and Mamercus of Catana, had resort to the Carthaginians for assistance, who sent Gisco to Sicily with a fleet of seventy ships and a body of Greek mercenaries. Although Gisco gained a few successes at first, the war was upon the whole favourable to Timoleon, and the Carthaginians were therefore glad to conclude a treaty with the latter in B. C. 338, by which the river Halycus was fixed as the boundary of the Carthaginian and Greek dominions in Sicily. It was during the war with Gisco that Hicetas fell into the hands of Timoleon. He had been completely defeated by Timoleon at the river Damarius, and was taken prisoner a few days afterwards, with his son Eupolemus. They were both slain by Timoleon's order. His wife and daughters were carried to Syracuse; where they were executed by command of the people, as a satisfaction to the menses of Dion, whose wife Arete and sister Aristomache had both been put to death by Hicetas. This is one of the greatest stains upon Timoleon's character, as he might easily have saved these unfortunate women, if he had chosen.

After the death of Hicetas, and the treaty between the Carthaginians and Timoleon, Mamercus, being unable to maintain himself in Catana, fled to Messana, where he took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. Timoleon quickly followed, and besieged Messana so vigorously by sea and land, that Hippon, despairing of holding out, attempted to escape by sea, but was taken and put to death in the public theatre. Mamercus now surrendered, stipulating only for a public trial before the Syracusans, with the condition that Timoleon should not appear as his accuser. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly at Syracuse, the people refused to hear him, and unani mously condemned him to death.

Thus almost all the tyrants were expelled from the Greek cities in Sicily, and a democratical form of government established in their place. Timoleon, however, was in reality the ruler of Sicily, for all the states consulted him on every matter of importance; and the wisdom of his rule is attested by the flourishing condition of the island for several years even after his death. He reproved the great cities of Agrigentum and Gela, which had been laid desolate by the Carthaginians, and also settled colonies in other cities. He did not, however, assume any title or office, but resided as a private citizen among the Syracusans, to whom he left the administration of their own affairs. Once, when his public conduct was attacked in the popular assembly by a demagogue of the name of Demaenetus, Timoleon is reported to have thanked the gods for answering his prayer that the Syracusans might enjoy freedom of speech; and when Laphystius, another demagogue, demanded that Timoleon should give sureties to answer an indictment that was brought against him, and some of Timoleon's friends began thereupon to raise a clamour, Timoleon himself restrained them by saying, that the great object of all his toils and exertions had been to make the law the same for all the Syracusans. A short time before his death Timoleon became completely blind, but the Syracusans notwithstanding continued to pay him the same honour as they had done before, and took his advice on all difficult cases. He died, according to Diodorus, in B. C. 337, in the eighth year after his first arrival in Sicily. He was buried at the public expense in the market-place at Syracuse, where his monument was afterwards surrounded with porticoes and a gymnasium, which was called after him the Timoleontium. Annual games were also instituted in his honour. Timoleon certainly deserves to be regarded as one of the greatest men of Greece, and it is not the slightest eulogium paid to him, that Mitford, with all his prejudices against the destroyer of his favourite tyrants, is able to detract so little from the virtues and merits of Timoleon. (Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos, Life of Timoleon; Diod. vii. 65—80; Polyen. v. 3. § 8; Mitford, History of Greece, c. xxii.)

TIMOCHUS (Τιμοχύς), an Athenian, of the demus of Acharnae. In B. C. 366, he commanded a body of Athenian troops, which, in conjunction with a Lacedaemonian force, had been appointed to guard the Isthmus of Corinth against... the Thebans. But they neglected to occupy the passes of Oneium, and Epanominos, who was preparing to invade Achaia, persuaded Peisias, the Argive general, to seize a commanding height of the mountain. The Thebans were thus enabled to make their way through the Isthmus (Xen.
Hell. vii. i. § 41; Dod. xyv. 75). Towards the end, apparently, of B.C. 301, Timomachus was sent out to take the command in Thrace, for which he seems to have been specially the elder, and the failure of which as much at least as his immediate predecessors, Menon and Autocles, in forwarding the Athenian interests in that quarter. Not only were his mi-itary arrangements defective, but, according to the statement of Aeschines, it was through its culpable casiness of disposition that Hegesander, his treasurer (tajlas), was enabled to appropriate to his own use no less than 80 minae. (more than 300£) of the public money. Timomachus appears to have been superseded by Cephisodotus in B.C. 300, and, on his return to Athens, was impeached by Apol-lodorus (son of Pasion, the banker), who had been one of his trierarchs. He was condemned, and, according to Domenesthenes, was heavily fined; but his punishment was death, if we may believe the statement of the Scholiast on Aeschines (Aesch.
c. Tim. p. 8; Schol. ad loc., Dem. de Fals. Leg.
Rhehdant., Vid. Ipiv., Churrn., Tim. cap. v. §§ 7, 9).
It was during the minority and of Timomachus, in Thrace that he received a letter from Cotys, who repudiated in it the promises he had made to the Athenians when he wanted their aid against the rebel Milbocyttes. (Dem. a. Arist. p. 658.)

TIMOMACHUS (Tumâuαxos), a very distinguished painter, of Byzantium. He lived (if the statement of Pliny, as contained in all the editions, be correct) in the time of Julius Caesar, who purchased two of his pictures, the Ajayx and Medea, for the immense sum of eighty Attic talents, and dedicated them in the temple of Venus Genitrix.
(Plin. H. N. vii. 58, s. 39, xxxx. 4. s. 9, 11. s. 40.
§ 30.) In the last of these passages, Pliny defines the artist's age in the following very distinct terms:
"— Timomachus Byzantinus Caesaris Dictatoris oedate Ajacem et Medeam pinxit." But here an important and important point is raised. In Cicerio's well-known enumeration of the masterpieces of Grecian art, which were to be seen in various cities (in Vorr. iv. 60), he alludes to the Ajayx and Medea at Cyzicus, but without mentioning the painter's name. (Quid Cysicoen [arbitramini merere velle], ut Ajacem, et Medeam [amittant?]?) From this passage a presumption is raised, that the two pictures should be referred to a period much earlier than the time of Caesar, namely to the best period of Grecian art, to which most of the other works, in connection with which they are mentioned, are known to have belonged:
at all events, as the manner in which they are referred to by Cicero presupposes their being already celebrated throughout the Roman empire, it is not likely that they could have been painted during the life of Caesar, and it is of course impossible that they were painted during his dictatorship.
But then, the question comes, whether these were the paintings mentioned by Pliny, and, as will presently be seen, celebrated by other writers.
The first impulse of any reader would be to assume this, as a matter of course; and it would be strange indeed if, while two such pictures as the Ajayx and Medea, celebrated by Cicero, existed at Cyzicus, two others on the same subjects should have been painted by Timomachus, and should have been admired as we know they were, and that the pictures of Ajayx and Medea should be simply mentioned by Pliny as well known, without any distinction being made between the two pairs of pictures. It is true that, from one of the passages of Pliny above cited (v. §§ 7, 9), it seems that the painter has been drawn that, besides the Ajayx and Medea, which Caesar dedicated in the temple of Venus, there was another pair of pictures brought to Rome by Agrippa, who purchased them from the Cyzicenes at a great price, namely, an Ajayx and Venus; but the passage is extremely difficult to understand clearly; and, even taking the above explanation, any conclusion drawn from it would apply only to the Ajayx, and not to the Medea, which was evidently the more celebrated of the two. On the whole, then, it seems most probable that the pictures at Cyzicus, mentioned by Cicero, were the very pictures of Timomachus, which were purchased by Julius Caesar; and therefore that the word oedate in Pliny must either be rejected, or interpreted with a considerable latitude. In confirmation of this conclusion another passage is cited from Pliny himself (I. c. § 41), in which he emu-lates his examples of the last unfinished pictures of the greatest artists, which were more admired than even their finished works, the Medea of Timomachus, in connection with the Iris of Aristide, the Tyndaridae of Nicomachus, and the Venus of Apelles; whence it has been argured that Timomachus was probably contemporary with the other great painters there mentioned, and moreover that it is incredible that Caesar should have given the large price above mentioned for two pictures of a living artist, especially when one of them was unfinished. Still, any positive chronological conclusion from these arguments can only be received with much caution. They seem to prove that Timomachus flourished not later than the early part of the first century B.C., but they do not prove that he is to be carried back to the third century.
The associations of works and names, in the passages of Cicero and Pliny, have respect to the order of excellence and not to that of time; and it must be remembered that a great artist often obtains a reputation even above his merits during his life and soon after his death, and that fashion, as well as fame, will set a high pecuniary value on such an artist's works. On the other hand, a positive argument, to prove that Nicomachus lived later than the time of that flourishing period of the art which is marked by the name of Apelles, may be drawn from the absence of any mention of him by Pliny in his proper chronological order, which indicates the absence of his name from the works of the Greek authors whom Pliny followed, and that he was one of those recent artists who were only known to Pliny by their works which he had seen.
Without attempting to arrive at any more precise conclusion with regard to the age of Timomachus, we proceed to state what is known of his works.
(I.) The two pictures already mentioned were the most celebrated of all his works, and the Medea appears to have been esteemed his masterpiece. It is referred to, in terms of the highest praise, in several passages of the ancient writers, from which we learn that it represented Medea TIMONACHUS.

meditating the murder of her children, but still hesitating between the impulses of revenge for her own wrongs and of pity for her children. A general notion of the composition is probably preserved in a painting on the same subject found at Pompeii (Mus. Borb. v. 33; Pompeii, vol. ii. p. 190), and the type of Medea is seen in a figure found at Herculanenum (Antiq. di Ercol. i. 13; Mus. Borb. x. 21), and on some gems. (Lippert, Suppl. i. 93; Panofka, Annal. d. Inst. i. p. 243; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst,§ 208, n. 2.) A minute description of the emotions expressed in the artist's Medea is given in the following epigrams from the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plan. iv. 133, 136, p. 317; Bruneck, Annal. vol. iii. p. 214, vol. iv. p. 174; Jacobs, Archl. Pal. Append. vol. ii. p. 667.) The first is anonymous:—

Τεχνὴ Τιμομάχου στοργῆς καὶ ζήλου θεϊκή Μηδείης, τέκνων εἰς μόρον ἐκλεκτῶν:
τῇ μὲν γὰρ συνέκεισεν ἡ ἐποίησις, ἢ δ’ ἀπαντεῖ σέβειν καὶ κτένειν βουλητῆν τέκνα.

The other is ascribed to Antiphiilus:—

Τῶν ὀλίγων Μηδείαν ὑπ’ ἔγγαρα Τιμομάχου χειρ, ζῆλον καὶ τέκνων ἀντιμεθελκόμενον, μορφὸν ἐρωτό μέχρι, τῇ θείᾳ διασα καραθεί, ἀπὸ τὸ μέν εἰς ἁγγεί σειρῆς, τὸ δ’ εἰς ἔλεγον.
ἀμφότεροι δ’ ἐπήκρουσαν ὡς τοῦ πόνου, ἐν γὰρ ἂν πρὶς ἄνειλαν δάκρυσαν, ἢν ἐλείον ὁ διδός ἀναστρέφεται.
Ἀρκεῖ δ’ ἡ λέλυκται, ἡς σαφῆς: αἰμα τεῖκνων ἔξεπε Μηδείης, κοβ χειρ Τιμομάχου.

There is a similar epigram by Ausonius (No. 129). From these descriptions it appears that the great art of Timomachus consisted in the expression of that conflict of emotions which preceded the perpetration of some dreadful act, and in exciting in the minds of the spectators the corresponding emotions of terror and pity, which are the end aimed at by all tragic exhibitions; and, at the same time, in avoiding the excess of horror, by representing, not the deed itself, but only the conception of it in the mind. Plutarch mentions the painting as an example of one of those works of art, in which unnatural deeds (πράξεις ἄτοποι) are represented, and which, while we abhor the deed, we praise on account of the skill shown in representing it in a becoming manner (τὴν τεχνήν, ἐμειται προσωποκατο μένος, Plut. de Aud. Poet. 8, p. 18, b.). There are also at least two other epigrams upon the picture in the Greek Anthology (Jacobs, l.c. Nos. 137, 138), from the former of which we learn that it was painted in encaustic; and, from the connection in which Timomachus is mentioned by Pliny, it would seem that this was the case with all his works.

(2.) His Ajax resembled his Medea in the conflict of emotions which it expressed. It represented the hero in his madness, meditating the act of suicide. It is described by Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. ii. 10), in an epigram in the Greek Anthology (Jacobs, l.c. No. 63, p. 649), and by Ovid (Trist. ii. 520).

(3.) His other works are mentioned by Pliny in the following words:—" Timomachi aequo laudantur Ovetsra, Ippagenia in Tauris, Lecythion agitlitis exercitator, Cognatii nobilium, Palliatii, quas dicturos pinxit, alterum stantem, alterum sedentem; paeripe tamen are ei favisse in Gorgone visa est," (Plin. ii. N. xxxiv. 11. s. 40. § 30.) [P.S.]
TIMON.

The writings of Timon are represented as very numerous. According to Diogenes, in the order of whose statements there appears to be some confusion, he composed Ἠτοῖ, καὶ τραγῳδίας, καὶ σατύρων, καὶ δράματα κυωνικά τρικόντα, τραγικὰ δὲ ἕξηκοντα, σκίλους τε καὶ κινιάδους. The double mention of his tragedies raises a suspicion that Dio-genies may have combined two different accounts of his writings in this sentence; but perhaps it may be explained by supposing the words τραγικὰ δὲ ἕξηκοντα to be inserted simply in order to put the number of his tragedies side by side with that of his comedies. Some may find another difficulty in the passage, on account of the great number and variety of the poetical works ascribed to Timon; but this is nothing surprising in a writer of that age of universal imitative literature; nor, when the early theatrical occupations of Timon are borne in mind, is it at all astonishing that his taste for the drama should have prompted him to the composition of sixty tragedies and thirty comedies, besides a large number of satirical poems. One thing, however, is important to observe. The composition of tragedies and comedies by the same author is an almost certain indication that his dramas were intended only to be read, and not to be acted. No remains of his dramas have come down to us.

Of his epic poems we know very little; but it may be presumed that they were chiefly ludicrous or satirical poems in the epic form. Possibly his Python (Πώμω), which contained a long account of a conversation with Pyrrhon, during a journey to Pytho, may be referred to this class; unless it was in prose (Diog. ix. 64, 105; Euseb. Preap. Ev.
xiv. p. 761, a.). It appears probable that his Ἀρκεσθαίου περὶδειπνοι πρὸ δείπνου was a sattirical poem in epic verse (Diog. ix. 115; Ath. ix.
p. 406, c.). Whether he wrote parodies on Homer or whether he merely occasionally, in the course of his writings, parodied passages of the Homeric poems, cannot be determined with certainty from the lines in his extant fragments which are evident parodies of Homer, such, for example, as the verse preserved by Diogenes,

'Εστετε νῦν μοι θυσία πολυπράγμονες ἐςτε σοφισταῖ, which is an obvious parody on the Homeric invoculation (Il. ii. 494),

'Εστετε νῦν μοι Μόιβα Ὀλυμπία Ὀκμάτι ἕχοσα,

The most celebrated of his poems, however, were the satiric compositions called Silli (σίλλοι), a word of somewhat doubtful etymology, but which undoubtedly describes metrical compositions, of a character at once ludicrous and sarcastic. The invention of this species of poetry is ascribed to Xenophanes of Colophon. [XENOPHANEΣ] The Silli of Timon were in three books, in the first of which he spoke in his own person, and the other two are in the form of a dialogue between the author and Xenophanes of Colophon, in which Timon proposed questions, to which Xenophanes replied at length. The subject was a sarcastic account of the tenets of all philosophers, living and death; an unbounded field for scepticism and satire. They were in hexameter verse, and, from the way in which they are mentioned by the ancient writers, as well as from the few fragments of them which have come down to us, it is evident that they were very admirable productions of their kind. (Diog.

l. c.; Aristocles ap. Euseb. Preap. Ev. xiv. p. 763,
c.; Suid. s. v. σιλλαδεῖς, Τίμων; Ath. passim; Gell. ii. 17.) Commentaries were written on the Silli by Apollonides of Nicaea, as already mentioned, and also by Sotion of Alexandria. (Ath. viii. p. 336, d.) The poem entitled Ἠδαιμονία, in elegiac verse, appears to have been similar in its subject to the Silli (Diog. Laér. ix. 65). Diogenes also mentions Timon's ἰσαβεί (ix. 110), but perhaps the word is here merely used in the sense of satirical poems in general, without reference to the metre.

He also wrote in prose, to the quantity, Diogenes tells us, of twenty thousand lines. These works were no doubt on philosophical subjects, but all we know of their specific character is contained in the three references made by Diogenes to Timon's works περὶ αἰτιόθεως, περὶ γίτιόθεως, καὶ κατὰ σοφίας.

The fragments of his poems have been collected by
H. Stephanus, in his Poëtica Philosophica, 1573, 8vo.; by J. F. Langenrich, at the end of his Dissertationes Graecorum, 1720, 1721, 1723, 4to.; by Brunnck, 1820, 8vo.; and by F. Paul, in his Dissertatio de Silli, Berol. 1821, 8vo. (See also Creuzer and Daub's Studien, vol. vi.

2. Timon the Misanthrope (ὁ μιανθρώπος) is distinguished from Timon of Philus by Diogenes (ix. 112), but, as has been remarked above, it is not clear how much, or whether any part, of the information Diogenes gives respecting Timon is to be referred to this Timon rather than the former.
The Timon of the ancient biographers and philosophers was an Athenian, the demi of Colytus, and his father's name was Echecrnites. In consequence of the ingratitude he experienced, and the disappointments he suf-ferrred, from his early friends and companions, he secluded himself entirely from the world, admitting no one to his society except Alcibiades, in whose reckless and variable disposition he probably found pleasure in tracing and studying an image of the world he had abandoned; and at last he is said to have died in consequence of refusing to suffer a surgeon to come to him to set a broken limb. His grave is said to have been planted with thorns, and the following epitaph upon him is preserved in the Greek Anthology (Bruneck, Anoth. vol. i. p. 153; Jacobs, Anth. Gr. vol. i. p. 86):—

Ε'ωθη ἀπορρήτας ψυχής βαρβαζομένη κείμαι, Τοῦθον έν ου ποιεσθέν, κακό δέ κακοῦ ἀνθίζωθεν.

The few details recorded of his eccentricities by the authors above cited have no value except as contributing to the study of his whole character, as one type of the diseased human mind, a subject which lies beyond our present limits, but for which the reader will find ample materials in comparing the ancient authorities with Shakespear's Timon of Athens, and in this comparison Mr. Knight's Introductory Notice to that tragedy will be found to give valuable assistance. [P. S.]

TIMON, a satyr, of whom nothing is known beyond the mention of him by Pliny as one of those who made athletēs et armatos et venatores sacrificantesque. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 34.)

TIMO'NAX (Τιμόναξ), wrote Σωκλήδης and Πελ. Σκυρίν. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iii. 1235, iv. 328, 1217.)

TIMONIDES (Τιμωνίδης), accompanied Dion into Sicily, and fought on his side. On one occasion, when Dion had been wounded while fighting against the mercenaries of Dionysius, and was obliged to retire from the combat, he appointed Timonides to the command of his troops. The history of Dion's wars in Sicily was related by Timonides in some letters to the philosopher Speusippos, which are quoted by Plutarch and Diogenes Laërtius. (Plut. Dion. cc. 22, 30, 31, 35; Diog. Laërt. i. 5, where Τιμωνίδης must be read instead of Σωκλήδης; C. Miller, Fragm. Historic. Græc. vol. ii. p. 83, Paris, 1848.) The Scholiast on Theocritus (i. 68) quotes a work on Sicily by Simonides, where Timonides is probably likewise the correct reading. In the article Simonides (p. 836, b) an error has been committed, which may be corrected from the preceding account.

TIMOPHANES (Τιμοφάνης), the brother of Timoleon. [TIMOLEON.]

TIMOSTHENES (Τιμόσθενης), the Rhodian, was the admiral of the fleet of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned from B.C. 285 to 247. He may therefore be placed about B.C. 222. He wrote a work on Harbours (πελμονέας), in ten books, which was copied by Eratosthenes, and which is frequently cited by the ancient writers. Strabo says (ix. p. 421) that Timothenes also wrote poetry. (Marcell. Heracleot. p. 63; Strab. ii. 92, ii. p. 140, et alibi; Harpocrat. s. v. έπ' έποιθ; Schol. ad Theocrit. xiii. 22; Steph. Byz. s. v. άετός, άαρ' ανδρός, et alibi; Vossius, De Hest. Græce, pp. 147, 148, ed. Westermann; Clinton, Fast. Helv. iii. p. 508.)

TIMOSTRATUS (Τιμόστρατος), a comic poet, of unknown time, the author of four dramas, Άρωσις, Πόρη, Παρακαταδηγή, and Φιλαδελφείς, of which we have scarce any remains, beyond the titles. (Antip. ii. pp. 80, 81, 1, 39, 23, 91, 1, 98, 4; Phot. Lex. s. v. ειρή.) He is mentioned by Phocius among the poets quoted by Stobaeus (Ibid. Cod. 167, p. 374) but no references are found in our present copies of Stobaeus. It is probable also that the name of a poet Δημοστράτος is quoted by Suidas (s. v. χροφον) an error for Τιμόστρατος. (Meineke, Frag. Con. Graec. vol. i. pp. 499, 500, vol. iv. pp. 595, 596; Editio Minor, p. 1184.) [P. S.]

TIMO'THEUS (Τιμόθεος), historical, 1. Father of Conon, the famous general. (Paus. viii. 52.)

2. Son of Conon, was a native of the demus of Anaphylatus, and, according to a probably conjecture of Bockeck, belonged to the priestly family of the Eumolpidae (Corp. Inser. 383; see Rehdanz, Vit. Iph. Chabri. Tim. p. 45). For the statement of Athenaeus (xii. p. 577, a), that his mother was a Thracian hetaira, there appear to be no grounds. Inhabiting a considerable fortune from his father, he seems in his early years to have indulged in the display of it, as we may gather from an allusion in the Pictus of Aristophanes (b. c. 338); and we may therefore well believe the assertion, that it was through his intercourse with Isocrates that his mind was directed to higher views (Lys. de Arist. Bon. p. 155; Arist. Plut. 180; Schol. ad loc.; Dem. c. Aphob. i. p. 815, c. Aphob. de F. T. p. 862; Pseudo-Dem. Erod. p. 1415). In b.c. 378, Timotheus was made general with Chabrias and Callistratus, and it is possible that, while Chabrias was occupied in Boeotia, his colleagues commanded the fleet, and were engaged in bringing over Euboea and other islands to the Athenian confederacy (Xen. Hell. v. 4. § 34; Diod. xx. 29, 40; Plut. de Glor. Ath. 9; Rehdanz, p. 57). In b.c. 375, Timotheus was sent with sixty ships to cruise round the Peloponnesus, in accordance with the suggestion of the Thebans, that the Spartans might thus be prevented from invading Boeotia. On his voyage he ravaged Laconia, and then proceeded to Corcyra, which he brought over to the Athenian alliance, behaving after his success with great moderation. This conduct, together with his conciliatory disposition and manners, contributed mainly to the prosperous issue of his further negotiations, and he succeeded in gaining the alliance of the Cephallenians and Acarnanians, as well as that of Aetolas, the king of Epirus. A Spartan fleet under Nicolochus was sent out against him, but he defeated it off Alyzia on the Acarnanian coast, and, being strengthened shortly after by a reinforcement from Corcyra, he entirely commanded the sea, though, having brought with him only thirteen talents from home, he was greatly embarrassed for want of funds (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 62—66; Dem. c. Arist. p. 686; Isocr. περί Αντίρρητος § 116; Diod. xv. 36; Corn. Nep. Tím. 2; Ael. V. H. iii. 16; Pseudo-Arist. Oecon. ii. 23; Polyena, iii. 10). In the following year peace was concluded between Athens and Sparta, and Timotheus was recalled. On his way, however, he stopped at Zacynthus, and forcibly restored some democratic exiles who had fled to him for refuge; hereupon the oligarchical party in the island complained to Sparta, and the failure of her application to Athens for redress led to a renewal of the war (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 2, 3; Diod. xv. 45). In b.c. 376, he was appointed to the command of sixty ships destined to act against Messapius in Corcyra; but he had no means of fully manning his squadron, and he was obliged therefore to cruise about the Aegean for the purpose of collecting men and money. It would appear to have been in the course of this cruise that he formed an intimacy with Amyntas, king of Macedonia, who made him a present of a quantity of timber for a house which he was building in the Piraeus. A considerable time, however, was expended in these preliminary operations, the danger of losing Coreya was becoming more and more imminent, and Timotheus, being accused by Iphicrates and Callisthenes, was deposed from his command, and recalled to Athens to stand his trial. This came on in the autumn of the same year, and he obtained an acquittal principally through the intervention of Jason of Pherae, and Alcetas, king of Epirus, who had come to Athens to intercede for him. In the oration against him written for Apollodoros, son of Pasion, and ascribed to Demostenes, there are many statements connected with the circumstances of Timotheus at this period, which we must of course regard with suspicion; but we learn from it certainly that he was now reduced to great pecuniary embarrassments, having probably expended his mine of the public service, and was even compelled to borrow from Pasion whereewithal to receive his distinguished guests above mentioned (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 11—13; Diod. xv. 47; Dem. c. Tim. pp. 1186—1192, &c.; Corn. Nep. Tim. 4). In the following year (a. c. 372) he entered into the service of Artaxerxes II, king of Persia, and went to command against Nectanabes I. in Egypt; but of his operations in this quarter we have no record (Dem. c. Tim. pp. 1191, 1192, 1195). It appears to have been about b. c. 367 that he was sent by the Athenians to aid Ariobarzanes, with an injunction, however, not to abet him in any enterprise against the king, his master; and accordingly, when he found that he was in open revolt from Artaxerxes, he refused to give him any assistance. He did not, however, consider himself precluded from besieging Samos, which was occupied by a Persian garrison under Cyropheus, and, if he had felt any scruples, the report of the king, so favourable to Thebes at the expense of Athens, must have removed them [Pseudo-Lophidas; Leon, No. 6]. The attack on the island was successful, and at the end of ten or twelve months Samos was restored to the Athenian alliance. Timotheus then sailed northward, and took the towns of Sestus and Chritote on the Hellespont, acquisitions which, according to Isocrates, first directed the attention of the Athenians to the recovery of the whole Chersonesus. If we may believe Cornelius Nepos, he was placed in possession of these two places by Ariobarzanes, as a reward for his services to him; but it is not easy to reconcile this statement with the account of Demostenes, as given above, of his refusal to help the rebel satrap, (Dem. pro Rhod. Lib. pp. 192, 193; Isocr. xep. Aritis. §§ 118, &c.; Corn. Nep. Tim. 1; Pseudo-Arist. Oec. ii. 23; Polyen. iii. 10.)

These successes, coupled probably with their jealousy of Iphicrates as the son-in-law of Coreya, seem to have mainly induced the Athenians to appoint Timotheus instead of him as commander in Macedonia (b. c. 364), where the recovery of Amphipolis was the great object of their wishes. In the interval between the recall of Iphicrates and the arrival of Timotheus, the Athenian forces were commanded by Callisthenes, whose disadvantageous treaty with Perdiccas III. of Macedonia contributed perhaps to hamper the new general, when he came on the scene of action. Timotheus, on taking the command, endeavoured to secure the services of the adventurer Charideus, but the latter passed over to the service of Coreya, in ships with which the Athenians themselves had furnished him; and it was now perhaps that, desiring of any effectual attack on Amphipolis, Timotheus turned his arms against the Olyanthians, from whom, with the help of king Perdiccas, he took Potidaea and Torone; and followed up these successes, if we may believe Ipho- crates, his friend and panegyrist, with the capture of all the Chalidian towns. It was in the same year, if we adopt the chronology of Diodorus, that he rejected an application from the nobles of Heraclia on the Euxine to aid them against the people; and in the same year, too, he relieved Cyzicus from a siege in which it was hard pressed, perhaps by the Persian garrison, which the citizens had ejected, perhaps, according to a conjecture of Mitford, by the armament of Epaminondas, who at the time was endeavouring to make Thebes a naval power, and to contest with Athens the sovereignty of the sea. The chronology, however, of the operations of Timotheus at this period is very uncertain; but on the whole it appears probable, following the views of Rehdanz, in preference to those of Thirlwall, that his campaign in the Chersonesus against Coreya was subsequent to his attempt at Amphipolis. The latter turned out an utter failure, the enemy having collected against him with numbers so superior, that he found it necessary to burn his ships on the Strymon, and to make his retreat by land. He was more successful, however, in the war with Coreya, who was probably assisted by the Byzantians (b. c. 3637), and gathered from his territory booty to the value of 1200 talents. (Dem. Olynth. ii. p. 22, iii. p. 38; Schol. Aug. ad loc.; Dem. c. Arist. pp. 669, 679; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 63; Isocr. xep. Arrid. § 119; Deinarch. c. Dem. p. 91; Philostr. p. 110; Diod. xv. 91; Pseudo-Arist. Oeo. &c.; Polyen. iii. 10; Just. xvi. 4; C. Nep. Tim. 1; Mitford's Greece, vol. v. p. 220; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. pp. 189, 193, 206, 217, 218; Rehdanz, pp. 132, &c.) [Charidemus; Clearchus.]

At this period Timotheus would probably be at the height of his glory and popularity, not only among the Athenians, but with many of the other Greeks, a popularity, however, not unmixted with envy, if we may believe the anecdote related by Aelian, that painters were wont to represent him as sleeping in his tent, while Fortune, standing over his head, drew cities for him into a net. (Dem. c. Lepid. pp. 482, 483; Isocr. Ep. ad Myst. p. 426; Paus. i. 3; Ael. V. H. xii. 43; Plut. Reg. et Imp. Apoph. Tim. 1.) It seems most likely also that at this time, about b. c. 360, he increased his political influence by a reconciliation with Iphicrates, to whose son Menestheus he gave his daughter in marriage. (Aphraath. Max. i. 12.) The suit instituted against him by Apollodoros, the son of Pasion, for sundry sums of money alleged to have been borrowed by him from the latter, it is not possible to assign any exact date; but there is no period at which it can be fixed more satisfactorily than between b. c. 360 and 356. The oration, written for the plaintiff on this occasion, and ascribed to Demostenes, is still extant. (See Rehdanz, pp. 195, 196.) In b. c. 358, when the Thebans had sent a military force over to Euboea, Timotheus, by an energetic appeal and fervid eloquence, incited the Athenians to raise an armament for the purpose of opposing them there, and saving their own interests in the island. (Diod. xvi. 7; Dem. Olynth. i. p. 11, de Chers. p. 108, c. Androl. p. 597; Aesch. c. Ctes. p. 65.) In the following year the Social War broke out; and in the second campaign of it (c. 356) Timotheus, Iphocrates, and Menestheus were joined with Chares as commanders of the Athenian fleet. The circumstances which followed are variously interpreted. According to Diodorus, Chares vainly endeavoured to induce his colleagues to engage the enemy in a storm, and, on their refusal, wrote to the people, accusing them of treachery. The account of C. Nepos is that Chares, having risked a battle in spite of the weather, was defeated, and, in order to screen himself, laid the blame on the other generals for not supporting him. Any how they were recalled, and Iphocrates and Menestheus were brought to trial first, the prosecution being conducted by Aristophanes the Athenian. They were acquitted; but Timotheus was nevertheless afterwards arraigned, probably in c. 354, and condemned to the crushing fine of 100 talents (more than 24,000l.). From Deinarchus we learn that the main charge against him was the having received bribes from the Chians and Rhodians, and the truth of this, if we follow the common reading in the passage (Dein. c. Deinarchus p. 92), he himself confessed. According to I screates, his condemnation was caused chiefly by his haughty and unbecoming demeanour, and by his refusal to pay court to the people and the popular orators. Be that as it may, he was unable to pay the fine, and withdrew to Chalcis in Euboea, where he died shortly after. The Athenians subsequently remitted nine-tenths of the penalty, and allowed his son Conon to expend the remainder on the repair of the walls, which the famous Conon had restored. (Isocr. Pela. iv. 137, &c.; Diod. xvi. 21; C. Nep. Tim. 3, 4; Deinarch. c. Phileol. p. 110; Ael. V. H. iii. 47, xiv. 3; Perizon. ad loc.)

The character of Timotheus was marked by mildness and amiability, even though we should set against this the haughtiness and the somewhat presumptuous self-reliance which his brilliant successes seem to have produced in him. Like his contemporaries Chabrias and Chares, he preferred residing abroad when he could,—a preference which may be ascribed at least as much to the glaring evils of the Athenian democracy as to the luxurious propensities which have been, on no very strong grounds, imputed to him. The eloquence and learning which were united with his military talents, must be traced in a great measure to his intimate friendship with Icrastes, who frequently attended him in his campaigns, and wrote his despatches for him. As a general he possessed some of the highest qualities, and held in contempt that fiery rashness which, as in the case of Chabrias, forgets the special duties of the commander in the mere dashing gallantry of the soldier. (Ael. V. H. ii. 10, 18; Ath. x. p. 419, c. d., xii. p. 532, b.; Cic. Tus. Quaest. v. 35, de Orat. iii. 34, de Offic. i. 32; Nep. Chabr. 3; Plut. Sull. 6, Reg. et Imp. Apoph. Tim. 2.)

3. Son of Clearaus, the tyrant of Heracleia on the Euxine. After the death of his father in b. c. 354, he succeeded to the sovereignty, under the guardianship, at first, of his uncle Satyrus, and held the rule for fifteen years. There is extant a letter addressed to him by Icrastes, in which the rhetorician commends him for his good qualities, gives him some very common-place advice, and recommends to his notice a friend of his, named Autocorctor, the bearer of the epistle. (Diod. xvi. 36; Wess. ad loc.; Memm. ap. Phot. Bibb. 224; Isocr. Ep. ad Tim.) [Clearaus.]

4. An Athenian, of the priestly family of the Eumipidai, whom Polemny Lagi brought over to Egypt, to preside over the religious rites and ceremonies. He was consulted by the king when, in consequence of a dream, he was contemplating the introduction of the foreign deity Serapis. (Tac. Hist. iv. 83; Plut. de Is. et Osir. 26.)

TimoTHEUS (Τυμόθεος), literary. 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, of whose plays we have the following titles, Κυνάρων (Ath. vi. p. 243, d; Suid.), Πηγέτως, Παπακατάθεη, and Μεταβαλλόμενοι or Μεταφέρομενοι. The only fragments of his dramas extant are the three lines quoted by Athenaeus from the first of the above plays, and three other lines, without the title of the comedy to which they belong (Append. Flores. ad Stob. p. 23, 7, ed. Gaisford). Three of the above titles are identical with those of plays ascribed to other poets; namely, there is a Πηγέτως by Timothes, a Παπακατάθεη by Aristophon, Σωτέρ, Sophilus, and Timostratus, and a Μεταφέρομενοι by Poseidippus. The Κυνάρων, which Harless adds to the list of the comedies of Timothes, is evidently the title of a work of the celebrated dithyrambic poet Timotheus. (Fabric. Bibl. Gracce. vol. ii. p. 505; Meineke, Frag. Com. Gracce. vol. i. p. 428, vol. ii. p. 589; Editio Minor, p. 798.)

2. The celebrated musician and poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, a native of Mileitus, and the son of Thersander (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μίλητος; Marm. Par. Ep. 77; Alex. Aetol. ap. Macrob. Sat. v. 22; Suid. s. v.). Suidas calls him a son of Thersander, or Neomusor, or Philopoid; but, as Schmidt observes, when Suidas mentions several names for a person's father, Suidas is usually the one which he has obtained from the best authorities; and the same scholar has suggested that the name Νεομούσων should perhaps be read Νεομώσαυν, which is very likely to be the invention of a comic poet, in allusion to the innovations made by Timotheus in music. (Diatrib. in Dithyramb. pp. 96, 97.)

The date of Timotheus is marked by the ancients with tolerable precision. According to the Parian marble, he died in b. c. 357, in the nineteenth year of his age, which would place his birth in b. c. 446; but Suidas (s. v.) says that he lived ninety-seven years. The period at which he flourished is described by Suidas as about the times of Euripides, and of Philip of Macedon; and he is placed by Diodorus with Philoxenus, Telesidus, and Polyeides, at Ol. 95, b. c. 398. (Diod. xiv. 46.) The absence of any mention of Timotheus by Aristophanes (unless we suppose him to have been one of the many Timothei who, as the Scholast on the Plautus, v. 180, tells us, were attacked by the poet) is a proof that he could not have attained to much eminence before the date mentioned by Diodorus; but yet it must have been before that year that his innovations in music began to attract public attention; for we have the testimony not only of Suidas, but also of Plutarch (see below) to the fact of his beginning his career during the life-time of Euripides, and we have also Respecting the details of his life we have very little information. He is said to have spent some time at the Macedonian court; and reference will presently be made to a visit which he paid to Sparta. He appears to have formed his musical style chiefly on that of Phrynis, who was also a native of Miletus, and over whom he on one occasion gained a victory. He was at first unfortunate in his professional efforts. Even the Athenians, fond as they were of novelty, and accustomed as they were to the modern style of music introduced by Melanippe, Phrynis, and the rest, were offended at the still bolder innovations of Timotheus, and hissed off his performance. On this occasion it is said that Euripides encouraged Timotheus by the prediction that he would soon have the theatres at his feet (Plut. A. sen. 66. ered. Lecpul. 23, p. 793, c.d.). This prediction appears to have been accomplished in the vast popularity which Timotheus afterwards enjoyed.

Plutarch records his exaltation in his victory over Phrynis (De orth. neand. 1, p. 539, b. c.) and even when, on one occasion, he was conquered by Philiotis, a disciple of Polydus, he could console himself with the rebuke administered to the boasting master of his successful competitor by the witty Stratonicus, to věi avn wAvas (i.e. Polydus) ψαφίστα τωις Τιμοθέου τοις ναύμοις. (Ath. v. 8, p. 352, b.: the point of the saying is in the double meaning of ναύμον, θέαν and musical strains, and is untranslatable into English.) The Ephesians rewarded him, for his dedicatory hymn to Artemis, with the sum of a thousand pieces of gold (Alex. Acol. op. Macrob. Sat. v. 22): the last accomplishment, by which the education of the Arcadian youth was finished, was learning the names of Timotheus and Philoxenus (Polyb. iv. 20; Ath. xiv. p. 626, c.): and there is still extant a decree of the Cnossians, probably of the second century B.C., in which Timotheus and Polydus are mentioned with the highest praise, and their names associated with those of the ancient Cretan poets (see Polydus, p. 467, b.). Timotheus died in Macedonia, according to Stephanus of Byzantium

(1 c.), who has preserved the following epitaph upon him. (Also in Jacobs, Anth. Pal. App. No. 295, vol. ii. p. 851.)

Πάλα Μιλέτου τιτείη Μονοκαι απόφθεγμα Τιμιθέου, καθάρα δεξιόν ἁλόχον.

The general character of the music of Timotheus, and the nature of his innovations, are pretty clearly described in the fragment of Pherocrates above quoted, and in other passages of the ancient writers. He delighted in the most artificial and intricate forms of musical expression, "windings like the passages in ant-hills" (Pherrec. i. c.). He used instrumental music, without a vocal accompaniment, to a greater extent than any previous composer (at least if Ulrici is right in his interpretation of the words μοὴν βαδιότης in Pherocrates); and, in direct opposition to the ancient practice, he preferred the chromatic to the other genera of music, and employed it to such an extent, as to be by some considered its inventor. (Boëth. de Mus. i. 1, p. 137, 2, ed. Basil.) But perhaps the most important of his innovations, as the means of introducing all the others, was his addition to the number of the strings of the cithara. Respecting the precise nature of that addition the ancient writers are not agreed; but it is most probable, from the whole evidence, that the lyre of Timotheus had eleven strings. The eight-stringed cithara, formed by the addition of the chord of the octave which was wanting in the heptachord of Terpander, was used in the time of Pindar (Terp. AN. 20, c.). There were already ten strings to the cithara in the time of Ion of Chios, the contemporary of Sophocles (Ion, Epigr. ap. Euclid. Introd. Harmon. p. 19, ed. Meibom.): and the conjecture appears therefore probable that the tenth was added by Melanippe. There remains, therefore, only the eleventh string to be ascribed to Timotheus, for it is most probable that the mention of a twelve-stringed lyre, in the above passage of Pherocrates, according to the present text, arises from some error, and those who have substituted for δοκέων in the last verse, without injuring the metre. The positive testimonies for ascribing the eleventh string to Timotheus, are that of Suidas (s. v.), who, however, makes him the inventor of the tenth string also, which the testimony of Ion proves to be an error; and the tradition that, when Timotheus visited Sparta, and entered the musical contest at the Carnea, one of the Ephors snatched away his lyre, and cut from it the strings, four in number, by which it exceeded the seven-stringed lyre of Terpander, and, as a memorial of this public vindication of the ancient simplicity of music, and for a warning to future innovators, the Lacedaemonians hung up the mutilated lyre of Timotheus in their Scias. (Paus. iii. 12. § 8; Plut. Institut. Lacon. 17, p. 238, c. Agis, 10; Artemon. ap. Ath. xiv. p. 636, c; C. de Legg. ii. 13; the number of the additional strings is only stated in the first of these passages, but, besides the agreement of that number with the other evidence, it must be remembered that Pausanias actually saw the lyre hanging in the Scias at Sparta). It is quite a mistake to argue, in the spirit of a pseudo-rationalistic criticism, against the truth of this tradition, from the fact of the very same story being told about the nine-stringed lyre of Phrynis (Plut. Agis, 10. Apophth. Lacon. p. 220, c.); for the conduct ascribed to the Ephor is so characteristic of the state of Spartan feelings with reference to the ancient music, that we may easily believe such an incident to have occurred every time that the attempt was made to violate that feeling; so that the two stories rather confirm one another; and, moreover, they are mentioned together, as two distinct events, by Plutarch (Apol., 10). The tradition is also embodied, with other particulars of the innovations of Timotheus, in the alleged decree of the Spartans, preserved by Boeotius (de Mus, l.c.). It has been, however, very clearly proved by the basis decrees of Laconian grammarian of an unknown date. (See especially Müller, Dor. h. i. c. 6, § 3, vol. ii. pp. 316—319, ed. Schneidewin). Still it is of importance, as embodying what the grammarian, who forged it, had collected from the ancient writers respecting the musical innovations of Timotheus. The substance of it is an order to the Ephors to censure Timotheus the Milesian, for that he had dishonoured the ancient music, and had corrupted the ears of the youth by deserting the seven-stringed lyre, and introducing a multiplicity of strings, and a novelty of melodies, in which ignoble and diversified strains took the place of the old simple and sustained movements, and by changing the genius from the Enharmic to the Chromatic as an Antistrophic variation, and also for that, when invited to perform at the festival of the Eleusinian Demeter, he had given an indelent representation of the myth, and had improperly taught the youth the travails of Semele; and, besides this censure, he was to be ordered to cut away the strings of his lyre which exceeded seven.
TIMOTHEUS.

Suidas (s. v.) describes his style in general terms as a softening of the ancient music (τὴν άρχαϊαν μουσικήν ἐπι τὸ μαλακέτρου μετριῶς). And Plutarch mentions him, with Creuxus and Philoxenus, and the other poets of that age, as φορτικέται καὶ φλάκκανοι, and as especially addicted to the style called τῶν φλάκτρων καὶ θεμιτικῶν (de Mus. 12, p. 1135, d.).

With regard to the subjects of his compositions, and the manner in which he treated them, we have abundant evidence that he even went beyond the other musicians of the period in the liberties which he took with the ancient myths, in the attempt to make his music imitative as well as expressive, and in the confusion of the different subjects and department of lyric poetry; in one word, in the application of that false principle, which also misled his friend Euripides, that pleasure is the end of poetry. Unfortunately the fragments of the poems of Timotheus and the other musicians of the period are insufficient to guide us to a full knowledge of their style; but we can judge of its general character by the chorale parts of the tragedies of Euripides, and by the description of Plato (de Legg. iii. p. 700, e), aided by the ancient testimonies, and the few fragments collected by later writers. The subject is well, though briefly, treated by Müller (Hist. of Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. ii. pp. 61, 62), who remarks that in the late dithyramb "there was no unity of thought; no one tone pervading the whole poem, so as to preserve in the hearers a consistent train of feelings; no subordination of the story to certain ethical ideas; no artificially constructed system of verses regulated by fixed laws; but a loose and wanton play of lyrical sentiments, which were set in motion by the accidental impulses of some mythical story, and took now one direction, now another; preferring, however, to seize on such points as gave room for an immediate imitation in tones, and admitting a mode of description which luxuriated in sensual charms." And a little above (p. 60)—"At the same time the dithyramb assumed a descriptive, or, as Aristotle says, a mimetic character (μεταστασία). The natural phenomena which it described were imitated by means of tunes and rhythms and the pantomimic gestures of the actors (as in the antiquated Hyperchome); and this was very much to the advantage of the instrumental accompaniment, which sought to represent with its loud full tones the raging elements, the voices of wild beasts, and other sounds. A parasite wittily observed of one of these storm-dithyrambs of Timotheus, that 'he had seen greater storms than those which Timotheus made in many a kettle of boiling water' (Ath. viii. 338, a.). A striking example of this mimetic and sensuous mode of representation is furnished by the dithyramb of Timotheus, entitled "the Travail of Semele" (Σεμέλης άφθαρτος), which is censured in the pseudo-Lacedemonian decree already quoted, and on one passage of which Stratonicus is said to have asked, "If she had been bringing forth a mechanic, and not a god, what sort of cries would she have uttered?" (Ath. viii. p. 352, a.; comp. Dio Chrys. Orat. 27, p. 426, ed. Reuske.)

The language of Timotheus was redundant and luxuriant, as we see by a fragment from his Cyclops, preserved by Athenaeus (xi. p. 465, d.). Of the boldness of his metaphors we have a specimen, in his calling a shield φιλάξ, 'Apeo, for which he was attacked by the comic poet Antiphanes (Ath. x. p. 433, c.), and which Aristotle has noticed no less than three times (Poet. xxi. 12, Rhet. iii. 4, 11). There is another example of his bold figures in a fragment of Anaxandrides (Ath. x. p. 455, £). In the celebrated passage of Aristotle respecting the representation of actual and ideal characters, in poetry and painting (Poet. 2), reference is made to "the Person and Cyclopes of Timotheus and Philoxenus;" but unfortunately there is nothing in the present text to show which of the two poets Aristotle meant to represent as the more ideal.

Like all the dithyrambic poets of the age, Timotheus composed works in every species of lyric poetry, and that in such a manner as to confound the distinctions between the several species, mingling Threnoi with Hymns, Paschas with Dithyrambs, and even performing on the lyre the music intended for the flute (Plato, de Legg. l. c.). The crowning step in this process appears to have been that which is ascribed to Timotheus alone, namely, the giving a dithyrambic tone and expression to the Nomes, which seem to have been hitherto preserved almost in their original form, and the adapting them to be sung by a chorus, instead of by a single performer (Plato. de Mus. 4, p. 1132, d.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 365).

The account which has now been given of the character of Timotheus as a musician and a poet must not be misunderstood. It is one thing to judge an artist by pure aesthetic standards, or by a comparison with the severe simplicity of an early stage of the development of his art; it is quite another thing to form a general estimate of his character with reference to the prevailing taste of the times in which he lived, or to the impression he Benihardy, a Timotheus, concerning through the compositions of Timotheus, and if they could be restored, even as mere writings, and much more if they could be reproduced as they were publicly performed, they would certainly excite our admiration, whatever might be the judgment of calm criticism. The few fragments which have come down to us afford ample proof of this. Such a line, for instance, as that with which he led off his name entitled Perseus, bears upon it the impress of the true poet. (Paus. viii. 59. § 3; Plut. Philostr. 11.)

He composed, according to Stephanus of Byzantium (l. e.), eighteen books of citharoedic romances, containing eight thousand verses, and προσώμα αδύν χίλια, according to the correction of Gronovius, αδύν for ἄλλαν, and, perhaps too, for προσώμα we should read προσώμα, but even so the meaning is not very clear, for we have no account of any flute-music by Timotheus: possibly there is some confusion between Burchard and Meineke, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great. Suidas gives a much fuller account of his works, and ascribes to him nineteen Musical Names, thirty-six Prooems, eight Diisconae (Διεύθυν cem) which Meineke supposes to mean compositions by other poets, which Timotheus recast and adapted to his own style of music, Hist. Crit. Com. Gracce. p. 32), eighteen Dithyrambs, twenty-one Hymns, some Encomiums, and other works; and, besides this general classification of his works, Suidas mentions the following special titles, 'Ἀρτέμις, Πέρασι Ἀνάφλος, Φρειδαι, Ναζέρτης. Probably, instead of Πέρασι Ἐνάφλος, we ought to read Πέρασι, Ναζέρτος, as two distinct titles, for the Ναζέρτος of Timotheus is quoted by Athenaeus (viii. p. 338) and by Eustathius (ad Od. v. p. 153). The Κόκλας, which appears to have been one of the most celebrated of his Dithyrambs, has already been referred to. The few extant fragments of these poems are collected by Bergk. Poetae Lyrici Graeci, pp. 860—863, and by Kayser, Diatretze in Dithyrambs, pp. 96—120. (Fabric. Bibl. Gracce. vol. i. p. 174, vol. ii. p. 325; Müller, Hist. of Lit. of anc. Graecia, vol. ii. pp. 59—62; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 604—610; Bode, vol. ii.; Bernhardy, Gesch. d. Griech. Litt. vol. ii. pp. 551—554; Kayser, l. c.; Clinton, Fast. Hellen. vol. ii. s. aa. 398, 357.)

3. A very distinguished flute-player of Thebes, concerning whom a few particulars are mentioned in Lucian’s dialogue Harmonides, in which Timotheus is introduced as discoursing to his disciple Harmonides concerning the means of obtaining success in his art. We learn from Suidas that Timotheus flourished under Alexander the Great, on whom his music made so powerful an impression that once in the midst of a performance by Timotheus, of an Orphan Nome to Athena, he started from his seat, and seized on his arms. (Suid. s. v. Ἀλέξανδρος, Ὀρθοπαιχτῶν, Τιμόθεος.) We have a suspicion, notwithstanding the opinions of eminent scholars, that this Timotheus has been invented, through a series of confusions, out of the celebrated Mileesian musician; but it is impossible in such a work as this to discuss every complicated question of criticism which may present itself.

4. A philosopher, follower of Patron the Epi-
TIRIBAZUS

THE Artemis of Timotheus was esteemed worthy to be placed by the side of the Apollo of Scoap and the Latona of Praxiteles, in the temple which Augustus erected to Apollo on the Palatine (Plin. L. c. § 10; the lines of Propertius, describing these statues, are quoted under Scopas, p. 756, b.). The head of this statue, however, was only a restoration by Anaximus Evander. (Plin. L. c.)

Pausanias (ii. 32. § 3. a. 4) mentions Timotheus as the maker of a statue at Troezen, which the Troezennians themselves believed to represent Hippolytus, but which he considered to be the statue of Asclepius. Pliny also enumerates Timotheus among the artists who made atlantes et armatae et venatores sacrificantesque (H. N. ixv. 8. a. 19. § 34). There is no ground for the doubt expressed by Sillig respecting the identity of the Timotheus referred to in all these passages. It is quite true that the artists of the later Attic school of sculpture wrought chiefly in marble; but there is sufficient evidence that they also practised the art of casting in bronze.

TIMO'XENUS (Τυμόξενος). 1. The commander of the troops of Scione, attempted to betray Pothisa to the Persians in b. c. 450, but his treachery was discovered. (Herod. viii. 158; Polyaeon. vii. 33. § 1; Aeneas Tact. folioret. p. 31.)

2. Son of Timocrates, was one of the commanders of the Corinthian force sent to Acarnania in b. c. 431. (Thuc. ii. 33.)

3. The Achaean, was general of the Achaean League in b. c. 223, in which year he obtained possession of Argos, and successfully resisted the efforts of Cleomenes to recover it. In b. c. 221 he was again general of the League; but in consequence of the want of discipline and practice among the Achaean troops, he was unwilling to undertake the command of the war against the Aetolians; and according a few days before the expiration of the office, he resigned it to Aratus, who was already general elect. He was a candidate for the office again in b. c. 216, and was supported by Aratus, but he was not elected in consequence of the influence of Apelles, the minister of Philip V., who wished to mortify Aratus. He was however general again in b. c. 216, after the termination of the Social War. (Polyb. ii. 53. iv. 6. 7. 82, v. 106; Plut. Cleom. 20, Arat. 38. 47.)

T. TINCA, of Placentia, was celebrated for his wit, but was no match for Granius. (Cit. Brut. 46.)

TINEIUS CLEMENS, consul under Septimius Severus, a. d. 195, with Scapula Tertullus. (Dig. 27. tit. 9. s. 1; Cod. 9. tit. 1. s. 1.)

TINEIUS SACERDOS. [SACERDOS.]

TIPHYS (Τίφυς), a son of Agnus or of Phorbas and Hyrmine, of Siphæ or Tiphæ in Boeotia, was the helmsman of the ship Argo. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 105; Paus. ix. 32. § 6; Apollod. i. 9. § 32; Hygin. Fab. 150; 4th ed. of Apollon. L. C.) [L. S.]

TIRESIAS. [TIRESIAS.]

TIRIBAZUS or TIRIBAZUS (Τυρίβαζος, Τυριβάζος), a Persian, high in the favour of Artaxerxes II. (Memon), and when he was present, so Xenophon tells us, no one else had the honour of helping the sovereign to mount his horse. At the time of the retreat of the 10,000, in b. c. 401, Tiribazus was satrap of Western Armenia, and, when the Greeks had reached the river Teleboas on the frontier of his territory, he himself rode up to their camp and proposed a truce, on condition that both parties should abstain from molesting each other, the Greeks taking only what they needed while in his country. The terms were accepted, but Tiribazus kept watching the 10,000 at the distance of several stadia with the intent of assailing them in a mountain pass, through which their march necessarily lay. On hearing this, the main body of the Greeks hastened to secure the pass and, having moreover attacked the camp of Tiribazus, put the barbarians to flight, and captured the tents of the satrap himself (Xen. Anab. iv. 4. §§ 4—7, 16—21, 5. § 25; Diod. xiv. 27.)

Tiribazus succeeded Tithraustes as satrap of Western Asia, and in this office we find him in b. c. 393, when Antalcidas was sent to negotiate, through him, a peace for Sparta with the Persian king. The satrap was convinced by Antalcidas that it was expedient for Artaxerxes to support the Lacedaemonians, and he accordingly gave them all the help which he could to venture without express authority from his master. We do not know the cause which led to Tiribazus being superseded by Struthas, in b. c. 392; but by b. c. 386 he had returned to his satrapy. He then co-operated faithfully, as before with Antalcidas, perhaps accompanied him to the Persian court to support his cause there, and, having summoned, on his return, a congress of deputies from Greek states, he promulgated in the king's name the famous decree which laid down the terms of the peace of Antalcidas (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. §§ 12, &c., v. 1. §§ 6, 25—31; Diod. xiv. 35.). [ANTALCIDAS; CONON; STRUTHAS.]

In b. c. 386 he was appointed to command the Persian fleet against Evagoras, the land forces being entrusted to Orontes. They defeated Evagoras, and formed the siege of Salamis; but Tiribazus was impeached by Orontes, and was recalled to court to answer for his conduct, b. c. 385. The accounts of what followed, as given by Diodorus and Plutarch, it is not very easy to reconcile. The former seems to intimate that Tiribazus was detained in prison until the return of Artaxerxes from his expedition against the Cadusii; while Plutarch tells us that he accompanied the king in his campaign, and did good service by exciting mutual suspicion against one another in the two Cadussian kings, and so inducing them separately to sue for peace. The language of Plutarch, however, implies that during the expedition in question Tiribazus was in disgrace, and it appears therefore that his trial did not take place until the king's return. It came on before three judges of the highest reputation, whose sense of impartiality would be also quickened by the recollection that some of their predecessors had been recently flayed alive for an unjust sentence, and that the judgment-seat was now covered with their skins. Tiribazus triumphantly disposed of the charges against him, and was honourably acquitted with the full approbation of Artaxerxes, in consideration not only of his innocence in regard to the special charges, but also of the great services he had rendered to his master. (Diod. xv. 8—11; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. Artax. 24.) [EVAGORAS; GAOS; ORONTES.] He now stood higher than ever in the royal favour, and received a promise of the hand of Anemis, the king's daughter. Artaxerxes, however, broke faith with him, and married the lady herself; and, the royal word having been again pledged to him, and again broken in the same way, with respect to Atossa, the youngest of the princesses, Tiribazus was beyond measure exasperated, and incited Dareius, the son of Artaxerxes and his heir-elect, to join him in a plot against the king's life. The design was betrayed to Artaxerxes by an eunuch, and the conspirators, when they came to execute their purpose, found themselves foiled. Tiribazus offered a desperate resistance to the guards who endeavoured to arrest him, and was slain at length by a javelin hurled at him from a distance. (Plut. Artax. 27—29.) [Aspasia, No. 2; Dareius.]

TIRIDATES or TERIDATES (Τιριδάτης), a common Eastern name, more particularly among the Parthians.

1. A beautiful eunuch, at whose death Artaxerxes was inconsolable. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 1.)

2. The guardian of the royal treasures at Persopolis, wrote to Alexander to inform him that the inhabitants wished to seize the treasures, and to beg him to march with all speed to the city. In consequence of this information Tiridates was left by Alexander in the same post which he had occupied under Dareius. He was afterwards made satrap of the Gedrosii and Arimaspi by Alexander. (Curt. v. 5; 6; Diod. xvii. 69, 81.)

3. The second king of Parthia. [Arsaces II.]

4. One of the royal race of the Arsacidae, was proclaimed king of Parthia in place of Phraates IV. (Arsaces XV.), whose cruelties had produced a rebellion of his subjects and led to his expulsion from his kingdom. Phraates, however, was restored to the throne soon afterwards, and Tiridates fled for refuge to Augustus, who refused to give him up to Phraates. This happened about b. c. 23. (Dion Cass. lii. 10, liii. 33; Justin, xili. 5; Hor. Carm. i. 26.) [Arsaces XV.]

5. Probably a grandson of Phraates IV., was set up by Augustus in a. d. 35 as a claimant to the Parthian throne in opposition to Artabanus III. (Arsaces XIX.) The history of his war with Artabanus III. and of his short reign is related elsewhere. [Arsaces XIX.]

6. Tiridates I., king of Armenia, and brother of Vologeses I. (Arsaces XXIII.), king of Parthia. He was made king of Armenia by his brother, but was driven out of the kingdom by Corbulus, the Roman general, and finally received the Armenian crown from Nero at Rome in a. d. 63, as is more fully related in the life of Vologeses I. [Arsaces XXIII.]

7. Tiridates II., king of Armenia, was the son of the Armenian king Vologeses. He was in the power of the Romans, from whom he escaped, and fled for refuge to Vologeses V. (Arsaces XXX.), king of Parthia. The Parthians, however, surrendered him to Caracalla, when the latter demanded him in a. d. 215, and backed him commend with an army. Tiridates must, however, have again escaped from captivity, for we find him at a later time on the Armenian throne. Macrinus, who was unwilling to prosecute the war against him, which had been commenced by Caracalla, concluded a peace with him, and sent him the diadem. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 19, 21, lxxviii. 27, with the notes of Reimar.)

8. Tiridates III., king of Armenia, the son of Choeros. His father was assassinated by the emissaries of Sapor I., king of Persia, who made Armenia a province of the Persian empire, and placed a certain Artavasdes on the throne, about A. D. 238. Tiridates, who was then an infant, was saved by the fidelity of a servant and carried to the Romans, by whom he was educated with great care. (Moses Choren. ii. 71, 73, 74.*) After he had lived under the protection of the Roman emperors for nearly thirty years, he was restored to the throne of his ancestors at the commencement of the reign of Diocletian. Although Tiridates displayed the greatest energy and courage, he was unable long to retain possession of his kingdom against the overwhelming power of the Persian monarchy. He was expelled from Armenia by Narses, and was obliged to take refuge a second time at the court of the Roman emperors. This led to a war between Rome and Persia, in which Narses was completely defeated and obliged to submit to a humiliating peace, A. D. 296. One of the conditions of this peace was the restoration of Tiridates to the Armenian throne. [Sassandar, p. 717, a. ] (Moses Choren. lib. ii.)

M. TIRO, a centurion, expelled from the army by Caesar, n. c. 47. (Hirt. B. Afr. 54.)

TIRO, APPINIUS, a man of praetorian rank, placed himself at the head of the fleet when it revolted from Vitellius to Vespasian in a. d. 69 but by the severe contributions which he levied in the municipia he did more harm than good to the cause of Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. iii. 57, 76.)

TIRO, CAELESTRIUS, an intimate friend of the younger Pliny. They had served together as military tribunes, as quaestors and as pretors, and were in the habit of frequently residing in each other's houses. (Plin. Ep. vii. 16.) Four of Pliny's letters are addressed to him (Ep. i. 12, vi. 1, 22, ix. 5).

TIRO, NUMISIUS. [Numisius, No. 5.]

TIRO, M. TULLIUS, the freedman and pupil of Cicero, to whom he was an object of the most devoted friendship and tender affection, appears to have been a man of very amiable disposition, and highly cultivated intellect. He was not only the amanuensis of the orator, and his assistant in literary labour, but was himself an author of no mean reputation, and notices of several works from his pen have been preserved by ancient writers. Thus we are told by A. Gellius (xiii. 9, comp. xii. 3) that he composed several books De Usu atque Ratione Linguae Latinae, and also De variis atque promiscuis Quaestionibus. It is added that on the most important of these he bestowed the Greek designation παράδεκτα "tanquam omne rerum atque doctrinarum genus continentem," an interpretation of the title altogether rejected by Lersch, who believes the piece in question to have been a grammatical treatise on the adverb, which was termed παράξιες by the stoics (see Charis. p. 173, ed. Putsch), and supports this view by a quotation (p. 186); "Neminem autem Tiros in Pandecte non recte ait dici adiectivo quod suae cooperationem ad adverbum." On the other hand, the passage extracted by Gallus relates entirely to the etymology of the word Saucelae. Aetius Pedianus (in Ael. Hist. § 39) refers to the fourth book of a life of Cicero by Tiro, and he was perhaps the compiler of a collection of his jests mentioned by both Quintilian (vi. 3, § 2), and Macrobius (ii. 1). But we owe him a debt of gratitude which never can be adequately acknowledged if it be true, as many believe, that he was the chief agent in bringing together and arranging the works of his illustrious patron, and in preserving his correspondence from being dispersed and lost. (See Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 17, ad Att. xvi. 5.)

* Zonaras speaks (xii. 21) of Tiridates as king of Armenia at this time, and says that after he fled to the Romans, his children joined the Persians; but this is clearly a mistake, for the subsequent narrative shows that the account of the Armenian historian is correct. See Gibbon, c. x. note 134.
TISMENUS.

After the death of Cicero, Tiro purchased a farm in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, to which he retired and lived, according to Hieronymus, until he reached his hundredth year.

It is well known that the Romans under the empire were acquainted with a species of short-hand writing so as to be able to take down fully and correctly the words of public speakers, however rapid their enunciation (Martial. Ep. xiv. 202; Manil. Astron. iv. 197; Senec. Epist. 90). From a notice in the Eusebian chronicle, taken in combination with some observations in the Origines of Isidorus (i. 21), it has been inferred that Tiro was the inventor of the art, and although the expressions employed certainly do not warrant such a conclusion, yet abbreviations of this description, which are by no means uncommon in MSS. from the sixth century downwards, have very generally been designated by the learned as Notae Tironianae. The whole subject is very fully discussed in the Palaeographia Critica of Kopp, Pars Prima, 4to, Mannh. 1817, p. 10, foll. (See Cic. ad Att. iv. 6, vi. 7, vii. 2, 3, 5, xiii. 7, ad Fam. lib. xvi. the whole contents of this book being addressed to Tiro; Plut. Cic. 41. 49; Lirsch, die Sprachphilosophie der Alten, 2te Theil, p. 46; Engelbronner, Disputatio hist. crit. de M. Tullio Tiro, 8vo, Amst. 1804; Lion, Tironiana, in Seебеs’s Archiv für Philologie, 1824; Dummann, Geschichte Roms, vol. vii. p. 409.) [W.R.]

TIRYN (Tiryns), according to Pausanias (ii. 25. § 7), a son of Argos, from whom the ancient city of Tiryns derived its name; according to Stephanus of Byzantium it derived its name from Tiryas, a daughter of Halus and sister of Amphityron. [L.S.]

TISAGEORAS (Τισαγεόρας), an artist who wrought in iron, and dedicated at Delphi a group made by himself in that material, representing the contest of Hercules with the hydra. Pausanias mentions this group as an admirable specimen of this most difficult kind of statuary in metal, but as to who this Tiragonas was, he confines himself entirely ignorant. (Paus. x. 18. § 5, 6.) [P. S.]

TISAGORAS/MENUS (Τισαγεόρας/Μενούς). 1. A son of Orestes and Hermione, was king of Argos, but was deprived of his kingdom when the Heraclideae invaded Peloponnesus. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 2; Paus. ii. 18. § 5, 38. § 1, vii. 6. § 2.) He was slain in a battle against the Heraclideae (Apollod. ii. 8. § 3), and his tomb was afterwards shown at Heilde, whence at one time his remains were removed to Sparta by command of an oracle. (Paus. vii. 1. § 3.)

2. A son of Thersander and Demonassa, was king of Thebes, and the father of Autesion. (Paus. iii. 15. § 4, ix. 5. § 8; Herod. iv. 147. [L. S.])

TISAGEORAS/MENUS (Τισαγεόρας/Μενούς). 1. An Elean soothsayer, of the family of the Clytiadæ, who seem to have been a branch of the Ianiæ, if the received reading in Herodot. ix. 50 is sound. (Comp. Philosot. Vit. Apoll. v. 25; Cic. Nat. Div. i. 41.) According to the story told by Herodotus, Tisenmus had been assured by the Delphic oracle that he should be successful in five great conflicts. Supposing this to be a promise of distinction as an athlete, he devoted himself to gymnastic exercises, and on one occasion was very near winning the prize for the pentathlum at Olympia. The Spartans, however, understanding the oracle to refer, not to gymnastics, but to military victories, made great offers to Tisamenus to induce him to take with their kings the joint-command of their armies. This he refused to do on any terms short of receiving the full franchise of their city, whereupon the Spartans at first indignantly broke off the negotiation, but afterwards professed their readiness to yield the point. Tisamenus then rising in his demands, stipulated for the same privilege on behalf of his brother Hegias, and this also was granted him. He was present with the Spartans at the battle of Platea, in b.c. 379, which, according to Herodotus, was the first of the five conflicts referred to by the oracle. The second was with the Argives and Tegeans at Tegen; the third, with all the Arcadians except the Mantineans, at Dipaeæ, in the Maenalian territory (both between b.c. 479 and 465); the fourth was the third Messenian War (b.c. 465—455); and the last was the battle of Tanagra, with the Athenians and their allies, in b.c. 457. (Herod. ix. 33—36; Müller, Dor. bk. i. ch. 9. §§ 9—11.)

2. A descendant apparently of the above, who took part in the plot of Cinadon, and was put to death for it, in b.c. 397. (Xen. Hell. iii. 3. § 11.) [E. E.]

TISANDER (Τιςανδρος), a statuary of unknown country, who flourished at the end of the fifth b.c., and made a large number of the statues in the group which the Lacedæmonians dedicated at Delphi out of the spoils of the victory of Aegospotami. (Paus. x. 9. § 4, 9.) [P. S.]

TISIAS, a Greek statuary, of whom nothing is known beyond the mention of his name in Pliny’s list of those artists who made, in bronze, athletæ et armatæ et venatorii sacrificantes. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 84.) [P. S.]

TISI/SCRATES. 1. An eminent Greek statuary, of the school of Lysippus, to whose works those of Tissocrates so nearly approached, that many of them were scarcely to be distinguished from the works of the master. Such were his Thiasus of Miletus, his King Demetrias, and his statue of Peucestes, who saved the life of Alexander the Great. The words added by Pliny to his mention of the last work, dipnus tanta gloria, show the high estimation in which the artist was held. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 8.) Pliny introduces the name of Tissocrates in such a way as to cause a doubt, whether he was the disciple of Lysippus himself or of his son Euthycrates; but we think he means the former. The artist’s date may be fixed at about ol. 120, b.c. 300. He appears to have excelled in equestrian groups. Pliny also mentions a byga of his, to which the artist Pison added the figure of a woman (l. c. § 32). There is another passage of Pliny, in which the name of Tisocrates occurs in the common editions (l. c. § 12); where the reading Tissocrates rests on no other aut-Tissaphernes.

authority than a conjecture of Gromovius. The more probable conjecture of Sillig, Amphiocrates, has been rendered certain by the authority of the Bamberg MS. (See Amphiocrates, and Jan's Supplement to Sillig's Pliny.)

2. A sculptor of the same name, whom M. Raoul-Rochette considers to be undoubtedly a different person, has been made known by a marble found near Albano, with the inscription, TESSIKRATOS EIOIEI. (Visconti, Op. Var. vol. ii. p. 82; R. Rochette, Leître à M. Schorm, p. 419, 2d ed.) Perhaps, however, the work may be only a very coarse copy of a bronze statue by the celebrated Tissaphernes. The orthography deserves notice; there are other examples of names beginning with the root TI, in both of the derived forms TIM and TIS, being spelt with the diphthong EI (See Pape, Wörterbuch d. Griech. Eigennamen.)

TISSAPHERNES. (Xen. 352, We 7.)

TISIPONUS (Τίσιπων), 1. The name of one of the Erinnyes (the avenger of murder, Orph. Arg. 866; comp. Erinnyes).

2. A daughter of Alemacon and Manto. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 7.)

TISIPUS (Τίσιπος), an Aeolian, and a partisan of Rome. (Bebius, No. 5; Lycurgus.)

TISSAPHERNES (Τισσαφέρνης), a famous Persian, who in B. C. 414 was commissioned by Dareius II. (Notius) to quell the rebellion of Pissuthnes, satrap of Lower Asia, and to succeed him in his government. Tissaphernes and his colleagues bribed the Greek mercenaries of Pissuthnes to desert his cause, and then transported him into a surrender by a promise, which Dareius broke, that his life should be spared. Amorges, however, the son of Pissuthnes, still continued in revolt, and Tissaphernes was commanded by Dareius to slay or capture him. The king also required from the new satrap the full tribute arising from his government, a considerable portion of which, viz. all which was due from the Greek towns under the protection of Athens, it had been hitherto impossible to collect. These combined motives led Tissaphernes, early in B. C. 412, to despatch an ambassador to Sparta, proposing an alliance, with the promise of payment for any troops that might be sent him, and supporting the prayer of Chios and Erythrae (states within his satrapy) that they might be aided by a Peloponnesian force in their intended revolt from Athens. Through the influence mainly of Alcibiades the Lacedaemonians decided in favour of the application of Tissaphernes, in preference to that of Pharnabazus, and shortly after the first treaty between the Persian king and Lacedaemon was concluded by Tissaphernes and Chalcides, the characteristic cunning of the former being exhibited in one of its articles, which secured to Dareius whatever territory or cities had been at any time possessed by himself or his ancestors. For a short period after this we find the satrap helping his allies with apparent cordiality, and co-operating with them in particular against the Athenians at Milethus, while they in their turn assisted him in the revolt of Alcibiades. Alcibiades Carisius, the envoy of Amorges, who was maintaining himself in the place. But disputes soon arose between the parties about the pay for the fleet, the amount of which Tissaphernes had diminished, and it was found necessary to make a new treaty, which specially provided that the king should support all the forces he might send for, so long as they continued in his territory, the article, however, which had virtually acknowledged the sovereignty of Persia over all the states she had ever possessed, being only slightly modified. Accordingly the eleven commissioners, whom the Spartans sent out in the winter of the same year (412) as counsellors to Astyochus, objected strongly to both the treaties, and especially to the sweeping clause in question; whereupon Tissaphernes, in real or pretended anger, broke off the conference and withdrew. When therefore Alcibiades deemed it expedient to abandon the Peloponnesian cause, and took refuge with the satrap, he found him fully prepared to listen to his suggestions, that the pay to the sea-men should be no. only reduced, but irregularly supplied, and that it would conduce more to the king's interests to hold the balance between Athens and Sparta, and so to weaken both, than to give a complete triumph to the latter. In this advice, however, the subtle Athenian had over-reached himself; for the view which it opened was so acceptable to Tissaphernes, and suited so well his crafty temper, that Alcibiades could not persuade him to take any decided part in favour of Athens; and therefore when Periander and his fellow-ambassadors came to negotiate for his alliance, their mission proved an utter failure. Tissaphernes now sought to connect himself again with the Peloponnesians, and a new treaty between the parties was concluded, which contained a more stringent stipulation on the subject of the pay, while the offensive article as to the king's right over the Asiatic cities was expressed in more vague and ambiguous terms. But Tissaphernes, with all his subscriptions to treaties, and all his promises of bringing up a Phoenician fleet to act against the Athenians, never intended to give any effectual assistance to his nominal allies, who at length (worn out and disgusted with his duplicity, and alarmed too at the apparent good understanding between him and Alcibiades, of which the latter made an ostentatious display) withdrew their whole armament from Milethus, and sailed northward to unite themselves with Pharnabazus (b. c. 411). Annoyed at this step of their's, and alarmed also at the part they had taken in the expulsion from Antandrus of the Persian garrison under Arsaces, his lieutenant, Tissaphernes left Aphabeton, whither he had gone under pretence of bringing up the Phoenician fleet, and proceeded towards the Hellespont to remonstrate with the Peloponnesians, and, if possible, to conciliate them. On his way he stopped at Ephesus, and sacrificed there to the TISSAPHERNES.

Ephesian Artemis, a circumstance which Thucydides, for some reason unknown to us, has thought it worth while to record, and with which his history abruptly ends. When the satrap arrived at the Hellespont, Alcibiades came with presents to pay his court to him, but Tissaphernes, in the hope of regaining the confidence of his old allies, seized the Athenian and sent him to Sardis, to be there kept in custody. He endeavoured also at the same time to apologise for his breach of promise with respect to the Phoenician ships, by alleging that they were needed to defend the king's dominions from the Arabians and Egyptians; for there can be no doubt that the name of Pharnabazus in Diodorus (xiii. 46) is a blunder of the historian's for Tissaphernes, as it certainly is in other passages of the same author, c. g. xiii. 36. 37. 38. xiv. 22. As however the value of the professions of Tissaphernes was now pretty well known, it is probable that few, if any, believed him; and Alcibiades, when he escaped from prison, after a month's detention, would be likely enough to gain credit for his assertion, that he had been released by the satrap himself. The latter notwithstanding still carried on his intrigues, through his emissaries at Sparta, to win back the confidence which had been transferred to Pharnabazus; but his attempts were defeated by Hermocrates, who had repaired thither for the express purpose of setting his character in its true light before the Lacedaemonians, and, a revolution having taken place about the same time at Thasos (b. c. 410), accompanied with the expulsion of Eteonicus, the Spartan harmost, Tissaphernes was suspected of having promoted it. In the following year (b. c. 409), when the Athenians under Thrasyllus had invaded Lycia, and were threatening Ephesus, Tissaphernes sent all round to summon the population to the defence of the goddess, and, having thus collected a considerable force, baffled the attempt of the enemy.

In b. c. 407 Cyrus the younger was appointed by his father, Dareius, to be viceroy of the whole maritime region of Asia Minor, and, regarding Tissaphernes as his enemy, listened readily to Lysander's complaints against him, and prepared to supply the Lacedaemonians with cordial and effectual assistance; nor could he be diverted from this course by the representations of Tissaphernes, that the true policy for Persia was the one which he himself had hitherto pursued. The mutual distrust and hostility between the prince and the satrap only increased with time; and when Cyrus, in b. c. 405, was summoned to court by his father, he took Tissaphernes with him, under pretence of doing him honour, but really because he was afraid to leave him behind. After the death of Dareius, at the end of the same year, Tissaphernes accused Cyrus of a plot against the life of his brother Artaxerxes, the new king, and it was only through the influence of the queen-mother, Parysatis, that the prince was pardoned. On their return to western Asia, Cyrus and Tissaphernes were engaged in continual disputes about the cities in the satrapy of the latter, over which Cyrus claimed dominion, and all of which indeed transferred their allegiance to him, with the exception of Miletus, where Tissaphernes quenched an intended revolt in blood. The ambitious views of Cyrus towards the throne at length became manifest to the satrap, who lost no time in repairing to the king with information of the danger. At the battle of Cunaxa, in b. c. 401, he was one of the four generals who commanded the army of Artaxerxes, and was stationed with the main body of the cavalry in the left wing, of which his troops were the only portion that was not put to flight by the Greeks. When the 10,000 had begun their retreat, Tissaphernes sought an interview with them, professed his great anxiety to serve them, as being a neighbour of Greece in his satrapy, and declared that he had been using in their favour his influence with the king, who had promised to consider his request, and had sent him in the meantime to ask the reason of their expedition against him. By his advice they gave to this message a moderate and prudent answer, and within three days' time Tissaphernes returned and informed them that he had with much difficulty prevailed on Artaxerxes to allow him to conduct them home in safety. After a delay of more than twenty days, during which he kept them waiting, the march began. In spite, however, of the solemn treaty between the parties, mutual suspicions continued to prevail, and it was in the hope of removing these that Clearchus sought an explanation with Tissaphernes and consented to the interview, at which he himself and four of the other generals were arrested by the treacherous satrap. [Clearchus.] Some time after this, Tissaphernes endeavoured, through his emissary Mithridates, to ascertain the plans of the Greeks, but his attempt was baffled by their resolution to hold no further intercourse with him. He then continued to annoy and harass them in their march, without however seriously impeding it, till they reached the Carduchian Mountains, at which point he gave up the pursuit. Not long after, and while the 10,000 were yet on their return home, Tissaphernes, as a reward for his great services, was invested by the king, in addition to his own satrapy, with all the authority which Cyrus had enjoyed in western Asia. On his arrival he claimed dominion over the Ionian cities, which, alarmed for their liberty, and fearing, too, the resumption of the satrap, whose rule they had renounced for that of Cyrus, applied to Sparta for aid. Their request was granted, and an army was sent under Thimbron, in b. c. 400, to support them. In the following year Dercyllidas succeeded Thimbron, and, taking advantage of the jealousy between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, concluded a truce with the latter, who, to save his own territory, unscrupulously abandoned that of his fellow-satrap to the invasion of the enemy. In b. c. 397, however, the Lacedaemonian forces were everywhere where the property of Tissaphernes lay. The two satraps now united their forces, but no engagement took place, and the negotiations which ensued ended in a truce, which was to last till the mutual requisitions of the belligerents should be decided on by the Spartan authorities and the Persian king respectively. [Dercyllidas.] In the following year, when Agesilaus invaded Asia with the professed intention of effecting the independence of the Asiatic Greeks, Tissaphernes proposed an armistice, that he might have time to lay the demand of the Lacedaemonians before Artaxerxes, whose answer he pretended to think would be favourable. The truce was solemnly ratified; but Tissaphernes, who of course had no intention of keeping it, immediately sent to the king for reinforcements, and on their arrival arrogantly commanded Aegaeus to withdraw from Asia. To this the Titan king replied he that thanked the satrap for having, by his perjury, made the gods the allies of Greece. Having then induced his wily and selfish enemy to believe that Caria was the object of his attack, and thus induced him to concentrate his forces in that direction, Aegaeus carried the war successfully into the satrapy of Phrygania. In the following year, B.C. 395, he declared his intention of invading the richest portion of the enemy’s country, and Tissaphernes, imagining that, if this had been his real purpose, he would not have revealed it, and that his operations therefore would now be indeed directed against Caria, again arranged his forces for the defence of that province. Aegaeus then, in accordance with what he had given out, marched into the country about Sardis, ravaged it for three days, and defeated a body of cavalry which Tissaphernes had sent against him. Grievous complaints of selfish neglect and treachery were now made against the satrap by those who had suffered from the Lacedaemonian invasion; and the charges were transmitted to court, where they were backed by all the influence of Parysatis, eager for revenge on the enemy of Cyrus, her favourite son. The result was that Tittho’nos, painted by the king's order, dethroned Tissaphernes to death and to succeed him in his government. The disgraced satrap accordingly was surprised and slain in his bath by a minister of execution, and his head was sent to Artaxerxes. (Thucyd. vii.; Xen. Hell. i. 1, 2, 5, iii. 1, 2, 4; Anab. passim, Ages. i.; Plut. Alc., Art., Ages.; Diod. ii. cc. xiv. 23, 26, 27, 80; Ath. xiv. p. 505, a.) [E. E.]

TITAN. (Τητάν.) 1. This name commonly appears in the plural Τητάνες, from Τητάνεις, as the name of the sons and daughters of Uranus and Ge, whereas they are also called Οὐπαρσίων or Οὐπασίδων. (Hom. Il. v. 893; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1232.) These Titans are Oceanus, Cœus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Cronus, Theia, Rheia,Themis, Mnemosyne, Pheboe, and Tethys, to whom Apollodorus (i. 1. § 3) adds Dione. (Hes. Theog. 133, &c.) Some writers also add Phorcys and Demeter. (Hymn. ap. Apollod. i. 1. § 1; Porphyry, Schol. ad Hes. Theog. 54.) The name of Byantain (κ.α. Αυλαία) has the following as the names of the children of Uranus and Ge: Adadnas, Ostasus, Andes, Cronus, Rhea, Iapetus, Olympus; and Pausanias (viii. 37. § 3) mentions a Titan Anytus, who was believed to have brought up the Arcadian Despoeas. Uranus, the first ruler of the world, threw his sons, the Hecatoncheires, Briareus, Cottus, Gyes (Hes. Theog. 617), and the Cyclopes, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes, into Tartarus. Gaea, indignant at this, persuaded the Titans to rise against their father, and gave to Cronus an adamantine sickle (βρόκου). They did as their mother bade them, with the exception of Oceanus. Cronus, with his sickle, unmanned his father, and threw the part into the sea, and out of the drops of his blood there arose the Erinyes, Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megera. The Titans then deposed Uranus, liberated their brothers who had been cast into Tartarus, and raised Cronus to the throne. But he again threw the Cyclopes into Tartarus, and married his sister Rhea (Ovid, Met. ix. 497, calls her Ops). As, however, he had been foretold by Gaia and Uranus, that he should be dethroned by one of his own children, he, after their birth, swallowed successively his children Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Pluto and Poseidon. Rhea therefore, when she was pregnant with Zeus, went to Crete, gave birth to the child in the Dictaean Cave, and entrusted him to be brought up to the Curetes, and the daughters of Melissus, the nymphs Adrasteia and Ida. The armed Curetes guarded the infant in the cave, and struck their shields with their spears, to that Crons might not hear the voice of the child. Rhea, moreover, deceived Cronus by giving him a stone wrapped up in cloth, which he swallowed, believing it to be his newly-born son. (Apollod. i. §§ 1—5; Ov. Fast. iv. 179, &c.) When Zeus had grown up he availed himself of the assistance of Thetis, the daughter of Oceanus who gave to Cronus a potion which caused him to bring up the stone and the children he had swallowed. United with his brothers and sisters, Zeus now began the contest against Cronus and the ruling Titans. This contest (usually called the Titanomachia), which was carried on in Thessaly, the Titans occupying Mount Othrys, and the sons of Cronus Mount Olympus, lasted for ten years, when at length Gaea promised victory to Zeus, if he would deliver the Cyclopes and Hecatoncheires from Tartarus. Zeus accordingly slew Campe, who guarded the Cyclopes, and the latter furnished him with thunder and lightning. Pluto gave him a helmet, and Poseidon a trident. The Titans then were overcome, and hurled down into a cavity below Tartarus (Hom. ll. xiv. 279; Hes. Theog. 697, 851; Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 335; Paus. viii. 37. § 3), and the Hecatoncheires were set to guard them. (Hom. ll. viii. 479; Hes. Theog. 617, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 1.) It must be observed that the fight of the Titans is sometimes confounded by ancient writers with the fight of the Gigantes.

2. The name Titans is also given to those divine or semi-divine beings who were descended from the Titans, such as Prometheus, Hecate (Hes. Theog. 424; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 511), Latona (Ov. Met. vi. 346), Pyrrha (i. 395), and especially Helios and Selene (Mene), as the children of Hyperion and Theia, and even the descendants of Helios, such as Circe. (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 119, vi. 725; Ov. Met. vi. 542, Schol. ad Ov. Met. vi. 542; Virg. Aen. ii. 671, iv. 943, Met. iii. 171, xiv. 382, Tithon. 180.)

3. The name Titans, lastly, is given to certain tribes of men from whom all mankind is descended. Thus the ancient city of Cnosos in Crete is said to have originally been inhabited by Titans, who were hostile to Zeus, but were driven away by Pan with the fearful sounds of his shell-trumpet. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 336; Diod. iii. 57, v. 66; Orph. Hymn. 36 2; comp. Hück, Cretas, p. 171, &c.; Lobech, Aglaoph. p. 763; Vööker, Mythol. d. Iapet. Gesch. p. 280, &c.) [L. S.]

TITARESIUS (Τιταρησίας), a surname of Mopsus, derived, according to some, from the river Tatarias in Thessaly, near which he was born (Hom. ll. ii. 751), but according to others, from his grandfather Titaron. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 65 with the Schol.) [L. S.]

TITHONUS (Τιθώνος), a son of Laomedon, and brother of Priam (Hom. ll. xx. 237), according to others (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 447, iii. 48), a brother of Laomedon. Others, again, call him a son of Cephalus and Eos. (Apollod. iiii. 14. § 3.) By the prayers of Eos who loved him he obtained from the immortal gods immortality, but not eternal youth, in consequence of which he completely shrunk together in his old age, whence an old decrepit man was proverbially called Tithonus. (Hom. Hymn. in Ven. 219; Res. Theoq. 984; Apollod. iii. 12. § 4; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 18; Horat. Carm. i. 28. 8; Ov. Fast. i. 461.) [L.S.]

TITHO'REA (Tisophéa), a nymph of Mount Parnassus, from whom the town of Tithorea, previously called Neon, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. x. 32. § 6.) [L.S.]

TITIRAUSTES (Tithraustes), a Persian, who was commissioned by Artaxerxes II. (Memon), in B.C. 395, to put Tissaphernes to death, and to succeed him in his satrapy. On his arrival at Colossae in Phrygia, he caused Tissaphernes to be slain, and sent his head to the king. He then opened negotiations with Aegaeus, representing to him that, as the chief promoter of the war was dead, there was no longer any occasion for the presence of a Spartan army in Asia, and proposing peace on condition that the Asiatic Greeks should be independent, only paying their ancient tribute to Persia. To this Aegaeus would not consent in the absence of instructions from home, and Titirasthes then persuaded him to remove the war from his satrapy into that of Pharnabazus, and even supplied him with money for the expedition. Being soon after convinced that Aegaeus had no intention of leaving Asia, Tithraustes sent Timocrates, the Rhodian, into Greece with fifty talents, which he ordered to distribute among the leading men in the several states, to induce them to excite a war against Sparta at home (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. §§ 25, &c., 5, § 1; Diod. xiv. 80; Paus. iii. 9; Plut. Art. 20, Ages. 15). Tithraustes had been superseded in his satrapy by B.C. 393, when Antalcidas was sent to negotiate with his successor, Tiribazus. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 12.)

It was probably the same Tithraustes whom we find joined with Pharnabazus and Abrocomes in the command of the unsuccessful expedition of the Persians to Egypt, which seems to have occurred between B.C. 393 and 390 [PHARNABAZUS]. We may perhaps identify him also with the Tithraustes who was mentioned as holding the office of Chilarch (Vizier) at the time of the embassy of Pelopidas and Iamenes to Susa in B.C. 367 (Ael. V. H. i. 21; see, however, C. Nep. Conv. 3). We hear, moreover, of a certain Tithraustes, who was sent to act against the rebel Antirhakus in B.C. 356, and was defeated by the Athenian general, Chares (Socr. Aug. ad Dem. Phil. i. p. 45). [CHARES.] [E.E.]

TITI'GAENS, plebeian, is rarely mentioned in the republican period, and did not rise out of obscurity till a very late time. None of its members obtained the consulship under the republic; and the first person of the name who held this office was M. Titius in B.C. 31. In the times of the empire, the Titii bore various surnames, a list of which is given below. [TITIUS.]

TIT'Tiana, Flavia, the wife of Pertinax and daughter of Flavius Sulpicianus. When her husband assumed the purple, the senate passed a decree conferring the title of Augusta upon the empress and of Caesar upon her son; but neither was permitted to accept these honours. She survived Pertinax; but the time and the manner of her death are unlike unknown. (Dion Cass. Ixxiii. 7.) [W.R.]

TITIANUS, T. ATTIL'US, consul under Hadrian in A.D. 127, with M. Squilla Gallicanus. (Fasti.)

TITI'ANUS, CORNEL'IUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who has addressed two letters to him. (Ep. i. 17, ix. 82.)

TITI'ANUS, T. FA'BIIUS, consul under Constantius in A.D. 357 with Felicianus. (Fasti.)

TITI'ANUS, FLAVIUS, procurator of Alexandria, was put to death by Theoctitus, the favourite of Caracalla. (Dion Cass. Ixxvii. 21.)

TITI'ANUS, JULIUS, a Roman writer, all whose works are lost, was the father of the rhetorician Titianus, who taught the younger Maximinus. The elder Titianus may therefore be placed in the reigns of Commodus, Pertinax, and Severus. He was called the age of his age, because he had imitated every thing (Jul. Capitol. Maximin. Jun. c. 1). He wrote, 1. A description of the provinces of the Roman empire (Jul. Capitol. l.c.), which is perhaps the same work as the Chorographikia, which is quoted by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. iv. 42) as a work of Titianus. 2. Epistulae, which were supposed to be written by distinguished women, and in which he imitated the style of Cicero. (Sidon. Apoll. Ep. i. 1.) 3. Rhetorica. (Isidor. Orig. ii. 2.) 4. Themata, or subjects for declamation taken from Virgil (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. x. 16). Titius appears to have written other works (comp. Servius ad Virg. Aen. xi. 631), but some of them may belong to his son. It was probably the younger Titianus whose Apolloii or Fables, translated by Aesop, were sent by Ausonius to Probus, and who is called by the poet "Fandi Titianus artifex" (Anon. Ep. xvi. Paeon. and line 81). (See Vossius, De Historiis Latinis, p. 172, foll.)

TITI'ANUS, JUNIUS, consul with the emperor Philippus in A.D. 245. (Cod. 6. tit. 39. § 2, et alibi.)

TITI'AS (Tirias), one of the Idaean Dactyls, or according to others, a Mariandynian hero, is called a son of Zeus and Mariandynus. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1126.) On his expedition against the Amazons, Hercules assisted the Mariandyni against the Belycres, and during the struggle, Prio- laus, the leader of the Mariandyni, fell. During the funeral games Hercules conquered Titanus, who is called the father of Barycles, while others call Priolaus and Mariandynus sons of Titius. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 780, ad Aeschyl. Pers. 933; Eustach. ad Dionys. Perieg. 987; comp. Lobeck, Apoekag. p. 1165.) [L.S.]

TITI'DIUS LA'BEI. (Labeo.)

TITI'NA, the wife of Cotta, was defended by Cicero against Ser. Naevius. (Cic. Brut. 60.)

TITI'NIA GENS, plebeian, is mentioned as early as the time of the decentivus, but it never obtained much importance, and none of their members was raised to the consulship. [TITIUS.]

TITI'NUS, PONTIUS. (Pontius; Titius; Titonius, No. 13.)

TITI'NIUS, a Roman dramatist whose productions belonged to the department of the Comœdia Togeta, is commended by Varro on account of the skill with which he developed the characters of the personages whom he brought upon the stage. "Hœ recording nulla alii servare convenit quam Titinio et Terentio; adhœ vero Trabea et Attilius et Caecilius facile moverant." From the terms in which this criticism is expressed, it has been inferred that Titinius was younger than Caecilius, but older 4 e 3 than Terence, and hence that he must have flourished about B.C. 170. The names of upwards of fourteen plays together with a considerable number of short fragments, the language of which bears an antique stamp, have been preserved by the grammarians, especially Nonius Marcellus. These will be found collected in the "Poetarum Latii Senticorum Fragmenta of Botto, vol. ii. Svo. Lips. 1834, p. 58, and in the essay of Neukirch, "De Fabula Topagia Romanorum. Svo. Lips. 1833, p. 97. (See Var. L. L. lib. v. as quoted by Charisius, p. 215, ed. Putsch; Seren. Sammon. de Re Med. v. 1044, where, according to one (false) reading, the name of the author would be Fuctius or Fuctius Titinius.) [W. R. J.]

TITINIUS. 1. M. TITINIUS, one of the tribunes of the plebs, elected immediately after the abolition of the decemvirate, B.C. 449. (Liv. iii. 54.)

2. Sex. Titinius, tribune of the plebs, B.c. 439. (Liv. iv. 16.)

3. L. Titinius Pansa Saccus, consul tribune, B.C. 400 and 396. (Liv. v. 12, 18; Fasti Capitol.)

4. M. Titinius C. F. C. N., magister equitum to the dictator C. Junius Bubulcus, B.C. 302. (Liv. x. 1; Fasti Capitol.)

5. P. Titinius, legatus of the praetor in the war against the Gauls B.C. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 21.)

6. M. Titinius Curvus, praetor urbanus B.C. 176. He levied troops at Rome in this year, and gave an audience of the senate to Ti. Sempronius Gracchus and L. Postumius Albinus on their return from Spain. (Liv. xli. 58, xlii. 5, 6.)

7. M. Titinius, praetor B.C. 176, received the province of Nearer Spain with the title of proconsul, and continued to govern it for four years, till B.C. 174. In B.C. 171 he was accused of malversation in the province, but was acquitted. (Liv. xlii. 15, 26, xliii. 2.)

8. C. Titinius Gadarus, one of the leaders of the slaves in Sicily, betrayed an important fact to the praetor Licinius Nerva in B.C. 103. (Diod. xxxvi. Ecl. 1. p. 532, Wess.)

9. M. Titinius, a legatus of Nerva in the Sertile war in Sicily, was defeated by the slaves. (Diod. l.c.)

10. C. Titinius, the husband of Fannia, who concealed Marius in B.C. 88. (Val. Max. viii. 2. § 3; Plut. Mar. 38, who erroneously calls him Titinius.) For particulars of the dispute between Titinius and Fannia, see FANNIA.

11. Cn. Titinius, a distinguished Roman eques, resided in the time of M. Livius Drusus, B.C. 91. (Cic. pro Client. 56.)

12. Titinius, are mentioned among the people of property proscribed by Sulla and murdered by Catiline in B.C. 81. (Q. Cic. de Pol. Cons. c. 2.)

13. Q. Titinius, one of the judges at the trial of Verres, was a brother (by the same mother) of C. Fannius, a Roman eques. (Cic. Verr. i. 49.) This Titinius carried on the business of a money-lender, and as such Cicero had dealings with him. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, he espoused the cause of Pompey, but his son, who had been adopted by one Pontius, and who is therefore called Pontius Titinius, sided with Caesar. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 4, v. 21. § 5, vii. 18. § 4, ix. 6. § 6, ix. 9, 18, 19.)

14. Titinius, a centurion in the army of Cassius at the battle of Philippi, B.C. 42, was sent by his commander, after his defeat by Antony, to see how Brutus had fared; but as Titinius did not return so soon as was expected, Cassius, supposing all was lost, put an end to his own life. Titinius, on his arrival, killed himself over the body of Cassius, to atone for his involuntary error. (Val. Max. ix. 9. § 2.) The story is told a little differently by Appian (B. C. iv. 113) and Plutarch. (Brut. 43.)

15. Titinius, a legate of Octavius in his war with Sex. Pompeius. (Appian, B. C. v. 111.)

16. C. Titinius, whose name occurs on coins, cannot be referred with certainty to any of the preceding persons. On the obverse is the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Victory in a biga with C. TITINIUS, and underneath ROMA. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 325.)

TIITIUS, a Roman sculptor, whose name appears on two inscriptions, the one published by Boissard (Antiq. Roman. p. iii. fig. 132), the other in the Museum of the Louvre. From the latter it seems, though there is some doubt as to the true reading of the inscription, that the artist’s full name was Titius Gemellus. (Silling, Catal. Artif. s. n.; B. Rochette. Lettre à M. Schoen, p. 419.) [P. S.]

TITIUS. 1. C. Titius, a Roman eques, and an orator of considerable merit, who, according to Cicero, obtained as much excellence as was possible without a knowledge of Greek literature, and without great practice. He left orations behind him, and likewise some tragedies. Cicero makes him a contemporary of Antonius and Crassus, who lived from B.C. 148 to 87; and this agrees with the statement of Macrobius, who calls him vita actatis Luciliane, for Lucilius was born in B.C. 146, and died in 103. It appears, however, that Titius ought to be placed a little earlier, since Macrobius likewise says that Titius spoke in favour of the Sextus (L. Fannius, which, we know, was enacted in B.C. 161. It is therefore probable that Titius spoke in favour of this law when he was quite a young man. (Cic. Brut. 45; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 9, 12; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorvm Fragmenta, p. 203, foll., 2d ed.)

2. C. Titius, a man who gained his living by pleading causes, but certainly a different person from the preceding, excuted a mutiny of the soldiers against the consul L. Porcius Cato in B.C. 89, but nevertheless escaped punishment. (Dion Cass. Fragm. 114, p. 46, Reimar.) [Cato, No. 7.]

3. Sex. Titius, a seditious tribune of the plebs, B.C. 99, attempted to follow in the steps of Saturninus and Glaucia, who had perished in the preceding year, but was vigorously resisted by the orator M. Antonius, who was then consul. He was afterwards condemned for having a statue of Saturninus in his house. Cicero says (Brut. 62) that Titius was fluent, and with a fair measure of acuteness, but so extravagant in his gestures, that a dance was called after his name. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 11, 66, pro C. Rabiir. 9.)

4. L. Titius, a Roman citizen residing at Agrigenium, was robbed of his ring by Verres. (Cic.

Verr. iv. 26.)

5. T. Titius T. f. one of the legates of Cn.
Pompeius, when the latter was intrusted with the superintendence of the corn-market. (Cic. ad Fam.

xiii. 58.)

50. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 58.)

7. and 8. C. Titius Strabo and L. Titius

Strabo. [Strabo.]

8. Q. Titius, was sent by Caesar into Epeirus in b.c. 48 to obtain corn for his troops. (Caes.

B. C. iii. 42.)

10. L. Titius, a tribune of the soldiers in the Alexandrine war, b.c. 48. (Hirt. B. Alex.

57.)

11. P. Titius, a tribune of the plebs, b.c. 43, proposed the law for the creation of the triumvirs in that year. Shortly before this he had deprived his colleague P. Servilius Casca of his tribunate, because the latter fled from Rome, fearing the vengeance of Octavius on account of the part he had taken in the assassination of Caesar. Titius died soon after, during his year of office, thus confirming the superstition, that whoever deprived a colleague of his magistracy, never lived to see the end of his own official year. (Appian, B. C. iv. 7; Dion Cass. xlv. 49; Cic. ad Fam. x. 12. § 3, x.

21. § 3.)

12. M. Titius, was proscribed by the triumvirs in b.c. 43, and escaped to Sex. Pompeius in Sicily.
He married Munatia, the sister of L. Munatius
Plancus, the orator, by whom he had a son [No.

13]. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

13. M. Titius, the son of the preceding, raised a fleet on his own account during the civil wars which followed the death of Caesar, but was taken prisoner in b.c. 40 off the coast of Gallia Narbo-nensis by Menas, the admiral of Sex. Pompeius.
He was, however, spared by Sex. Pompeius, chiefly for the sake of his father, who was then living with Pompeius in Sicily. By the peace of Misenum, concluded in the following year (b.c. 39) between Pompeius and the triumvirs, Titius returned to Italy (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30). Titius now entered the service of Antonius and served as his quaeestor in the campaign against the Parthians, in b.c. 36 (Plut. Ant. 42). In the following year (b.c. 35), Titius received the command of some troops from L. Munatius Plancus, the governor of Syria, in order to oppose Sex. Pompeius, who had fled from Sicily to Asia. Pompeius was shortly after taken prisoner and brought to Miletus, where he was murdered by Titius, although the latter owed his life to him. Titius, however, had probably received orders from Plancus or Antonius to put him to 134, 136, 140, 142, 144; Dion Cass. xlviii. 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 79.) This, however, was not the only act of ingratitude committed by Titius, for in b.c. 32 he deserted Antonius, and went over to Octavius along with his uncle Plancus. He was rewarded for his treachery by being made one of the consuls (suffecti) in b.c. 31. He served under Octavius in the war against his former patron, and, along with Statilius Taurus, had the command of the land forces. Shortly before the battle of Actium he put Antony's cavalry to the rout. (Dion Cass. i. 3, 13; Plut. Ant. 58; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.)

14. Q. Titius, occurs on coins, but cannot be referred with certainty to any of the preceding persons. Whom the head on the obverse represents is uncertain; on the reverse is Pegasus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 325.)

TITIUS FLAVIUS SABI'NUS VESPASI-

A'NUS, Roman emperor, a. D. 79—91, commonly called by his praenomen Titus, was the son of the emperor Vespasianus and his wife Flavia Domitilla. He was born on the 30th of December,
A. D. 40, about the time when Caius Caligula was murdered, in a mean house and a small chamber, which were still shown in the time of Suetonius.
From his childhood he manifested a good disposition. He was well made, and had an agreeable countenance, but it was remarked that his belly was somewhat large. (Sueton. Titus. 3.) Yet he was active, and very expert in all bodily exercises; and he had a great aptitude for learning. He was brought up in the imperial household with Britnicus, the son of Claudius, in the same way and with the same instructors. It is said that he was a guest at Nero's table, when Britannicus was poisoned, and that he also tasted of the same deadly cup. He afterwards erected a gilded statue to the memory of Britannicus, on the Palatium.
Titus was an accomplished musician, and a most expert shorthand writer, an art in which the Romans excelled.

When a young man he served as tribunos militum in Britain and in Germany, with great credit; and he afterwards applied himself to the labours of the forum. His first wife was Arricidia, daughter of Tertullus, a Roman equester, and once praefectus praetorio; and, on her death, he married Marcia Furnilla, a woman of high rank, whom he divorced after having a daughter by her, who was called Julia Sabina. After having been quaeestor, he had the command of a legion, and served under his father in the Jewish wars. He took the cities of Tarichaea, Gamala, and other places.

When Galba was proclaimed emperor, A. D. 68, Titus was sent by his father to pay his respects to the new emperor, and probably to ask for the promotion which his merits entitled him; but hearing of the death of Galba at Corinth, he returned to his father in Palestine, who was already thinking of the higher destiny to which he was called. Titus managed to reconcile Mucianus the governor of Syria, and his father, and thus he contributed greatly to Vespasian's elevation. [MUCIANUS, LIGNINUS.] Vespasian was proclaimed emperor on the 1st of July, A. D. 69, and Titus accompanied him to Alexandria in Egypt. He returned to Palae-stine to prosecute the siege of Jerusalem, during which he showed the talents of a general with the daring of a soldier. The siege of Jerusalem, one of the most memorable on record, was concluded by the capture of the place, on the 8th of September, A. D. 70, and Titus received from the acclama-tions of his soldiers the title of Emperor. The most complete account of the siege and capture of Jerusalem is by Josephs. He did not return to Italy for eight months after the capture of Jerusalem, during which time he had an interview with the Parthian ambassadors at Zeugma on the Euphrates, and he paid a visit to Egypt, and assisted at the consecration of the bull Apis at Memphis.

4 e 4
(Sueton. Titus, c. 5.) On his journey to Italy he had an interview with Apollonius of Tyana, who gave him some very good advice for a youth in his elevated station.

Titus triumphed at Rome with his father. He also received the title of Caesar, and became the associate of Vespasian in the government. They also acted together as Censors. Titus undertook the office of Praefectus Praetorio, which had hi-thero only been discharged by Roman equites. His conduct at this time gave no good promise, and the people looked upon him as likely to be another Nero. He was accused of being excessively addicted to the pleasures of the table, of indulging lustful passions in a scandalous way, and of putting suspected persons to death with very little inquiry. A. Caecina, a consular whom he had invited to supper, he ordered to be killed as he was leaving the room; but this was said to be a measure of necessary severity, for Titus had evidence of Caecina being engaged in a conspiracy. His attachment to Berenice also made him unpopular. Berenice was the sister of King Agrippa II., and the daughter of Herodes Agrippa, sometimes called the Great. She was first married to Herodes, king of Chalcis, her uncle, and then to Polemon, king of Cilicia. Titus probably became acquainted with her when he was in Judæa, and after the capture of Jerusalem she followed him to Rome with her brother Agrippa, and both of them lodged in the emperor's residence. It was said that Titus had promised to marry Berenice, but as this intended union gave the Romans great dissatisfaction, he sent her away from Rome after he became emperor, as Suetonius says; but in his father's lifetime according to Dion. The scandalous life of Titus had already poisoned his father at a feast (24th June, A. D. 79) is not believed even by Dion, who could believe anything bad of a man.

The year A. D. 79 was the first year of the sole government of Titus, whose conduct proved an agreeable surprise to those who had anticipated a return of the times of Nero. His brother Domitian, it is said, was dissatisfied at Titus being sole emperor, and formed the design of stirring up the soldiers; but though he made no decided attempt to seize the supreme power, he is accused of having all along entertained designs against his brother. Instead of punishing him, Titus endeavoured to win Domitian's affection, and urged him not to attempt to gain by criminal means that power which he would one day have in a legitimate way. During his whole reign Titus displayed a sincere desire for the happiness of the people, and he did all that he could to relieve them in times of distress. A story is told, that one evening, recollecting that he had given nothing during the day, he said, "My friends, I have lost a day." He assumed the office of Pontifex Maximus after the death of his father, and with the purpose, as he declared, of keeping his hands free from blood; a resolution which he kept. Two patricians who were convicted by the senate of a conspiracy against him, were pardoned and treated with kindness and confidence. He checked all prosecutions for the crime of laxa majestas, which from the time of Tiberius had been a fruitful source of false accusations; and he severely punished all informers. He also removed from about him many young men, whose acquaintance had damaged his reputation, and he associated only with persons of good repro-

At the close of this year Titus repaired one of the Roman aqueducts, and he assumed the title of Emperor on the occasion of the successes of Agricola in Britain. This year is memorable for the great eruption of Vesuvius, which desolated a large part of the adjacent country, and buried with lava and ashes the towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii. Pliny the elder lost his life in this terrible catastrophe; the poet Caecina Bassus is said to have been burnt in his house by the lava, and Agrippa the son of Claudius Felix, once governor of Judæa, perished with his wife. Dion Cassius (Ixiv. 21, d.c.) has described the horrors of this terrible calmi-ety; and we have also the description of them in a letter addressed to Tacitus by the younger Pliny. [TACITUS.] Titus endeavoured to repair the ravages of this great eruption: he sent two consuls with money to restore the ruined towns, and he applied to this purpose the property of those who had been destroyed, and had left no next of kin. He also went himself to see the ravages which had been caused by the eruption and the earthquakes. During his absence a fire was burning at Rome for three days and three nights A. D. 80: it destroyed the Capitol, the library of Augustus, the theatre of Pompeii, and other public buildings, besides many houses. The emperor declared that he should consider all the loss as his own, and he set about repairing it with great activity: he took even the decorations of the imperial residences, and sold them to raise money. The eruption of Vesuvius was followed by a dreadful pestilence, which called for fresh exertions on the part of the emperor.

In this year he completed the great amphitheattre, called the Colosseum, which had been con-\[Mucianus, Imperator.\] menised by his father; and also the baths called the baths of Titus. The dedication of these two edifices was celebrated by spectacles which lasted one hundred days; by a naval battle in the old naumachia, and fights of gladiators: on one day alone five thousand wild animals are said to have been exhibited, a number which we may reasonably suspect to be exaggerated. He also repaired several aqueducts, and paved the road from Rome to Rimini (Ariminum).

In the year A. D. 81 Agricola was employed in securing his conquests in Scotland south of the

Clyde and the Forth. After presiding at some games, at the close of which he is said to have wept bitterly, though the cause of his sorrow is not stated, Titus went off to the country of the Sabines in very low spirits, owing to some bad omens. He was seized with fever at the first resting-place, and being carried from thence to a villa, in which his father had died, he ended his life there on the 13th of September, after a reign of two years and two months, and twenty days. He was in the forty-first year of his age. There were suspicions that he was poisoned by Domitian. Plutarch says that his health was damaged by the frequent use of the bath. There is a story that Domitian came before Titus was dead, and ordered him to be deserted by those about him; according to another story, he ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of snow, under the pretext of cooling his fever. It is reported that shortly before his death, Titus lamented that he was dying so soon, and said that he had never done but one thing of which he repented. Nobody knew what this one thing was; but there were various conjectures. Perhaps the difficulty may be best solved by supposing that he never uttered the words, or if he did, that he was in the delirium of his fever. Titus was succeeded by his brother Domitian. His daughter Julia Sabina was married to Flavius Sabinus, his cousin, the son of Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian.

Titus is said to have written Greek poems and tragedies: he was very familiar with Greek. He also wrote many letters in his father's name during Vespasian's life, and drwc up edicta. CHON OF TITUS.

TITUS, one of the two supernumerary tyrants added by Trebellius Pollio to his list of the Thirty [see Aurelius]. He is said to have maintained his pretensions to the throne for a few days during the reign of Maximinus, and to have been put to death by the very soldiers who had forced the purple on his acceptance. There can be little doubt that he is the same person who is called Theus by Capitonius (Maximin. dio., c. 11), and Quartinus by Herodian. [Quartinus] [W. R.]

TITUS (Trydes), a son of Gaia, or of Zeus and Elara, the daughter of Orchemenus, was a giant in Euboia, and the father of Europa. (Hom. Od. vii. 324; Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 181, 761; Pind. Pyth. iv. 81.) Instigated by Hera (Hygin. Fab. 55), he made an assault upon Leto or Artemis, when she passed through Panopaesus to Pytho, but was killed by the arrows of Artemis or Apollo, or, according to others, Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning. (Hygin. l.c.; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 161; Paus. iii. 18. § 9; Pind. Pyth. iv. 160; Horat. Carne. iv. 6. § 2.) He was then cast into Tartarus, and there he lay outstretched on the ground, covering nine acres, and two vultures or snakes devoured his liver. (Hygin. l.c.; Schol. ad Pind. Od. i. 97; Hom. Od. xi. 576, &c.) His gigantic tomb was shown in aftertimes near Panopeus (Paus. x. 4. § 4), and his fall by the arrows of Artemis and Apollo was represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae. (Paus. iii. 18. § 9, x. 11. § 1, 29. § 2; comp. Strab. ix. p. 422; Virg. Aen. vii. 595; Or. Met. iv. 457, Epist. ex Pont. i. 2. 41.) [L. S.]

TLEPOLEMUS (Τελπόλεμος). 1. A son of Hercules by Astyoche, the daughter of Phylus (Hom. ii. 658; Apollod. ii. 7. §§ 6, 8; Philostr. Her. ii. 14), or by Astyoamia, the daughter of Amynor, king of the Dolopians in Thessaly. (Pind. Od. vii. 41.) Tlepolemus was king of Argos, but after slaying his uncle Lycus, he was obliged to take to flight, and in conformity with the command of an oracle, settled in Rhodes, where he built the towns of Lindos, Ialysos and Cameiros, and from whence he joined the Greeks in the Trojan war with nine ships. (Hom. ii. 653, &c.; Apollod. ii. 8. §§ 2.) At Troy he was slain by Sarpedon. (Ili. v. 627, &c.; Diod. iv. 58, v. 59.) His wife Philoœid instituted funeral games in commemoration of his death. (Tzetz. ad Iliad. 911.)

2. A Trojan, a son of Damastor, who was slain by Patroclus. (Hom. ii. 416.) [L. S.]

TLEPOLEMUS (Τελπόλεμος), historical. I. An Athenian general, who brought a reinforcement to Pericles in the Samian war, b.c. 440. (Thuc. i. 177.)

2. The son of Pyrophanes, one of the ἐτραπόω, or body-guard of Alexander the Great, was joined in the government of the Parthysai and Hyrcania with Ammianus, a Parthian, whom Alexander had appointed satrap of those provinces. At a later period Tlepolemus was appointed by Alexander satrap of Caramania, which he retained on the death of Alexander in b.c. 323, and also at the fresh division of the provinces to Triparadisus in b.c. 321. (Arrian, Anat. ii. 22, vi. 27; Diod. xviii. 3, 39.)

TLEPOLEMUS, CORNELIUS, and Hiero, who are called by Cicero the canes venatici of Verres, were brothers, natives of city, whom they fled, under the suspicion of having pilaged the temple of Apollo, and betook themselves to Verres, who was then in Asia. From that time they became his dependents, and during his government of Sicily they performed for him the service of hunting out the works of art which appeared to be worth appropriating. They were both artists. Tlepolemus being a painter, and Hiero a modeller in wax. Some particulars of their mode of proceeding are given by Cicero (in Verri. iii. 28, iv. 13).

Respecting another artist of this name, see Tlenpolemos.

[See Aurelius.]

TLENPOLEMOS (Τλενπόλεμος), is the form in which the name of a maker of painted vases is inscribed twice on one of the Canino vases (Mus. Etrusque, No. 149), and again, in connection with the name of the painter Taconides, on a vase discovered by the MM. Candelori (Gerhard, Rapport. Volceat. p. 180), and thirdly on a recently discovered vase, now in the Museum of Berlin, (Neuerworbene Vasenbilder, No. 1597.) It has been disputed whether the true reading of the name is Tlepolemus or Tlesiolemus; but the con-joint evidence of the three vessels is decisive in favour of the form Tempelosio. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorff. p. 61. 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TLESON. son of Nearchus, a maker of painted vases, whose name is inscribed, in the following manner, on several vases found at Canino, Toscane, Corneto, and elsewhere:

TIVOSEN HONEAPXO EIIOHSEN.

His vases are all in the form of a patera mounted on a tall foot, and of an antique style of workmanship. Raoul-Rochette regards the addition of the name of the artist's father, on these vases, as a novelty borrowed from the Greek vase-makers, and as one of the proofs that the manufacture was not of Etruscan origin. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorff, pp. 61, 62, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TMOLUS (Τμόλος). 1. The god of Mount Timolus in Lydia, is described as the husband of Pluto (or Orphale) and father of Tantalus, and said to have decided the musical contest between Apollo and Pan. (Apollod. ii. 6, § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 5; Or. Met. xi. 157.)

2. A son of Proteus, was killed by Hercules. (Tzetza, ad Lyc. 124.) [L. S.]

TROGONIUS GALLUS. a senator, proposed in A.D. 32 that Tiberius should choose twenty senators, who should accompany him as a bodyguard after he went into the senate, a proposition which only made Togonius ridiculous, as it was well known that Tiberius intended never to return to Rome. (Tac. Ann. vi. 2; Dion Cass. Ivit. 17.)

TOLIMIDES (Τολιμίδης), an Athenian general, who in B.C. 455 persuaded the people to send him with a fleet to cruise round the Peloponnesus, and ravage the enemy's country. If we may believe Diodorus, 1000 men were voted to him, to be selected by himself; but he first prevailed on 3000 to join him as volunteers, by assuring them that he meant at any rate to name them for the service, and that, if defeated, they should be absolved from acting on the vote of the assembly, and chose 1000 more.

In his expedition he burnt the Lacedaemonian arsenal at Gythium, took Chalcis, a town of the Corinthians, and disembarking on the Sicilian territory, defeated the troops that came against him. According to Diodorus, he had previously captured Methone, which, however, by the arrival of Spartan succours, he was soon obliged to relinquish. He also took Naupactus from the Ozolian Locrians, and settled there the Messenians, who had been besieged and recently conquered by the Lacedaemonians at Ithome. After the return of Tolmides to Athens, we hear of his leading Athenian settlers (κληρονόμοι) to Euboea and Naxos; and in B.C. 447, when the Boeotian allies had returned and seized Chaeroneia and Orchomenus, he proposed that he should be sent at once with a body of volunteers to quell the rising. Pericles objected in vain to the expedition as hasty and ill-advised. Tolmides, having carried his point, marched into Boeotia with 1000 Athenians and some allied troops, and took Chaeroneia, where he left a garrison. But near Coroneia he fell in with a force consisting of the Boeotian exiles who had gathered together at Orchomenus, some Locrians and Euboean allies, and others of the same party. A battle ensued, in which the Athenians were utterly defeated, and Tolmides himself was slain. (Thucyd. i. 103, 108, 113; Diod. xii. 84, 85, xii. 6; Aesch. de Foes. Leg. p. 38; Paus. i. 27; Plut. Ages. 19, Per. 10, 18.) [E. E.]

TOLUMNIUS, LAR. king of the Veientes, to whom Fidenae revolted in B.C. 438, and at whose instigation the inhabitants of Fidenae slew the four Roman ambassadors, who had been sent to Fidenae to inquire into the reasons of their recent conduct. The names of these ambassadors, were C. Fulcinius, Cloelius, or Cluliilius Tullus, Sp. Aritus, and I. Roscius; and statues of all four were placed on the Rostra at Rome, where they continued till a late time (Liv. iv. 17; Cic. Phil. ix. 2; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 11). In the war which followed, Tolumnius was slain in single combat by Cornelius Cossus, who dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won. (Liv. iv. 18, 19.) [Cossus, p. 865, b.]

TOLYNIUS (Τολύνιος), of Megara, is supposed to have been a comic poet of the Old Comedy, before Cratinus, and about contemporary with Ephantides, on the authority of a passage in the Elymogelicum Magnum, which seems to ascribe to him the invention of the metre afterwards called the Cratinian. (Eym. Mag. p. 761, 47. Τολύνιος το καλαμίκανος Κρατίνην μέτρον, κ. τ. λ.) It appears, however, very probable that Τολύνιος, in this passage, is only a false reading for Τελλήνιος, and that the reference is to the lyric poet and musician Tellen. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 38, 39. [P. S.]

TOMYRIS (Τομυρίς), a queen of the Massagetae. According to Herodotus, when Cyrus the Great was contemplating the reduction of that nation (n. c. 559), Tomyris was a widow, and the Persian king sent an embassy to her with an offer of marriage. This she indignantly rejected, and Cyrus then prepared to cross the river Araxes, and to invade her territory. Tomyris warned him by a herald not to be guilty of such injustice, but added that, if he were bent upon it, she would not dispute with him the passage of the river, but would either advance three days' journey into her territory, or allow him to come as far into her's, that they might decide their quarrel by a fair battle. Cyrus chose the latter alternative, and by a stratagem surprised and captured Spargapises, the son of Tomyris. The queen demanded his restoration, with the threat that Cyrus, as he loved blood, should have plenty of it if he refused her. The Persian would not release his prisoner, who slew himself through grief, and a battle ensued, in which Cyrus was defeated and slain. Tomyris is described by Herodotus as roaming about the field after her victory in search of her enemy's body, on finding which she fastened his head in a leathern bag full of blood, in accordance with her threat. (Herod. i. 203—214.) [E. E.]

TONGIULIUS. 1. A dissolute youth, was one of Calisthene's crew. (Cic. in Cat. ii. 2.)

2. A man indicted by Juvenal (vii. 130). TOLMIUS. (Τολμίος.)

TORISMOND. (Τορίσμονδ.)

TORQUATA, JUNIA. a Vestal Virgin, and the sister of C. Junius Silanus, interceded on behalf of her brother, who was condemned of treason in A.D. 22, and obtained from Tiberius a commutation of his punishment. Her name occurs in inscriptions. (Tac. Ann. iii. 70, with the note of Lipsius; Spon, Miscell. p. 150.) (Silanus, No. 10.)

1. T. MANLIUS L. F. A. N. IMPERIOSUS TORQUATUS, the son of L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus, dictator in b. c. 363, was a famous hero of Roman story. He possessed the characteristic virtues of the old Romans, being a brave man, an obedient son, and a severe father; and he never allowed the feelings of nature or friendship to interfere with what he deemed his duty to his country. Manlius is said to have been dull of mind in his youth, and was brought up by his father in the closest retirement in the country. The tribune M. Pomponius availed himself of the latter circumstance, when he accused the elder Manlius in b. c. 362, on account of the cruelties he had practised in his dictatorship in the preceding year, to excite an odium against him, by representing him at the same time as a cruel and tyrannical father. As soon as the younger Manlius heard of this, he hurried to Rome, obtained admission to Pomponius early in the morning, and compelled the tribune, by threatening him with instant death if he did not take the oath, to swear that he would drop the accusation against his father. Although the elder Manlius was no favourite with the people, and had received the surname Imperiosus on account of his haughtiness, yet they were so delighted with the filial affection of the younger Manlius, that they not only forgave his violence to the tribune but elected him one of the tribunes of the soldiers in the course of the same year. In the following year, b. c. 361, according to Livy, though other accounts give different years, Manlius served under the dictator T. Quintius Pennus in the war against the Gauls, and in this campaign earned immortal glory by slaying in single combat a gigantic Gaul, who had stepped out of the ranks and challenged a Roman to fight him. From the dead body of the barbarian he took the chain (torques) which had adorned him, and placed it around his own neck; his comrades in their rude songs gave him the surname of Torquatus, which he continued ever afterwards to bear, and which he handed down to his descendants. His fame became so great that he was appointed dictator in b. c. 353, before he had held the consulship, in order to carry on the war against the Caerites and the Etruscan. In b. c. 349 he was again raised to the dictatorship for the purpose of holding the comitia. Two years afterwards, b. c. 347, he was consul for the first time with C. Plautius Venno Hypsaeus; during which year nothing of importance occurred, except the enactment of a law de fenore. He was consul a second time in b. c. 344 with C. Marcus Rutilius, and a third time in b. c. 340 with P. Decius Mus. In his third consulship Torquatus and his colleague gained the great victory over the Latins at the foot of Vesuvius, which established for ever the supremacy of Rome over Latium. An account of this battle, which was mainly won by the self-sacrifice of Decius Mus, has been given elsewhere. [Mus., No. 1.] The name of Torquatus has become chiefly memorable in connection with this war on account of the execution of his son. Shortly before the battle, when the two armies were encamped opposite to one another, the consuls published a proclamation that no Roman should engage in single combat with a Latin on pain of death. Notwithstanding this proclamation, the young Manlius, the son of the consul, provoked by the insults of a Tuscan noble of the name of Mettius Gemi-

nus, accepted his challenge, slew his adversary, and bore the bloody spoils to triumph to his father. Death was his reward. The consul would not overlook this breach of discipline; and the unhappy youth was executed. The litter in presence of the assembled army. This severe sentence rendered Torquatus an object of detestation among the Roman youths as long as he lived; and the recollection of his severity was preserved in after ages by the expression Manliana imperia. Two writers relate that the young Manlius was executed by his father's orders in a war with the Gauls (Sall. Cat. 52; Dionys. vii. 79); but as we do not read of Torquatus having the command in any war against the Gauls, it is probable that he is confounded by these writers with No. 6, as Zonaras has done, who says (ix. 8), that No. 6 caused his son to be executed. Torquatus is not mentioned again by Livy; but according to the Fasti he was dictator for the third time in n. c. 320. (Liv. vii. 4, 5, 10, 19—28, viii. 3—12; Cic. de Off. iii. 91, de Fin. ii. 7, ii. 19, 22, Tusc. iv. 22; Val. Max. vi. 9, § 1, i. 7, § 8, ii. 7. § 8; Zon. Chron. p. 16, Reim.; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 28.)

2. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, the son of the preceding, was slain by his father's order, as is related above.

3. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably a son of No. 2, was consul n. c. 299 with M. Fulvius Paetinus. He was appointed to conduct the war against the Etruscans; but he had scarcely entered Etruria, when he was thrown from his horse, and died in consequence on the third day after. (Liv. x. 9, 11.)

4. L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably a brother of No. 3, legatus of the propraetor Scipio in the great campaign of n. c. 298. (Liv. x. 26.)

5. A. MANLIUS T. F. T. N. TORQUATUS ATTICUS, son of No. 3, was censor n. c. 247 with A. Attilius Calatinus, consul for the first time in 244 with C. Sempronius Blaesus, and for the second time in 241 with Q. Lutatius Cero. In his first consulship Torquatus deposed the Fa- lisci, who had taken up arms and obtained a triumph in consequence. (Fasti Capit.; Eratop. ii. 28; Oros. iv. 11; comp. Liv. Ep. 19; Polyb. i. 65.) Pliny (H. N. vii. 53, § 54) speaks of the sudden death of a consular A. Manlius Torquatus, who may have been either the subject of this notice or No. 9.

6. T. MANLIUS T. F. T. N. TORQUATUS, son of No. 3 and brother of No. 5, was consul for the first time in n. c. 235 with C. Attilius Bulbus, in which year he conquered the Sardinians, and obtained in consequence a triumph. His first consulship was memorable from the circumstance that the temple of Janus was closed in this year, in consequence of the Romans enjoying universal peace, which is said not to have occurred before since the reign of Numa Pompilius. (Eratop. iii. 3; Liv. xxiii. 34; Vell. Pat. ii. 38; Oros. iv. 12; Liv. i. 19; Plut. Num. 29.) In n. c. 231 Torquatus was elected censor with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, but was obliged to resign through some unfavourable symptom in the auspices. (Fasti Capit.) In n. c. 224 he was consul a second time with Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and along with his colleagues carried on the war with success against the Gauls in the north of Italy. These consuls were the first Roman generals who crossed the Po. (Polyb. ii. 31; Liv. Epit. 20; Oros. iv. 13.) This Torquatus possessed the hereditary sternness and severity of his family (princeps ac minus durae severitatis, Liv. xiii. 60). We accordingly find him resolutely opposing, in the senate the ransom of those Romans who had been taken prisoners at the fatal battle of Cannae (n. c. 216). In the following year (n. c. 217) he was sent into Sardinia in consequence of the illness of the praetor Q. Macius, who had the government of the province; and while in the island he carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians and the Sardini- ans, who had revolted at the instigation of the former people. In n. c. 212 he was a candidate for the dignity of pontifex maximus, but was defeated by P. Licinius Crassus, who was greatly his junior, and was then suing for the curule aedilship. The people wished to choose Tor- quatus consul for the year 210, but he refused to accept the honour. Two years afterwards (n. c. 206) he was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia and presiding at the games which had been vowed by the praetor M. Aemilius (Liv. xxii. 30; xxxi. 34, 40, 41, xxv. 3, xxvi. 22, xxvii. 33.) He died in n. c. 202. (Liv. xxx. 39.)

7. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, known only from the Fasti Capitolini as the son of No. 6 and the father of No. 8.

8. T. MANLIUS A. P. T. N. TORQUATUS, the son of No. 7, was consul n. c. 165 with Cn. Octa- vius. He inherited the severity of his ancestors; of which an instance is related in the condemnation of his son, who had been adopted by D. Junius Silanus, the particulars of which are related elsewhere. (Silanus, No. 3.) He appears to be the same person as the T. Manlius Torquatus, who was elected pontiff in n. c. 170, and who was sent on an embassy to Egypt about n. c. 164 to mediate between the two Ptolemies, Philometor and Euer- getes. On his return Torquatus spoke in the senate in favour of the younger brother, Euergetes. (Liv. xiii. 11; Polyb. xxxi. 10, xxxii. 1.)

9. A. F. T. N. TORQUATUS, son of No. 7 and brother of No. 8, was praetor in n. c. 167, when he obtained Sardinia, but was unable to go into his province, as he was retained by the senate to investigate some capital offences. He was consul in n. c. 164 with Q. Cassius Longinus (Liv. xlv. 16; Fasti Capit.). Respecting his death, see No. 5.

10. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, was proprae- tor of Africa, perhaps about n. c. 70, where Plancius, whom Cicero defended at a later period, served under him. (Cic. pro Plane. 11.)

11. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably son of No. 10, was praetor in n. c. 52, when he presided at the trial of Milo for bribery. On the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the side of Pompey, and after the defeat of the latter retired to Athens, where he was living in exile in n. c. 45. He was an intimate friend of Cicero, who addressed four letters to him (ad Fam. vi. 1—4) while he was in exile. (Ascon. in Cic. Mil. pp. 40, 54; ed. Orelli; Cic. ad Att. v. 1, 4, 21, vi. 11, viii. 14, ix. 8, de Fin. ii. 22.)

12. T. MANLIUS T. F. TORQUATUS, the first cousin (frater patruelis) and father-in-law of No. 10, bore witness on behalf of Plancius in n. c. 54. He is spoken of by Cicero as an orator who came from Molo's school. (Cic. pro Plane. 11, Brut. 70.)
TORQUATUS.

13. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, probably a son of No. 12, is spoken of by Cicero in his oration for Deiotarus, b.c. 45, as "optimus adolescens." He appears to be the same person as the Torquatus who is mentioned by Cicero two or three times in his correspondence with Atticus in that year, from which we learn that he was an Agricola. He was quaeator of Pansa in b.c. 43. (Cic. pro Deiot. 11, ad Att. xiii. 20, 21, xii. 17; Appian, B. C. iii. 69, 76; Pseudo-Brut. ad Cic. i. 6.)

14. L. MANLIUS L. F. TORQUATUS, was consul b.c. 65 with L. Aurelius Cotta. Torquatus and Cotta obtained the consulship in consequence of the condemnation, on account of bribery, of P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, who had been already elected consuls. It is stated by Dion Cassius (xxxvi. 27) that Cicero and his colleague accused the consuls elect; but it appears from Cicero (de Fin. ii. 19, pro Sull. 17, 18) that this is a mistake, and that it was the younger Torquatus (No. 15) who brought the accusation against Sulla and Paetus. Before Torquatus and Cotta entered upon the consulship, the first Catilinarian conspiracy, as it is called, was formed, in which Sulla and Paetus are said to have united with Catiline for the purpose of assassinating the consuls on the 1st of January. This conspiracy, however, failed. At this time and during his consulship Torquatus was in close connection with Hortensius, and he did not consult Cicero on any matters, although the latter was then praetor, and was very intimate with the younger Torquatus. (Cic. pro Sull. 4.) Notwithstanding this attempt, upon his life, Torquatus defended Catiline in the course of the same year when he was accused of extortion (de retractis) from his previous province. After his consulship Torquatus obtained the province of Macedonia, where he performed some exploits; in consequence of which the senate, upon the motion of Cicero, conferred upon him the title of imperator. During Cicero's consulship, b.c. 63, he took an active part in suppressing the Catilinarian conspiracy, although he was then out of health. He also supported Cicero, when he was banished in b.c. 58, and interceded in vain on his behalf with the consul Piso. He is not mentioned again, and probably died soon afterwards. Cicero speaks of him (Brut. 60) as "elegans in dicendo, in existimando admodum prudens, ut genere perurbanus;" and as he belonged to the aristocratical party, the orator praises his gravitas, sanctitas, and constantia. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Sull. Cid. 10; Liv. Eplt. 101; Cic. de Div. i. 12, de Leg. Agr. ii. 17, pro Sull. b.c. 66, 10, 12, 29, ad Att. xii. 21, in Pison. 19, 20, 21.)

15. L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, son of No. 13, accused of bribery, in b.c. 66, the consuls elect, P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus, as is related above, and thus secured the consulship for his father. He was closely connected with Cicero during the praetorship (b.c. 65) and consulship (b.c. 63) of the latter. In b.c. 62 he brought a second accusation against P. Sulla, whom he now charged with having been a party to both of Catiline's conspiracies. Sulla was defended by Hortensius and by Cicero in a speech which is still extant, and through the eloquence of his advocates, and the support of the aristocratical party, he obtained a verdict in his favour. In b.c. 54 Torquatus defended Gabinius when he was accused by Sulla. Torquatus, like his father, belonged to the aristocratical party, and accordingly opposed Caesar on the breaking out of the civil war in b.c. 49. He was praetor in that year, and was stationed at Alba with six cohorts; but on the fall of Corfinium he abandoned Alba and his soldiers went over to Caesar. He subsequently joined Pompey in Greece. In the following year (b.c. 48) he had the command of Oricium intrusted to him, but was obliged to surrender both himself and the town to Caesar, who, with his usual magnanimity, dismissed Torquatus uninjured. Torquatus, however, forthwith joined Pompey, and fought under him against Caesar at Dyrrhachium (Oros. v. 15). After the battle of Pharsalia he went to Africa, and upon the defeat of his party in that country, in b.c. 46, he attempted to escape to Spain along with Scipio and others, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius at Hippo Regius and slain together with his companions. (Cic. pro Sull. 1, 8, 10, 12, ad Att. iv. 16, § 11, ad Q. Fr. iii. 3, § 2, ad Att. vii. 12, 23, ix. 8; Caes. B. C. i. 24, iii. 11; Hist. B. Afr. 96; Oros. vi. 16, where he is erroneously called Titus.)

Torquatus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and is praised by Cicero as a man well trained in every kind of learning. Although he expressed himself with elegance and force, he was not much of an orator. He belonged to the Epicurean school of philosophy, of which he was one of the most distinguished disciples at that time at Rome; and he is introduced by Cicero as the advocate of that school in his dialogue De Finibus, the first book of which is called Torquatus in Cicero's letters to Atticus. (Cic. Brut. 76, de Fin. i. 5, ad Att. xiiii. 5, 19, 32.)

16. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, the legatus of Pompey in the war against the pirates in b.c. 67 (Appian, An. 65), was probably the same as one of the preceding persons, but we have no means of determining which.

17. TORQUATUS, to whom Horace addresses two of his poems (Carm. iv. 7, Sat. i. 5), probably did not belong to the Manlia gens, but was the same person as C. Nonius Asprenas. (Nonius, No. 8.) There are several coins bearing the name of L. Manlius Torquatus, who was the propraetor of Sulla, as we learn from one of the coins. The specimen annexed has on the obverse the head of Rome, encircled with a torques or chain [see No. 1], and on the reverse a man riding a horse at full gallop, with the legend L. TORQUA. (Q.) ex s. c. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 244.)

COIN OF L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS.

TORQUATUS, NO'NIUS ASPRENAS. [Nonius, No. 8.]

TORQUATUS, NO'VELLIUS, of Mediolanum (Milan), lived in the reign of Claudius, and obtained the surname of Tricognius by drinking three congi of wine at once; that is, nearly eighteen English pints! (Plin. H. N. xiv. 22. s. 38.)

TORQUA TUS SILA'NUS. [Silanus, N. 14, 15.]
TOXOEUS (Toöeüs), a son of Oeneus and Althaea, was killed by Meleager. (Apollod. i. 8 § 1; Anton. Lib. 2; comp. Oeneus.)

TOXO'TIUS, a senator, married Junia Faillia, the promepeus of Antoninus, who had been previously betrothed to the younger Maximinus. Toxotius died after his praetorship, leaving some poems behind him. (Capitol. Maximin. Jnn. 1.)

Q. TRABEA, a Roman comic dramatist who occupied the eighth place in the canon of Voluntius Sedigritus [Sedigritus]. Varro, while he assigns the palm to Titinius and Terence in the delineation of character (Iepn), classes together Traben, Atti- lius, and Caecilius as masters in the art of touching the feelings (padom). The period when he flourished is uncertain, but he has been placed by Gronovius about B.C. 130. No portion of his works has been preserved with the exception of half a dozen lines quoted by Cicero. (Cic. Tusc. Quaest. iv. 31, de Fin. ii. 4, comp. ad Fam. ix. 21, where, however, the interpretation is doubtful; Var. L. L. lib. v. ap. Chrys. p. 215, ed. Putsch; Bothe, Poetarum Latii Sceniorum Fragmenta, vol. ii. p. 58, 3vo. Lips. 1634.)

[ W. R.]

TRA'CHALUS, GALE'RUIS, was consul A.D. 68 with Silius Italicus, and a relation of Galeria Fundana, the wife of Vitellius, who protected him on the accession of his husband to the throne. Trachalus is frequently mentioned by his contemporary Quintilian, as one of the most distinguished orators of his age. Tacitus takes notice of a report that Trachalus wrote the orations which the emperor Otho delivered, but the speeches of Otho in the Histories of Tacitus (i. 37, 83) were composed by the historian and not by Trachalus. (Tac. Hist. i. 90, ii. 60; Quinctil. vi. 3 § 78, viii. 5 § 19, x. 1 § 115, xii. 5 § 5, xii. 10 § 11; Spalding, ad Quinctil. vi. 3 § 73; Bernardi, Recherches sur Galeri- rius Trachalus, in the Mémoires de l' Institut Royal de France, vol. vii. p. 119, foll.; Paris, 1824; Mei, Poetarum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 592, foll., 2d ed.)

TRAGISCUS (Tropynxos), a Tarentine, assisted Philemenus and Nicon in betraying his native city to Hannibal in B.C. 212. (Polyb. viii. 29, foll.) For details, see Nicon. No. 2.

TRAJANUS, M. U'LPIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 98—117, was born at Italica (Alcalà del Rio), near Seville, the 18th of September, A.D. 52, according to some authorities. His father, also named Trajanus, had attained, it is said, the dignity of consul, and been elevated to the rank of patrician; but his name does not occur in the Fasti.

The son was trained to arms, and served as tribunus militum. It appears that he was employed near the Euphrates, probably about A.D. 80, when he checked the progress of the Par- thians; and it is not unlikely that he was at this time serving under his father. He was raised to the praetorship sometime before A.D. 86, and was consul in A.D. 91 with M' Acius Gabrio. He afterwards returned to Spain, whence he was sum- moned by Domitian to command the troops in Lower Germany, and he had his head-quarters at Cologne. At the close of A.D. 97, he was adopted by the emperor Nerva, who gave him the rank of Caesar, and the names of Nerva and Germanicus, and shortly after the title of imperator, and the tribunitia potestas. His style and title after his elevation to the imperial dignity were Imperator Caesar Nerva Trajanus Augustus. He was the first emperor who was born out of Italy. Trajan was a man adapted to command. He was strong and healthy, of a majestic appearance, laborious, and inured to fatigue. Though not a man of letters, he had good sense, a knowledge of the world, and a sound judgment. His mode of living was very simple, and in his campaigns he shared all the sufferings and privations of the sol- diers, by whom he was both loved and feared. He was a friend to justice, and he had a sincere desire for the happiness of the people. Yet it is said that he sometimes indulged in wine to excess, and during intoxication was subject to fits of passion. A strong nature, like that of Trajan, may some- times have required excitement, notwithstanding his habitual temperance. It is difficult to decide between the testimony of his panegyrist Plinius, who commends the chastity of Trajan, and the testimony of Dion Cassius, the universal cal- numiator, who says that he was addicted to shameful vices. Julian, a severe judge, has not spared him on this point.

Nerva died in January A.D. 98, and was suc- ceeded by Trajan, who was then at Cologne. He did not come to Rome for some months, being employed in settling the frontiers on the Rhine and the Danube. It was apparently about this time that the Chamavi and Angiravi drove the Bructeri from their lands on the Rhine, and de- stroyed the greater part of them, the Romans being witnesses of the bloody combat, and seeing with indifference, or even pleasure, the mutual slaughter of their enemies.

In A.D. 99 Trajan did not take the consulsiphip, though it was usual for an emperor to hold this office in the year which followed his elevation. One of the consuls of this year was C. Sosius Seneecio, whom Plutarch addresses in the beginning of his life of Romulus, and in several of his moral essays. Trajan entered Rome on foot, amidst the rejoicings of the Romans, accompanied by his wife Pompeia Plotina. This lady is highly commended by Plinius the younger for her modest virtues, and her affection to Marcian, the sister of Trajan. The title of Pater Patriae was accepted by the em-1165  emperor after his arrival at Rome, and the new designation of Optimus. It seems probable that his wife and sister also had the title of Augustae.

It was usual for a new emperor to bestow a gift of money on each of his soldiers, and it appears from the medals that Trajan made his congranirium in this year. He also showed the same liberality to the Roman citizens, and extended it to children under eleven years of age, who had not been allowed to share in former donations of this kind. The emperor made allowances for the bringing up of the children of poor free persons at Rome, the direct object being to encourage the procreation, or rather the preservation of children, who otherwise would have been abandoned. "It is," says Plinius (Panegyr. c. 27), "a great indulgence to bring up children, to raise them with the hope of receiving sustenance (alimenta), of receiving donations (congiiaria)." Plinius commends the emperor for being liberal out of his own means, that is, out of the imperial revenue; but this money came either from taxes, or from the produce of lands which belonged to the fiscus. So long as a bounty is paid for the procreation of children, the state may rest secure that it will not want citizens. This system was extended to other towns of Italy, where provision was made for supporting the children of the poor. This was the mode in which the Roman policy attempted to meet an evil, which grows up in all large towns, a population without the means of subsistence (see the Tabula Alimentaria of Velleia). Trajan also occupied himself with provisioning Rome, a part of Roman policy which had been long established. There are only two ways of feeding a people; one way is to let them feed themselves by removing all obstacles to freedom of trade and freedom of communication; the other is by taking from one to give to another, a system which is more agreeable to him who gains than to him who loses. Trajan punished the odious class of informers, a measure that will always be popular.

There was at Rome a tax of five per cent. (vicesima) on successions, that is, on property which came to a man by the death of another. The mode of raising a revenue contains the principle of the state assuming that a man's title to property ceases with his life, for if the amount of the tax is carried high enough, the whole will go to the state. It is not like a tax annually paid upon the annual produce or value of land, which is only a contribution of a portion of the fruits. Trajan (Plin. Paneg. c. 37, &c.) released from this tax on successions those heredes who were not extranei, and also those who succeeded to a small hereditas. Many of the public buildings at Rome were repaired by the emperor in the early part of his reign, and he added accommodation to the Circus for five thousand persons.

In the year A.D. 100, various persons enjoyed for a time the honour of the consulship; Sex. Julius Frontinus, the author of a work on the aqueducts of Rome, Tertullus Cornutus, and C. Caecilius Plinius Secundus. In this year Marius Priscus, consul proconsul of Africa, was tried by the senate for peculation in his province. Plinius and Cornelius Tacitus, the historian, were appointed by the senate to prosecute. Priscus made no defence, and submitted to be convicted. He was banished, but he still enjoyed himself in his exile (Juv. Sat. viii. 120). Caecilius Classicus, proconsul of Bactica, was accused about the same time of pilging the people whom he had been sent to govern. He died or killed himself before judgment was given (Plin. Ep. iii. 9); but the matter was still prosecuted: the property which Classicus had before he was governor was given to his daughter, and the rest was distributed among those whom he had robbed. Some of the accomplices of Classicus were also punished. The Panegyricus on Trajan, which is our authority for many of Trajan's acts up to this time, was pronounced by Plinius in A.D. 100, the year in which he received the consular honour. Some additions were made to the Panegyricus after it was pronounced (Plin. Ep. iii. 13, 18). It was perhaps about this time that Hadrian, afterwards emperor, married Sabina, the grand-niece of Trajan; and to this date or somewhere about this time we may refer a letter of Plinius (Ep. iii. 20), in which he says that all the senators on the day of electing the magistrates demanded the vote by ballot (tabellas postulaverunt).

In his fourth consulship, A.D. 101, Trajan left Rome for his campaign against the Daci. Decebalus, king of the Daci, had compelled Domitian to purchase peace by an annual payment of money; and Trajan, either being tired of paying this shameful tribute, or having other grounds of complaint, determined on hostilities. Decebalus was defeated, and one of his sisters was taken prisoner, historian of his strong posts were captured. Trajan advanced as far as Zermizegethusa, probably the chief town of the Dacian king, and Decebalus at last sued for peace at the feet of the Roman emperor; but Trajan required him to send ambassadors to Rome to pray for the ratification of the treaty. The conqueror assumed the name of Dacicus, and entered Rome in triumph.

Plinius (Ep. iv. 22) records a curious decision at Rome in the emperor's consilium. Trebonius Rufinus, duumvir of Vienna, had put an end to certain games in that town, which had been established by a testamentary bequest; the ground of not allowing their celebration was, that the games were injurious to the morals of the people of Vienna. The case was carried by appeal to Rome, and the judgment of Rufinus was confirmed. When the members of the consilium were asked their opinion, Junius Mauricus said that he wished such exhibitions could be stopped at Rome also. This was the same man who gave Nerva a rebuke (Nerva, p. 1167). (Plin. Ep. iv. 22.)

It was probably some time in A.D. 103, that Trajan made an artificial harbour at Centum Cellae (Civitá Vecchia), the form of which is recorded on a medal: the operations of constructing the port are described by Plinius (Ep. vi. 31). The port was called Trajanus Portus, but the old name of Centum Cellae afterwards prevailed. In this year or the following Plinius was sent by Trajan as governor of Pontus and Bithynia, with the title of Legatus and Proprator, and with Consularis Potestas. It was during his residence of about eighteen months in this province that part of his correspondence with Trajan took place, which is preserved in the tenth book of the letters of Plinius. He was particularly commissioned by the emperor to examine the state of the revenue and expenditure of the towns, and to cut off all useless cost. The correspondence of Trajan with his governor shows the good sense and moderation of the Roman emperor, his attention to business, his honest straightforward purpose. As to the treatment of the Christians in Bithynia, see Plinius, C. Caecilius Secundus.

An embassy from a Sarmatian king (A.D. 104) passed through Nicaea in Bithynia on their way to Trajan (Plin. Ep. x. 14). In this year the remains of Nero's golden palace were burnt, and Orosius adds (vii. 12) that it was a visitation upon Trajan for his persecution of the Christians; but as it is not proved to the satisfaction of all persons that Trajan was a persecutor, perhaps the historian may be mistaken in his opinion. Besides, the burning of Nero's palace, who set the first example of persecution, does not seem to have been an appropriate punishment for Trajan, even if he deserved punishment.

In this year Trajan commenced his second Dacian war against Decebalus, who, it is said, had broken the treaty; and when Trajan required him to surrender himself, he refused, and prepared for resistance. The senate declared Decebalus an enemy, and Trajan conducted the campaign in person. The Dacian attempted to rid himself of his formidable enemy by sending two pretended deserters to assassinate him when he was in Maecia. Longinus, one of the generals of Trajan, was surprised by Decebalus in an ambuscade, and the Dacian king offered to restore him, if Trajan would grant peace, restore the country as far as the Danube, and pay the expenses of the war. Trajan, who could not accept such terms as these, gave an evasive answer, and in the mean time Longinus relieved the emperor from his difficulty by poisoning himself. In order to effect a communication with the country north of the Danube, Apollodorus the architect constructed, by Trajan’s command, a bridge over the river, which is described by Dion Cassius (lxxviii. 13, and the valuable note of Reimarus), though his description is inaccurate, and his measurements exaggerated. “When the water is very low, some of the piles stand two or three feet above it.” (Wilkinson’s Wallachia and Moldavia, p. 5.) The bridge was built at a place called Szernecz. The piers were of enormous size, but the arches were constructed of wood. Trajan crossed the Danube on his new bridge, and entered Dacia. He found great obstacles in this country, where there were no roads, and everything was almost in a state of nature. Hadrian commanded a legion under the emperor, and greatly distinguished himself in this Dacian campaign. Decebalus being defeated on every side, killed himself, and his head was carried to Rome. Dacia was reduced to the form of a Roman province; strong forts were built in various places, and Roman colonies were planted. It is generally supposed that the column at Rome called the Column of Trajan was erected to commemorate his Dacian victories. On his return Trajan had a triumph, and he exhibited games to the people for one hundred and twenty-three days, a time long enough to satisfy the avidity of the Romans for these spectacles. Eleven thousand animals were slaughtered during these amusements; and an army of gladiators, ten thousand men, gratified the Romans by killing one another. We must assume that there was at least an appearance to prevent the outbreak of so many desperate men. Probably many of these gladiators were prisoners. (A. D. 105.)

About this time Arabia Petrea was subjected to the empire by A. Cornelius Palma, the governor of Syria; and an Indian embassy came to Rome.

Trajan constructed a road across the Pontine marshes, and built magnificent bridges across the streams. Buildings, probably mansions, were constructed by the side of this road. He also called in all the old money, and issued a new coinage.

In the autumn of A. D. 106 Trajan left Rome to make war on the Armenians and the Parthians. The pretext for the war was that Exedares, the king of Armenia, had received the diadem from the Parthian king, and he ought to have received it from the Roman emperor, as Tiridates had received it from Nero. When Chosroes, the Parthian king, knew that Trajan was seriously bent on war, he sent ambassadors, who found Trajan at Athens, and, in the name of Chosroes, offered him presents, and informed him that Chosroes had deposed Exedares, and begged him to confer the crown on Parthamisarius. Trajan refused his presents, and said that when he arrived in Syria he would do what was proper. He reached Seleucia in Syria in the month of December, and entered Antioch early in the following January. The evidence for the interview at Antioch between the emperor and Ignatius, which ended in the condemnation of Ignatius, is stated elsewhere [Ignatius]. The circumstances, as told, are exceedingly improbable, and sound criticism would lead us to reject the genuineness of the narrative contained in the Martyrdom of Ignatius on the internal evidence alone.

From Antioch Trajan marched to Armenia, by way of Samosata, on the Euphrates, which he took. He thence advanced to Satala, and Elegia, a town in Armenia, where he granted Parthamisaris an interview. Parthamisaris had already written to Trajan, and in his letter he assumed the title of king. Trajan sent no answer, and he wrote again, dropping the title of king, and prayed that M. Junius, governor of Cappadocia, might be sent to him: Trajan sent to him the son of Junius. The Armenian king took the diadem from his head, and placed it at the feet of Trajan, who sat on his tribunal within the Roman camp. He expected that Trajan would give it back to him, but he was told that Armenia was now a Roman province, and he was sent away escorted by some horsemen. The kings of the countries bordering on Armenia made a form of submission to the Roman emperor; the king of the Iberi, of the Sauromtatae, of Colchis, and others.

Trajan returned by way of Edessa, where he was well received by the cautious Abgarus, king of Oorhoene, who now made his apology for not having paid the emperor a visit at Antioch, and through the interest of his son Arbanes, whom Trajan had seen and liked, the king of Oorhoene was excused for his former want of respect. The transactions with some of the petty chiefains of Mesopotamia hardly merit a notice, but military operations in this country are dangerous enough even without a formidable enemy, and the emperor set his soldiers an example of endurance, which may have been an act of prudence as of hardihood. The town of Singar (Sinjar) is one of those which are mentioned as having been taken by the Romans.

The history of this campaign of Trajan is lost, and the history of the year 107 and 108 is of no great interest, and which may enable us to construct even a probable narrative. In fact the period from A. D. 108 to A. D. 115 is nearly a blank; it is even doubtful whether Trajan ever returned to Rome. The year A. D. 112 was the sixth and last consulship of Trajan, and there is some slight evidence which renders it probable that he was at Rome in this year.

In the spring of A. D. 115 he left Syria on his Parthian expedition. He had constructed boats of the timber which the forests near Niabiah supplied, and they were conveyed on waggons to the Tigris, for the formation of a bridge of boats. He crossed the river and advanced into the country of Adiabene, an event which is recorded by an extant medal. The whole of this country, in which were situated Gaugamela and Arbela, places memorable in the history of Alexander, was subdued. From Adiabene he marched to Babylon, according to Dion Cassius (lxxviii. 28), and he must therefore have crossed the Tigris. His course was then through the desert to the Euphrates, and past the site of Hit (Is), where he saw the springs of bitumen, which was used for cement at Babylon, and which Hebrews has described. Trajan meditated (Dion Cass.) the formation of a canal from the Euphrates to the Tigris, in order that he might convey his boats along it, and construct a bridge over the lower course of the Tigris. We must suppose that the bridge of boats over the upper Tigris in Adibene was intended to remain; and that Trajan had also sent boats down the Euphrates, which Dion Cassius has not mentioned. Dion Cassius's narrative, which exists only in the epitome of Xiphilinus, is very confused. There were already canals existing, which joined the Euphrates and Tigris, and we must therefore suppose that they required clearing out, and were not in a fit condition for the transit of boats. According to Dion Cassius, Trajan did not cut the intended canal, for fear that the Euphrates might be drained by it of its waters. Accordingly, the boats were taken across by land, the Tigris was bridged; and the Roman emperors entered the Parthian capital of Ctesiphon. This event was commemorated by his assuming the name of Parthicus, though it seems that he had assumed it before. (See the medal at the close of this article.)

Tillemont supposes that Trajan returned to Antioch in the winter of A.D. 115, during which happened the great earthquake, which nearly destroyed Antioch and many other cities; but Dion Cassius places the earthquake before the capture of Ctesiphon. This terrible calamity, which was as awful in its circumstances as the great earthquake of Lisbon in the last century, destroyed a great number of buildings and many people: Pdeo the consul perished, and Trajan escaped through a window, with a slight injury, being led forth by a man of supernatual size.

In the following year Trajan descended the Tigris and entered the Erythraean Sea (the Persian Gulf). The king of the district called Mesene, between the lower course of the Tigris and the Euphrates, submitted to the emperor. Dion Cassius adds that Trajan sailed as far as the Ocean, and seeing a vessel bound for India, said that he would have gone thither, if he were younger. In the mean time he was losing his Eastern conquests as quick as he had gained them; some of his governors were slaughtered, and others expelled. He sent his generals Lusius and Maximus to restore obedience. Maximus lost his life; but Lusius was successful, for he recovered Nisibis, and took Edessa by storm and burnt it. Seleucia on the Tigris, near Ctesiphon, was taken and burnt by Erycius Clarus and Julius Alexander. It appears that the whole country east of the Tigris from north to south, had risen against the Romans. Returning to Ctesiphon, Trajan determined to give the Parthians a king. He assembled the Romans and Parthians in a great plain near the city, and ascending a lofty tribunal, he commemorated his own exploits, and concluded by declaring Parthamaspates king of the Parthians, and placing the dindem on his head. The conquest of Arabia is recorded by several medals among the exploits of Trajan, but it is impossible to say which of the several parts of Asia included under that name, was conquered by him. Dion Cassius says: "after this he went into Arabia and attacked the Atreni, who had revolted; and their city is neither large nor rich." By Arabia he here means northern Mesopotamia, for Atra is Al Hasdr. (London Geog. Journal, vol. xi. p. 17.) Trajan was obliged to return to this town. Tillemont supposes that Trajan entered the Indian Ocean, and penetrated "even to the extremities of Arabia Felix," but it is impossible to adopt his conclusions from the evidence that he produces.

Trajan fell ill after the siege of Atra, and as his complaint grew worse, he set out for Italy, leaving Hadrian in Syria, and Parthia again hostile, for the Parthians had ejected the king whom Trajan gave them. The emperor seems to have had a variety of complaints, both dropsy and paralysis. He lived to reach Selinus in Cilicia, afterwards called Trajanopolis, where he died in the early part of August, A.D. 117, after a reign of nineteen years six months and fifteen days. His ashes were taken to Rome in a golden urn, carried in triumphal procession, and deposited under the column which bears his name. He left no children, and he was succeeded by Hadrian.

Trajan constructed several great roads in the empire; he built libraries at Rome, one of which, called the Uplio Bibliotheca, is often mentioned; and a theatre in the Campus Martius. His great work was the Forum Traiani, the site of which was an elevation which was removed, and the ground was levelled to a plain, in the centre of which was placed the column of Trajan, the height of which marked the height of the earth which had been removed. The inscription on the column fixes the date at the year A.D. 112, the sixth consulate of Trajan. Apollodorus was Trajan's architect. Trajan constructed the port of Ancona, on the ancient mole of which there still stands a triumphal arch, dedicated to Trajan, his wife, and his sister. The inscription on the bridge of Alcantara over the Tagus belonged to the year A.D. 106, but though the inscription was in honour of Trajan, it states that the bridge was made at the common expense of the several towns which are there mentioned.

Under the reign of Trajan lived Sextus Julius Frontinus, C. Cornelius Tacitus, the Younger Plinius, and various others of less note. Plutarch, Suetonius, Epictetus, survived Trajan. The jurists Juventinus Celus, and Neratius Priscus, were living under Trajan.

The authorities for part of the reign of Trajan are very defective. Tillemont, with all his industry, has not been able to construct a narrative of the latter years of his reign, which we can fully accept, and his chronology is open to several objections. Still the life of Trajan in the Histoire des Empereurs (vol. ii.) contains all the materials that exist for the reign of this distinguished man, and, with the notes of Reimarus on the sixty-eighth book of Dion Cassius, must be the foundation of any future attempts to give a satisfactory history of this period. There is an essay by H. Franck, Zur Geschichte Trajans und seiner Zeitgenossen, &c., 1837, which is well spoken of. [G.L.]

COIN OF TRAJANUS.

TRAJANUS, comes, a general of the emperor Valens. In A.D. 373 he conducted the war against the Persians, and defeated Sapor with great slaughter. He spent the winter with Valens at Antioch, and in the following year (374) was sent into Armenia, with secret orders to put to death Para the king of Armenia, who was an ally of the Romans, but was distrusted by the emperor. On his arrival in Armenia, Trajan invited Para to a banquet, where he was treacherously murdered by the Roman soldiers. [ARSACIDAE, p. 364, a. ] In A. D. 377 the Goths rose in arms, and laid waste Thrace and the surrounding countries. Gratian sent Richomir at the head of a large army to stop their ravages, and Valens despatched forces under the command of Trajan and Profuturus. These three generals fought a battle with the Goths, which lasted from the morning to the evening, without any decisive advantage being gained on either side, according to Ammianus Marcellinus. It would appear, however, that the Goths suffered most, and Theodoret even speaks of the defeat of Trajan, with the Goths assumed to be the victors. The emperor, however, recalled him to the army shortly afterwards, and he fell in the course of the same year at the fatal battle of Adrianople, in which Valens himself perished, August 9th, 378. [VALENS.] Trajan continued firm in the Catholic faith, although he served an Arian master, and accordingly his praises have been celebrated by the ecclesiastical writers. (Alam. Marc. xxii. 1, xxxi. 7, 13; Theodoret. iv. 30; Basil, Ep. 376, 377; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v.)

TRABELLIUS. (TRAULUS, a son of Telamon and Theaneira or Hesione, a king of the Leleges. (Athen. ii. p. 43.) When his mother was with child with him, she fled to Mileitus, where she was received by king Arion, who also brought up his son Trambelus. In the time of the Trojan war, when Achilles came to Mileitus, he slew Trambelus, but greatly repented when he learnt that he was a son of Telamon. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 467.) Another tradition places Trambelus in the island of Lesbos. (Parchen. Edrat. 26.)

TRANSQUIILLA, SABINIA. [SABINIA.] TRANSQUIILLA, SUETO'NIUS. [SUETO'NIUS.]

TRĀULUS MONTA'NUS, a Roman eques, and one of the paramours of Messalina, was put to death by Claudius in A. D. 48. (Tac. Ann. xi. 56.)

TREBANIA GEN$ occurs only on coins; a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Pallas, and the reverse Jupiter in a quadriga, with L. TREBAN. and underneath ROMA. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 326.)

TREBATICUS, mentioned by Appian as the leader of the Samnites in the Social war, B. C. 90 — 69, is probably a false reading for Egnatius.

(Appian, B. C. i. 52, with Schweighäuser's note.) [EGNATIUS, No. 2.]

TREBATIUS PRISCUS. [PRISCUS.]

TREBATIUS TESTA. [TESTA.]

TREBELLIUS NUS, one of the most insignificant and despicable of the herd of thirty tyrants enumerated by Pollio [see AURELUS.]. He was a Cilician robber, who called his castle in the fastnesses of the Isaurian mountains the Palatiun, established a mint, and gave himself the title of emperor. But he had been tempted to quit his stronghold and descend into the plain, he was there encountered and slain by Causieolus, an Egyptian, one of the generals of Gallienus. (Trebell. Poll. Triq. Tyranz. xxv.)

[W.R.]

TREBELLIUS NUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

TREBELLIUS. 1. Q. TREBELLIUS, a centurion in the second Punic war, was rewarded by Scipio in B. C. 210 with the corona muralis. (Liv. xxvi. 48.) For details see DIGITUS, No. 1.

2. M. TREBELLIUS, of Trnegellae, served in Illyricum under the legate L. Coelius during the war against Perseus in B. C. 169. (Liv. xiii. 21.)

3. M. TREBELLIUS, a friend of Sex. Naevius, B. C. 61. (Cic. pro Quest. 5.)

4. L. TREBELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 67, joined his colleague, L. Roscius Otho, in opposing the roation of Gabinius for conferring upon Pompeius the command of the war against the pirates. Trebellius had promised the senate that he would die before he allowed the proposition to pass into a law; and as neither threats nor entreaties induced him to withdraw his veto, Gabinius proposed to the tribes to deprive him of his office. Seventeen out of thirty-five tribes had already voted for his degradation, when Trebellius gave way. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 71, ed. Orelli; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 7, 13; comp. Otho, p. 65, a.)

5. L. TREBELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 47, resisted his colleague, P. Dolabella, who had proposed a measure for the abolition of debts. Great tumults arose in consequence at Rome, in which Dolabella's party was eventually defeated. (See [Vol. I. p. 1058.] Trebellius was as much involved in debt as Dolabella, and he had only opposed the latter in order to please Caesar. Accordingly after the death of the dictator, he attempted, by Antony's assistance, to carry the very measure which he had formerly resisted. He was one of Antony's friends, whom he accompanied in his campaign against D. Brutus in B. C. 43. (Dion Cass. xii. 29; Plut. Anton. 9; Cic. Phil. vi. 4, x. 10, xi. 6, xii. 8, xii. 2, 12; Cic. ad Fam. xi. 13: § 4.)

6. A. TREBELLIUS, a Roman eques, deserted from the Pompeian party to Caesar in the Spanish war, B. C. 45. (Auctor, B. Hisp. 26.)

7. M. TREBELLIUS, the legatus of Vitellius, the governor of Syria in A. D. 36. (Tac. Ann. vi. 41.) TREBELLIUS CALCA, pretended to be Clodius, and actually came before the court of the centumviri, to lay claim to the property of Clodius. (Val. Max. ix. 15, § 4.)

TREBELLIUS MAXIMUS, was one of the three commissioners appointed in the reign of Nero, A. D. 61, to take the census of the Gauls. He was consul suffectus in the following year (A. D. 62) with L. Annaeus Seneca; and accordingly a Senatusconsultum passed in their consulsiphip is quoted under the title of Senatusconsultum Trebel-lianus. (Gaius, ii. 251, 253; Dig. 36. tit. 1.)
Trebonius afterwards succeeded Petronius Turpil- minus in the government of Britain, where he was hated by the army on account of his inactivity, puillanimity, and avarice. In the commotions which followed the death of Nero, Roscius Caecilius, the legate of Trebonius, induced the soldiers to rise against their general. Trebonius quitted the island, and fled to Vitellius. The latter, however, did not replace Trebonius in the government, but sent Vettius Bolanus to occupy the vacant post. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 46, Hist. i. 60, ii. 65, Agr. 16.)

TREBELLIIUS POLLIO, one of the six "Scriptores Historiae Augustae" [see C Epstein]. His name is prefixed to the biographies of:

1. The two Varienari, father and son; 2. The Gallieni; 3. The thirty tyrants; 4. Claudius; the last-named piece being addressed to Constantine. We learn from Vopiscus that the lives written by Trebellius Pollio commenced with Philippus and extended down to Claudius. Of these, all as far as the Varienari, regarding whom but a short fragment remains, have been lost, thus accounting for the gap in the series which we noticed under CAPITOLINUS. Vopiscus does not give Pollio a very high character as an historian, for he accuses him (Aurelian. c. 2) of having recorded many things meagrely and many things carelessly, but we have no reason to form very high expectations, for he tells us himself, at the close of his book on the Thirty Tyrants, that he did not write but dictated these memoirs, and with such impatience that he could not draw his breath. He flourished as we have seen above under Constantine, and was anterior to Vopiscus. For editions, translations, &c. see C Epste. [W. R.]

M. TREBIUS GALLUS, one of Caesar's officers in Gaul in b.c. 58. (Caes. B. G. iii. 7.)

TREBIUS NIGER. [Niger.]

TREBIUS SERGIANUS, consul under Hadrian in a. d. 132, with C. Serius Augurinus (Fasti.)

TREBIUS STATTIUS. [Statius.]

TREBONIA GENSA, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity, and gained distinction as early as b. c. 447, but none of its members obtained the consulship under the republic, during which time likewise we find none of them mentioned with any surname.

TREBONIA/NUS GALLUS, the Roman emperor, is spoken of under GALLUS, but as no coin of his is given under that head, it is inserted here.

COIN OF TREBONIANUS GALLUS.

TREBONIUS. 1. L. TREBONIUS, tribune of the plebs in b.c. 447, obtained the surname of Asper on account of his frequent attacks upon the patres. He proposed and carried a plebiscitum, that if the ten tribunes were not chosen before the comitia were dissolved, those who were elected should not fill up the number (co-optare), but that the comitia should be continued till the ten were elected. (Liv. iii. 65, v. 10.)

2. CN. TREBONIUS, tribune of the plebs in b.c. 401, vigorously resisted the attempts of the patres to undermine the law of his ancestor. (Liv. v. 11.)

3. M. TREBONIUS, consul tribune in b.c. 383. (Liv. vi. 21.)

4. P. TREBONIUS, consular tribune in b.c. 379. (Diod. xvii. 25.) His name does not occur in Livy (vi. 50) among the consular tribunes of that year.

5. C. TREBONIUS, legatus of the consul L. Papirius Cursor in b.c. 293. (Liv. x. 40.)

6. TREBONIUS, slew C. Lusius, a nephew of C. Marius, for attempting a criminal assault upon him. (Lusius.)

7. A. TREBONIUS, proscribed by Sulla. (Cic. Verr. i. 47.)

8. P. TREBONIUS, brother of No. 6, attempted to leave his brother some property, but his will was declared void by Verres. (Cic. l. c.)

9. A. TREBONIUS, a Roman eques and a negotiator or money-lender in the provinces, was recommended by Cicero to the proconsul Lentulus in b.c. 56. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 3.)

10. C. TREBONIUS, a distinguished Roman eques, the father of the following. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 28, Phil. vili. 10.)

11. C. TREBONIUS, played rather a prominent part in the last days of the republic. He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and in his quaestorship (a. c. 60) he attempted to prevent the adoption of P. Claudius into a plebeian family, contrary to the wish of the triumvirs. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 21.) He changed sides, however, soon afterwards, and in his tribunate of the plebs (b.c. 55) he was the instrument of the triumvirs in proposing that Pompey should have the two Spain, Crassus Syria, and Caesar the Gauls and Ilyricum for another period of five years. This proposal received the approbation of the comitia, and is known by the name of the Lex Trebonia. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 33; Cic. ad Att. iv. 8, b. § 2.) For this service he was rewarded by being appointed one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, where he remained till the breaking out of the civil war in b.c. 49. In the course of the same year he was intrusted by Caesar with the command of the land forces engaged in the siege of Massilia. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, vi. 40, B. C. i. 36, ii. 1; Dion Cass. xii. 19; Cic. ad Att. viii. 3, § 7.) In b.c. 48 Trebonius was city-praetor, and in the discharge of his duties resisted the seditions attempts of his colleague M. Caecilius Rufus to obtain by force the repeal of Caesar's law respecting the payment of debts. The history of these events is related elsewhere. [Vol. iii. p. 672, b.] (Caes. B. C. iii. 20, 21; Dion Cass. xii. 22.) Towards the end of b.c. 47, Trebonius, as propraetor, succeeded Q. Cassius Longinus in the government of Further Spain, but was expelled from the province by a mutiny of the soldiers who espoused the Pompeian party. Notwithstanding this want of success, he still continued to enjoy the favour and confidence of Caesar, who raised him to the consulship in the month of October, b.c. 45, and promised him the province of Asia. (Dion Cass. xiii. 29, 46.) In return for all these honours and favours, Trebonius was one of the prime movers in the conspiracy to assassinate his benefactor, and among the many instances of black ingratitude on the fatal Ides of March, his was one of the blackest. It had been assigned to Trebonius to keep Antonius engaged in conversation outside the senate-house while the other conspirators perpetrated the foul deed. Trebonius did not remain long at Rome, and the murder of Caesar, but went as proconsul to the province of Asia. In the following year (b.c. 43) he sent a supply of money to M. Brutus in Macedonia, and to C. Cassius who was attempting to obtain possession of Syria. In the course of the same year, Dolabella, who had received from Antonius the province of Syria, appeared before Smyrna, where Trebonius was then residing, surprised the town in the night-time, and slew Trebonius in his bed. For details see Dolabella, p. 1059, b. (Dion Cass. xiv. 19, xlvii. 21, 26, 29; Plut. Brut. 19; Appian, B. C. ii. 113, 117, iii. 26; Cic. Phil. ii. 11, 14, xi. 1, 2, 4, xii. 10, xiii. 16, ad Fam. x. 28, ad Att. xiv. 10, ad Fam. xii. 12, 14, 15.) A few of Cicero's letters are addressed to this Trebonius (ad Fam. x. 28, xii. 16, xv. 20, 21). The panegyrics which Cicero pronounces upon this ungrateful wretch in his letters and in the Philippics are needful to his character and language which the author uses on one occasion in reference to the murder of the great man to whom he owed his own life, is positively so loathsome that it deprives us of almost all pity for his own fate. Thus he writes to Trebonius (ad Fam. x. 28): "Quam vellem ad illas pulcherriam epulas me Iulius Martius invitatess i reliquiariam nihil haberemus." 13. TREBO'NIUS, a contemporary of Horace, detected in adultery, is otherwise unknown. (Hor. Sat. i. 4. 114.)

TREBO'NIUS GAR'UCI'A NUS, procurator of Africa at the death of Nero, A. D. 68, put to death Clodius Macer, the governor of the province, by the command of Galba. (Tac. Hist. i. 7.)

TREBO'NIUS RUF'IUS. [Rupinus.]

TREMELLIUS GENS, plebeian, is first mentioned toward the end of the second Punic war, but never obtained much importance. None of its members held the consulship. They bore the surnames of SCROFA and FLACCUS: the latter cognomen was used under Flaccus, and is therefore given below.

TREMELLIUS. 1. CN. TREMELLIUS FLAC'CU, of quaestor rank in B.C. 205, was sent on an embassy, in that year, with four colleagues, to king Attalus, and brought back with him the sacred stone, which represented the Mother of the Gods. He was plebeian aedile in B.C. 203 and praetor in 202, when he obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxix. 11, xxx. 26, 27.)

2. CN. TREMELLIUS, one of the decemvirs in B.C. 173 for dividing certain lands in Lignaria and Cisalpine Gaul among the Roman citizens and the Latin allies. (Liv. xlii. 4.)

3. CN. TREMELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 167. (Liv. xlv. 15.)

4. CN. TREMELLIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 160, was condemned to pay a fine on account of his having insulted the pontifex maximus M. Aurelius Lepidus. (Liv. Epist. 47.)

TREMULUS, Q. MAR'CIUS, a plebeian, was twice consul with the patrician P. Cornelius Arvina, the first time in B.C. 306, and the second time in B.C. 238. In his first consulship Tremulus carried on wars against the Harnici and Anagnini, whom he conquered with ease, and then marched to the assistance of his colleague in Samnium. On his arrival in the latter country he was unexpectedly attacked by the Samnites, but Cornelius came to his succor, and the two armies gained a brilliant victory over the enemy. Cornelius remained in Samnium, but Tremulus returned to Rome, where he celebrated a triumph over the Harnici and Anagnini, and an equestrian statue was erected to him in the forum before the temple of Castor. (Liv. ix. 42, 43; Fasti Capitol; Cic. Phil. vi. 5; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6.)

TRIAR'IA, the wife of L. Vitellius, the brother of the emperor of that name, was distinguished for her haughtiness and cruelty. (Tac. Hist. ii. 63, iii. 77.)

TRIAR'IIUS. 1. A rhetorician, frequently mentioned by M. Seneca. (Suet. 2, 5, 6, Controv. 1, 2, 6, et alibi.)

2. A friend of the younger Pliny, who addresses one letter to him (Ep. vi. 23).

TRIAR'IIUS VAL'ERIUS. 1. L. VALERIUS TRIARIUS, was quaestor urbicus in B.C. 61 (Cic. Verr. i. 14), and subsequently praetor. He was a friend of Brutus, but had fled into that island after his unsuccessful attempt to repeal the laws of Sulla. (Ascon. in Scour. p. 19, ed. Orelli.) Triarius served under Lucullus as one of his legates in the war against Mithridates, and at first gained considerable distinction by his zeal and activity. (For details, see Lucullus, p. 833.) In B.C. 68 Triarius was despatched to the assistance of Fabius, who had been intrusted with the defence of Pontus, while Lucullus invaded Armenia, and who was now attacked by Mithridates with overwhelming numbers. Triarius compelled Mithridates to assume the defensive, and early in the following year he commenced active operations against the Pontic king. Anxious to gain the victory over Mithridates before the arrival of Lucullus, Triarius allowed himself to be attacked at a disadvantage, and was totally defeated with great slaughter. From the expression of Cicero (de Leg. Man. 9) we might conclude that every man in the army perished; but this does not appear to have been the case. Plutarch says that seven thousand Romans fell, among whom were a hundred and fifty centurions and twenty-four tribunes; and that Lucullus, who arrived a few days afterwards, was obliged to secure Triarius from the fury of his troops. This fatal battle, which was one of the severest blows that the Roman arms had sustained for a long time, was fought near Zela, at the same spot where Caesar afterwards gained a victory over Pharnaces. (Appian, Mith. 88, 89, 112, 120; Plut. Pomp. 35; Dion Cass. xxxv. 10—12; Cic. de Leg. Man. 9; Liv. Ep. 98; Plin. H. N. vi. 3.) In Livy (l. c.) the praenomen of Triarius is erroneously Caius.

2. P. VALERIUS TRIARIUS, the son of the preceding, accused M. Aemilius Scaurus, in B. C. 54, of first of repetundae and next of ambitus. Scaurus was defended on both occasions by Cicero. (Ascon. in Scour. p. 34; Cic. pro Scour. 1, 2; ad Att. iv. 16, § 8, iv. 17, § 2, ad Q. Fr. ii. 2, § 9.) For details, see Scaurus, p. 737, b.

3. C. VALERIUS TRIARIUS, perhaps a brother of No. 2, was a friend of Cicero, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Finibus (i. 5), and praises his oratory in his Brutus (c. 76). His sister Valerina Paula divorced her husband in B.C. 50, and married D. Brutus. (Cael.
TRIBONIANUS.

op. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 7.) On the breaking out of the civil war Triarius espoused the cause of Pompey, who appointed him and Laelius in B. C. 48 to the command of the ships which were furnished by the province of Asia. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and it is said to have been by his advice that Pompey ordered his troops to stand still and receive the charge of Caesar's soldiers, a mistake in the opinion of his great opponent. Triarius perished in the civil wars, probably in Africa, for Cicero speaks in B. C. 45 of his death, and adds, that Triarius had left him the guardian of his children. (Cass. B. C. iii. 5, 92; Cic. Brut. 76, ad Att. xii. 28, § 3.)

TRIBONIANUS was a son of Macedonianus, according to Suidas. There are in Suidas two articles on Tribonianus, both of which have been supposed to refer to the same person. They are a strange medley of confusion. The first article begins by saying that Tribonianus was a Greek and an atheist, and in all respects averse to the faith of the Christians; in fact the latter part of the character is an explanation of what the zealot from whom this fragment is taken meant by an atheist. He is further described as a flatterer and a cheat, and as persuading Justinian that he would not die, but would be translated to heaven in the flesh (Suidas, s. v. Τριβονιάνους, ed. Gaisford, and the notes). The foolish compiler seems not to have perceived that a profession of atheism and a promise of heaven to the emperor are hardly consistent things.

He is further said to have had great natural powers, and to have made acquirements inferior to those of no man of his age; but he was wonderfully greedy of money, and he sold justice for lucre; every day he repealed some laws, and made others, selling to each according to his wants. This is taken from Procopius (Persica, I. 24). He lived many years in honour, and died a natural death, having suffered no ill from any one, for he was cunning, and pleasant in his manners, and he threw a shade over his avarice by the abundance of his learning. This is the character which we have of the quaestor of Justinian.

The other article appears to be intended by Suidas to refer to another person of the same name, whom he calls a native of Sida in Pamphylia, but he also calls him a lawyer, or advocate, and a very learned man. He however makes him a contemporary of Justinian, for one of his works was addressed to the emperor. The list of his works given by Suidas is a list of trifles; and no legal work is enumerated among them. It may be safely affirmed that Tribonian the jurist was not the author of any of the works enumerated in this second article of Suidas.

Tribonianus was successively quaestor, consul, and master of the offices to Justinian. In A. D. 531 he was disgraced in consequence of a popular tumult, but he was soon restored, and remained in office until his death in A. D. 545. His name is recorded among those who made the legal compilations of Justinian. In A. D. 532 he was one of the ten commissioners appointed by Justinian to form his first codex: he had at that time the title of "Vir magnificus magister dignitate inter agentes decorum." In A. D. 530 Tribonianus, then quaestor, was commissioned with sixteen others, to compile the Digest or Pandect; and Tribonianus himself, and the four professors (antecessores) of Theophilus, Craterus, Dorotheus and Anatolius, were the most active among the commissioners. In December A. D. 533 the Digest was promulgated as law.

During the time that he was employed on the Pandect, Tribonianus and the two professors, Theophilus and Dorotheus, were commissioned to compile an Institutional work. Tribonian had at this time the title of "Vir magnificus, magister, et Ex- quenstor sacri palatii nostri" (Instit. Prooenium), and they took as their basis the Institutional work of Gaisus, and produced the four books of the Institutes of Justinian, which were published in November A. D. 533. The revised or second edition of the Codex was also the work of Tribonianus and four other jurists, and it was published in December A. D. 534. (Constitutio, Cordi, &c.) It is hardly possible to form any estimate of the services of Tribonianus as distinct from those of the other commissioners. He had the superintendence of the Digest, and may have taken the chief part in planning the work; and to his activity it was owing, that the large collection of juristic writings was made, from which the compilers selected the materials for the Digest (Constitutio, Tanta, &c.). He had a well-stocked library of the old writers on law. As to the compilations made by Tribonian and his associates see the article Justinianus.

Gibbon (c. 44) has expanded the scanty and scandalous notices of Procopius (Persica, i. 23, 24, and Anecdota, 13, 20) and Suidas after his peculiar fashion. There is a life of Justinian and Tribonian by J. P. de Ludewig, entitled "Vita Justiniani Magni atque Theodorne nec non Tribonianir, Hal. 1731." [G. L.]

TRIBUNUS (Τριβούνω), a very eminent physician, a native of Palestine, and a man of great piety and benevolence. He went to Persia, where he attended on the king, Cosra (or Chosroès) I., and returned home laden with magnificent presents, probably A. D. 531. When this king was concluding a treaty of peace with the emperor Justinian in the following year, he made it a special request that Tribunus should be allowed to stay with him for twelve months. This was agreed to, and when at the end of that time Tribunus was about to take leave of the Persian court, the king told him to ask for any favour that he pleased. The noble-minded physician only begged for the liberation of some Roman captives; and the king released not only those whom he particularly named, but three thousand others besides (Procop. De Bello Goth. iv. 10; Suid. s. v. Τριβούνωs). This anecdote will bring to the recollection of an English physician the very similar disinterestedness of Mr. Boughton at the court of the Great Mogul about the middle of the seventeenth century, which was the origin of the power of the East India Company in Bengal. [W. A. G.]

TRICCI A'NUS, DE CIUS, a soldier of humble origin, who rose to the dignity of governor of Pamonia under Macrinus. He is apparently the same person as the Triccius, who at an humble period was put to death by Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. xxviii. 15, lxxix. 4.) [W. R.]

TRICIPTI'NUS, the name of an ancient patriotic family of the Lucretia gens.

1. SP. LUCRETII TRICIPTI'NUS, the father of Lucretia, whose rape by Sex. Tarquinius led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus and the establishment of the republic. [Vol. III. p. 979, b. 1.] Tricipitius was a member of the senate under Tarquin with was appointed Praefectus Urbi by the king, when the latter left the city to prosecute the war against Ardea. After the dethronement of the king, and before the appointment of the consuls, Tricipitius, in virtue of his office of Praefectus Urbi, had the government of the city. He presided at the comitia, in which the first consuls were elected, and for this purpose was probably elected interrex by the patricians, as indeed is expressly stated by Dionysius (v. 11), and might be inferred from analogy.

The two first consuls were L. Junius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, b.c. 509; and after the death of Brutus in battle, in the course of the same year, Tricipitius was elected to supply his place; but worn out by age, he died a few days after entering upon the office. (Liv. i. 58, 59, ii. 9; Dionys. iv. 76, 72, 64, v. 11, 19; Tac. Ann. vi. 11; Cic. de Rep. ii. 31.)

1. L. Lucretius. T. F. T. N. TRICIPITIUS, consul in b.c. 508 with P. Valerius Publicola, in which year he fought against the Etruscans, who had attacked Rome under Persena, and he is said by Dionysius to have been wounded in the battle. Dionysius, however, places the invasion of Persena in the following year, and accordingly represents Tricipitius as one of the generals of the Roman army under the consuls. (Liv. ii. 8, 11; Dionys. v. 20, 22, 23.) Tricipitius was consul a second time in b.c. 504 with P. Valerius Publicola, in which year the consuls carried on the war against the Sabines with success. (Liv. ii. 16; Dionys. v. 40, foll.)

2. Lucretius (Tricipitius), consul in b.c. 507 with P. Valerius Publicola, according to Livy (ii. 15); but in Dionysius (v. 21) and the Fasti M. Horatii Pulvillus is mentioned instead as the colleague of Publicola. [PULVILLUS, No. 1.]

4. L. Lucretius T. F. T. N. TRICIPITIUS, son of No. 2, was consul in b.c. 462 with T. Veturius Gobio which year he conquered the Aequi. He was consul the same year, when they were returning from an invasion of the Roman territory laden with booty, and nearly annihilated the whole army. He obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. In the following year he exerted himself warmly to save Kaeso Quintius, who was brought to trial by the tribune Virginis. (Liv. iii. 8, 10, 12; Dionys. ix. 69—71.) Tricipitius is mentioned by Dionysius (xi. 15) as one of the distinguished senators who spoke in favour of the abolition of the decemvirate in b.c. 449.

5. Hostus Lucretius L. F. T. N. TRICIPITIUS, son of No. 4, consul in b.c. 429 with L. Sergius Fidenas. (Liv. iv. 30.)

6. P. Lucretius Hosti F. TRICIPITIUS, son of No. 4, consul in b.c. 419, and a second time in 417. (Liv. iv. 44, 47.)

7. L. Lucretius FLAVUS TRICIPITIUS, consul in b.c. 393 with Ser Sulpius Camerinus, in which year he conquered the Volsci. He was a consular tribune in 391, when he gained a victory over the Volsciennes; and he held the same office a second time in 388, a third time in 383, and a fourth time in 381. (Liv. v. 29, 32, vi. 4, 21, 22.) Plutarch (Camill. 32) represents L. Lucretius as the senator who was usually asked first for his opinion, probably because he was one of the few who had held the rank of consul; and the same writer informs us that Lucretius spoke against the removal to Veii.

TRICOLO'NUS (Tēkōλων), two mythical personages, one a son of Lycejon, and founder of Tricoli in Arcadia (Paul. viii. 3, § 1), and the other one of the suitors of Hippodameia, who was conquered and killed by Oenomaus. (Paul. vii. 21, § 7.)

TRICOSTUS, the name of an ancient family of the Virginia gens. Almost all the members of the Virginia gens belonged to this family, which became so extensive that it was subdivided into other families bearing the names of CARLOMONTA'NUS, ESQUALI'NUS, and RUTI'LUS. The two former are spoken of under their respective names, and it therefore only remains to treat here of the Tricosti, who had no additional name, and of the Tricosti Rutili.

1. OPERI VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS, consul b.c. 502 with Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, carried on war against the Aurunci and took Pometia, in consequence of which he and his colleague obtained a triumph. (Liv. ii. 17; Dionys. v. 49.)

2. OPERI VIRGINIUS (TRICOSTUS), consul b.c. 473 with L. Aemilius Mannercus, according to Livy (ii. 54); but other authorities give Vopiscus Julius Julius in place of Virginus. [Julius, No. 3.]

3. L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS, consul b.c. 435 with C. Julius. (Liv. iv. 21; Diod. xii. 49.) Respecting the events of this year, see JULUS, No. 4. Virginus and Julius were again consuls in the following year, according to Licinius Macer; but other authorities mentioned M. Manlius and Q. Sulpicius as consuls, and others again relate that there were no consuls but consular tribunes this year. (Liv. iv. 23.)

4. L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS, consular tribune b.c. 389, the year after Rome had been taken by the Gauls. (Liv. vi. 1.)

5. PACOCLUS VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS RUTILUS, consul b.c. 406 with Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, according to Livy (xv. 49); but as he would not meet him in the field, he returned to Rome after laying waste their territory. He took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of his colleague. [VISCELLINUS.] (Liv. iv. 41; Dionys. viii. 68, ix. 51.)

6. T. VIRGINIUS T. F. T. N. TRICOSTUS RUTILUS, consul b.c. 479 with K. Fabius Vibulanus, in which year the Fabia gens left Rome to carry on the war alone against Veii. (Liv. ii. 48, 49; Dionys. ix. 14.) This Virginus was augur, and died in 463 in the great pestilence which devastated Rome in that year. (Liv. iii. 7.)

7. A. VIRGINIUS T. F. T. N. TRICOSTUS RUTILUS, brother of No. 6, was consul in b.c. 476 with Sp. Servilius Priscus Sicularus. (Liv. ii. 51; Dionys. ix. 23.)

TRIGEMINUS, P. CURIATIUS FISTUS, consul b.c. 453, and one of the first decemvirates, is spoken of under Fistus. The cognomen Trigeminus shows that he pretended to be descended from one of the three Curati who fought with the Horati; and it appears from coins, a specimen of which is annexed, that some of the Curati in later times laid claim to a similar descent. On the obverse of the coin is the head of Pallas with trig (i. e. Trigeminus), and on the reverse a woman driving a quadriga with Victory standing behind her, and the legend c. cvr (C. Cv.
TRIPTOLEMUS. Dion Ov. Ov. for the in venr he cretius an anxiety tween and Schol. foil.)

TRIGONELA or TRITOGENEIA (Trypövea or Tryppövea), a daughter of Aeusus, and the wife of Minyas, or according to others, the mother of Minyas by Poseidon. (Tzetzs. ad Lyc. 873; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 120.)

TRIO. L. FULCI'NIUS, a notorious informer under Tiberius (celebre inter accusatores Trionis ingenium, Tac. Ann. ii. 28), and one of the friends and favourites of Tiberius. He is first mentioned in A. D. 16, when he was the chief instrument in procuring the condemnation of the praeator L. Scribonius Libo. In A. D. 20 he accused Piso before the consuls, and in consequence of that service was allowed by Tiberius to become a candidate for the higher honors of the state. In A. D. 31 he was consul with P. Memmius Regulus, in which year Sejanus was put to death. Being a friend of Sejanus, Trio was suspected of favouring his cause, and vehement disputes arose in consequence between the two consuls. By pretending great anxiety to bring the accomplices of Sejanus to justice, the fall of Trio was postponed for a short time; but in A. D. 35, having been accused and thrown into prison, he did not choose to wait till he was formally condemned, and therefore put an end to his own life, after first making his will, in which he attacked in the severest terms Macro and the principal freedmen of Tiberius, as well as the emperor himself. (Tac. Ann. ii. 28, 30, iii. 10, 19, v. 11, vi. 4, 58; Dion Cass. liv. 9, 25.)

TRIO, LUCRETIIUS, known only from coins, on which we find On. Lucretius Trio and L. Lucretius Trio. The specimen annexed has on the obverse the head of the Sun, and on the reverse the Moon surrounded by the seven Planets, or the constellation of the Great Bear. (See Dict. of Antiq. p. 147, 2d ed.) These devices, like many in modern heraldry, are a kind of punning on the name. The Sun and Moon give the greatest light (lux-em), and thus have reference to the gentile name Lucretius; while the seven Planes are an evident allusion to the surname. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 239.)

TRIOPAS (Tpöpas or Triöv). 1. A son of Poseidon and Canace, a daughter of Aeolus (Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 100) or of Helios and Rhodos, and the father of Iphimedeia and Erysichthon (Apollod. i. 7. § 4; Dion. v. 56; Steph. Byz. s. v. Triövov; Ov. Met. viii. 751); he is also called the father of Pelasgus. (Paus. ii. 22. § 2.) He expelled the Pelasgians from the Dotian plain, but was himself obliged to emigrate, and went to Caria, where he founded Cnidus on the Triopian promontory. (Diod. l. c.; Herod. i. 174.) His son Erysichthon was punished by Demeter with insatiable hunger, because he had violated her sacred grove (Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 25, &c.); but others relate the same of Triopas himself. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 14; comp. Schol. ad Theocrit. lyc. 69.) The statue of Triopas with a horse stood at Delphi, being an offering of the Cnidians. (Paus. x. 11. § 1.)

2. A son of Phorbas, an Argive, was the father of Ismus, Agenor and Messene. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, iv. 1. § 2.)

TRIPHYLUS (Triövßulos), a son of Arcas from whom Tripylvania, a portion of Elis, was believed to have derived its name. (Polyb. iv. 77; Paus. x. 9. § 3.)

TRIPTOLEMUS (Triövßlemos), a son of Celeus and Metaneira or Polymania, or according to others, a son of king Eileius by Cythoneia, or Cyntineia, or Hyona, Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 19; Schol. ad Stat. Theb. i. 382.) Others again describe him as a son of Oceanus and Gaea, as a younger brother or relation of Celeus, as a son of Trochilus by an Eleusinian woman, as a son of Rharus by a daughter of Amphictyon, or lastly, as a son of Dysaules. (Hygin. Fab. 147; Apollod. i. 5. § 2; Paus. i. 14. § 2; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 153.) Triptolemus was the favourite of Demeter, and the inventor of the plough and agriculture, and of civilisation, which is the result of it. He was the great hero in the Eleusinian mysteries. (Plin. H. N. vi. 56; Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 22; Virg. Georg. i. 19.) According to Apollodorus, who makes Triptolemus a son of Celeus and Metaneira, Demeter, on her arrival at Eleusis in Attica, undertook as nurse the care of Demophon, a brother of Triptolemus, who had just been born. In order to make the child immortal, Demeter at night put him into a fire, but as Metaneira on discovering the proceeding, screamed out, the child was consumed by the flames. As a compensation for this bereavement, the goddess gave to Triptolemus a chariot with winged dragons and seeds of wheat. According to others Triptolemus first sowed barley in the Rharian plain, and thence spread the cultivation of grain all over the earth; and in later times an altar and threshing floor of Triptolemus were shown there. (Paus. i. 38. § 6.) In the Homeric hymn on Demeter, Triptolemus is described as one of the chief men of the country, who like other nobles is instructed by Demeter in her sacred worship (123, 474, &c.); but no mention is made of any relationship between him and Celeus. In the tradition related by Hyginus, who makes Triptolemus a son of Eleusis, Triptolemus himself was the boy whom the goddess wished to make immortal. Eleusis, who was watching her, was discovered by her and punished with violent death. (Ov. Hymn. ad Cru. xviii.) Triptolemus, after having received the dragon-chariot, rode in it all over the earth, making man acquainted with the blessings of agriculture. (Comp. Paus. vii. 18. § 2, viii. 4. § 1; Ov. Met. v. 646, &c.) On his return to Attica, king Celeus wanted to kill him, but by the command of Demeter he was obliged to give up his country to Triptolemus, which he now called after his father Eleusis. He now established the worship of Demeter, and instituted the Theomorphia. (Hygin. Fab. 147; comp. Dionys. Hal. i. 12; Ov. Fast. iv. 507, &c.) He had temples and statues both at Eleusis and Athens (Paus. i. 14. § 1. 36. § 6.) Triptolemus is represented in works of art as a youthful hero, sometimes with the petaeus, on a chariot drawn by dragons, and holding in his hand a sceptre and corn ears. (See Müller, Anc. Art. and its Rem. § 385.)

TRITAEA (Türkiyea), a daughter of Triton, a priestess of Athena, by whom Ares became the father of Melanippus, who gave to a town in Achaia the name of his mother. Sacrifices were offered there to Ares and Tritaea in the temple of Athena. (Paus. viii. 22. § 5, &c.)

TRITANNUS, a man distinguished for his remarkable strength. (Cic. De Fin. i. 3; Plin. H. N. vii. 19. s. 20; Solin. c. 4.)

TRITANTAECHMES (Trtanatekhmeis). 1. A Persian satrap of Babylon, son of Artabazus. (Herod. i. 192.)

2. A son of Artabanus [No. 1], and a cousin therefore of Xerxes, was one of the commanders of the Persian infantry when the barbarians invaded Greece in n. c. 486. After the battle of Thermopylae, when the Persians had been vanquished, some Arcadian deserters of the contests at Olympia for no other prize than a simple olive-crown, Tritantaschmes exclaimed that men who thus strove, not for gain, but for glory, could not be attacked with much chance of success, a sentiment which Xerxes ascribed to cowardice. (Herod. vii. 82, 131, viii. 26.)

TRITO or TRITOGENIAEA (Trto or Trirotgenresia and Trirotysiæ), a surname of Athena (Hom. II. iv. 515, Od. iii. 378; Hes. Theog. 924), which is explained in different ways. Some derive it from lake Tritonis in Libya, near which she is said to have been born (Eurip. Ion. 872; Apollod. i. 3. § 8; comp. Herod. iv. 150, 179); others from the stream Triton near Alacomenae in Bœotia, where she was worshipped, and where according to some statements she was also born (Paus. ix. 33. § 4; comp. Hom. II. iv. 0); the grammarians, lastly, derive the name from τριτός, which, in the dialect of the Athenians, is said to signify "third," and, as is supposed, she would be the goddess born out of the head of her father. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1310; comp. Hom. Hymn. 28. 4; Hes. Theog. 924.)

TRITON (Trto). 1. A son of Poseidon and Amphitrite (or Celaeno), who dwelt with his father and mother in a golden palace on the bottom of the sea, or according to Homer (H. xiii. 20) at Aegae. (Hes. Theog. 930, &c.; Apollod. i. 4. § 6.) Later writers describe this divinity of the Mediterranean as riding over the sea on horses or other sea-monsters. (Ov. Heroid. vii. 50; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 28; Claudian, xxvii. 378.) Sometimes also Tritons are mentioned in the plural, and as serving other marine divinities in riding over the sea. Their appearance is differently described, though they are always conceived as possessing the human figure in the upper part of their bodies, while the lower part is that of a fish. (Pausanias ix. 21. § 1) says: The Tritons have green hair on their head, very fine and hard scales, breathing organs below their ears, a human nose, a broad mouth, with the teeth of animals, sea-green eyes, hands rough like the surface of a shell, and instead of feet, a tail like that of dolphins. (Comp. Orph. Hymn. 23. 4; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4, 7.) The chief characteristic of Tritons in poetry as well as in works of art is a trumpet—consisting of a shell (concha), which the Tritons blow at the command of Poseidon, to soothe the restless waves of the sea (Ov. Met. i. 353), and in the fight of the Gigantes this trumpet served to frighten the enemies. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 28; comp. Paus. viii. 2. § 3; Mosch. ii. 20; Virg. Aen. x. 209, &c.; Ov. Met. ii. 8; Plin. H. N. ix. 5.) Tritons were sometimes represented with two horse's feet instead of arms, and they were then called Centaur-Tritons or Ichthyocentaurs. (Tzetz. ad Lyce. 84, 886, 892.) Their figures are frequently mentioned in works of art, as in the sanctuary of Poseidon on the Corinthian isthmus (Paus. i. 1. § 7), in the temple of Dionysus at Tanagra (ix. 20. § 4; comp. Aelian, H. A. xiii. 21), in the pediment of the temple of Saturn at Rome. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 8; comp. Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 152; Müller, Anc. Art. and its Rem. § 402.)

2. The god of lake Tritonis in Libya, is, like Glaucus, a marine divinity connected with the story of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1552, &c.; Orph. Argon. 337; Tzetz. ad Lyceph. 34, 754; Herod. iv. 173.)

TRITONIS (Triotoneis). 1. A nymph of lake Tritonis in Libya, who according to an ancient tradition was the mother of Athena by Poseidon. (Herod. iv. 180; Pind. Pyth. iv. 20.) By Amphi- themis she became the mother of Nasamon and Caphaurus. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1455.)

2. A surname of Athena, like Tritogeneia and Tritonia. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 72, 109; Virg. Aen. ii. 171.)

TROEZEN (Troisën), a son of Pelops, and founder of the town of Troezen or Troezea. He was the father of Anaphylustus and Sphettus. (Paus. ii. 30. § 8, &c.; Parthen. Erot. 31.)

TROGUS, C. MA'RIUS, a triumvir of the mint under Augustus, occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of Augustus, and on the reverse two men standing, with the legend c. marivs c. p. tro. iii. vii. (Ekchel, vol. v. p. 250.)

COIN OF C. MARIVS TROGUS.

TROGUS POMPEIUS. [JUSTINUS, p. 680, b.] TROGUS, T. QU'N'TIUS, was accused by the quaestor M. Sergius. (Varr. L. L. vi. 90—92, ed. Müller.)

TROGUS, SAWEFIS. [SAFFRIS, No. 6.] TROILUS (Tra'olis), a son of Priam and Hebe- cabe (Hom. II. xxiv. 257), or according to others a son of Apollo. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) He fell by the hands of Achilles (Virg. Aen. i. 474; Hornt. Carm. ii. 9, 16; Cic. Tusc. i. 39) others relate that Achilles ordered Troilus who was made prisoner, to be strangled (Dict. Cret. iv. 9), or that Troilus, when fleeing from Achilles, ran into the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo, where Achilles slew him on the same spot where he himself was afterwards killed. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 307.)

TROILUS (Τρόιλος), a sophist of some distinct, who taught at Constantinople, under Arcadius and Honorius, at the beginning of the fifth century of our era, was a native of Side in Pamphylia. Among his disciples were Eusebius Scholasticus, Ablabius, a Novatian bishop of Nicæa, and Silvanus, bishop of Philippopolis. He wrote, according to Suidas, λόγοι πολετικοί, and seven books of letters. (Socrat. Il. E. vi. 6, vii. 1, 27; Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bild. Graec. vol. vi. p. 140; Clinton, Fast. Rom. s. a. 401, 408.) There is an epigram in the Greek Anthology on the athlete Lyron, ascribed to a grammarian Troilus, whom Schneider and Jacobs identify with the Sophist; though Fabricius supposes the two persons to be different, without stating his reason. (Fabric. Bild. Graec. vol. i. p. 498; Bruneck, Anat. vol. ii. p. 450; Jacobs, Ath. Graec. vol. iii. p. 155, vol. xili. p. 962.)

TROPHILUS (Τρόφιλος), a physician quoted by Stobaeus (Flor. cii. 9), who said that he was a perfect physician who was able to distinguish what was possible from what was not. He may, perhaps, be the same person who wrote a book entitled Ξυναγογή Ἀκονιστάτων Θεομάτων, which is quoted by Stobaeus (ibid. c. 22–24). Fabricius says (Bild. Graec. vol. xili. p. 439, ed. vet.) that Trophilus is also mentioned by Plutarch in his Salutaris Prosepta, and if this be so (for the writer has not been able to find the passage) he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

TROPHIMUS, a Greek statuary of the Roman period, who made an honourable statue of a Roman magistrate, erected by the college of Pastophori of the town of Industry, of which the artist was a citizen. The following is the inscription: —

T. GRAE. TROPHIMUS IND. FAC. (Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. cxxxi. 1; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 419, 420, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TROPHON or GROPHON, is supposed to have been the maker of the statue of Æphanto, the daughter of Zeus, the inscription belonging to which we still possess, namely, the well-known Melian inscription. The last word of the inscription is TROPHON, where it is not quite clear whether the first letter is Τ or Θ, but most scholars take it for the latter. The whole inscription thus, when the orthography is modernized: —

TROPHONIUS (Τρόφωνιος), a son of Erginus, king of Orchomenus, or of Apollo. He with his brother Agamedes built the temple at Delphi and the treasury of king Hyrieus in Boeotia. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 296; Paus. ix. 37 and 39; Strab. ix. p. 421.) After his death he was worshipped as a hero, and had a celebrated oracle in a cave near Lebadæa in Boeotia. (Herod. l. 46; Strab. ix. p. 114; Dind. Ion, 300; Aristoph. Nub. 502; comp. Dict. de Antiq. s. v. Oroclum.) [L. S.]

TROS (Τρῶς). 1. A son of Erichthonius and Astyoche, and a grandson of Dardanus. He was married to Calirhoe, by whom he became the father of Ilus, Assaracus and Ganymedes, and was king of Phrygia. (Hom. Il. xx. 230.) The country and people of Troy derived their name from him. He gave up his son Ganymedes to Zeus for a present of horses. (Paus. v. 24. § 1; Apolloed. iii. 12. § 2; comp. Ganymedes.)

2. A Trojan, a son of Alastor, who was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xx. 462.) [L. S.]

TRYPHAENA (Τρυφέα, TRYPHIODORUS, a Greek grammarian, was born in Egypt. Nothing more is known of his personal history. All that is known of the time when he lived is that he was later than Nestor of Larunda [Nestor], whom he imitated. Some place him as late as the fifth century. Of the grammatical labours of Tryphiodorus we have no records. He is known to us only as a versifier. He wrote a poem called Παραδειγμα, another entitled Τα κατ’ ἑπεκδώμενα; a third called Οδος δύναμιν, written for King Tryphiodorus, was so called, according to Eustathius (Prop. ad Odys. p. 4), because no word was admitted into it which contained the letter σ. It is difficult however to conceive of the composition of an Odyssey from which the name of Odysseus must have been excluded. The account of the matter given by Hesychius is more probable, that from the first book the letter α was excluded, from the second β, and so on (Hes. s. v. Νικεω). In any case it must have been a miserable exercise of ingenuity. A fourth work of Tryphiodorus was Παράφρασις των Ὀμίων παραθεσιν. All these, and others not more distinctly named, have perished. The only effect of the mass of Tryphiodorus which has come down to us is his Προερωτημα, a poem consisting of 691 lines. From the small dimensions of it, it is necessarily little but a sketch. It is not, like the poem of Quintus Smyrnaeus, a continuation of the Iliad; it is an independent poem. After a brief indication of the subject, there follows a meagre recapitulation of some of the chief events since the death of Hector, given in the clumsiest and most confused manner, without any indication of the mode in which they were connected together. The proper subject of the poem begins with the account of the building of the wooden horse. Tryphiodorus describes minutely the painting and other adornments of the work, and enumerates the heroes who took their places in it; not forgetting to mention the ambrosial food with which Athena provided them. In his account of Simon Tryphiodorus agrees more with Virgil, not with Quintus, who represents him as mutilated by the Trojans before he would tell them the purpose of the wooden horse. The episode of Laocoon is entirely omitted. After the horse had been brought into the temple, of Athené, Venus, assuming the form of an old Trojan woman, discloses to Helen the trick of the Greeks, and informs her that Menelaus is among the heroes inside. Intending to bring about their detection, she goes to the temple, and within the hearing of the warriors talks of the wives in Greece. Stifled sighs and tears escape from the heroes. Antilochus is on the point of betraying the whole scheme by speaking aloud, but Ulysses claps his hands over his mouth, and holds them so tight that he smothers him. Athene appears and sends Helen home again. This scene is the only part of the poem which has much merit. A somewhat lengthy, though otherwise tolerably good description of the scenes which ensued upon the sack and destruction of the city, is followed by a meagre notice of some of the chief special incidents.

The poem of Tryphiodorus was first published in connection with those of Quintus Smyrnaeus and Coluthus. A separate edition, accompanied by a Latin translation in verse, was published by F. Jamot (Paris, 1557). Frischlin and Rhodoman published a critical edition with Latin versions in prose and metre. (Frankfurt, 1583.) An improved edition of Tryphiodorus was published by J. Neuss (Oxford, 1739), in which several omissions were supplied from fresh MSS. Merrick also published an English translation and a treatise on Tryphiodorus (Oxford, 1759). The edition of Bandini, (Florence 1765) contained a collection of the various readings of two new MSS. He did little for the text however. His critical apparatus was applied to that object by Thomas Northmore in his edition of the poem (Cambridge 1791, London, 1804). A splendid folio edition was printed by Bodoni at Parma in 1796. An equally imposing edition, and one more correct, was published by Tauchnitz (Leipzig 1808) under the superintendence of G. H. Schafer. A critical edition with the notes of Merrick, Schaefer, and others, and some of his own, was published by F. A. Wernicke (Leipzig 1819). Besides the Latin and English translations, there is one in German by B. Thiersch. (Suida's, s. v. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 526; Scholl, Gesch. der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. iii. p. 199). [C. P. M.]

TRYPHON. Tryphos, literary. 1. Of Alexandria, the son of Ammonius, a grammarian and poet, lived before and during the reign of Augustus (Suid. s. v.). A long list of his works, in almost every department of grammar, is given by Suidas, and an account of several of them, which exist in MS., will be found in Fabričius (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 351, comp. pp. 163, 192, 319, 321, 381, and vol. i. p. 526).

2. The son of Hermes, the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology, on the sudden death of the harp-player Terpæs, who was killed in the Scis of Sparta, by having a fig thrown into his open mouth. There is a passage of Suidas (s. v. Γαιονυ μελεν και πνευσταρα), which makes it all but certain that the Terpæs of the epigram is no other than the celebrated Terpander, and that the epigram refers to a traditional account of his death, in which, as in similar stories of the death of other poets, even the manner of his decease was made symbolical of the sweetness of his compositions. Respecting Tryphon himself we have no further information. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 451; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 157, vol. x. p. 296, vol. xiii. p. 963.)

TRYPHON.

3. See Diodorus Tryphon, Vol. i. p. 1017, b. 4. Tryphon the Jew, whose name appears in Justin's well-known dialogue, hardly falls within the limits of this work. All the particulars respecting him which are necessary for understanding Jerome, and they are very few, will be found in the dialogue itself. (See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 62.) [P. S.]

TRYPHON (Tryphos), artists. 1. An eminent engraver of precious stones, whose beryl, engraved with a figure of the sea-nymph Galene, is mentioned in an epigram by Addaeus (No. 6, Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 242), who appears to have lived in the time of Alexander the Great and his successors. There is a very celebrated gem by him in the collection of the Duke of Marlborough, representing the reconciliation of Eros and Psyche (Bracci, i. 114), of which there are several copies; one of the best of these is in the Museum at Naples (Visconti, Op. Var. vol. ii. p. 192, No. 114). There is also a cornelian, engraved with a figure of Eros riding on a lion, bearing the inscription ΤΡΥΦΩΝ, in the Museum of the Hague (De Jonge, Notice, p. 148, No. 16); and another gem, mentioned by Ramboux (1545), with the inscription ΤΡΥΦΩΝ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. His name also occurs on another gem, in the Museum of the Hague (De Jonge, p. 151, No. 12; Caylus, Recueil, v. pl. lii. No. 5, p. 148); but in this case the inscription is certainly a modern forgery. (R. Rochette, Lettre a M. Scharny, pp. 157, 158.)

2. An architect of Alexandria, who flourished in the time of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and distinguished himself in the defence of Apollonia, by the invention of an ingenious plan of countermine. (Vitruv. x. 22. s. 16. § 10, Schneider.) [P. S.]

TRYPHON (Tryphos). 1. A surgeon, who lived at Rome shortly before the time of Celsus, that is, probably in the first century B.C. (Cels. De Med. vi. 5, vii. 1. pp. 117, 137.) As Celsus calls him "Tryphon pater," there would seem to have been another medical man of the same name, who lived somewhat later. This is perhaps also implied by Galen when he speaks of Tryphos ὁ χαρακτήρ (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Lic. vii. 3. p. 214, § 114), who may perhaps be the same person as the "Tryphon pater" of Celsus, and who is certainly the surgeon quoted by Scribonius Largus (De Compos. Medicam. c. 69. § 201. p. 227. Cf. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Lic. vi. 13. vol. xiii. p. 745) and apparently his tutor (ibid. c. xiv. § 175. p. 222), and perhaps also the physician mentioned by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. i. 4. p. 323). Tryphon, the native of Gortyna in Crete, who is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Lic. ix. 2. vol. xxii. pp. 246, 253) is also perhaps the same person; but the writer on gymnastics, mentioned by Galen (Ad Thrasyb. de Med. et Gymnast. c. 47. vol. v. p. 898) probably lived earlier.

2. The physician introduced by Plutarch as one of the speakers in his Symposiaca (iii. 1. 2, 3; 2 § 1, 2), if he was a real personage, lived in the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

TRYPHON, THE DIOGENES. 1. TOTUS (Toddus) Tryphos, a usurper of the throne of Syria during the reign of Demetrius II. Nicator. After the death of Alexander Balas in B.C. 146, Tryphon first set up Antiochus, the infant son of Balas, as a pretender against Demetrius; but in B.C. 142 he murdered Antiochus and reigned as king himself.
TRYPHONINUS.

TRYPHON, SA'LVlUS, one of the leaders of the revolted slaves in Sicily, had been accustomed to play on the flute in the orgies of the women, and was supposed to have a knowledge of divination, for which reason he was elected king by the slaves in n. c. 103. He displayed considerable abilities, and in a short time collected an army of 20,000 foot and 2000 horse, with which he led siege to Morgantia, a strong city in Sicily. The praetor P. Licinius Nerva obtained possession of the camp of the slaves by surprise, but was afterwards defeated by Salvius. After this victory Salvius assumed all the pomp of royalty. He administered justice in the toga praetexta, surrounded himself with lectors, and took the surname of Tryphon, probably because it had been borne by Diodotus, the usurper of the Syrian throne. He chose the strong fortress of Tricola as the seat of his new kingdom; and his power was still further strengthened by the submission of Athenion, who had been elected leader of the slaves in the western part of the island. The insurrection had now assumed such a formidable aspect, that the senate sent the propraetor L. Licinius Lucullus into Sicily in the following year (n. c. 102) with a force of 17,000 men, the greater part of which were regular Roman or Italian troops. Tryphon, however, did not hesitate to meet this force in the open field. Athenion, whom he had first thrown into prison through jealousy, but had afterwards released, fought under him with the greatest bravery, and was severely wounded in the battle. The slaves were defeated with great slaughter, and Tryphon was obliged to take refuge in Tricola. But Lucullus, whether from incapacity or treachery, failed in taking the place, and returned to Rome without effecting anything more. Lucullus was succeeded by C. Servilius; and on the death of Tryphon, about the same time, the kingdom of the slaves devolved upon Athenion, who was not subdued till n. c. 101. (Diod. Eclog. ex lib. XXXVI. p. 533, foll. ed. Wess. Flor. iii. 19.)

TRYPHONI'NIUS, CLAUDIUS, a Roman jurist, wrote under the united reign of Septimius Severus, and his son Antoninus Caracalla (Dig. 40. tit. 19. s. 39); and he survived Severus, who died A. D. 212, for he speaks of "Imperator noster cum Divo Severo patre suo" (Dig. 27. tit. 1. s. 44). There is extant a rescript of Antoninus (A. D. 213) addressed to Claudius Tryphoninus, which declares that a legacy left by Cornelia Salvia to the "universitas" of the Jews in Antioch could not be sued for (Cod. 1. tit. 9. s. 1). It is probable that this rescript was addressed to Tryphoninus in the capacity of Advocatus Fisci. Tryphoninus (Dig. 23, tit. 3. s. 73. § 4) speaks of giving his opinion in the "auditorium," which may be that of Papiniun. Tryphoninus appears to have studied Cicero's writings: he quotes the oration Pro Clientio (Dig. 48. tit. 19. s. 93). Tryphoninus was in the Consilium of Severus at the same time with Messius and Papiniun (Dig. 48. tit. 14. s. 50). He was the author of twenty-one Libri Disputationum, from which there are seventy-nine excerpts in the Digest; and he also wrote notes on Cervidius Sceavola.

COIN OF TRYPHON, KING OF SYRIA.

TRYBERO.

TUBERO, AELIUS. 1. P. AELIUS TU'BERO, was elected plebeian aedile in n. c. 202, but resigned his office, together with his colleague L. Laetorius, because there had been some fault in the auries at their election. He was praetor the following year, n. c. 201, when he obtained Sicily as his province. In n. c. 189 he was one of the ten commissioners sent into Asia after the conquest of Antiochus; and in n. c. 177 he was again elected praetor. (Liv. xxx. 39, 40, xxxvii. 55, xlii. 8.)

2. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, tribune of the plebs n. c. 194, proposed a plebiscitum, in accordance with a decree of the senate, for founding two Latin colonies in southern Italy; one among the Bruttii, and the other in the territory of Thurii. He was appointed one of the three commissioners for the foundation of the latter colony. (Liv. xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 9.)

3. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, the son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paulus, served under the latter in his war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. After Perseus had been taken prisoner, he was committed by Aemilius to the custody of Tubero. This Tubero, like the rest of his family, was so poor that he had not an ounce of silver plate, till his father-in-law gave him five pounds of plate from the spoils of the Macedonian monarch. (Liv. xlv. 7, 8; Val. Max. iv. 4. § 9; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 11; Plut. Aemil. Paul. 28.)

4. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, the son of No. 3, the jurist. See below Tubero, jurists, No. 1.

5. L. AELIUS TUBERO, an intimate friend of Cicero. He was a relation and a school-fellow of the orator, had served with him in the Mardic war, and had afterwards served under his brother Quintus as legate in Asia. It is uncertain in what way he was related to Cicero. The Scholiast on the oration for Ligarius says (pp. 415, 417, ed. Orelli) that Tubero married the soror of Cicero. We know that Cicero had not a sister; but the brother of the orator's father may have had a daughter, who was married to Tubero; and hence we may understand soror to signify in this passage, as it frequently does, a first cousin, and not a sister. (Drummun, Geschichte Rom, vol. vi. p. 273.) On the breaking out of the civil war, Tubero, who had espoused the Pompeian party, received from the senate the province of Africa; but as Atius Varus and Q. Ligarius, who likewise belonged to the aristocratic party, would not surrender it to him, he passed over to Pompey in Greece. He was afterwards pardoned by Caesar and returned with his son Quintus to Rome. (Cic. pro Q. Fr. 7, 8, ad Q. Fr. i. 1. § 3, pro Plane, 41.) Tubero cultivated literature and philosophy. He wrote a history (Cic. ad Q. Fr. l. c.), and the philosopher Aeneasidemus dedicated to him his work on the sceptical philosophy of Pyrrhon. (Phot. Cod. 212.)
TUBERO.

6. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, the son of No. 5, the jurist. See below, No. 2.

TUBERO, AELIUS, jurists. 1. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, called the Stoic, was a pupil of Panassius; and one of the scholars of Panassius dedicated to Tubero a treatise De Officiis (Cic. de Offi. iii. 15). He was the son of Q. Aelius Tubero, who was the son-in-law of L. Aemilius Paulus. [See above, No. 3.] Tubero the Sen. had a reputation for talent and legal knowledge. (Cic. Brut. iii. 31, pro Muren, c. 36; Tac. Ann. xvi. 22; Gell. i. 22.) Plutarch (Lecull. c. 39) attributes to this Tubero the saying that Lucullus was "Xerxes in a toga;" but this is a mistake, for Tubero the Stoic was a contemporary of the Gracchi and tribunus plebis in B.C. 133, the year in which Tiberius was also tribunus plebis. Lucullus could not play the part of Xerxes in a toga earlier than B.C. 63. In B.C. 129 Tubero failed in his candidature for the praetorship, but in B.C. 123 he was praetor. Pomponius says that he was also consul, but it has been inferred from the passage in the Brutus (c. 31) that he never obtained the consularship. He appears however to have been consul subjectus in B.C. 118. He was an opponent of C. Gracchus as well as of Tiberius, and delivered some speeches against him B.C. 123. Tubero is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue de Republ. The passages in the Pancræt in which Tubero is cited do not refer to this Tubero, but to the son of Lucius. (Cic. Brut. ed. H. Meyer, c. 31, and note; H. Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Frag. p. 251, 2d ed.)

2. Q. AELIUS TUBERO, the son of Lucius [see above, No. 5], was born probably about B.C. 74. When he was a young man, he made a speech (B.C. 46) before C. Julius Caesar against Q. Ligarius, who was defended by Cicero in a speech which is extant (Pro Q. Ligario). When L. Tubero, who had been appointed governor of Africa by the senate, attempted to land there, Ligarius, who held Africa in the capacity of legatus, prevented Lucius from landing with his son Quintus, who accompanied him; and this was the main cause of the enmity of Tubero against Ligarius. The oration of Tubero is mentioned by Quintilian (Instit. Orat. x. 1. § 23, xi. 1. § 78). After his failure on this occasion Tubero applied to the study of the Jus Civile under Ollius; and he obtained considerable reputation. He had a great knowledge both of Jus Publicum and Privatum, and he wrote several works on both these divisions of law; but he affected an antiquated mode of expression, which made his writings less agreeable to read (Pomponius, Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2, § 46): from this remark of Pomponius we may infer that Tubero's works were extant when he wrote. Tubero married a daughter of Servius Sulpicius, and the daughter of Tubero was the mother of the jurist C. Cassius Longinus. It is uncertain if this Tubero was consul under Augustus A.D. 11, with P. Fabius Maximus, for his consulship is not mentioned by Pomponius, but that omission is not decisive against the evidence of the Fasti Capitolini and Pliniius (H. N. viii. 17). A work by Tubero, "De Officio Judicis" is mentioned by Gallius (xiv. 2); and another "Ad C. Oppium" is mentioned by Gallius (vii. 19). Like his father Q. Tubero wrote a history (Liv. iv. 23; Suet. Caes. 83), but whether the quotations of A. Gallius (vi. 3, 4) are taken from the history of the father or the son cannot be determined. Tubero the jurist, who is often cited in the Digest, is this Tubero; but there is no excerpt from his writings. [G. L.]

TUBERO, L. SEIUS, a legatus of Germanicus in his campaign in Germany in A.D. 16, was consul with the latter in A.D. 18. Tubero was falsely accused of majestas in A.D. 24. (Tac. Ann. ii. 20, iv. 29; Fasti.)

TUBERTUS, the name of an ancient family of the patrician Postumia gens.

1. P. POSTUMIUS Q. F. TUBERTUS, consul B.C. 505 with M. Valerius Volusus in the fifth year of the republic. Both consuls fought against the Sabines, over whom they gained a decisive victory in the neighbourhood of Tibur, and obtained in consequence the honour of a triumph. (Liv. ii. 16; Zonar. v. 37—39; Plut. Public. 20; Zonar. vii. 13.) Tubertus was consul again in B.C. 503 with Agrippa Menenius Lanatus. According to Livy he defeated the Aurunci, and on his return triumphed over them; but other authorities relate that he again fought against the Sabines, and at first with bad success, but that he afterwards gained a victory over them, and on his return celebrated the lesser triumph or ovation, which was on this occasion first introduced at Rome. (Dionys. v. 44—47; Zonar. vii. 13; Plin. H. N. xv. 29; Fasti Cap.) In B.C. 493 he was one of the ten ambassadors sent by the senate to the people on the Sacred Mountain. (Dionys. vi. 69.) This Tubertus was buried in the city on account of his virtues, a privilege which his posterity retained. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 23.)

2. A. POSTUMIUS TUBERTUS, was magister equitum to the dictator Mam. Aemilius Mamercius in B.C. 453, and was himself dictator in B.C. 431. The latter year was memorable in the Roman annals by the great victory which the dictator gained on Mount Algidus over the united forces of the Aequians and Volscians. This victory, which is related to have been fought on the 18th of June, decided the contest with the Aequians, who from this time forward appear as the subjects of Rome. According to universal tradition the dictator put his son to death in this campaign, because he quitted the post in which his father had placed him, through his desire of fighting with the enemy. This story is rejected by Livy, but on insufficient grounds, as Niebuhr has shown. Tubertus celebrated a triumph on his return to Rome. (Liv. iv. 26—29; Diosd. xii. 64; Ov. Fast. vi. 721, foll.; Plut. Camill. 2; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 8; Gell. xvi. 21; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 452, foll.)

TUBULUS, the name of a family of the Hostilia gens.

1. C. HOSTILIUS TUBULUS, praetor urbanus B.C. 209, was stationed in Etruria in the following year (B.C. 208) as propraetor with the command of two legions. He received orders from the senate to keep an especial watch upon Arretium, which was suspected of an inclination to revolt to Hannibal, and he therefore took away as hostages one hundred and twenty children of the senators of the town. Next year (B.C. 207) Tubulus was sent from Etruria to Tarentum, and in the course of the same year from the latter place to Capua; but while marching to Capua he fell upon Hannibal's army, killed four thousand men, and took nine standards. He continued in the command at Capua till the end of B.C. 203. (Liv. xxvii. 6, 7, 11, 25, 24, 35, 40, xxviii. 10, xxix. 13.)
COIN OF L. HOSTILIUS TUBULUS.

TUCCA, PLOTIUS, a friend of Horace and Virgil. The latter poet left Tucca one of his heirs, and bequeathed his unfinished writings to him and Varius, who afterwards published the Aeneid by order of Augustus. (Hor. Sat. i. 5. 40, i. 10. 81; Donat. Vit. Virgil. §§ 52, 53, 56; Schol. ad Pers. Sat. i. 42; Weichert, Poëtarum Latinarum Relig. quærie. p. 217, foll.)

TUCCA, C. SERVILIUS, consul n. c. 284 with L. Cacelius Metellus Denter. (Fasti.)

TUCCIA, a Vestal Virgin, accused of incest, appealed to the goddess to prove her innocence, and had power given to her to carry a sieve full of water from the Tiber to the temple. (Val. Max. viii. 1. abs. 5; Plin. H. N. xxviii. 2; Dionys. ii. 69; Augustin. de Civ. Dei. x. 16.) This miracle is commemorated on an ancient gem, of which an engraving is given in the Dict. of Antiq. p. 1191, a. 2d ed.

TUCCIUS. 1. M. TUCCIUS, curule aedile n. c. 193, and praetor n. c. 190, with Apulius and Brutti as his province, where he also remained for the following two years as praeproter. In n. c. 183 he was one of the triumviri appointed for founding colonies at Sipontum and Buxentum. (Liv. xxxiv. 41, xxxvi. 45, xxxvii. 2, 50, xxxviii. 36, xxxix. 23.)

2. M. Tuccius, accused C. Sempronius Rufus of vis in n. c. 51, and was in his turn accused by Rufus of the same offence. (Cael. ap. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8.)

TUDITANUS, the name of a plebeian family of the Sempronis gens. The name was supposed by Atelius the philologist to have been originally given to one of the Sempronii, because he had a head like a tudes (tuditius) or mallet. (Festus, p. 352, ed. Müller.)

1. M. SEMPRONIUS C. F. M. N. TUDITANUS, consul n. c. 240 with C. Claudius Centho, and censor n. c. 230 with Q. Fabius Maximus. (Gell. xvii. 21; Cic. Brut. 18, Tusc. i. 1, de Senect. 14; Fasti Capit.)

2. P. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, was a tribune of the soldiers at the battle of Cannae in n. c. 216, and one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. When the smaller of the two Roman camps in which he had taken refuge was besieged by the Carthaginians, he bravely cut his way through the enemy with his hundred men, reached the larger camp, and from thence marched to Canusium, where he arrived in safety. Two years afterwards (n. c. 214) Tuditanus was curule aedile, and in the next year (n. c. 213) praetor, with Ariminum as his province. He took the town of Aternum, and was continued in the same command for the two following years (n. c. 212, 211). He was censor in n. c. 209 with M. Cornelius Cethegus, although neither he nor his colleague had yet held the consulship. In n. c. 205 he was sent into Greece with the title of proconsul, and at the head of a military and naval force, for the purpose of opposing Philip, with whom however he concluded a preliminary treaty, which was readily ratified by the Romans, who were anxious to give their undivided attention to the war in Africa. Tuditanus had, during his absence, been elected consul for the year 204 together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, his colleague at Rome. He received Brutti as his province with the conduct of the war against Hannibal. In the neighbourhood of Croton Tuditanus experienced a repulse, with a loss of twelve hundred men; but he shortly afterwards gained a decisive victory over Hannibal, who was obliged in consequence to shut himself up within the walls of Croton. It was in this battle that he vowed a temple to Fortuna Primigenia, if he should succeed in routing the enemy. In n. c. 201 Tuditanus was one of the three ambassadors sent to Ptolemy, king of Egypt. (Liv. xxii. 50, 60; Appian, Anni. 26; Liv. xxiv. 43, 44, 47, xxv. 3, xxvi. 1, xxvii. 11, 39, xxixi. 11, 12; Cic. Brut. 15, de Senect. 4; Liv. xxix. 13, 39, xxxi. 2.)

3. M. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, one of the officers of Scipio at the capture of New Carthage in Spain. (Liv. xxvi. 48.)

4. C. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, plebeian aedile n. c. 198 and procurator n. c. 197, when he obtained Nearer Spain as his province. He was defeated by the Spaniards with great loss, and died shortly afterwards in consequence of a wound which he had received in the battle. He was pontifex at the time of his death. (Liv. xxxii. 27, 28, xxxiii. 25, 42; Appian, Hisp. 39.)

5. M. SEMPRONIUS M. F. C. N. TUDITANUS, tribune of the plebs n. c. 193, proposed and carried a plebiscitum, which enacted that the law about money lent should be the same for the Socii and the Latinis as for the Roman citizens. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Lex Semproniana de Penore.) He was praetor n. c. 193, when he obtained Sicily as his province, and consul n. c. 185 with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. In his consulship he carried on war in Liguria, and defeated the Apuani, while his colleague was equally successful against the Ingamii. Tuditanus was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship in n. c. 184, but was elected one of the pontifices in the following year. He was carried off by the great pestilence which devastated Rome.
TULLIA.

in b. c. 174. (Liv. xxv. 7, xxxvii. 47, 50, xxxix. 23, 52, 40, 46, xii. 21.)

6. C. SEMPRONIUS C. F. TUDITANUS, was one of the ten commissioners sent to L. Mummius in b. c. 146 in order to form Southern Greece into a Roman province. He has been confounded by Drummian (Geschichte Roms, vol. iii. p. 61) with the following [No. 7], as he had been by Cicero, whose mistake was corrected by Atticus. This Tuditanus was the praefectus or great-grandfather of the orator Hortensius. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6. § 4, xiii. 33, § 3.)

7. C. SEMPRONIUS C. C. N. TUDITANUS, the son of No. 6, was praetor b. c. 132, fourteen years after his father had been sent as one of the ten commissioners into Greece. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 30. § 3, xiii. 32. § 3.) He was consul in b. c. 129, with M. Aquilius. On the proposition of Scipio Africanus, the decision of the various disputes, which arose respecting the public land in carrying the agrarian law of Gracchus into effect, was transferred from the triumvirs who had been appointed under the law, to the consul Tuditanus; but the latter, perceiving the difficulty of the cases that were brought before him, avoided giving any decision by pleading that the Illyrian war compelled him to leave the city. In Illyricum he carried on war against the Iapyges, and at first unsuccessfully, but he afterwards gained a victory over them chiefly through the military skill of his legate, D. Junius Brutus, who had previously earned great glory by his conquests in Spain. [BRUTUS, No. 15.] On his return to Rome, Tuditanus was allowed to celebrate a triumph over the Iapyges. (Vell. Pat. ii. 4; Cic. de nat. Deor. ii. 5; Appian, B. C. i. 19, Illyr. 10; Liv. Epit. 59; Fasti Capitol.) Tuditanus was an orator and an historian, and in both obtained considerable distinction. Cicero says of him (Brut. 25): — "Cum omni vita atque victu exultus atque exoptatus, tum ejus elegans est habi\n\ntum etiam orationis genus." Dionysius (i. 11) classes him with Cato the Censor as among άρεστόν, αρετών συγγραφέων. His historical work is likewise quoted by some of the other ancient writers. (Ascon. in Cornel. p. 76, ed. Orelli; Gell. v. 4, xiii. 15;Macrobi. i. 16; Kranse, Vitas et Frug. Histor. Rom. p. 173, foll.) This Tudit\n\nas was the maternal grandfather of the orator Hortensius, since his daughter Sempronia married L. Hortensius, the father of the orator.

8. SEMPRONIUS TUDITANUS, was the maternal grandfather of Fulvia, the wife of Antonius the triumvir. He is described by Cicero as a mad\n\n\nm, who was accustomed to scatter his money among the people from the Rostra. (Cic. Phil. iii. 6. Acad. ii. 29; Val. Max. viii. 8. § 1.)

CN. TUDICIUS, a senator, who supported Cluentius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 70.)

M. TUGIO, mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Balbus (c. 20) as a person well versed in the law relating to aqueducts.

TULLIA, the name of the two daughters of Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome. [TULLIUS, SERVIUS.]

TULLIA, frequently called by the diminutive TULLIOLA, was the daughter of M. Cicero and Terentia. The year of her birth is not mentioned, but it was probably in b. c. 79 or 78. [TERENTIA, No. 1.] Her birthday was on the 9th of Sextilis, or Tilia or August. She was betrothed as early as b. c. 67 to C. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, whom she married in b. c. 63 during the consulship of her father. At the time of Cicero's exile (b. c. 58), Tullia displayed a warm interest in his fate. She and her husband threw themselves at the feet of the consul Piso to implore his pity on behalf of their father. During Cicero's banishment Tullia lost her first husband: he was alive at the end of b. c. 50, but she was a widow when she welcomed her father at Brundisium on his return from exile, in August of the following year. She was married again in b. c. 56 to Furius Crassipes, a young man of rank and large property; but she did not live with him long, though the time and the reason of her divorce are alike unknown. [CRASSIPES, No. 2.] In b. c. 50 she was married to her third husband, P. Cornelius Dolabella, one of the most profligate young men of a most profligate age. Cicero was well acquainted with the scandalous private life of his future son-in-law, for although the latter was still only twenty, he had been already twice defended by the orator in a court of justice when accused of the most abominable crimes. But the patrician birth, high connections, and personal beauty of Dolabella, covered a multitude of sins as well in Cicero's eyes as in those of his wife and daughter. Dolabella had been previously married and divorced his wife Fabia for the purpose of marrying Tullia. The marriage took place during Cicero's absence in Cilicia. The marriage was solemnized at Illyrica, which was not a happy one. On the breaking out of the civil war in b. c. 49, the husband and the father of Tullia espoused opposite sides. While Dolabella fought for Caesar, and Cicero took refuge in the camp of Pompey, Tullia remained in Italy. She was pregnant at the commencement of the war, and on the 19th of May, b. c. 49, was delivered of a seven months' child, which was very weak, and died soon afterwards. After the battle of Pharsalia, Dolabella returned to Rome, but brought no consolation to his wife. He carried on numerous intrigues with various Roman ladies; and the weight of his debts had become so intolerable that he caused himself to be adopted into a plebeian family, in order to obtain the tribuneship of the people, and thus be able to bring forward a measure for the abolition of debts. He was elected tribune at the end of b. c. 48, and forthwith commenced to carry his schemes into execution. But Antony took up arms and Dolabella was defeated. In the midst of these tumults Tullia, who had been long suffering from ill health, set out to join her father at Brundisium, which place she reached in June, b. c. 47. Cicero, however, was unwilling that even his own daughter should be a witness of his degradation, and he therefore sent her back to her mother. Dolabella's conduct had been so scandalous, that a divorce would have been the proper course; but this Cicero would not adopt, as he feared the anger of the dictator, and was unwilling to lose a friend in Dolabella. He did not, however, require his intercession, for Caesar not only pardoned him but received him as his friend, when he landed in Italy in September (b. c. 47). Cicero returned to Rome, and Dolabella was likewise pardoned by Caesar. In December Dolabella went to Africa to fight against the Pompeian party, but he came back to Italy in the summer of the follow\n\ng year. Cicero and his wife now lived together again for a short time, but before Dolabella left for Spain at the end of the year.
TULLIUS.

COIN OF THE TULLIA GENS.

TULLIUS, VOLCATIUS, accused in a. d. 65, as privy to the crimes of L. Torquatus Silanus, escaped punishment (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8), and is conjectured by Lipsius to be the same person as Volcatus Tertullinus, who is mentioned as tribune of the plebs in a. d. 69. (Tac. Hist. iv. 9.)

TULLIUS. 1. M. Tullius, or M. Atius, as he is called by Dionysius, one of the decemviri who had the charge of the Sibylline books in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, was bribed by Petronius Sabinus to allow him to take a copy of these books, and was in consequence punished by the king by being sewed up in a sack and thrown into the sea, a punishment subsequently inflicted upon parricides. (Val. Max. i. 1. § 13; Dionys. iv. 62.)

2. SEX. Tullius, served for the seventh time as centurio primi pili in b. c. 338 under the dictator C. Sulpicius Peticus, when he besought the dictator on behalf of his comrades to let them fight against the Gauls, and distinguished himself in the battle which ensued. He also fought with great bravery in the following year under the consul C. Marcus Tullius against the Primitives. (Liv. vii. 13—16.)

3. L. Tullius, a Roman eques, was magister of the company which formed the Scriptura (see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.) in Sicily. (Verr. iii. 71.)

4. M. Tullius, on whose behalf Cicero spoke in n. c. 71. It is quite uncertain who this M. Tullius was. He was not a freedman, as appears from Cicero’s speech, but it is equally clear that he was a different person both from M. Tullius Decula, consul b. c. 81, and from M. Tullius Albinus. The fragments of Cicero’s speech for Tullius were published for the first time from a palimpsest manuscript by Angelo Mai. An analysis of it is given by Drumm. (Geschichte Roma, vol. v. p. 256, foll.)

5. L. Tullius, a legate of Cicero in Cilicia, owed his appointment to the influence of Q. Titius, and probably also of Atticus, whose friend he was. His conduct, however, did not give satisfaction to Cicero. (Cic. ad Att. v. 4, 11, 14, 21.) In one of Cicero’s letters (ad Fam. xv. 14. § 8) he read of his legate L. Tullius, which is probably a false reading for L. Tullius.

6. Tit. Tullius, fought on the side of the to the honours of the state was M. Tullius Decula, consul b. c. 81, and the next was the celebrated orator M. Tullius Cicero. (Decula; Cicero.) The other surnames of the Tullii under the republic belong chiefly to freedmen, and are given below. On coins we find no cognomen. The following coin, which bears on the obverse the head of Pallas and on the reverse Victory driving a quadriga, with the legend of M. Tulli, is supposed by some writers to belong to M. Tullius Cicero, the orator, but the coin is probably of an earlier date. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 327.)

a divorce had taken place by mutual consent. At the beginning of the following year (b. c. 45) Tullia was delivered of a son. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigues of a journey, she accompanied her father to Tusculum, but she died there in February.* It appears from Cicero’s correspondence that she had long been unwell, and the birth of her child hastened her death. Her loss was a severe blow to Cicero: he had recently divorced his wife Terentia, and married a young wife Publilia, without however adding to his domestic happiness, and thus he had clung to Tullia more than ever. His friends hastened to console him; and among the many consolatory letters which he received on the occasion is the well-known one from the celebrated jurist Serv. Sulpicius (ad Fam. iv. 5). To dissipate his grief, Cicero drew up a treatise on consolation, in which he chiefly imitated Crantor the Academician (Cicero, p. 733, b.); and to show his love to the deceased, he resolved to build a splendid monument to her honour, which was to be consecrated as a temple, in which she might receive the worship both of himself and of others. This project he frequently mentions in his letters to Atticus, but the death of Caesar in the following year, and the active part which Cicero then took in public affairs, prevented him from carrying his design into effect. Tullia’s child survived her mother. He is called Lentulus by Cicero (ad Att. xii. 29), a name which was also borne by his father by adoption; and as Dolabella was absent in Spain, and was moreover unable from his extravagance to make any provision for his child, Cicero took charge of him, and while he was in the country wrote to Atticus, to beg him to take care that the child was properly attended to. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 28.) The boy probably died in infancy, as no further mention is made of him. The numerous passages in Cicero’s correspondence in which Tullia is spoken of, are collected in Orelli’s Onomasticon Tullianum (vol. ii. pp. 596, 597), and her life is written at length by Drumm (Geschichte Roma, vol. vi. p. 696, foll.).

TULLIUS.

Pompeian party in Spain in B.C. 45. (Auct. B. Hist. 17, 18.)

TULLIUS ALBINOVANUS. [ALBINOVANUS.]

TULLIUS, A'TTIUS, the celebrated king of the Volscians, to whom Coriolanus fled, when he was banished from Rome, and who induced his people to make war upon the Romans, with Coriolanus as their general. For details and authorities, see CORIOLANUS. In the best MSS. of Livy the name is written Attius Tullius, and in Zonaras we also find Tolkios; but in Dionysius and Plutarch the form Tholos occurs. Tullius, and not Tullus is the correct form. (Aschkeski, ad Liv. i. 37; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. note 217.)

TULLIUS BASSUS. [BASSUS, p. 471.]

TULLIUS or TULLIUS CIMBER. [CIMBER.]

TULLIUS FLAVIANUS, a commander of a troop of cavalry under Petilius Cerialia, was taken prisoner by the Vitellian troops in the battle in the suburbs of Rome, A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. iii. 79.)

TULLIUS GEMINUS. [GEMINUS.]

TULLIUS LAU'REA (Toöllios Lwopelas), the author of three epigrams in the Greek Anthology. Fabricius conjectured, and Reiske and Jacobs approve of the suggestion, that he is identical with Laurens Tullius, the freedman of Cicero, from whose Latin poems in elegiac verse Pliny (H. N. xxxi. 2) quotes some lines, which are printed also in Burmann's Anthologia Latina (vol. i. p. 340). This conjecture is strongly confirmed by the fact, that the epigrams of Tullius had a place in the Anthology of Philip, which consisted chiefly of the poets of the Augustan age. In the title of one of the three epigrams there is a slight confusion in the different copies of the Anthology, the Planudean giving Zawulion, and the Palatine Tarwulion, both of which variations perhaps arise from the reading M. Tolkios. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 498; Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 102; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 90, vol. xiii. p. 907.)

L. TULLIUS MONTANUS, accompanied M. Cicero the younger to Athens in B.C. 45. He is also mentioned at a later time in Cicero's correspondence, and it is probably to him that the Tullitium captur refers. (Cic. ad Att. xil. 52, 53, xiv. 16, 17, xv. 26, 29.)

TULLIUS RU'FUS, a man of quaestorian rank, belonged to the Pompeian army, and was slain at the battle of Thapsus, B.C. 46. (Hirt, B. Afr. 63.)

TULLIUS SENE'CIO. [SENERCIO.]

TULLIUS, SERVIUS, the sixth king of Rome. The account of the early life and death of Servius Tullius is full of marvels, and cannot be regarded as possessing any title to a real historical narrative. According to the general tradition, he was of servile origin, and owed his elevation to the favour of the gods, and especially to the protection of the goddess Fortune, with whom he was always a favourite. During his life-time she used to visit him secretly in his chamber as his spouse; and after his death, his statue was placed in her temple, and remained unhurt when the temple itself was once destroyed by fire (Ov. Fast. vi. 573, foll.; Val. Max. i. 8. § 11). The future greatness of Servius was announced by a miracle before his birth. His mother Octavia, a female slave of the queen's, and one of the captives taken at Corinium, was offering cakes to the Lar or the household genius, when she saw in the fire on the hearth an apparition of the deity. Tanaquil, who understood the portent, commanded her to dress herself as a bride, and to shut herself up in the chamber. There she became pregnant by the god, whom some Romans maintained to be the household genius, and others Vulcan; the former supporting their opinion by the festival which Servius established in honour of the Lares, the latter by the deliverance of his statue from fire (Ov. Fast. vi. 625, foll.; Dionys. iv. 2). There are two other legends respecting the birth of Servius, which have more of an historical air, and may therefore be regarded as of later origin. One related that his mother was a slave from Tarquinia, that his father was a client of the king, and that he himself was brought up in the palace with the other household slaves, and waited at the royal table (Cic. de Rep. ii. 21). The other legend, which gives Servius a nobler origin, and which is therefore preferred both by Dionysius and Livy, states that his father, likewise called Servius Tullius, was a noble of Corinium, who was slain at the taking of the city, and that his mother, then in a state of pregnancy, was carried away captive to Rome where she gave birth to the future king in the royal palace. The prodigies which preceded the birth of Servius accompanied his youth. Once as he was sleeping at mid-day in the porch of the palace, his head was seen surrounded with flames. Tanaquil forbade their being extinguished, for her prophetic spirit recognised the future destiny of the boy: they played around him without harming him, and when he awoke, the fire vanished. From this time forward Servius was brought up as the king's child with the greatest hopes. Nor were these hopes disappointed. By his personal bravery he gained a battle in which the Romans had nearly lost; and Tarquinius placed such confidence in him, that he gave him his daughter in marriage, and entrusted him with the exercise of the government. His rule was mild and beneficent; and so popular did he become, that the sons of Ancus Marcius, fearing lest they should be deprived of the throne which they claimed as their inheritance, procured the assassination of Tarquinius [TARQUINIUS]. They did not, however, reap the fruit of their crime, for Tanaquil, pretending that the king's wound was not mortal, told the people that Tarquinius would recover in a few days, and that he had commanded Servius meantime to discharge the duties of the kingly office. Servius forthwith began to act as king, greatly to the satisfaction of the people; and when the death of Tarquinius could no longer be concealed, he was already in firm possession of the royal power. Servius thus succeeded to the throne without being elected by the senate and the curia; but the curie afterwards, at his own request, invested him with the imperium. (Cic. de Rep. ii. 21; Dionys. iv. 12.)

The reign of Servius Tullius is almost as barren of military exploits as that of Numa. The only war which Livy mentions (i. 42) is one against Veli, which was brought to a speedy conclusion. This war is magnified by Dionysius (iv. 27) into victories over the whole Etruscan nation, which is said to have revolted after the death of Tarquinius Priscus; and these pretended triumphs have found their way into the Fasti, where they are recorded.
with the year and date of their occurrence. But the great deeds of Servius were deeds of peace; and he was regarded by posterity as the author of all their civil rights and institutions, just as Numa was of their religious rites and ordinances. Three important events are assigned to Servius by universal tradition. First he established a constitution, in which the plebs took its place as the second part of the nation, and of which we shall speak more fully below. Secondly, he extended the pomerium, or hallowed boundary of the city (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Pomerium), and completed the city by incorporating with it the Quirinal, Viminal and Esquiline hills. He surrounded the whole with a stone wall called after him the wall of Servius Tullius; and from the Porta Collina to the Esquiline Gate where the hills sloped gently to the plain, he constructed a gigantic mound, nearly a mile in length, and a mount, one hundred feet in breadth and thirty in depth, from which the earth of the mound was dug. Rome thus acquired a circumference of five miles, and this continued to be the legal extent of the city till the time of the emperors, although suburbs were added to it. Thirdly, Servius established an important alliance with the Latins, by which Rome and the cities of Latium became the members of one great league. As leagues of this kind were always connected among the ancients with the worship at some common temple, a temple of Diana or the Moon was built upon the Aventine, which was not included in the pomerium, as the place of the religious meetings of the two nations. It appears that the Sabines likewise shared in the worship of this temple. There was a celebrated tradition, that a Sabine husbandman had a cow of extraordinary beauty and size, and that the soothsayers had predicted that whoever should sacrifice this cow to Diana on the Aventine, would raise his country to rule over the confederates. The Sabine, anxious to secure the supremacy of his own people, had driven the cow to Rome, and was on the point of sacrificing her before the altar, when the crafty Roman priest rebuked him for daring to offer it with unwashed hands. While the Sabine went and washed in the Tiber, the Roman sacrificed the cow. The gigantic horns of the animal were preserved down to very late times, nailed up in the vestibule (Liv. i. 45). From the fact that the Aventine was selected as the place of meeting, it has been inferred that the supremacy of Rome was acknowledged by the Latins; but since we find it expressly stated that this supremacy was not acquired till the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, this view is perhaps not strictly correct. (Comp. Niebuhr, Lectures on the History of Rome, p. 118, London, 1848.)

After Servius had established his new constitution, he did homage to the majesty of the centuries, by calling them together, and leaving them to decide whether he was to reign over them or not. The body which he had called into existence, naturally ratified his power, and declared him to be their king. The patricians, however, were far from acquiescing in the new order of things, and had the man who had deprived them of their exclusive rule, and had conferred such important benefits upon the plebeians. In addition to his constitutional changes in favour of the second order in the state, tradition related, that out of his private wealth, he discharged the debts of those who were reduced to indigence; that he deprived the creditor of the power of seizing the body of his debtor, and restricted him to the seizure of the goods of the latter; and that he assigned to the plebeians allotments of lands out of the territories which they had won in war (Cic. de Rep. ii. 21; Dionys. iv. 9; Liv. i. 46). The king had good reasons for mistrusting the patricians. Accordingly, when he took up his residence on the Esquiline, he would not allow them to dwell there, but assigned them to the valley, which was called after them the Patricius Vicus, or Patrician Street (Festus s. e). Meantime, the long and uninterrupted popularity of the king seemed to deprive L. Tarquinius more and more of the chance of regaining the throne of his father. The patricians, anxious to recover their supremacy, readily joined Tarquinius in a conspiracy to assassinate the king. The legend of his death is too celebrated to be omitted here, although it perhaps contains no further truth than that Servius fell a victim to a patrician conspiracy, the leader of which was the son or descendant of the former king. The legend ran as follows. Servius Tullius, soon after his succession, gave his two daughters in marriage to the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus. L. Tarquinius the elder was married to a quiet and gentle wife; Aruns, the younger, to an aspiring and ambitious woman. The character of the two brothers was the very opposite of the wives who had fallen to their lot; for Lucius was proud and haughty, but Aruns ambitious and quiet. The wife of Aruns, enraged at the long life of her father, and fearing that at his death her husband would tamely resign the sovereignty to his elder brother, resolved to destroy both her father and her husband. Her fiendish spirit put into the heart of Lucius thoughts of crime which he had never entertained before. Lucius murdered his wife, and the younger Tullia her husband; and the survivors, without even the show of mourning, were straightforward joined in unhallowed wedlock. Tullia now incessantly urged her husband to murder her father, and thus obtain the kingdom which he so ardently coveted. It was said that their design was hastened by the belief that Servius, in order to complete his legislation, entertained the thought of laying down his kingly power, and establishing the consular form of government. The patricians were no less alarmed at this scheme, as it would have had the effect of confirming for ever the hated laws of Servius. Their mutual hatred and fears united them close together; and when the conspiracy was ripe, Tarquinius entered the forum arrayed in the kingly robes, seated himself in the royal chair in the senate-house, and ordered the senators to be summoned to him as their king. At the first news of the commotion, Servius hastened to the senate-house, and standing at the door-way, ordered Tarquinus to come down from the throne. Tarquinius sprang forward, seized the old man, and flung him down the stone steps. Covered with blood, the king was hastening home; but, before he reached it, he was overtaken by the servants of Tarquinus, and murdered. Tullia drove to the senate-house, and greeted her husband as king; but her transports of joy struck even him with horror. He bade her go home; and as she was returning, her charioteer pulled up, and pointed out the corpse of her father lying in his blood across the road. She commanded him to drive on; the blood of her father spirted over the carriage and on her dress; and from that day forward the street bore the name of the Vicus Sceleratus, or Wicked Street. The body lay unburied, for Tarquinius said scoffingly, "Romanus too went without burial;" and this impious mockery is said to have given rise to his surname of Sceleratus (Liv. i. 48—49; Ov. Fast. vi. 551, foll.). Servius had reigned forty-four years. His memory was long cherished by the plebeians, and his birth-day was celebrated on the nones of every month, for it was remembered that he was born on the nones of some month, but the month itself had become a matter of uncertainty. At a later time, when the oppressions of the patricians became more and more intolerable, the senate found it necessary to forbid the markets to be held on the nones, lest the people should attempt an insurrection to restore the laws of their martyrized monarch. (Macrob. Sat. i. 13.)
TULLIUS.

The Roman traditions, as we have seen, were unanimous in making Servius Tullius of Latin origin. He is universally stated to have been the son of a native of Corniculum, which was a Latin town; and Niebuhr, in his Lectures, supposes that he may have been the offspring of a marriage between one of the Lucii and a member of the Caelian gens, and that the establishment of the comitium, and that this may be the foundation of the story of his descent. His name Tullius also indicates a Latin origin, since the Tullii are expressly mentioned as one of the Alban gentes which were received into the Latin state in the reign of Tullius Hostilius. (Liv. i. 30.) His institutions, likewise, bear all the traces of a Latin character. But the Etruscan tradition about this king was entirely different, and made him a native of Etruria. This Etruscan tradition was related by the emperor Claudius, in a speech which he made upon the admission of some Logudonensean Gauls into the senate; and the fragments of which are still preserved on two tables discovered at Lyons in the sixteenth century, and since the time of Lipsius have been printed in most editions of Tacitus. In this speech Claudius says: "that, according to the Tuscans, Servius was the faithful companion of the Etrurian Tarquinius, and a founder of the constitution: that at last being overpowered by a variety of disasters, he quitted Etruria with the remains of the army which had served under Caeses, went to Rome, and occupied the Caelian Hill, calling it so after his former commander: that he exchanged his Tuscan name Masturna for the Roman one of Servius Tullius, obtained the kingly power, and wielded it to the great good of the state." This Caeses Vibenna was well known to the Roman writers, according to whom he came himself to Rome, though the statements in whose reign he came differed greatly. All accounts, however, represent him as a leader of an army raised by himself, and not belonging to any state, and as coming to Rome by the invitation of the Roman kings, to assist them. [CABES]. There can be no question that the emperor Claudius drew his account from Etruscan annals; and there is no reason for believing that Caeses Vibenna and Masturna are historic personages, for, as Niebuhr observes, Caeses is too frequently and too distinctly mentioned to be fabulous, and his Etruscan name cannot have been invented by the Romans. The value of the tradition about Masturna would very much depend upon the date of the Etruscan authorities, from whom Claudius derived his account; but on this point we are entirely in the dark. Niebuhr, in the first edition of his history, inclined strongly to the opinion that Rome was of Etruscan origin, and in his lectures, delivered in the year 1826, he adopted the Etruscan tradition respecting the origin of Servius Tullius, on the ground "that Etruscan literature is so decidedly more ancient than that of the Romans, that he did not hesitate to give preference to the traditions of the former." (Lectures, p. 84.) In the second edition of his history, however, Niebuhr so completely abandoned his former idea of the Etruscan origin of Rome, that he would not even admit the Etruscan origin of the Lucreces, a point in which most subsequent scholars dissent from him; and in his Lectures of the year 1828, he strongly maintains the Latin origin of Servius Tullius, and asserts his belief that "Etruscan literature is mostly assigned to too early a period, and that to the time from the Hannibal war down to the time of Sulla, a period of somewhat more than a century, most of the literary productions of the Etruscans must be referred." (Lectures, p. 123.) But the fact is that whether we are to follow the Etruscan or the Roman tradition about Servius is one of those points on which no certainty can be by any possibility obtained; and it seems impossible that Servius usurped the throne: he seized the royalty upon the murder of the former king, without being elected by the senate and the comitia, and he introduced great constitutional changes, apparently to strengthen his power against a powerful faction in the state. It is equally clear that his reign came to a violent end: he was dethroned and murdered by the descendants of the previous king, in league with his enemies in the state, who sought to recover the power of which they had been dispossessed. Now if we are right in our supposition that Tarquinius Priscus and Tarquinius Superbus were both of Etruscan origin, and represent an Etruscan sovereignty at Rome [TARQUINIUS], it seems to follow that the reign of Servius Tullius represents a successful attempt of the Latins to recover their independence, or in any case the sovereignty of an Etruscan people different from the one to which the Tarquins belonged. Further than this we cannot go, and it seems impossible to determine which supposition has the greatest preponderance of evidence in its favour. K. O. Müller adopted the latter supposition. He believed that the Etruscan town of Tarquinii was at the head of the twelve cities of Etruria at this time, that it conquered Rome, and that the reign of Tarquinius Priscus represents the supremacy of the state of Tarquinii at Rome. He further supposed that the supremacy of Tarquinii may not have been universally acknowledged throughout Etruria, and that the army of Caeses and of his lieutenant Matarna perhaps belonged to the town of Volsini, which wished to maintain its independence against Tarquinii; that it was with the remains of this army that Matarna eventually conquered Rome, and thus destroyed the dominion of Tarquinii in that city. (Müller, Etruskr. vol. i. p. 121.)

CONST I TUTION OF SERV IUS TULLIUS.

The most important event connected with the reign of Servius Tullius is the new constitution which he gave to the Roman state. The details of this constitution are stated in different articles in the Dictionary of Antiquities, and it is therefore only necessary to give here a general outline, which}
The two main objects of the constitution of Servius were to give the plebs political independence, and to assign to property that importance in the state which had previously belonged to birth exclusively; and it cannot be questioned that the military and financial objects, which he secured by the new organized and tributary system, were regarded by him as of secondary importance. In order to carry his purpose into effect Servius made a two-fold division of the Roman people, one territorial, and the other according to property. He first divided the whole Roman territory into regions, and the inhabitants into Tribus, the people of each region forming a tribe. The city was divided into four regions or tribes, and the country around into twenty-six regions or tribes, so that the entire number of Tribus Urbanæ and Tribus Rusticæ, as they were respectively called, amounted to thirty. (Liv. i. 43; Dionys. iv. 14, 15.) Livy does not mention the number of the country tribes in his account of the Servian constitution, and we are indebted to Fabius Pictor, the oldest of the Roman annalists (Dionys. l.c.), and to Varro (esp. Non. p. 49), for the number of twenty-six. Moreover Livy, when he speaks of the whole number of the tribes in n. c. 495, says that they were made twenty-one in that year. (Liv. ii. 21; comp. Dionys. vii. 64.) Hence the statements of Fabius Pictor and Varro might appear to be doubtful. But in the first place their account has the greatest internal probability, since the number thirty plays such an important part in the Roman constitution, and the thirty tribes would thus correspond to the thirty curiae; and in the second place Niebuhr has called attention to the fact that in the war with Porsena, Rome lost a considerable part of her territory, and thus the number of her tribes would naturally be reduced. When, however, Niebuhr proceeds to say that the tribes were reduced in the war with Porsena from thirty to twenty, because it was the ancient practice in Italy to deprive a conquered nation of a third part of its territory, he seems to have forgotten, as Becker has remarked, that the four city tribes of Rome had not been taken into account in such a forfeiture, and that consequently a third part of the territory would not have been ten tribes. Into this question, however, it is unnecessary further to enter. The conquest of Porsena had undoubtedly broken up the whole Servian system; and thus it was all the easier to form a new tribe in n. c. 504, when the gens Claudia migrated to Rome. (Liv. ii. 16.) It would appear that an entirely new distribution of the tribes became necessary, and this was probably carried into effect in n. c. 495, soon after the battle of the lake of Regillus. In fact the words of Livy (ii. 21) already referred to state as much, for he does not say that before this year there were twenty tribes, or that the twenty-first was then added for the first time, but simply that twenty-one tribes were then formed (Romae tribus una et viginti factae). The subsequent increase in the number of the tribes, till they reached that of thirty-five, is related in the Dictionary of Antiquities (s. v. Tribus). But to return from this digression to the Servian constitution, Each tribe was an organised body, with a magistrate at its head, called Φυλακας by Dionysius (iv. 14), and Curator Tribus by Varro (L. L. vi. 86), whose principal duty appears to have consisted in keeping a register of the inhabitants in each regio, and of their property, for purposes of taxation, and for levying the troops for the armies. Further, each country tribe or regio was divided into a certain number of Pagi, a name which had been given to the divisions of the Roman territory as early as the reign of Numa (Dionys. ii. 76); and each Paga also formed an organized body, and was governed by a head, who kept a register of the names and of the property of all persons in the paga, raised the taxes, and summoned the people, when necessary, to war. Each pagus had its own sacred rites and common sanctuary, connected with which was a yearly festival called Paganalia, at which all the Paganii took part. Dionysius says that the Pagi were fortified places, established by Servius Tullius, to which the country people might retreat in case of an hostile inroad; but this is scarcely correct, for even if Servius Tullius established such fortified places, it is evident that the word was used to indicate a local division, and must have been given to the country adjoining the fortified place as well as to the fortified place itself. (Dionys. iv. 15; Varr. L. L. vi. 24, 26; Macrobi. Saturn. i. 16; Ov. Fast. i. 669; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Pagi.) As the country tribes were divided into Pagi, so were the city tribes divided into Vici, with a Magister Vici at the head of each, who performed duties analogous to those of the Magister Pagi. The Vici in like manner had their own religious rites and sanctuaries, which were erected at spots where two or more ways met (in compitu); and consequently their festival, corresponding to the Paganalia, was called Comitiales. (Dionys. iv. 14; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Vici and Comitiales.)

The main object which Servius had in view in the institution of the tribes was to give an organization to the plebeians, of which they had been entirely destitute before; but whether the patricians were included in the tribes or not, is a subject of great difficulty, and has given rise to great difference of opinion among modern scholars, some regarding the division into tribes as a local division of the whole Roman people, and consequently of the patricians and their clients as well as of plebeians, while others look upon it as simply an organization of the second order. The undoubted object of Servius Tullius in the institution of the tribes led Niebuhr to maintain that the patricians could not possibly have belonged to the tribes originally; but as we find them in the tribes at a later period (Liv. iv. 24, v. 30, 32), he supposed that they were admitted into them by the legislation of the decemvirs. But probably as this might appear, all the evidence we possess goes the other way, and tends to show that the tribes were a local division of the whole Roman people. In the first place, if Servius had created thirty local tribes for the plebs alone, from which the patricians were excluded, it is not easy to see why the three ancient tribes of the Romans, Titii, and Luceres, should not have continued in existence. This we know was not the case; for it is certain, that the three ancient tribes disappear from the time of the Servian constitution, and that their names alone were retained by the Equites, and that henceforward we read only of the division of the patricians into thirty curiae: indeed it is expressly said that the ψαλων γενοικα were abolished by Servius, and that the ψαλω τουποκαλ were established in their place. (Dionys. iv. 14.) Secondly, it is certain that all the tribes of the year n. c. 495, with the exception of the Crustumina, take their names from patrician gentes. Thirdly, the establishment of the Claudian tribe, consisting as it did mainly of the patrician Claudia gens, is almost of itself sufficient to prove that patricians were included in the Servian tribes. Niebuhr lays great stress upon the fact that in no instance do we find the patricians voting in the Comitia Tributa before the time of the decessivus; but as Becker very justly remarks, this does not prove anything, as we have no reason for supposing that the Comitia Tributa were established by Servius along with the tribes. Such an assembly would have had no meaning in the Servian constitution, and would have been opposed to its first principles. The Comitia Tributa were called into existence, when the plebs began to struggle after independence, and had tribunes of their own at their head; and it is certainly improbable that patricians should have been allowed to vote in assemblies summoned by plebeian magistrates to promote the interests of the plebs. The Comitia Tributa must not therefore be regarded as assemblies of the tribes, as Becker has justly remarked, but as assemblies of the plebeians, who voted according to tribes, as their natural divisions. Hence as the same writer observes, we see the full force of the expression in the Leges Valeria Horatia, Publilia and Hortensia: "quod tributum plebes jussisset." The tribes therefore were an organisation of the whole Roman people, patricians as well as plebeians, according to their local divisions; but they were instituted, as we have already remarked, for the benefit of the plebeians, who had not, like the patricians, possessed previously any political organisation. At the same time, though the institution of the tribes gave the plebeians a political organisation, it conferred upon them no political power, no right to take any part in the management of public affairs or in the elections. These rights, however, were bestowed upon them by another institution of Servius Tullius, which was entirely distinct from and had no connection with the thirty tribes. He made a new division of the whole Roman people into Classes according to the amount of their property, and he so arranged these classes that the wealthiest persons, whether patricians or plebeians, should possess the chief power and influence. In order to ascertain the property of each citizen, he instituted the Census, which was a register of Roman citizens and their property, and enacted that it should be taken anew from time to time. Under the republic it was taken fresh, as is well known, every five years. Lists of the citizens were made out by the curator tribus or magistrate of each tribe, and each citizen had to state upon oath the amount and value of his property. According to the returns thus obtained a division of the citizens was made, which determined the tax (tributum), which each citizen was to pay, the kind of military service he was to perform, and the position he was to occupy in the popular assembly. The whole arrangement was of a military character. The people assembled in the Campus as an army (exercitus, or, according to the more ancient expression, classicus), and was therefore divided into two parts, the cavalry (equites), and the infantry (pedites). The infantry was divided into five Classes. The first class contained all those whose property amounted at least to 100,000 asses; the second class those who had at least 75,000 asses; the third those who had at least 50,000 asses; the fourth those who had at least 25,000 asses; and the fifth those who had at least 10,000 asses, according to Böckh's probable conjecture, for Dionysius makes the sum necessary for admission to this class 12,500 asses (12½ minas) and Livy 11,000 asses. It must be recollected, however, that these numbers are not the ancient ones, when the as was a pound weight, but those of the sixth century of the city. The original numbers were nearly 20,000, 15,000, 10,000, 5000, and 2000 asses respectively, which were increased fivefold, when the as was coined so much lighter. (Böckh, "Metropolitische Untersuchungen," c. xxix.) Further, for military purposes each of the five classes was divided into elders (Seniores) and younger (Juniores) men: the former consisting of men from the age of 46 to 60, the latter of men from the age of 17 to 45. It was from the Juniores that the armies of the state were levied: the Seniores were not obliged to serve in the field, and could only be called upon to defend the city. Moreover, all the soldiers had to find their own arms and armour; but it was so arranged that the expense of the equipment should be in proportion to the wealth of each class.

Servius however did not make this arrangement of the people for military purposes alone. He had another and more important object in view, namely, the creation of a new national assembly, which was to possess the powers formerly exercised by the Comitia curiata, and thus become the sovereign assembly in the state. For this purpose he divided each classis into a certain number of centuriae, each of which counted as one vote. But in accordance with the great principle of his constitution, which, as has been several times remarked, was to give the preponderance of power to wealth, a century was not made of a fixed number of men; but the first or richest class contained a far greater number of centuries than any of the other classes, although they must at the same time have contained a much smaller number of men. Thus the first class contained 80 centuries, the second 20, the third 20, the fourth 30, and the fifth 30, in all 170. One half of the centuries consisted of Seniores, and the other half of Juniores; by which an advantage was given to age and experience over youth and rashness, for the Seniores, though possessing an equal number of votes, must of course have been very inferior in number to the Juniores. Besides these 170 centuries of the classes, Servius formed five other centuries, admission into which did not depend upon the census. Of these the smiths and carpenters (fabri) formed two centuries, and the horn-blowers and trumpeters (cornicines and tubicines) two other centuries: these four centuries voted with the classes, but Livy and Dionysius give a different statement as to which of the classes they voted with. The other century not belonging to the classes, and erroneously called the sixth class by Dionysius, comprised all those persons whose property did not amount to that of the fifth class. This century, however, consisted of three subdivisions according to the amount of their property, called respectively the accessi velati, the proletariss and capita censis: the accessi velati were those whose property was at least 1500 asses, or originally 300 asses, and they served as supernumeraries in the army without arms, but ready to
TULLIUS.

The cavalry or Equites were divided by Servius Tullius into 18 centuries, which did not comprise Seniores or Junioris, but consisted only of men below the age of forty-six. The early history and arrangement of the Equites have given rise to much discussion among modern scholars, into which we cannot enter here. (See Dict. of Antitv. a. v. Equites.) It is sufficient for our present purpose to state that Tarquinius Priscus had divided each of the three ancient centuries of equites into two troops, called respectively the first (prioraes) and second (postiores) Ramnes, Tities, and Lucretes. These three double centuries Servius Tullius formed into six new centuries, usually called the sex suffragia: and as they were merely a new organization of the old body, they must have consisted exclusively of patricians. Besides these six centuries, Servius formed twelve others, taken from the richest and most distinguished families in the state, plebeian as well as patrician. There can be little question that a certain amount of property was necessary for admission to all the equestrian centuries, as well in consequence of the timocratic principle of this part of the Servian constitution, as on account of the express statement of Dionysius (iv. 18) that the equites were chosen by Servius out of the richest and most illustrious families, and of Cicero (de Rep. ii. 22) that they were of the highest census (censu maximo). Neither of these writers nor Livy mentions the property which was necessary to entitle a person to a place among the equites; but as we know that the equestrian census in the later times of the republic was four times the amount of that of the first class, it is probable that the same census was established by Servius Tullius. Niebuhr indeed supposed that the sex suffragia comprised all the patricians, independent of the property they possessed; but this supposition is, independent of other considerations, disproved by the fact, that we have express mention of a patrician, L. Tarquiniius, who was compelled on account of his poverty to serve on foot.

The 175 centuries of pedetes and the 18 of equites thus made a total of 193 centuries. Of these, 97 formed a majority of votes in the assembly. Although all the Roman citizens had a vote in this assembly, which was called the Comitia Centuriata, from the voting by centuries, it will be seen at once that the poorer classes had not much influence in the assembly; for the 18 centuries of the equites and the 80 centuries of the first class, voted first; and if they could come to an agreement upon any measure, they possessed at once a majority, and there was no occasion to call upon the centuries of the other classes to vote at all. This was the great object of the institution, which was to give the power to wealth, and not either to birth or to numbers.

The preceding account of the centuries has been taken from Livy (i. 43) and Dionysius (iv. 16, foll.), who agree in all the main points. The account of Cicero (de Rep. ii. 22) cannot be reconciled with that of Livy and Dionysius, and owing to the corruptions of the text it is hopeless to make the attempt. The few discrepancies between Livy and Dionysius will be seen by the following table, taken from Becker, by which the reader will also perceive more clearly the census of each class, the number of centuries or votes which each contained, and the order in which they voted.

TULLIUS.

There can be little doubt that the number in Dionysius is the correct one. According to Livy’s number cases might have arisen in which it was impossible to obtain a majority, as ninety-seven might have voted for a mesure and ninety-seven against it. Moreover, Cicero (de Rep. ii. 22) describes ninety-six as the minority. The other discrepancies between Livy and Dionysius are of no great importance, and need not be discussed further in this place.

The Assembly of the Centuries, or Comitia Centuriata, was made by Servius, as we have already remarked, the sovereign assembly of the nation, and it accordingly stept into the place formerly occupied by the Comitia Curiata. Servius transferred to it from the latter assembly the right of electing kings and the higher magistrates, of enacting and repealing laws, and of deciding upon war, and jurisdiction in cases of appeal from the sentence of a judge. He did not, however, abolish the Comitia Curiata, but on the contrary he allowed them very great power and influence in the state. He not only permitted them to retain the exercise of such rights as affected their own corporations, but he enacted that no vote of the Comitia Centuriata should be valid till it had received the sanction of the Comitia Curiata. This sanction of the Curiae is often expressed by the words patres, as patres auctoribus facti, in which phrase patres mean the patriei. In course of time the sanction of the Curiae was abolished, or at least became a mere matter of form; but the successive steps by which this was accomplished do not belong to the present inquiry, and are related elsewhere. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Autor, Comitia, p. 333, n. Plebs, 2d ed.)

Although Servius gave the plebeians political rights and recognised them as the second order of the Roman people, it must not be supposed that he placed them on a footing of equality with the patricians. From the time of Servius they were cives, they had the jus civitatis, but not in its full extent. The jus civitatis included both the jus publicum and the jus privatum; but of each of these rights they possessed only a portion. Of the jus publicum Servius gave to them only the jus suffragii, or right of voting in the comitia centuriata, but not the jus honorum, or eligibility to the public offices of the state. Of the jus privatum Servius conferred upon them only the commercium, by virtue of which they could become owners of land and could appear before the courts without the mediation of a patronus, but he did not grant to them the communium, or right of marriage with the patricians. Moreover, they had no claim to the use of the public land, the possessio of which continued to be confined to the patricians, although the conquered lands were won by the blood of the second order as well as of the first; but, as some compensation for this injustice, Servius is said to have given to the poor plebeians small portions of the public land in full ownership. (Dionys. iv. 9, 10, 13; Liv. i. 46; Zonar. vii. 9.)

The laws of Servius Tullius are said to have been committed to writing, and were known under the name of the Commentarii Servii Tullii. Dionysius says (iv. 13) that he regulated the commercium between the two orders by about fifty laws; but the commentaries of Servius Tullius, which are cited by later writers, such as Verrius Flaccus, can only have contained the substance of the laws ascribed to him; since the original laws, if they were ever committed to writing, must long since have perished. COIN OF M. MACELLIUS TULLIUS.

TULLIUS, VOLCATIUS. I. L. VOLCATIUS TULLIUS, consul b. c. 66 with M. Aemilius Lepidus. He is mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Plancius (c. 21) as one of those distinguished men who had failed when a candidate for the aedileship, but who afterwards obtained the highest honours of the state. Velentius did not take a prominent part in public affairs, and appears to have been a man of moderate opinions, and fond of quiet. He approved of Cicero’s proceedings in his consulship, and spoke in the debate in the senate on the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. In the discussion in b. c. 56, respecting the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to his kingdom, he was in favour of intrusting this important commission to Pompey, who had lately returned from the East. In b. c. 54 he was one of the consuls who supported M. Scaurus, when he was brought to trial in this year. On the breaking out of the civil war, in b. c. 49, he resolved to take no part in the struggle, but remained quietly in Italy all the time. He is spoken of by Cicero in b. c. 46 as an enemy of M. Marcellus, when the latter was pardoned by Caesar. (Cic. in Cat. i. 6, ad Att. xii. 21, Philipp. i. 5, ad Fam. i. 1, 2, 4, ad Q. Fr. i. 1190.
Ascon. Dion but \[W. Cic.\] Martial, \[L.\] distinguished courage. vian praetor by higher whom Cyrene, On Egypt discharge defect, person and nius. \[AsTERius.\] letter TURBO, a gladiator of small stature but great courage. \(\text{Hor. Sat. ii.} 3, 310, \text{with the Schol.}\)

TURCIUS RUFUS APRONIA'NUS AST- TERIUS. \[AsTERius.\]

TURBO, MARCIUS LIVIA'NUS, a distinguished general under Trajan and Hadrian. He was sent by the former emperor in a.d. 115 to Egypt to suppress the insurrection of the Jews at Cyrene, which he effected without much difficulty. On the accession of Hadrian \(\text{a.d.} 117\), with whom he had lived on intimate terms during the life-time of Trajan, he was raised to offices of higher honour and trust. He was first sent into Mauritania to quiet the disturbances in that province which were supposed to have been excited by Q. Lusius Quetius \[QUETUS\], and he was afterwards appointed to the government of Pan- nonia and Dacia with the title of Egyptian Prae- fect, that he might possess greater weight and influence. Subsequently he was summoned to Rome, and raised to the important dignity of Praefectus Praetorio in place of Attianus. In the discharge of the duties of this office, he was most assiduous; but nevertheless, like all the other friends of Hadrian, was at length treated with ingratitude by the emperor. Turbo was fifty years of age at the time of his death, as we learn from an inscription on his tomb. \(\text{Euseb. H. E. iv.} 2, \text{Spart. Hadr.} 4—9, 15; \text{Dion Cass. lxix.} 18; \text{Gruter, p.} 437.1\).

TURDIUS, C. PAPI'RILIUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 178. \(\text{Liv. xii.} 6\). This is the only person of this family mentioned. Cicero speaks of the Turdi as a plebeian family of the Papiria gens \(\text{ad Fam. ix.} 21, \text{§ 3}\).

TURIA, the wife of Q. Lucretius Vespilio, concealed her husband when he was proscribed by the triumvirs in b.c. 43. \(\text{Val. Max. vi.} 7, \text{§ 2; Appian, B. C. iv.} 44\). \[VESPILIO.\]

TURI'BIUS, a Spanish bishop, a bitter enemy and persecutor of the Priscillianists. About the year \(\text{a.d.} 447\), before he was elevated to the episcopal dignity, he published a letter still extant, entitled Expiatio de non recipiendis in auctoritatem Vidi apoqyphis Scripturis, et de secta PrisciUianis- tarum, addressed to his friends Idacius and Cepo- nius. A letter to Pope Leo the Great, and various tracts connected with the controversy, have perished.

The Epistle to Idacius and Ceponius was first printed by Ambrosius de Morales, in his Historia Hispaniae, lib. xi. 26, and will be found in the editions of the works of Leo by Quenell and by the brothers Ballerini, inserted immediately after the letter of Leo to Turbius, which is numbered xv. \(\text{Schoenemann, Biblioth. Patrum Latt. vol. ii.}\)

§ 51; Baehr, Geschichte der Röm. Litterat. Suppl. Band. 2te Abtheil. § 167.)

TURIUS. 1. L. TURIUS, was accused by Q. Gallus and defended by Cato the Censor. \(\text{Gell. xiv.} 2\). A warning is known respecting either this L. Turius or Cn. Gallius, a wide field is opened for learned trifling. The different con- jectures started are given by Meyer. \(\text{Orat. Roman. Fragm.} p. 140, \text{foll., 2nd ed.}\)

2. L. TURIUS, characterized by Cicero as an orator of small talent but great diligence, failed in ob- taining the consulship only by a few centuries. \(\text{Cic. Brut. 67.}\) This Turius can hardly be the same person as the preceding, as he is mentioned by Cicero with M. Piso, P. Murena, C. Censorinus, C. Macer, C. Piso, and L. Torquatus, all of whom were the contemporaries of Cicero.

3. Q. TURIUS, a negotiator or money-lender in the province of Africa, where he died. Cicero wrote to Q. Cornificius in b.c. 44, begging him to support the validity of the will of Turius against the attempts of his freedman Turius Eros. \(\text{Cic. ad Fam. xii.} 15, 31\).

4. TURIUS, a corrupt judge in the time of Horace. \(\text{Hor. Sat. ii.} 1, 49\).

TURNUS \(\text{Töppvus}\), a son of Danus and Venilia, and king of the Rutulians at the time of the arrival of Aeneas in Italy. \(\text{Verg. Aen. x.} 76, 616\). He was a brother of Juturna and related to Amata, the wife of king Latinus. \(\text{xii. 138.}\)

Alecto, by the command of Hern, stirred him up to fight against Aeneas after his landing in Italy. \(\text{vii. 408, &c.}\) He appears in the Aeneid as a brave warrior, but in the end he fell by the hand of the victorious Aeneas \(\text{xii. 926, &c.}\). Livy \(i. 2\) and Dionysius also mention him as king of the Rutulians, who allied himself with the Etruscans against the Latins, consisting of Aborigines and Trojans. The Rutulians according to their account indeed were defeated, but Aeneas fell. \(\text{Comp. AENEKAS.}\)

TURNUS, a Roman satyric poet. According to the old scholar upon Juvænul, who quotes two lines from one of his pieces, he was a native of Aurunca, of servile extraction \(\text{libertini generis}\), the brother of Sceava Memor the tragedian, and rose to honour and power at court under the Flavi- an dynasty. He is mentioned in terms of high praise by Martial, by Rutilius, and by Sidosion Apollinaris. We possess thirty hexameters, form- ing a portion of, apparently, a long satyric poem, the subject being an enumeration of the crimes and abominations which characterised the reign of Nero. This fragment was first published from a MS. by J. L. G. de Balzac in his "Entretiens" (12mo. Amst. 1663), was copied by Burmann into his "Anthologia Latinæ" \(\text{vi. 94, or No. 196, ed. Meyen.}\)

The latter employs some arguments which, to a certain ex- tent, bear out his conjecture that the piece ought to be ascribed to Turnus; but the evidence is of a very indirect and uncertain description. \(\text{Vet. Schol. in Juv. i.} 20, 71; \text{Martial. vii.} 97, 10; \text{Rutil. Numat. i.} 599; \text{Sidon. Apollin. Carm. ix.} 267; \text{F. A. Wolf, Vorlesungen über Röm. Litt. p.} 231; \text{Zumpt, ad Rutil. Numat. l. c.}\)

TURNUS \(\text{Töppvus}\), a statuary, known only by the single passage in which Tatian mentions his statue of the courtezan Laïs. \(\text{Orat. ad Graec.} 55, p. 121, \text{ed. Worth: Άλας ἐνδυμάνον, καὶ δ}'\) TURPILIANUS.

Plut. 69..)

TURNUS HERDONIUS. [HERDONIUS.]

TURPILIA, left P. Silius one of her heirs. The interpretation of her will gave rise to much controversy. (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 21.) [Silius, No. 4.]

TURPILIANUS, PETRONIUS. 1. P. PETRONIUS TURPILIANUS, triumvir of the mint under Augustus, whose name occurs on a great variety of coins, seven of which are given below. The first has on the obverse the head of Augustus, and on the reverse the virgin Tarpeia overwhelmed by the shields cast upon her, which subject has a reference to the Sabine origin of the Petronia gens. The next three coins relate to the Eastern glories of Augustus and the restitution of the Roman standards by the Parthians in B.C. 20. The second coin has on the obverse the head of the goddess Feronia, which likewise has reference to the Sabine origin of the gens, and on the reverse a kneeling Parthian offering a standard. The third coin has the same obverse, and on the reverse a man in a chariot drawn by two elephants, holding an olive branch in his hand, which subject probably has reference to the Indian embassy sent to Augustus in A.D. 20. The fourth coin has on the obverse the head of Libera, or perhaps of Bacchus, habited as a female, and on the reverse a kneeling figure of Armenia. The reverses of the next three coins are probably intended to celebrate the love of Augustus or Petronius for poetry. The fifth coin has on the obverse the head of Augustus, and on the reverse one of the Sirens, holding a trumpet in each hand. The sixth has the same obverse, and on the reverse Pegasus. The seventh has likewise on the obverse the head of Augustus, but struck at a different period, and on the reverse the sun and moon. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 270, foll.; vol. vi. p. 99.)

COINS OF P. PETRONIUS TURPILIANUS.

2. C. PETRONIUS TURPILIANUS, consul B.C. 61 with C. Caesonius Paetus, was sent by Nero towards the close of the year to succeed Suetonius Paulinus in the government of Britain. He did not undertake in this province any military enterprises, but covered, says Tacitus, idle inactivity with the honourable name of peace. Nevertheless he received the triumphal insignia in A.D. 65; but this honour and the friendship of Nero caused his ruin, for he was in consequence put to death by order of Galba at the commencement of his reign. (Tac, Ann. xiv. 29, 39, Apr. 16, Ann. xv. 72, Hist. i. 6, 37; Plut. Galb. 15.)

TURPILIANUS LA/BEQ, of Venice, a Roman knight, contemporary with Pliny, who mentions him as an exception to the low condition in life of the generality of Roman painters since Paccuvius. Another peculiarity was that he painted with his left hand. He was recently dead when Pliny wrote the passage in which he mentions him. There were some beautiful pictures by him at Verona. He may be placed about A.D. 60. (Plin, H. N. xxxv. 4. s. 7.)

TURPILIANUS, SEXTUS, a Roman dramatist whose productions belonged to the department of Comoedia Palliata. The titles of thirteen or fourteen (Acta, Boodhuntes, Canephora, Demetrius, Demiurgus, Epiclerus, Hetaera, Lemnii, Leucadia, [P. S.]
TURRINUS.

Ludi, Paracerus, Philopator, Thrasyleon, Veliterna (?) have been preserved, together with a few fragments which will be found collected in the Postumae Latii Scenicorum Fragmenta of Bothe, vol. ii. p. 76. Rvo. Lips. 1834. Of the above, the Thrasyleon appears to have been taken from Meander, the Demetrius and the Leucadia from Alexia. According to Hieronymus, in the Eusebian Chronicle, Turrius died, when very old, at Sinuessa in b.c. 101. He stands seventh in the scale of Volcatins Sedigibus. [Sedigibus.] [W.R.]

TURPILIVS SILIANUS. [Silanus.]

TURPIO, L. AMBIVIUS, a very celebrated actor in the time of Terence, in most of whose plays he acted. (Didascaliae Terentianae; Cie. de Sen. 14; Tac. Dial. de Ortat. 14; Symmach. Ep. i. xix. 2.)

TURPIO, ANTISTIUS, fought in single combat Q. Pompeius Niger in the Spanish war in b.c. 45. (Auctor, B. Hosp. 25.)

TURPIO, NAEVIVS. [Naevius, No. 7.]

TURRANNIUS or TURRANIIUS. 1. D. TURRANIIUS NIGER, a friend of Varro, to whom the latter dedicated the second book of his work De Re Rustica. He was also a friend of Q. Cicero, whom he accompanied to Cilicia, when Quintus went there as the legatus of his brother Marcus. (Varr. R. R. ii. Praef.; Cie. ad Att. i. 6, vi. 9, vii. 1; in one of these passages the name is written Turran-iius.) He is perhaps the same as the writer Turrianus Oenecilus, quoted by the elder Pliny. [Gra-cileus.]

2. M. TURRANIIUS, praetor b.c. 44, refused a province which was offered him by Antony, and is therefore called by Cicero "homo summa integritate atque innocentia." (Cic. Phil. iii. 10.)

3. TURRANIIUS, a tragic poet mentioned by Ovid (ex Post. iv. 16. 29).

4. C. TURRANIIUS, praefectus annonae at the death of Augustus, A. D. 14, was one of the first to swear allegiance to Tiberius upon his accession. He continued to hold this office till the reign of Claudius, for he is spoken of as praefectus rei frumentariae in A. D. 48. (Tac. Ann. i. 7, xii. 31.)

5. TURRANIIUS RUPINUS. [Rupinus, No. 1.]

TURRIAN'US, a Volscian of Fregellaec, was an eminent statistician in clay, in the early Etruscan period, and the maker of a statue of Jupiter, which was dedicated by Tarquinius Priscus, and which was painted with vermilion on great festivals. This is according to the common text of Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 12. s. 45); but the reading is so very doubtful, and the critical discussion of it so complicated, with so very little hope of a satisfactory result, that we must be content to refer the reader to the following work, in which the question is treated at length. (Sillig's Pliny, L., and Jan's Supplement; Sillig, Catal. Artif. Append. s. v.; Jan, in the Jen. Litt. Zeitung, 1838, p. 258; Kunstdblatt, 1832, No. 49, 1833, No. 51; Müller, Etrusker, vol. ii. p. 246, and Archäol. d. Kunst, § 171, ed. Welcker.) [P. S.]

TURRINUS, CLODIUS, the name of two rhetoricians, father and son, spoken of with praise by the elder Seneca, who gives a short account of them. The elder by his eloquence obtained wealth and honour, and held an important public office in Spain. The son was an intimate friend of Seneca. (Senec. Contrav. v. Praef. p. 333, ed. Bip. Suet. 2, Contr. 30—35.)

TURRINUS, MAMILIIUS. 1. C. MAMIL-

LIUS Q. Q. N. TURRINUS, consul b.c. 259 with Q. Valerius Fulto. (Fasti Capit.; Gall. xvii. 21, 43, where the reading is C. Manilius.)

2. Q. MAMILIIUS TURRINUS, plebeian aedile b.c. 207 and praetor b.c. 206, obtained by lot the jurisdiction peregrina, but was sent by the senate into Gaul. (Liv. xxxviii. 10.)

TURRIS or THURRSUS, one of the most powerful of the Celtiberian chiefs conquered by Gracchus in b.c. 179, became a faithful ally of the Romans. (Liv. xl. 49.)

L. TURSIUS, made M. Antonius his heir, disinheriting his other brother. (Cic. Phil. ii. 16.)

P. TURSIUS, a TURRIUS, one of Caesar's assassins, was quæstor of Caesarianus, and Turrinus in b.c. 43, and received the command of the fleet which had been raised by Titilius Cimber in Bithynia. After the battle of Philippi, in b.c. 42, Turrius joined Cassius Parmensis, and subsequently took refuge with Antony, with whom he lived on intimate terms. In order to please Octavian, Turrius was surrendered to him by Antony after the battle of Actium, and was put to death by order of Octavian in the island of Cos that he might appear to offer satisfaction to Aesculapius, the trees of whose sacred grove he had previously cut down for the use of Antony's navy. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 18; Appian, B. C. v. 2; Dion Cass. li. 8; Val. Max. i. i, § 19.)

TURRIUS, CERRIALIS, a primipilarius in a. D. 69. (Tac. Hist. ii. 22.)

TUSCENIUS, an obscure person, whom Q. Cicero compelled in b.c. 69 to dispose some dishonest gains. (Cic. ad Q. Frac. i. § 6, i. 2.)

TUSCIANUS (Tuscinavi, of Lydia), a distinguished orator and rhetorician in the fourth century of the Christian era. (Emanu. Jul. p. 95, Proacer, p. 111; Suidas, s. v.)

TUSCIANUS NOMINA'TUS, an orator and a contemporary of the younger Pliny, who mentions him in his correspondence (Ep. v. 4, 14.)

TUSCUS, C. AQUILLLIUS, consul b.c. 487 with T. Siciuus Sabinus, carried on war against the Hernici, whom he defeated, and obtained in consequence an ovation or lesser triumph. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. ii. 40; Dionys. viii. 64, 65, 67.)

TUSCUS, CAECINA. [Caricina, No. 8.]

TUSCUS, ClODIUS, to whom Asinius Capito wrote a letter, which is quoted by Gallius (v. 20.)

TUSCUS, FABRICIUS, a Roman writer, of whom nothing is known except that he was used by Pliny in drawing up his Natural History (Index, lib. iii. foll.)

TUTELINA, an agricultural divinity among the Romans, or, perhaps, rather an attribute of Ops, by which she is described as the goddess protecting the fruits which have been brought in at the harvest time from the fields. Tutelina, Secia and Messia had three pillars with altars before them in the Circus. (August. De Cie. Det. iv. 8; Macrob. Sat. i. 16; Plin. H. N. xvii. 2; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 2.)

TUTRINUS, a friend of Ovid, who addressed to him one of his extant epistles from Pontus (iv. 15). Tutticannus had made a free translation into TYCHE.

Latin verse of the Odyssey, or at least of a portion of it, to which Ovid refers in the lines:—

“Dignam Maeoniun Phaeacida condere chartes Cum te Piérides perdorcuere tune.”

Ovid likewise alludes to this poem in another passage (“Et qui Maeonian Phaeacida vertit,” ex Pont. iv. 16, 27), but without naming the author. (Wernsdorff, Poét. Lat. Min. vol. iv. pp. 584, 585.)

TUTIJA, mentioned in one of Cicero’s letters (ad Att. xvi. 2), does not occur elsewhere, and is perhaps a false reading for Julia, and the same as the Julia spoken of ad Att. xv. 29.

TUTULIUS, a rhetorician, whose daughter Quintilian married. (Flin. Ep. vi. 32; Quintil. iii. l. § 21, which the text should be read instead of Rutulius.) [QUINTILLIANUS, p. 635, a.]

L. TUTIUS CEREA/LIUS, consul under Trajan A. D. 106 with L. Ceionius Commodus Verus (Fasti). Pliny speaks of Tutius Cerealis a consularis in one of his letters (Ep. ii. 11); but as the letter was written in A. D. 99, it must refer to some other person of the same name, unless we suppose that the consul of the year 106 had held the same dignity previously.

TUTOR, JU'LIUS, a Tavirian, who had been placed by Vitellius in a command on the left bank of the Rhine (A. D. 69), took part in the rebellion of CLASSICUS. After the murder of Voclca, he gained over the Roman soldiers at Colonia Agrippinensis and on the banks of the Upper Rhine to the oath to the empire of Gaul. He neglected to guard the Upper Rhine and the passes of the Alps against Cerialis; and, on the appearance of the Roman army he was deserted by a large body of his troops. He retired to Bingum, and was there defeated. After assisting Valentinius in his attempt to renew the war [VALENTINUS], he joined Civilis and Classicus, with whom he fled across the Rhine. [CIVILIS.] (Tac. Hist. iv. 55, 59, 70, v. 19—22.) [P. S.]

TYCHE (Týchê). 1. The personification of chance or luck, the Fortuna of the Romans, is called by Pindar (Ol. xii. init.) a daughter of Zeus the Liberator. She was represented with different attributes. With a rudder, she was conceived as the divinity guiding and conducting the affairs of the world, and in this respect she is called one of the Moerai (Paus. viii. 26, § 3; Pind. Pragm. 75, ed. Heyne); with a ball she represents the varying unsteadiness of fortune; with Plutos or the horn of Amalthea, she was the symbol of the plentiful gifts of fortune. (Artemid. ii. 37; comp. Müller, Anc. Art and its Rom. § 398.) Tyche was worshipped at Pharao in Messenia (Paus. viii. 39, § 2); at Smyrna, where her statue, the work of Bæron, held with one hand a globe on her head, and in the other carried the horn of Amalthea (iv. 30, § 4); in the arch of Sicyon (ii. 7, § 5); at Aegela in Achaia, where she was represented with the horn of Amalthea and a winged Eros by her side (vii. 26, § 3; comp. Plut. De Fort. Rom. 4; Arnob. adv. Gent. vi. 25); in Elis (Paus. vi. 25, § 4); at Thebes (ix. 16, § 1); at Lebanon, together with ἀγάστης δαίμων (ix. 39, § 4); at Olympia (v. 15, § 4), and Athens. (Aelian, V. H. ix. 39; comp. Fortuna.)

2. A nymph, one of the playmates of Persephone. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 421.)

3. One of the daughters of Oceanus. (Hes. Theog. 360.) [L. S.]

TYCHONIUS.

TY'CHICUS, Q. HATE'RIUS, an architect, who is mentioned in two extant inscriptions, from which it appears that he held the office of redemptor operum under the emperor Claudius, and that he constructed and adorned with marbles, at his own expense, a small temple of Hercules. (For the inscriptions themselves, see R. Rohette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 420, 421, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TYCHIUS (Týchóis). 1. Of Hyle, a mythical artificer, mentioned by Homer (who calls him σκανδριμα ε'ν δραμοι), as the maker of Ajax’s shield of seven ox-hides, covered with a plate of brass. (Il. 219—223; Nonn. Dionys. xii. 671.)

2. A maker of fictile vases, whose name is inscribed on the margin of one of the large vases found at Corinth in the following form: ΘΩ'RIOS

EPOESSEN (Gerhard, Rapport Volont. pp. 178, 701.) His name is also found on some vases recently discovered at Vulci, of which there is one in the Museum at Berlin. (Gerhard, Neuerworben antik. Denkmäler, No. 1664; R. Rohette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 62, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

TYCHON (Týków). 1. A god of chance or accident, was, according to Strabo (ix. p. 408), worshipped at Athens. (Comp. Anthol. Patat. ix. 334.)

TYCHIÓNIUS, also written Tychonius, was an African, well versed in sacred and not ignorant of profane literature, who flourished under Theodosius and his sons, being contemporary with Rufinus and Augustine. Augustine, however, never addressed them in his writings, and although triumphant in confuting their doctrines, refused to quit their communion. This perversity of temper calls forth the indignation of the bishop of Hippo, who while he inveighs against the author, at the same time praises his genius and eloquence, and earnestly recommends his works. Of these one only has reached us, entitled Septem Regulæ or De Septem Regulis, being a code of Seven Rules for explaining Holy Scripture. It is analysed by Augustine at the conclusion of his third book De Doctrina Christiana, but will be found to contain little that is important, interesting, or even intelligible.

Tychonius composed also a treatise in three books De Bello intestino, on the decrees of the ancient Synods which might be quoted in defence of his party; Commentarium in Apocalypsin, in which he expanded the vision in a sense purely spiritual; and, although he never assailed them in his writings, and although triumphant in confuting their doctrines, refused to quit their communion. This perversity of temper calls forth the indignation of the bishop of Hippo, who while he inveighs against the author, at the same time praises his genius and eloquence, and earnestly recommends his works. TYMENES. iv. § 26 ; Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Literat. Suppl. B. § 100. [W. R.]

TYCUS. [QUARTINUS.]

TYDEUS (Τυδέος), a son of Oeneus and Periboea (Gorg or Althaea), was the husband of Deipyle, by whom he became the father of Diodedes; he was king of Calydon, and one of the princes who joined Polynices in the expedition against Thebes. (Apollod. i. 8. § 5 ; Hom. Ili. ii. 406, xiv. 115, &c.)

Tydeus was obliged to flee from his country in consequence of some murder which he had committed, but which is differently described by the different authors, some saying that he killed his father's brother, Melas, Lycopeus, or Alcamous; others that he slew Thoas or Apheris, his mother's brother; others that he slew his brother Olenias, and others again that he killed the sons of Melas, who had revoluted against Oeneus (Schol. ad Stat. theb. i. 290, 492). He fled to Adrastus at Argos, who purified him from the murder, put him in charge of his daughter Deipyle in marriage. With Adrastus he then went against Thebes, where he was wounded by Melanippus, who, however, was slain by him. (Apollod. L. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 268, 971.) When Tydeus lay on the ground wounded, Athena appeared to him with a remedy which she had received from Zeus, and which was to make him immortal. This, however, was prevented by a stratagem of Amphiaraus, who hated Tydeus, for he cut off the head of Melanippus and brought it to Tydeus, who cut it in two and ate the brain, or devoured some of the flesh. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. x. 12 ; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1272.) Athena seeing this, shuddered, and did not apply the remedy which she had brought. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 8.) Tydeus then died, and was buried by Macon. (Paus. i. 16. § 2 ; comp. ADRASTUS ; AMPHICRONUS.) [L. S.]

TYDEUS (Τυδέος). 1. A Chian, son of Ion, appears to have been a leader of the democratic party in his native island, and was one of those who were put to death in B.c. 412, by Pedaritus the Lacedaemonian, for attachment to the Athenian cause. It is possible that his father was no other than Ion, the tragic poet. (Thuc. viii. 38.) [ION, No. 1 ; PEDARITUS.]

2. An Athenian, was one of the three additional generals who were appointed in B.c. 405 to share the command of the fleet with Conon, Philocrates, and Adeimantus. Tydeus and Menander, one of his colleagues, are particularly mentioned by Xenophon as contemptuously rejecting the advice of Alcibiades before the battle of Aegos-potami in the same year; and we find in Pausanias that he and Adeimantus were suspected by their countrymen of having been bribed by Lysander. He was put to death by the Spartans, as we may conclude, after the battle, together with the other Athenian prisoners. (Xen. Hell. ii. 1. §§ 16, 26; Paus. x. 9.) [ADEIMANTUS.] [E. E.]

TYMENES (Τύμνης), an epigrammatic poet, whose epigrams were included in the Garland of Meleager, but respecting whose exact date we have no further evidence; for the grounds on which Reiske supposes that he was a Cretan, and that he was contemporary with Meleager, are very slight. There are seven of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Bruckn, Anal. vol. i. p. 505; Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. i. p. 256, vol. xii. p. 963; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 498, 499.) Tymenus occurs, as a Carian name, in Herodotus (v. 37, vii. 96). [P. S.]

TYMENIANUS. L. POSTUMIUS, a son of Perieres and Gorgophone, and a brother of Apheris, Leucippus, Iapius, and Arcete (Apollod. i. 9. § 5) or according to others (Apollod. iii. 10. § 4), a son of Oebalus, by the nymph Bateia or by Gorgophone. (Paus. iii. 1. § 4.) Tyndareus, with Icarion, being expelled by his step-brother Hippocoon and his sons, he fled to Thestius in Aetolia, and assisted him in his wars against his neighbours. Others (Paus. L. c.) state that Icarion assisted Hippocoon, and, according to a Lacementian tradition, Tyndareus went to Peliana in Laconia, and according to a Messenian tradition, he went to Aphares in Messenia. (Paus. iii. 1. § 4, 21. § 2.) In Aetolia he married Leda, the daughter of Thestius (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5 ; Euphr. Jph. Aus. 48), and afterwards he was succeeded to his kingdom of Sparta by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 3, iii. 10. § 5 ; Paus. ii. 18. § 6 ; Diod. iv. 33.) By Leda, Tyndareus became the father of Timandra, Clytaemnestra and Philoctet. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6 ; Hom. Od. xxiv. 199.) One night Leda was embraced both by Zeus and Tyndareus, and the result of this was the birth of Polydeuces and Helen, the children of Zeus, and of Castor and Clytaemnestra, the children of Tyndareus. (Hygin. Fab. 77; comp. Dioscor. ; HELENA ; CLYTAEMNESTRA.) When Tyndareus saw that his beautiful daughter Helen was beleaguered by suitors, he began to be afraid, lest if one should be successful, the others should create disturbances, and, on the advice of Odysseus, he put them all to their oath, to protect the suitor that should be preferred by Helen, against any wrong that might be done to him. (Paus. iii. 20. § 9.) To reward Odysseus for this good advice, Tyndareus himself begged Icarius to give to Odysseus his daughter Penelope, (Apollod. iii. 10. § 9,) Tyndareus was believed to have built the temple of Athena Chalcoiceus at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 17. § 3.) When Castor and Polydeuces had been received among the immortals, Tyndareus invited Menelaus to come to Sparta, and surrendered his kingdom to him. (Apollod. iii. 11. § 2.) His tomb was shown at Sparta as late as the time of Pausanias (iii. 17. § 4.) [L. S.]

TYNDARION (Τυνδαρίων), a tyrant of Tauromenium in Sicily, who invited Pyrrhus over from Italy in B.c. 278. Pyrrhus directed his course first to Tauromenium, and received reinforcements from Tyndarion. (Diod. Edc. viii. p. 493 ; comp. Plut. Pyrrh. 23 ; Droysen, Geschichte des Helenismus, vol. ii. p. 150.) [L. S.]

TYPHON or TYFOEUS (Τύφων, Τύφωες, Τύφως), a monster of the primitive world, is described sometimes as a destructive hurricane, and sometimes as a fire-breathing giant. According to Homer (II. vii. 783 ; comp. Strab. xiii. p. 929) he was concealed in the country of the Arimis in the earth, which was lashed by Zeus with flashes of lightning.

In Hesiod Typhon and Typhoeus are two distinct beings. Typhon is a son of Typhoeus

* Eiv 'Αρμος, of which the Latin poets have made Inarites (Virg. Aen. ix. 716; Or. Met. xiv. 89).
TYRANNION.
(Tyog. 369), and a fearful hurricane, who by Echidna became the father of the dog Orthus, Cerberus, the Lernaean Hydra, Chimaera, and the Sphyxus. (Tyog. 366; comp. Apollod. ii. 3. § 1, iii. 5. § 8.) Notwithstanding the confusion of the two beings in later writers, the original meaning of Typhon was preserved in ordinary life. (Aristoph. Ran. 845; Plin. ii. N. ii. 48.) Typhoeus, on the other hand, is described as the youngest son of Tartarus and Gaea, or of Hera alone, because she was indignant at Zeus having given birth to Athena. Typhoeus is described as a monster with a hundred heads, fearful eyes, and terrible voices (Pind. Pyth. i. 31, viii. 21, Od. iv. 12); he wanted to acquire the sovereignty of gods and men, but was subdued, after a fearful struggle, by Zeus, with a thunderbolt. (Hes. Tyog. 821, &c.) He begot the winds, whence he is also called the father of the Harpies (Val. Flacc. iv. 420), but the beneficent winds Notus, Boreas, Argoetes, and Zephyrus, were not his sons. (Hes. Tyog. 365, &c.) Asclepius and PIndar describe him as living in a Clipeus. (Pind. Pyth. viii. 21; comp. the different ideas in Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1210, &c.; and Herod. iii. 5.) He is further said to have at one time been engaged in a struggle with all the immortals, and to have been killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning; he was buried in Tartarus under Mount Aetna, the workshop of Hephaestus. (Ov. Her. xv. 11, Fast. iv. 491; Asclepiol. Prom. 351, &c.; Pind. Pyth. i. 29, &c.) The later poets frequently connect Typhoeus with Egypt, and the god, it is said, when unable to hold out against him, fled to Egypt, where, from fear, they metamorphosed themselves into animals, with the exception of Zeus and Athena. (Anton. Lib. 28; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 28; Ov. Met. v. 321, &c.; comp. Apollod. i. 6. § 3; Ov. Fast. ii. 401; Horat. Carm. iii. 4. 53.)

TYRANNION (Tyanaioi). I. A Greek grammairan, a native of Amisus in Pontus, the son of Epicratides, or, according to some accounts, of Corymbus. He was a pupil of Hestineus of Amisus, and was originally called Theophrastus, but received from his instructor the name of Tyraanion on account of his domineering behaviour to his fellow disciples. He afterwards studied under Dionysius the Thracian at Rhodes. In b.c. 72 he was taken captive by Lucullus, who carried him to Rome. At the request of Murena Tyraanion was handed over to him, upon which he emancipated him, an act with which Plutarch (Lucullus, 19) finds fault, as the emancipation involved a recognition of his having been a slave, which does not seem to have been the light in which Lucullus regarded him. At Rome Tyraanion occupied himself in teaching. He was also employed in arranging the library of Apollion, which Sula brought to Rome. (Plint. Sulla, 26.) Cicero employed him in a similar manner, and speaks in the highest terms of the learning and ability which Tyraanion exhibited in these labours. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 4, b. 1. 8, a. 2.) Cicero also availed himself of his services in the instruction of his nephew Quintus (ad Quint. Fratris ii. 4. § 2; comp. ad Att. ii. 6. § 1, xii. 6. § 1, 2. § 2. 7. § 2, ad Quint. Fr. iii. 4. § 5). Strabo (xii. p. 548) speaks of having received instruction from Tyraanion. The geographical knowledge of Tyraanion seems to have been considerable; at any rate Cicero thought highly of it. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 6.) Tyraanion amassed considerable wealth, and according to the scarcely credible statement of Suidas (s. e.), collected himself a library of 30,000 volumes. Cicero alludes to a small work of his (ad Att. iv. 6), but we do not learn the subject of it. Tyraanion died at a very advanced age of a palsyct stroke.

2. A native of Phocinia, the son of Artemidorus, and a disciple of the preceding. His original name was Diocles. He was taken captive in the war between Antonius and Octavianus, and was purchased by Dymas, a freedman of the emperor. By him he was presented to Terentia, the wife of Cicero, who manumitted him. He taught at Rome, and according to Suidas, wrote 68 works. The following are mentioned:—1. Περί τῆς Ὀμηρικῆς προσωδίας. 2. Περὶ τῶν μερῶν τοῦ λόγου. 3. Περὶ τῆς Ῥώμαιικῆς διάλεκτος, showing that the Latin language is derived from the Greek. 4. Τοῦ Ἀττικῆνος ὡς Ῥώμαιική διάλεκτος. 5. Ὅτι διαφορο-

TERT. τῶν Νόμων καὶ τῶν Χειροκίτων φασίν. 6. Περὶ τῆς Ῥώμαιικῆς ἡπείρου. 7. Λαοδίκοιος. 8. Ὅτι τοῦ Ῥώμαιικος ἡπείρος. Tyrannion is mentioned in the scholia on Homer (Schol. mar. ad ii. β. 92, 155, 169).

3. Suidas mentions a third writer of the name of Tyrannion, a Messenian, who wrote a work on augury (οἰωνοσκοπία) in three books, and some other works.

A work Περὶ τοῦ σκολιοῦ μέτρου is ascribed by Suidas (s. e. σκολιοῖ) to a writer named Tyrannion, and stated to have been written at the suggestion of Caius Caesar. If this notice is correct, and the Tyrannion meant is the second of that name, he must have reached a very advanced age when he commenced this treatise, even supposing him to have been young when he was brought to Rome. (C. P. M.)

TYRIA' SPES (Tyriaspis), a Persian, who in n. c. 327 was appointed by Alexander the Great to the satrapy of the Paphomades, west of the river Cophen. In the following year Alexander commissioned him and Philippos to reduce the Assaceneans, who had revolted (Arr. Anab. iv. 22, v. 20). [E. E. W.]

TYRO (Tyro), a daughter of Salmononius and Alcidice, was the wife of Crethus, and the beloved of the river-god Eunipos in Thessaly, in the form of whom Poseidon appeared to her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus. By Crethus she was the mother of Aeson, Pheres, and Amythaon. (Hom. Od. xi. 235, &c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 8.)

TYRO SABINUS. [Sabinus.]

TYRRHENIUS (Τυρρηνίος or Τυρρηνιος), a son of the Libyan king Atys and Callithen, and a brother of Lydos, is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Libya into Italy, into the country of the Umbrians, and to have given to the colonists his name, Tyrrenhians. (Herod. iv. 94; Dionys. Hal. i. 27.) Others call Tyrrenius a son of Heracles by Omphale (Dionys. i. 28), or of Telephilus and Hera, and a brother of Tarchon. (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 1242, 1249.) The name Tarchon seems to be only another form for Tyrrenius, and the two names represent a Pelasgian hero founding settlements in the north of Italy. (Comp. Müller, Die Etrurier, vol. i. p. 72, &c.)

TYRRHEUS, a shepherd of king Latinus. Assacni once, while hunting, killed a tama stag belonging to Tyrrheus, whereupon the country people took up arms, which was the first conflict in TYRTAEUS, son of Archembrotus, the celebrated poet, who assisted the Spartans in the Second Messenian War, was the second in order of time of the Greek elegiac poets, Callinus being the first. At the time when his name first appears in history, he is represented, according to the prevalent account, as living at Aphidnae in Attica; but the whole tradition, of which this statement forms a part, has the same mythical complexion by which all the accounts of the early Greek poets are more or less pervaded. In attempting to trace the tradition to its sources, we find in Plato the brief statement, that Tyrtaeus was by birth an Athenian, but became a citizen of Lacedaemon (De Legg. i. p. 629). The orator Lycurgus tells the story more fully; that, when the Spartans were at war with the Messenians, they were commanded by an oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians, and thus to conquer their enemies; and that the leader they so chose from among the Athenians was Tyrtaeus himself, and that in the second he himself was Lacedaemonian; and then Strabo adds,—directly after the words τοῖς Ακαδεμαίοισι, καὶ γὰρ εἶναι φησίν ἐκείνων ἐν τῇ ποιησὶν ἐλεγείαν, ἣν ἐντράγα"νων Εὐνώμων.

The oracles of the sibyls round about Dodona and among the Corinthians were to the Spartans as important as those at Delphi were to the Athenians. The story of the oracles was pictured in the Homeric poems. Homer himself, in the Iliad, speaks of the oracle of Dodona, which was supposed to be the repository of the oracular laws of the Sparta and the Argives. The Spartan oracles were of a different kind; for it is said that they were not given by the gods, but by the Messenian Argives, who were the real authors of the oracles. At the time of the Messenian war, the Spartans were in dispute with the Argives about the oracle, which was situated on the boundary of their territory. The Greek poets, who wrote about the time of the Messenian war, were all in favor of the Spartans. The Spartan oracles were calculated to give the Spartans an advantage over the Argives. The Spartan oracles were also used to prove the right of the Spartans to the Peloponnesus. The Spartan oracles were also used to prove the right of the Spartans to the Peloponnesus.

TYRTAEUS. 1197

Italy between the natives and the Trojan settlers. (Virg. Aen. vii. 493, &c., ix. 28.) [L. S.]

TYRTAEUS (Τυρταῖος, or Τύρτας), son of Archembrotus, the celebrated poet, who assisted the Spartans in the Second Messenian War, was the second in order of time of the Greek elegiac poets, Callinus being the first. At the time when his name first appears in history, he is represented, according to the prevalent account, as living at Aphidnae in Attica; but the whole tradition, of which this statement forms a part, has the same mythical complexion by which all the accounts of the early Greek poets are more or less pervaded. In attempting to trace the tradition to its sources, we find in Plato the brief statement, that Tyrtaeus was by birth an Athenian, but became a citizen of Lacedaemon (De Legg. i. p. 629). The orator Lycurgus tells the story more fully; that, when the Spartans were at war with the Messenians, they were commanded by an oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians, and thus to conquer their enemies; and that the leader they so chose from among the Athenians was Tyrtaeus himself, and that in the second he himself was Lacedaemonian; and then Strabo adds,—directly after the words τοῖς Ακαδεμαίοισι, καὶ γὰρ εἶναι φησίν ἐκείνων ἐν τῇ ποιησὶν ἐλεγείαν, ἣν ἐντράγα"νων Εὐνώμων.

From which Strabo draws the conclusion, that either the elegies containing these verses are spurious, or else that the statement of Philochorus, &c. (as already quoted) must be rejected. The commentators, however, are not content with Strabo's own negative inference from the verses quoted, but will have it that he understood them as declaring that Tyrtaeus himself came from Erineus to join the Spartans in their war against the Messenians; and, to give a colour to this interpretation of Strabo assumes as self-evident that after τοῖς Ακαδεμαίοισι some such words as ἀλλὰν ἐξ Ἑρείου have been lost. But, if the passage says that Tyrtaeus came from Erineus at all, it says as plainly that he came thence to Peloponnesus together with the Ἡρειοῖς ἱτημένας; and it is therefore clear that the verses refer, not to any removal of Tyrtaeus himself, but to the great migration of the Dorian ancestors of those Lacedaemonians for whom he spoke, and among whom he, in some sense, included himself; and the argument of Strabo, as the passage stands, is, that Tyrtaeus was a Lacedaemonian (ἐκεῖθεν referring, of course, to Λακεδαιμονίων), because of the intimate way in which he associates himself with the descendants of the Dorians who migrated from Erineus (one of the four Dorian states of Thessaly) to the Peloponnesus. The true question that remains is this, whether his manner of identifying himself with the Lacedaemonians in this passage, and in the phrase about their fathers' fathers, implies that he himself was really a descendant of those Dorians who invaded the Peloponnesus, and of those Lacedaemonians who fought in the first Messenian war, or whether this mode of expression is sufficiently explained by the close association into which he had been thrown with the Spartans, whom he not only aided in war, but by whom he had been made a citizen. This last fact is expressedly stated by Plato (L.c.), and its probability is confirmed by the statement of Aristotle (Pol. ii. 6. § 12) that, in the times of the early kings, the Spartans sometimes conferred the citizenship upon foreigners. Plutarch ascribes a saying to Pausanias, the son of Cleombrotus, that, when asked why they had made Tyrtaeus a citizen, he replied, "that a foreigner might never appear to be our leader" (Apophth. Leon. p. 230, d.). Of course, a mere floating apophthegm like this can have little weight; it may be a genuine tradition, or it may be the invention of some writer who wished to reconcile the common story about Tyrtaeus with the well-known repugnance of the Lacedaemonians to confer their franchise upon foreigners. The statement of Suidas, that Tyrtaeus was a Lacedaemonian, according to some, furnishes no additional evidence, but must be interpreted according to the conclusion which may be arrived at respecting the whole question. It should not be forgotten, in estimating the value of Strabo's opinion, that he may have found other passages in the writings of Tyrtaeus, which seemed to imply that he was a Lacedaemonian, besides those which he quotes; but of course this possibility cannot be adduced as a positive argument, unless it were confirmed by the actual occurrence of such passages in the extant fragments of Tyrtaeus.

In the opinion of those modern critics, who reject the account of the Attic origin of Tyrtaeus, the extant fragments do actually furnish evidence of his being a Lacedaemonian. The spirit displayed in them is said to be thoroughly Dorian; and the patriotic energy, with which the poet praises those who face danger for their native land, is certainly extraordinary for a foreigner, especially when it is remembered that Tyrtaeus is not only said to have shown his influence over the Spartans by leading them in war, but also by appeasing their civil discord at home; and all this becomes the more extraordinary, if we reflect that this patriotic ardour was excited, and this influence was exerted, by an Ionian over and on behalf of Dorians. Neither does it seem probable that, whatever aid the Lacedaemonians might be willing to accept from a foreigner, they would entrust to him the command of their armies.

On the other hand, it is urged by Müller with some force, that "If Tyrtaeus came from Attica, it is easy to understand how the elegiac metre, which had its origin in Ionia, should have been used by him, and that in the very style of Callinus. Athens was so closely connected with her Ionian colonies, that this new kind of poetry must have been soon known in the mother city. This circumstance would be far more inexplicable if Tyrtaeus had been a Lacedaemonian by birth, as was stated vaguely" by some ancient authors. For although Sparta was not at this period a stranger to the efforts of the other Greeks in poetry and music, yet the Spartans, with their peculiar modes of thinking, would not have been very ready to appropriate the new invention of the Ionians."+

Discussions of this sort are extremely unsatisfactory, in respect of the establishment of any positive conclusions; but for that very reason they are extremely important, in order to mark the limits of our knowledge of the early history of Greek lyric poetry, and to show the danger of accepting the positive statements of writers who lived long after the period with reference to which their evidence is brought forward, as if their being positive statements were alone sufficient to authenticate them. In the present case, the question of the country of Tyrtaeus appears to us still undecided, and likely to remain so.

The most popular of the popular story, namely, that Tyrtaeus was a lame schoolmaster, are rejected by all modern writers. It would lead us too far to discuss their probable origin: we will only observe that the statement of his being a schoolmaster may simply mean that he was, like the other early musicians and poets, a teacher of his own art; and his alleged lameness may possibly be connected with some misunderstanding of expressions used by the earlier writers to describe his metres. These suggestions, however, are by no means put forward as altogether satisfactory explanations of the tradition.

Turning now to the more certain facts of the poet's history, we find him presented to us in the double light of a satesman and a military leader, composing the dissenions of the Spartans at home, and animating their courage in the field. And this representation is quite consistent with the position occupied by a poet in those early times, as the teacher and prime mover both in knowledge and in virtue; a position attested by abundant evidence, and recognised by the very phrase which is several times used to describe those early poets, σοφὸς ποιητής. It is remarkable that the power of the poet to teach political wisdom, and to appease civil discord, is not only recognised in the traditions about the early history of Greece, from the legends respecting Orpheus downwards, but also that, in the semi-historical period now under consideration, and with specific reference to the Lacedaemonian state, we are told of civil tumults being appeased, not only by Tyrtaeus, but also by Tperander and Thaletas, who, according to the received chronology, were his contemporaries (Terpander; Thales). The nature of these dissenions it is the province of the political historian to investigate; the form which the tradition assumes in the case of Tyrtaeus is the following. Among the calamities, which the revolt of the Messenians brought upon the Spartan state, and which, according to the common story, Tyrtaeus was the divinely-appointed minister to remedy, not the least was the discontent of those citizens, who, having possessed lands in Messenia, or on the borders, had either been expelled from their estates, or had been forced to leave them uncultivated for fear of the enemy, and, being thus deprived of their means of subsistence, demanded compensation by a new division of landed property. To convince these sufferers of their error in disturbing public order, Tyrtaeus composed his elegy entitled "Legal Order" (Εὐβουλία), which Suidas calls also Παλαιοτέia. (Aristot. Politi. v. 7. § 1; Paus. iv. 18. § 2.) Of this work Müller gives the following excellent description:—"It is not difficult, on considering attentively the character of the early Greek elegy, to form an idea of the manner in which Tyrtaeus probably handled this subject. He

+ How was it, then (one may ask), that they were so "very ready to appropriate" Tyrtaeus and the invention together?
TYRTAEUS.

doubtless began with remarking the anarchical movement among the Spartan citizens, and by expressing the concern with which he viewed it. But, as in general the elegy seeks to pass from an excited state of the mind through sentiments and images of a miscellaneous description to a state of calmness and tranquillity, it may be conjectured that the poet in the Eunomia made this transition by drawing a picture of the well-regulated constitution of Sparta, and the legal existence of its citizens, which, founded with the divine assistance, ought not to be destroyed by the threatened innovations; and that at the same time he reminded the Spartans, who had been deprived of their lands by the Messenian war, that on their courage would depend the recovery of their possessions, and the restoration of the former prosperity of the state. This view is entirely confirmed by the fragments of Tyrtaeus, some of which are distinctly stated to belong to the Eunomia. In these the constitution of Sparta is extolled, as being founded by the power of the gods; Zeus himself having given the country to the Heraclids, and the power having been distributed in the justest manner, according to the oracles of the Pythian Apollo, among the kings, the gerons in the council, and the men of the commonalty in the popular assembly." (Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 111.)

But Tyrtaeus is still more celebrated for the compositions by which he animated the courage of the Spartans in their conflict with the Messenians, "Tyrtaeusque mares animos in Martia bella Versibus exauit." (Hornt. Ars Poëtic. 402.)

The poems were of two kinds; namely, elegies, containing exhortations to constancy and courage, and descriptions of the glory of fighting bravely for one's native land; and more spirited compositions, in the anapaestic measure, which were intended as marching songs, to be performed with the music of the flute. The former are called υοσθέσια, ουροσθέσιας δι᾿ ελεγείας, or ελεγεία simply; the latter ἢτα ἀνάστασα, μέλα πολεμισθήρ, ἐμαθηρία, ἐνόπλικα, or προπρεστικα. Both classes of compositions, we are told, he used to recite or sing to the rulers of the state in private, and to bodies of the citizens, just as he might happen to collect them around him, in order to stimulate them to the prosecution of the war (Paus. iv. 15); and with the same songs he animated their spirits on the march and on the battle field. He lived to see the success of his efforts in the entire conquest of the Messenians, and their reduction to the condition of Helots. (Paus. iv. 14. 3.)

It thus appears that the period when Tyrtaeus flourished was precisely coincident with the time of the second Messenian War; for the history of which, indeed, his poems appear to have been the only trustworthy authority that the ancients possessed, although it is very doubtful how far the later writers on the subject, such as Myron and Rhianus, adhered to the information they obtained from that source. (See Grote, Hist. of Greece, Pl. ii. c. 7, vol. ii. pp. 556, foll.) The time of the war, according to Pausanias (iv. 15. § 1) was B.C. 685—668; but Mr. Clinton and Mr. Grote agree in the opinion that this date is too high. (Clinton, P. H. s. a. 685; Grote, L. c. p. 558.) Suicides places Tyrtaeus at the 35th Olympiad, and also indicates his time by saying that he was contemporary with the so-called Seven Wise Men, and also older. As all events, he lived during the period of that great development of music and poetry, which took place at Sparta during the seventh century, b. c., although we have no distinct account of his relation to the other musicians and poets whose efforts contributed to that development. The absence of any statement of a connection between him and Terpander or Thalætas is easily explained by the fact that he was not, properly speaking, a lyric poet. Besides his anapaestic war-songs, his compositions, so far as we are informed, were all elegiac, and his music was that of the flute. He is expressly called by Suidas ἔλεγεωστοι καὶ ἀληθης.

The estimation in which Tyrtaeus was held at Sparta, as long as the state preserved her independence, was of the highest order. Even in his own time, his poems were used in the instruction of the young, as we learn from the orator Lycurgus (l. c.), who goes on to say that the Lacedaemonians, though they made no account of the other poets, set such value upon this one, that, when they were engaged in a military expedition, it was their practice to summon all the soldiers to the king's tent, that they might hear the poems of Tyrtaeus. Atheneus also (xiv. p. 630, f.) tells us that, in time of war, the Lacedaemonians regulated their evolutions by performing the poems of Tyrtaeus (πα ῶερταλων ποιηματα ἀπομυνενον τε ἔρουμαν κηρυν ποιητης), and that they had the custom in their camps, that, when they had supped and sung the paean, they sang, each in his turn, the poems of Tyrtaeus. Polliux (iv. 107) ascribes to Tyrtaeus the establishment of the triple choruses, of boys, men, and old men. The influence of his poetry on the minds of the Spartan youth is also indicated by the saying ascribed to Leonidas, who, being asked what sort of a poet Tyrtaeus appeared to him, replied, "A good one to tickle the minds of the young." (Plut. CLEOM. 2.)

The extant fragments of Tyrtaeus are contained in most of the older and more recent collections of the Greek poets, and, among the rest, in Gaisford's Poëtae Minores Graeci, Schneiderin's Delectus Poëticorum Graecorum, and BERGK'S Poëtae Lyrici Graeci. The best separate editions are those of KLOTZ, BREMNE, 1764, 8vo., reprinted, with a German translation by WEISS, ALTEN, 1767, 8vo. ; of FRANKE, in his edition of Callinus, 1816, 8vo. ; of STOCK, with a German translation and historical introduction, Leipzig, 1819, 8vo. ; of DIDOT, with an elegant French translation, a Dissertation on the poet's life, and a modern Greek version by CLONARAS, Paris, 1826, 8vo. ; and of N. Bach, with the remains of the elegiac poets, CALLINUS and ASINUS, Leipzig, 1831. There are also various translations of the fragments into the European languages, a list of which, and of the other editions, will be found in Hoffmann's Lexicon Bibliographii Cum Scriptoriorum Graecorum. TZEITZES. 1. Joannes (Ὑανναῖος Τζέτζες), a Greek grammarian of Constantinople. The period when he flourished may be gathered from his own statement, that he wrote one hundred years after Michael Pselus (Chit. xi. 719), and from the fact that he dedicated his Homeric Allegories to Irene Augusta, the wife of Manuel Comnenus, who died A.D. 1138. The father of Joannes Tzetzes was Michael Tzetzes. His mother's name was Eudocia (Chil. v. 611). He was himself named after his paternal grandfather, a native of Byzantium, a man of some wealth, who, though not a learned man, showed great respect for scholars (ib. 615). His maternal grandmother was of a Basque or Iberian family. The earlier part of his life he spent with his brother Isaac at home, where they received various wholesome precepts from their father, urging them to prefer learning to riches, power, and fashion. (Chil. iii. 157, iv. 566, &c.) At the age of fifteen he was placed under the instruction of tutors, who not only carried him through the usual routine of study, but taught him Hebrew and Syriac (comp. Chil. vi. 282). His writings bear evident traces of the extent of his acquirements in literature, science, and philosophy, and not less of the inordinate self-conceit with which they had filled him. He boasts of having the best memory of any living man. (Chil. i. 275, 545.) He styles himself a second Cato or Palamedes (iii. 160); and says that he knows whole books off by heart (x. 681, comp. vi. 497, 475, viii. 182, ix. 752, x. 340, 364, xii. 13, 118, καὶ δῶ πάλιν ἐτέρα ἑξῆς τις μαθημάτων, εἰ ἄλλο στήθος αὐθαίρετο ἄγετο πειρατήδω). Another subject on which he glorifies himself is the rapidity with which he could write, comparing it to the speed of lightning (xii. 119, vii. 269, 526, καὶ νῦν τὰ δύστατα τῆς Ἐπετηθίας ἀναφέρω). He talks of Tzetzes ἄρα ἁρακασ, as models of investigation, ἐν ἀληθῶ ἡ ἁθεία ἐκ χῶν ἀναφέρει (xii. 75, 126). It is not much to be wondered at that others had so exalted an opinion of him as he had of himself (xii. 97). The neglect of his fellow-countrymen even excites in him the fear that Constantinople would be given up to the barbarians, and become itself barbarous (xii. 993, &c.). He complains with bitterness that the princes and great men of his age did not appreciate his merits, but left him to get a livelihood by transcribing and selling his writings, of which they nevertheless expected copies to be sent them gratis (v. 941, comp. ix. 369). He speaks of Irene Augusta as the only person of high station from whom he had received any thing (xi. 48), and even in this instance he complains that the sums promised him for his Homeric Allegories were kept back by those who should have paid him (ix. 282, &c.). Further biographical particulars have not come down to us.

A large part of the voluminous writings of Tzetzes is still extant. The following have been published. 1. Ἱλακά. This consists properly of three poems, collected in one under the titles Τὰ πρὸ Ὀμηροῦ, τὰ Ὀμηροῦ, καὶ τὰ μὲν Ἄρρηνον. The first contains the whole Iliac cyclus, from the birth of Paris to the tenth year of the siege, when the Iliad begins. The second consists of an abridgment of the Iliad. The third, like the work of Quintus Smyrnaeus, is devoted to the occurrences which took place between the death of Hector and the return of the Greeks. The whole amounts to 1676 lines, and is written in hexameter metre. It is a very dull composition, all the merits that are to be found in which should be ascribed to the earlier poets from whom Tzetzes derived his materials. Our knowledge of this composition is of comparatively recent date. A fragment of one hundred and forty-eight lines, from the Antehomeric, was published by F. Morel, under the title Illeucum carmen Postae Graeci eunys nomen ignotum. A fragment of twenty lines from the Posthomerica was published by Dodwell in his Dissertationes de veteribus Graecis et Romanis Cyvelis, p. 502. In 1770 G. B. von Schirach published from a manuscript formerly at Augsburg, now at Munich, the whole of the Antehomeric, with the exception of about one hundred and seventy lines, a portion of the Homeric, and the fragment of the Posthomerica which had been published by Dodwell. The missing portion of the Antehomeric, together with the whole of the Posthomerica, was found in a manuscript at Vienna by T. C. Tychsen, who sent a copy of it to F. Jacobs. A copy of a manuscript of the Homeric was obtained from England, and a complete edition of the three poems was published by Jacobs in 1793, with a commentary. A more correct edition is that of Immanuel Bekker (Berlin, 1816). 2. Another extensive work of Tzetzes is that known by the name of Chiliaides, consisting in its present form of 12,061 lines. The name Chiliaides was given to it by the first editor, Nic. Gerbelius, who divided it, without reference to the contents, into thirteen divisions of 1000 lines, the last being incomplete. Tzetzes himself called it ἔπος ἀτόρχω, and divided it into three πίνακες, as he termed them; the first of which contains one hundred and forty-one narrations, and ends at Chil. iv. l. 495. Hereupon follows an epistle to one Joannes Lachanes, in which the contents of the first table are repeated and accompanied with moral observations. The second πίναξ extends from Chil. iv. l. 781 to Chil. v. 192, and contains twenty-three narratives. The third contains four hundred and ninety-six stories. It consists of six hundred and sixty chapters or divisions, scattered into three masses. Its subject-matter is of the most miscellaneous kind, but embraces chiefly mythological and historical narratives, arranged under separate titles, and without any further connection. The following are a few of them, as they occur: Croesus, Midas, Gyges, Codrus, Alcmnon, the sons of Boreas, Euphorbus, Narcissus, Nileus, Hyacinthus, Orpheus, Amphin, the Sirens, Maresyas, Terpander, Arion, the golden lamb of Ateius, the bull of Minos, the dog of Cephalus, Megacles, Cimon, Aristopatra, the victories of Simonides, Sischeclus, Tyrranous, Hannibal, Ducephalus, the clothes of the Sibyrite Antisthenes, Xenex, Cleopatra, the Phæs at Alexander, Trajanus and his bridge over the Danube, Archimedes, Hercules, &c.

It is an uncritical gossiping book, written in bad Greek in that abominable make-believe of a metre, called political verse (ἡμαζουμένους στίχους, Chil. ix. 283), of which the following is a sample:— οἰάδε βίως πάντων ἄκρηδως τὰ πάντα σώμα βίβλων ἐν στήθος τα καὶ στόματος οὕτως ἡμετέρως λέγειν, οἰάδε γὰρ μημονεστρώτον τῆς Τιτέρθεως ἡδείς ἁλῶν Πανοράς τῶν πρῶ τα καὶ τῶν κόψων ἔξωθεν ἐν βίο. (Chil. i. 275.)

It is followed by an appendix, in iambics, and some prose epistles. It contains, however, a great deal of curious and valuable information, though, as Heyne has shown, the bulk of it was obtained by Tzetzes at second hand. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. xi. p. 243, &c.) has a list of above 400 writers quoted by Tzetzes in this work. The author ap

Of the unpublished works of Joanna Tzetzes, the most considerable is: 1. The Homeric Allegories (ὑπάθεις του Ὀμήρου ἀλληγορία, or μετάφορά Ὀμήρου), consisting of some 6000 political lines. Tzetzes mentions this work in the Chiliades (v. 7, 776, ix. 282, &c.). Besides this there are, 2. Scholia on the Halleuctes of Oppian. 3. Expositio Ionges, seu Libri de V. Vechius PORTPHRIS, in political verses. 4. An epitome of the rhetoric of Homer, in political verses. 5. Λογομαθία βίβλου (comp. Chil. xi. 361). 6. A collection of 107 letters (see above). 7. A treatise on the Canon of Ptolem. 8. Various short pieces, epigrams, &c. For an account of the manuscripts in which these are found the reader is referred to Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. xi. p. 215, &c., comp. i. 403, &c. vi. 352. (Schiill, Geschichte der Griech. Litteratur, vol. iii. p. 84, &c.; Bernhardy, Grundriiss der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. ii. p. 1070.)

2. ISAAC (Ἰακώβος Χερσηγός), brother of the preceding, is named in the manuscripts as the author of the commentary on the Cassandra of Lykophr. It appears however from passages in his works, that Joanna Tzetzes claimed it as his production (Chil. ix. hist. 298; comp. Schol. ad Lykophr. 83). The same claim is made in a letter of Joanna Tzetzes to the Protonotarius Basilius Achridens, printed in Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vol. i. p. 753, and in Küster's Suidas, v. τ. Ακουφρού. In Chil. viii. hist. 294, Joanna says that some other grammarians attempted to set up a claim to be the author of the commentary, but was speedily detected. This last edition, J. C. Müller, 35 of opinion that Isaac Tzetzes first published a commentary on Lykophr. and that Joanna Tzetzes subsequently published an enlarged and improved edition of it. Of this he finds traces in the manuscripts, some of which contain apparently the older edition of Isaac, others the improved edition of Joanna, the additions exhibiting not only the learning, but the arrogant self-complacency of Joanna. The latter moreover does tell us that his brother Isaac wrote a commentary on Lykophr (Schol. ad Heniod. Proleg. καὶ τα ἐμὸ δε ἀδελφο ἔκπτηταί λας κάλλιστα καὶ φιλοτιμώτατα περὶ τοῦτον ἐν τῇ τοῦ Λυκόφρονος εὔγνησθε; comp. Chil. vii. 486). The commentary is printed in several of the editions of Lykophr, as in that printed at Basel, 1546; in those of Santcr (Basel, 1556), Stephanus (1601), Potter (Oxon. 1657), Owen (Oxon. 1752), Sebastiani (Rome, 1803). The best edition of the commentary, without the text of Lykophr, is that by Müller (Leipzig, 1811).

VABALATHUS. Vopiscus, in his life of Aurelian (c. 30), asserts that Zenobia assumed the purple as regent for her son Balbatus (al. leg. Balbaltus), and not in the name of Herennianus and Timolos, which is the statement of Tregellis Pollio (Trig. Tyrann. xxix.). It is certain that we find no trace of either Herennianus or Timolos on medals, while a few are extant, both Greek and Roman, which exhibit IMP. C. VABALATHUS AUG. OF ATT.OTABAAAOC,CEB, with the effigy and titles of Aurelian on the reverse. But several of these bear words or characters, in addition to those given above, which have proved a source of much embarrassment. Thus, on one we find VABALATHUS. VCRMDDL, abbreviations to which no archaeologist has been able to supply a satisfactory interpretation; on others, ATT. CPICIA, OTABAAAACOC.AOHNOT. or, ACPICIA.OTABAALAAOC.AOHNT. or, ATT.K.OTABAALAAOC.AOHNO.CEB, in which AOHNOT. &c., is supposed to stand for Αὐρωπαβάταυ ὦλος, while Sroias or Srios may be a sort of praenomen. Finally, there is a rare coin displaying on the obverse two laurelled heads, one of a bearded man, the other of a smooth-faced boy, with the legend ATPHIANOC.AOHNOΔΑΡΟC. It would be tedious and unprofitable to enumerate the various theories proposed to solve the problems suggested by these pieces. The only conclusion we can safely form is, that Sroias, Valbalatus, and Athenodorus were princes of Palmyra, connected with Odenathus and Zenobia, but in what relation they stood to them and to each other, has never been determined.

VACCA, ELAMTI/NIUS, a Roman sculptor, of whom all that is known is contained in the following inscription: D. O. M. FLAMINIO VABALATI SCULPORI ROMANO QUI IN OPERIBUS QUAE PECTIT NUNQUAM SIBI SATISPECIT. (Montfaucon, Dier. Ital. p. 105; Welcker, Rhein. Mus. 1842, vol. vi. p. 333.)

VACCA. 1291
VACCUS, M. VITRUVIUS, a citizen of Fundi, was the leader of the revolt of the Fundani and Privernates against Rome in B.C. 330. He was a man of considerable reputation both in his own state and also at Rome, where he had a house on the Palatine. The consul L. Plautius Venno was sent to quell the revolt, which he effected without difficulty. On the capture of Privernum, Vaccus fell into the consul's hands, and was put to death after his triumph. His property was confiscated to the state, his house on the Palatine destroyed, and the site on which it stood was over called the Vaccus Prata. (Liv. viii. 19, 20; Cic. pro Dom. 38.)

VACUNA, a Sabine divinity identical with Victoria. She had an ancient sanctuary near Horace's villa at Tibur, and another at Rome. The Romans however derived the name from Vacus, and said that she was a divinity to whom the country people offered sacrifices when the labours of the field were over, that is, when they were at leisure, vacui. (Schol. ad Horat. Epist. i. 10. 49; Ov. Fast. vi. 307; Plin. H. N. iii. 17.) From the Schol. on Horace, we also learn that some identified her with Diana, Ceres, Venus, or Minerva. [L. S.]

VALA, NUMONIUS. 1. C. NUMONIUS VALA, known only from coins, from which it appears that he had obtained renown by storming a vallum, and had hence obtained the surname of Vala, which, according to the usual custom, became hereditary in his family. The coins were struck by one of his descendants in commemoration of the exploit. The one annexed has on the obverse the head of Numonius, with c. NUMONIUS VAALA, and on the reverse a man storming a vallum of a camp, which is defended by two others, with VAALA. Vaala is an ancient form of Vala, just as on the coins of Sulla we find FELIX instead of Felis. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 263.)

COIN OF C. NUMONIUS VAALA.

2. NUMONIUS VAALA, to whom Horace addresses one of his Epistles (I.15), appears to have had estates in the neighbourhood of Velia and Salesurn, since the poet makes inquiries of Vala about the climate of those places, as he intended to pass the winter in one of them. As this poem was probably written about B.C. 22, the friend of Horace was most likely the father of No. 3, if not the same person.

3. NUMONIUS VAALA, legate of Quintilius Varus in A.D. 9, left the infantry when they were attacked by the enemy in the fatal battle of that year, and fled with the cavalry to the Rhine, but was overtaken in his flight and slain. (Vell. Pat. ii. 119.)

VALENS, one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see Aurelius], was nominated proconsul of Achaea by Gallienus in consequence of his high character as a soldier, and a statesman. The usurper Macrianus [Macrianus] fearing him as a rival, and hating him as a private foe, despatched an emissary [Piso, No. 33], to put him to death. Valens, upon receiving intelligence of this design, conceived that he might best avoid the threatened danger by assuming the purple. Accordingly he was proclaimed emperor, and was soon after murdered by his soldiers. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xviii.)

VALENS, the maternal granduncle or uncle of the preceding, rebelled in Illyria during the reign of Gallienus, and perished after having held sway for a few days. He, as well as his nephew, is pressed into the list of the thirty tyrants by Pollio. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. xix.)

VALENS, emperor of the East A.D. 364–378, the brother of Valentinian [Valentinianus I.], was born about A.D. 328. The name of his wife was Albia Dominia, by whom he had a son and two daughters. Under Julian he was one of the Domestici. He was made emperor of the East by his brother on the 28th of March A.D. 364, as is told in the article VALENTINIANUS.

Valens had in his service the Prefect Sallustius, and the generals Lupinus, Victor, and Arintheus. By a constitution of the 16th of December of this year, he forbade the practice of giving presents to those who carried to the provinces important news, such as the accession of an emperor or his assumption of the consulship: he allowed the carriers of such news to receive the presents which persons of property or condition might choose to give, but not to exact anything from those who were not in easy circumstances. The Goths are spoken of as having made their appearance in Thrace in this year, but probably in the following. Valens left Constantinople in the spring of A.D. 365, for Asia Minor, and he was at Csesarea in Cappadocia in the month of July, when the great earthquake happened, which shook all the country round the Mediterranean. The revolt of Procopius for a time rendered the throne of Valens insecure. Procopius assumed the imperial title at Constantinople, on the 28th of September, A.D. 365, and Valens received the intelligence as he was going to leave Csesarea. [PROCOPIUS.] After the death of Procopius, A.D. 366, Valens treated the partisans of the rebel with great clemency according to Themistius; but Ammianus and Zosimus say that he punished many innocent persons. The fact of some persons being punished is certain: the nature and degree of their participation in the revolt may be doubtful. The emperor had sworn to demolish the walls of Chalcedon for the share which it had taken in the insurrection, but at the prayer of the people of Nicaea, Nicomedia, and Constantinople, he satisfied his superition by pulling down some small portion of the walls and rebuilding it. Probably about this time he did Constantinople the service of improving the supply of water by building an aqueduct.

The year A.D. 367 is memorable in the reign of Valens for an extraordinary event, the diminution of the taxes by one fourth, a measure which rarely happens in the history of a nation, the general rule being progressive taxation till people can pay no more. The diminution was the less expected as a war with the Goths was imminent. These barbarians had for some time hung on the northern frontier, and occasionally pillaged the Roman lands. Three thousand Goths, who had been sent by Athanaric to aid Procopius, were compelled to surrender after the death of the rebel, and were distributed in the towns along the Danube and kept under surveillance. The Gothic king, Ermenric, demanded these Goths back, but Valens refused them, and resolved on war, as he had nothing else to do.

Before undertaking the war, for which he made great preparation, Valens received the rite of baptism from Eudoxus, the chief of the Arians who was then seated in the chair of Constantinople. Thus, says Tillemont, "he began by an act which involved him in a thousand mishaps, and finally precipitated his body and his soul to death." The emperor posted his troops on the Danube, and fixed his camp at Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Maesia. He was ably assisted by Auxonius, who was made Praefectus Praetorio in place of Sallustius, who was relieved of his office on account of his age. Valens crossed the Danube, and finding no resistance, ravaged the country of the enemy. He was again at Marcianopolis in January A. D. 368, where he appears to have passed the winter. An incursion of the Isaurians, who extended their ravages to Cilicia and Pamphylia, and cut to pieces Musonius, the Vicarius of Asia, and his troops, may perhaps be referred to this year.

The military events of the year A. D. 368 were unimportant. Valens was unable to cross the Danube, and he passed the winter again at Marcianopolis. On the 10th of October, the city of Nicaea was destroyed by an earthquake. On the 3d of May, A. D. 369, Valens left Marcianopolis for Noviodunum, where he crossed the Danube and entered the country of the Goths. The Goths sustained considerable loss; and Valens also defeated Athanaric, who opposed him with a numerous army. He returned to Marcianopolis, intending to pass another winter there, but the Goths sued for peace, which was granted on the condition that they should not cross the Danube, and should only be allowed to trade at two towns on the river. The treaty between Valens and Athanaric was concluded on vessels in the Danube, for Athanaric refused to set his foot on the Roman territory. At the end of this year, Valens was at Constantinople.

The year A. D. 370 is memorable for the cruel punishment of eighty ecclesiastics. The Arians were persecuted by the Catholics at Constantinople, and the Catholics sent a deputation of eighty ecclesiastics to Valens, who was then at Nicomedia. It is said that Valens ordered them to be put to death, and that his order was executed by Modestus, Praefectus Praetorio, by placing them in a vessel on the sea, and setting fire to it. "This inhumanity," observes Tillemont, "was punished by a famine which desolated Phrygia and the neighbouring country;" but the pious historian does not explain how the sufferings of the innocent are to be considered as a punishment on the guilty.

Valens spent the early part of A. D. 371 at Constantinople, whence he moved to Caesarea in Cappadocia, where he probably spent the winter. About this time he lost his only son. When the youth was taken ill, the emperor, who had entertained a design of banishing Basilus, bishop of Caesarea, applied to him for his help, and the bishop promised that the boy should recover, if the emperor would allow him to be baptized by Catholic priests; "but Valens caused him to be baptized by Arians, and the child immediately died." It was about this time also that Valens divided Cappadocia into two provinces, and made Tyana the capital of the second.

In A. D. 372 modestus, the Praefect, and Arintheus were consuls. Arintheus, who was a man of extraordinary stature, and of perfect form, of great courage and superior military skill, had been employed both by Julian and Jovian, and he had served Valens well in the war against Procopius. On the 10th of April, Valens was at Antioch in Syria, whither he had gone to conduct the war against Sapor king of Persia. Sapor had made a treaty with Jovian, in which it seems that Armenia was comprehended. However this may be, Sapor had set his mind on getting possession of Armenia, and about A. D. 369, having prevailed on Arsaces, the Armenian king, to come to an entente, he made him prisoner, put out his eyes, and finally ordered him to be executed. He gave the government of Armenia to Cylax and Artabanus, two natives, and creatures of his. Olympias, the wife of Arsaces, escaped with her son Para and her treasures to a strong place, which Cylax and Artabanus with some Persian troops made an unsuccessful attempt to take; it is said that Cylax and Artabanus were treacherous to their Persian allies.

Para implored the assistance of Valens, who supported him at New Caesarea in Pontus, in a manner suitable to his rank, and he sent Comes Terentius to put him in possession of Armenia, but without conferring on him the insignia of royalty, which, it was supposed, might be taken as an infraction of the treaty with the Persians. On hearing of this Sapor sent troops into Armenia, who drove Para into the mountains. Sapor, not being able to seize Para, made a show of reconciliation and Para of submission, one of the tokens of which was the heads of Cylax and Artabanus, for which Sapor had asked, on the ground that they were rather the masters than the servants of Para. Valens upon this sent Arintheus into Armenia, who checked the approach of the Persian troops. Sapor complained, but Valens paid no attention to his complaints. The Persian king threatened an attack, but nothing was done this year, though Valens appears to have advanced into Mesopotamia.

In the following year A. D. 373, the Roman and the Persian armies met; the Romans, commanded by Comes Trajanus and Vadomarus, formerly a king of the Allemanni. (Ann. Marc. xxix. 1.) Mesopotamia was apparently the seat of the war. Sapor was defeated, and retired to Ctesiphon after a truce was agreed on. Valens spent the winter at Antioch.

During this winter there was a conspiracy to assassinate Valens, to which some persons, said to be pagans, were encouraged by believing that some person whose name began with Theod, was destined to succeed Valens. This was learned by the application of certain magical arts, and the person pointed out as the successor of the emperor was Theodorus, one of the notaries or secretaries of the court; this affair is recorded by Procopius (Bell. Pers. iv. 11). Theodorus and many other persons were put to death, some innocent and others guilty, for the existence of a plot appears probable enough. Sozomen says that all persons of rank who bore a name beginning with Theod were put to death, which is not credible. He also assigns this as the cause of the death of Theodosios or Theodosius, a grandee of Spain, and it seems that he must mean Theodosius, the father of the emperor Theodosius, who was executed at Carthage, A.D. 376. However, many persons were executed who had dealt in magic; Maximus, once the teacher of the emperor Julian, Simonides, Hilarius and others. Books of magic were diligently sought after, and all that could be found were burnt. Chrysostom, then a young man, who by chance found a book of magic, expected and feared to share the fate of those who had dealt in this wicked art.

The same year in which Gabinius in the West fell a victim to Roman treachery (A.D. 374), Para perished by the same shameful means. Para, it appears, was established on the throne of Armenia, but Valens was for some reason dissatisfied with him, and sent for him to Tarsus under some pretext, leaving him to wait there, until Para, suspecting that it was a mere pretext, made his escape to Armenia. Valens commissioned Comes Trajanus, the commander of the Roman forces in Armenia, to put him to death, and Trajanus executed the order by inviting Para to a banquet and assassinating him.

Negotiations for peace were still going on with Sapor (A.D. 375), but they resulted in nothing. The emperor spent this year at Antioch, taking little care of the administration, and allowing his ministers to enrich themselves by unjust means. Ammianus (xxx. 4) has a chapter on these matters. The pretext for these odious inquisitions was the vague charge of treason against the emperor.

The events of A.D. 376 were unimportant. Valens was consul for the fifth time with Valentinianus, junior, who with his elder brother Gratianus had succeeded their father Valentinianus I., who died at the close of A.D. 375. Valens was preparing for war against the Persians, and he assembled a great force, but there is no record of what was the result of all this preparation. Sapor made conquests in Iberia and Armenia, which Valens could not prevent. Valens sent Victor to Persia to come to terms with the Persian king, and peace was made on terms, as it appears, not advantageous to the Romans.

At this time the Romans became acquainted with the name of the Huns. The Huns, after attacking various tribes and the Alans, who inhabited the banks of the Tanais, fell upon the Goths called Greuthingi or Eastern Goths, and so alarmed them that Ermenric, their king, killed himself. Vithimir, his successor, fell in battle against the Huns, and Attheus and Saphrax, the guardians of his son Vitheric, retreated before this formidable enemy, to the country between the Borysathens and the Danube. Athanaric and his Goths attempted a useless resistance to the Huns on the banks of the Dniester. The Goths, and among them were some of the people of Athanaric, to the number of about 200,000, appeared on the banks of the Danube and asked for permission to enter the Roman territories. Valens was then at Antioch, and the Goths sent a deputation to him at the head of which was their bishop Ulphilas. Valens granted the request of the Goths, but ordered that their children should be carried over to Asia as hostages, and that the Goths should not bring their arms with them; but the last part of the order was imperfectly executed. Accordingly the Goths were received into Thrace and spread over the country on the borders of the Danube. Their chiefs were Alavif and Fritigern.

Valens was still at Antioch (A.D. 377). It was the policy of the Romans to draw away the Goths from the immediate banks of the Danube, who had not moved off, because they were not supplied with provisions, as the emperor had ordered. Lupicinus, Comes of Thrace and Maximus, who held the rank of Dux, are accused of irritating the barbarians by their treatment, and of driving them to arms. Lupicinus attempted to make the Goths leave the Danube, and employed for that purpose the soldiers who were stationed on the river; but as soon as the Greuthingi, under Saphrax and Attheus, saw the banks unprotected, they crossed over, having previously been refused permission. The Greuthingi joined Fritigern and his Goths at Marcinopolis. Lupicinus invited Alavif and Fritigern to a feast, but instead of a reconciliation, this brought a tract called “Ravenna and Pannonia” in which Lupicinus was defeated. Some Goths, who were already encamped near Hadrianople, were ordered to cross the Hellespont, but they asked for two days’ delay and supplies for the journey. The chief magistrate of the city, being irritated at some damage done by the Goths to a country-house of his, attacked them, and had the worst in the combat. These Goths soon joined Fritigern, who had advanced as far as Hadrianople, and they besieged the city. They could not take Hadrianople, but they were masters of all the country, which they pillaged.

Valens was at Antioch when he heard this news, and he sent forward Profuturus and Trajanus with the legions from Armenia to bring the Goths to obedience. These two generals were joined by Ricimer, who brought some help from Gratian. The Romans found the main body of the Goths at a place called Salices or the Willows, supposed to be in its aspect called Saxi and Peristatis in the lower course of the Danube and the sea, where a great battle was fought, apparently with no advantage to the Romans, for they returned to Marcinopolis. The further operations of this campaign led to no decisive result, and there was loss on both sides. The Goths appear to have spread themselves all over the country between the Danube and the Archipelago, and to have advanced even to the suburbs of Constantinople. Valens reached Constantinople on the 36th of May, A.D. 378. He deprived Trajanus of the command of the infantry, which he gave to Sebastianus, to whom he entrusted the conduct of the war. “It was,” says Tillemont, “worthy of an Arian emperor to entrust his troops to a Manichaean. It was he who with the emperor determined on the unfortunate battle where they perished, against the advice of the most prudent, and principally Victor, general of the cavalry, a man altogether Catholic.” Valens left Constantinople on the 11th of June, with a small solitary named Isaac, whose cell was near Constantinople, threatened him with the vengeance of God. “Restor,” he said, “to the flocks their holy pastors, and you will gain a victory without trouble: if you fight before you have done it, you will lose your army and you will never return.”

The emperor encamped with a powerful army near Hadrianople. Trajanus, it appears, was restored to his command, or held some command; but the advice of Sebastianus prevailed with the emperor over that of Victor and the other generals, and a battle was resolved on. It was on the 9th of August, A. D. 378, and some few hours from Hadrianople, where the Romans sustained a defeat so bloody, that none can be compared with it in the Annals of Rome except the fight of Cannae. Amianus (xxxii. 13) has given a laboured description of the battle, not particularly clear. The Theurgingi under Fritigern, and the Greuthungi under Alatheus and Saphrax, destroyed two-thirds of the Imperial army. Trajanaus, Sebastianus, Valerianus Comes Stabuli, and Euphrosus, fell. Valens was never seen after the battle. He was wounded by an arrow, and, as some say, died on the field. According to another story, he was carried to a peasant’s house, to which the barbarians set fire without knowing who was in it, and Valens was burnt. Though the mode of his death is not certain, all authorities agree in saying that his body was never found. The commentary of Orosius on the death of Valens is instructive (vii. 33): “The Goths some time before sent ambassadors to Valens to pray that bishops (episcopi) might be sent to them to teach them the rule of Christian faith, Valens, through pestiferous depravity, sent teachers of the Arian dogma. The Goths retained the instruction in their first faith, which they received. Therefore by the just judgment of God the very persons burnt him alive, who through him, even after death, are destined to burn on account of the vice of their error.”

The reign of Valens is important in the history of the empire on account of the admission of the Goths into the countries south of the Danube, the commencement of the decline of the Roman power. The furious contests between the rival creeds of the Catholics and the Arians, and the persecution of the Catholics by Valentinian, also characterize this reign. These religious quarrels, which we might otherwise view with indifference, are not to be overlooked in forming our judgment of this period, nor must we forget them when we attempt to estimate the value of the historians for this period.

The character of Valens is drawn by Gibbon and Tillemont; by Gibbon perhaps with as much impartiality as he could exercise, by Tillemont under the influence of strong religious convictions, with as much fairness as we can expect from one who condemned the persecutions of Valens, both as a man of humanity and a zealous Catholic.

The chronicle of Hieronymus terminates with the death of Valens, and here also ends the history of Ammianus, the last of the Roman historians. Eutropius, who does not deserve the name of historian, wrote his Breviarium Historiae Romanae in the time of Valens, and by the order of the emperor, to whom his work is dedicated. (Gibbon, cc. 25, 26; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v., where all the authorities are collected.)

in the empire, and whom he put to death a few months afterwards, when he concluded a peace with Constantine, who stipulated positively for the deposition of this puppet Caesar. Eckehl assigns a medal bearing on the obverse the legend IMP. C. AUR. VALENS. P. F. AUG., and on the reverse JOVI CONSERVATORI AUG., to this Valens; but it seems doubtful whether he ever received, formally at least, any higher title than that of Caesar. [Compare Martinianus.] (Excerpta Vales. 17, 18; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 40; Zosim. ii. 19, 20.)

[Nota R.]

VALENS, DONATUS, a centurion in the army of Hordeonius Flaccus in Germany, attempted with some few others to protect the images of Galba, when the rest of the soldiers revolted to Vitellius, but was seized, and shortly afterwards put to death. (Tac. Hist. i. 56, 59.)

VALENS, FAHIR. 1. One of the principal generals of the Emperor Vitellius in A. D. 69. His character is drawn in the blackest colours byTacitus; and among the various profligate commanders in that civil war, Valens seems to have been the most notorious for his avarice, venality, and cruelty. He was of an equestrian family, and was born at Anagnia, a town of Latium. He entered freely into the debaucheries of Nero’s court, and at the festival of the Juvenalia, in which the most distinguished persons of the state were obliged to take a part (see Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Juvenalia, 2d ed.), he was accustomed to act the licentious part of a mime, at first, as if by compulsion, but afterwards evidently from choice. He was subsequently appointed by Nero legatus of the first legion in Germany. In the troubles immediately preceding and following Nero’s death, Valens endeavoured to persuade Verginius Rufus, who governed Upper Germany, to assume the purple; and when Rufus refused to do so, Valens sought to blacken his character, and accused him to Galba, of attempting to make himself emperor. Soon after Galba’s accession, Valens, in conjunction with the legate of another legion, Cornelius Aquinus, put to death Fonteius Capito, the governor of Lower Germany, on the plea that he was intending to revolt, but, as many thought, because he had refused to take up arms at the solicitation of Valens and Aquinus. However this may be, Valens claimed great merit with Galba for the services he had rendered him in exposing the plots of Verginius Rufus, and destroying Fonteius Capito, who might have been a dangerous rival; and upon receiving no reward, he complained bitterly that he had been treated with ingratitude. Accordingly, upon the arrival of Vitellius in Lower Germany as the successor of Capito, Valens was one of the first to urge him to seize the empire, and at that time he was very successful in uniting him with his former commanders. The legions in Upper Germany refused to take the oath of allegiance to Galba on the 1st of January, A. D. 69. Valens thereupon marched into Cologne on the following day, and saluted Vitellius as emperor. His example was immediately followed by the soldiers in Lower Germany, and on the next day by those of Upper Germany, and active preparations were made to prosecute the war against Galba. Vitellius entrusted the conduct of it to Valens and A. Caecina, the latter of whom had commanded a legion in Upper Germany, and had been one of the chief leaders of the revolt in favour of Vitellius.

Valens was entrusted with 40,000 men belonging to the army of Lower Germany, with orders to march through Gaul, and persuade it to submit to Vitellius, or, if he could not succeed in so doing, to lay it waste with fire and sword, and finally to cross over into Italy by Mont Genèvre (Cottionis Alpibus). Caecina received 30,000 men belonging to the army of Upper Germany, with orders to march direct into Italy by the pass of the Great St. Bernard (Poenisus jugis).

Valens commenced his march early in January. His formidable army secured him a friendly reception in Gaul; but upon his arrival at Divijodurum (Maez), his soldiers were seized with a panic terror, and slaughtered 4000 of the inhabitants. This massacre, however, instead of provoking any resistance in Gaul, only made the people still more anxious to deprecate the wrath of the troops. On reaching the capital of the Leci, the modern Toulu, Valens received intelligence of the death of Galba and the accession of Otho; and this news produced the recognition of Vitellius throughout the whole of Gaul, the inhabitants of which de-tested alike both Otho and Vitellius, but were more afraid of the latter. Valens, therefore, continued to advance without any interruption. The inhabitants of Lugdunum (Lyons) persuaded him to march against Vienna (Vienne), which had espoused the cause of Vindex and Galba; but the Viennenses averted the impending danger by throwing themselves before the army as suppliants, and by giving an immense sum of money to Valens, of which the soldiers likewise received a small portion. The avarice of Valens knew no bounds, and he employed the great power which he now possessed, to gratify it in every possible manner. Throughout his march the proprietors of the lands and the magistrates of the cities paid him large sums of money not to march through their property or encamp upon it; and if money failed, they were obliged to appease him by sacrificing their wives and daughters to his lusts. On his arrival in Italy, Valens took up his quarters at Ticinum (Pavia), where he nearly lost his life in an insurrection of the soldiers. He took refuge in the dress of a slave in the tent of one of his officers, who concealed him till the danger was over. Valens afterwards put this man to death on suspicion of his having taken a thousand drachmas from his baggage. (Dion Cass. lxiv. 16; comp. Tac. Hist. ii. 29.) Caecina, who had arrived in Italy before Valens, had meantime been defeated by the generals of Vitellius in the neighbourhood of Cremona; and although Valens and Caecina disliked each other, and it was thought that the latter had been defeated, because Valens had purposely not made sufficient haste to join him, yet their mutual interests inclined them to unite, and to act in harmony against the common enemy. Otho’s generals earnestly dissuaded him from risking a battle, but their opinion was overruled by the emperor, who was anxious to bring the war to a close. The result was the battle of Bedricacum, in which Valens and Fabius gained a decisive victory, and thus secured for Vitellius the sovereignty of Italy. [Otho.] The two generals remained in northern Italy for some time after the battle, till they were joined by Vitellius, whom they accompanied to Rome. Vitellius advanced them to the consulsip, which they entered upon on the 1st of September, and he left the whole government in their hands.
Although they were more jealous of one another than ever, they agreed in one point, which was to obtain all the property they could lay their hands on, while their besotted master was indulging in every kind of debauchery. But the approach of Antonius Prinus, who had espoused the cause of Vespasian, and was marching into Italy at the head of the Pannonian and Moesian legions, compelled Caecina and Valens to the same vigil for war. As Valens was at the time only just beginning to recover from a severe illness, he was obliged to remain at Rome, while his colleague marched against Prinus. The treachery of Caecina, who deserted Vitellius and joined Prinus, has been related elsewhere. [CAECINA.] Valens remained faithful to Vitellius, almost the only fact recorded in his favour. He had left Rome a few days after Caecina, and might perhaps have prevented the revolt of the latter, if the indulgence of his pleasures had not delayed him on the march. He was still in Tuscany when he heard of the victory of Prinus and the capture of Cremona [PRIMUS], and as he had not sufficient troops to oppose the enemy, he resolved to sail to Gaul androuse the Gallic provinces to espouse the cause of Vitellius: but he was taken prisoner by some ships sent after him by Suetonius Paulinus at the island of the Stoechadai (the Hières off Mâssilia.) He was kept in confinement for a time, but about the middle of September was slain at Urbium (Urbino) and his head shown to the Vitellian troops, to contradict the report that he had escaped to Germany and was there collecting an army. 2. A friend of the younger Pliny, who addressed a letter to him (Ep. iv. 24), from which we gather that he was a young man at the time.

VALENS, MA'NLIUS, legatus of a legion in Britain in the reign of Claudius, a. d. 50. He is afterwards mentioned as the legatus of the Italic legion in the civil wars in a. d. 69, and is probably the same as the C. Maullius Valens, who was consul with C. Antistius Vetus in the last year of Domitian's reign, and who died in the same year in the ninetieth year of his age. [Tac. Ann. xii. 40, Hist. i. 64; Dion Cass. lviii. 14.]

VALENS, PINA'RIUS, was named praefect of the praetorians upon the elevation of Maximus and Balbinus. He was paternal uncle of the former. (Capitolin. Max. et Balb. 4, 5). [W. R.]

VALENS, VII'NNIUS, a centurion in the praetorium of Augustus, memorable for his extraordinary strength. (Plin. H. N. vi. 19. s. 20.)

VALENTINIA'NIUS L., Roman emperor a. d. 364—375, was the son of Gratusian, and was born a. d. 321, at Cibalis in Pannonia. [GRA-TI-ANS.] He bore also the name of Flavius, which was common to all the emperors after Constantine. His first wife was Valeria Severa, by whom he bore and reared the future emperor Gratianus. Valentinian entered the army when young, and showed military talents; but the emperor Constantius for some reason or other deprived him of his rank a. d. 357. Under Julian he held the office of tribune of the guard, or of the Scutarii, as Orosius terms the body (vii. 32), and in this capacity he was with Julian at Antioch, a. d. 362, and accompanied him to a heathen temple, Julian, it is said, commanded him to sacrifice to the idol, or resign his office; but Valentinian, who had been baptized in the Christian faith, refused. According to most of the historians, Valentinian was exiled for his adherence to his religion.

Jovian succeeded Julian a. d. 363, and Lucilius, the father-in-law of Valentinian, took him with him to Gaul. Lucilius lost his life in war, and his son, and Valentinian only saved himself by flight. Returning to the East he was rewarded by Jovian with the office of captain of the second company of Scutarii. When Jovian died suddenly at Dadastana, on the borders of Galatia and Bithynia, on the 16th of February, a. d. 364, Valentinian was at Anzarya. For ten days the empire was without an emperor, but it was at last agreed by the officers of the army of Jovian, who were at Nicaea, that Valentinian should be the successor of Jovian. Valentinian came to Nicaea, and on the 26th of February he assumed the imperial insignia in the presence of the army in the plain of Nicaea.

Valentinian maintained the pure Catholic faith, though his brother Valens was an Arian. He forbade, under pain of death, all pagan ceremonies, magical arts and sacrifices by night; but this was a prudent measure of policy, and nothing more. He restored the figure of the image of Jesus Christ on the Labarum or chief standard of the armies, for Julian had removed these Christian symbols. He also renewed and perhaps extended a law of Constantine, which forbade any judicial proceedings, or the execution of any judicial sentence on Sunday. However, Valentinian did not meddle with religious disputes, and either from indifference or good sense, he said it was not for him, a layman, to deal with difficulties of that description. Though a Catholic, he did not persecute either Arians or heathens: he let every man follow his own religion, for which Ammianus Marcellinus (xxx. 9) has commended him; and certainly his moderation in this respect must be considered a remarkable feature in his character. Though there were some enactments made by him against Manichaeans, Donatists and the other heretics, the general religious freedom which he allowed is undisputed (Cod. Theod. tit. 16. a. 9), and the emperor set an example which even now is not completely followed in modern Europe. This is the most unequivocal evidence of the good sense and the courage of Valentinian. Ecclesiastical writers, like Baronius, as a matter of course blame that toleration which they suppose to be condemned by the religion which they profess.

Ammianus and other writers have spoken particularly of the personal merits and defects of Valentinian. He was robust and handsome; he had a natural eloquence, though he had no literary acquirements; he was neat in his apparel, but not expensive; and his chastity is specially recorded. He possessed good abilities, prudence, and vigor of character. He had a capacity for military matters, and was a vigilant, impartial, and laborious administrator. Ammianus sums up by saying that he had so many good qualities that, if every thing had been equal in him, he would have been as great a man as Trajan or Marcus Aurelius. Among his faults was that of having a very good opinion of himself, and he punished sometimes with excessive severity. Yet he is accused of behaving with too much lenity.
to the officers when they misconducted themselves; and of currying himself by arbitrary means, though the same authorities say that he endeavoured to alleviate the sufferings of the people. The truth is that the character of a man, who possesses supreme power, may be made to appear almost anything, according to a writer’s temper and judgment. Many instances of the severity, and even of the cruelty of Valentinian are recorded; and Gibbon, following chiefly the authority of Ammianus, has made him a monster of cruelty. Yet Valentinian had feelings of compassion, when he was not in an angry mood, and he promulgated a constitution against the exposure of children (Cod. Just. 8. tit. 51. (52.) s. 2. A. D. 374.) and he encouraged learning, though he was illiterate, by the foundation of schools. (Cod. Theod. 14. tit. 9.)

Valentinian, after being declared emperor on the 26th of February, moved to Nicomedia on the 1st of March, where he conferred on his brother Valens the dignity of Constable, that is, he made him chief of the stable; and on the 26th of March, being then at Constantinople, he declared him Augustus in the Hebdomon, or field of Mars, in the neighbourhood of that city. The two brothers confirmed to the town of Nicæa, when Valentinian was declared emperor, the title of Metropolis, and raised it to equal rank with Nicomedia. In the early part of this year the two Augusti, Constantine, and Valentinian, proceeded through Hadrianople, Philippopolis, and Sardica, to Naesus in Dacia, in the neighbourhood of which they remained some days to arrange the affairs of the empire. Valentinian kept Jovinus general of the troops in Gaul (magister armorum), to which rank he had been promoted by Julian, and Dagalaephus (millitine rector), who owed his promotion to Jovian. Victor and Arinthaenae were attached to the service of Valens. Zosimus, indeed, states (iv. 2) that the two emperors were hostile to all the friends of Julian, and that all those who had been promoted by Julian were deprived of their offices, except Arinthaenae and Victor; but Zosimus may be mistaken here, as in other cases. The provinces of the empire were also distributed between the two brothers. Valens had the East, comprising Asia, Egypt, and Thrace; Valentinian had the West, comprising Illyricum, Italy, the Gauls, Britain, Spain, and Africa. After this Valens set out for Constantinople to govern the East, of which he knew not even the language, and Valentinian for Italy.

Valentinian went to Milan, where he arrived some time in November, and he stayed there till the beginning of A. D. 365.

Volusianus, prefect of Rome, was succeeded in this year by Symmachus, the father of the orator, to whom some constitutions of Valentinian are addressed, by which the emperor endeavoured to secure the provisioning of Rome, and provided for the repair of the buildings. A constitution of this year enacted that the governors of provinces must not sit in judgment in matters civil or criminal, in private, but that judicial proceedings must be held with open doors.

The nations on the Roman frontiers were disturbing the provinces, and the vigilance of Valentinian was required to protect his empire. Romanus, who had been made comes of Africa under Jovian (A. D. 363), instead of protecting the country, which he was sent to govern, plundered the people worse than the border tribes. On the accession of Valentinian, the people of Leptis sent their presents to the new emperor, and at the same time represented to him the wretched condition of their country. In the mean time, a barbarous tribe, called Austeriani, were threatening Leptis and plundering the country, and Valentinian sent Palladius to inquire into the state of affairs in the province of Africa. But Palladius was interrupted by Romanus, who reported that the people of Leptis and the rest of the province had nothing to complain of. The result was, that those who had complained of Romanus were punished (Amm. Marc. xxviii. 6).

It appears from various constitutions, that Valentinian visited several places in North Italy during the year A. D. 365. A constitution of this year appears to be the earliest in which the Defensores are spoken of, and it is addressed to "Seneca Defensor" (Cod. Just. i. tit. 55.) In the month of October Valentinian left Italy for Gaul, and he was at Paris about the end of the month. His presence was required by an irruption of the Alamanni, who had ravaged the country west of the Rhine. Valentinian sent Dagalaephus against them, and he went himself as far as Rheims; but the Alamanni had retired, and Valentinian returned to Paris, where he appears to have remained, and had a temporary residence in the Palace of the Palatine. Before the beginning of A. D. 366 the Alamanni again entered Gaul during a severe winter, defeated the Roman troops and killed Charietto, who was comes of the Two Germanies. Dagalaephus, who was sent against the Alamanni by the emperor, was tardy in his movements, and he was replaced by Jovinus the master of the horse (magister equitum), who defeated the Alamanni in several engagements. One battle was fought at Scarponna between Metz and Toul, and another in the neighbourhood of Châlons-sur-Marne with a body of Alamanni which had penetrated as far as this place. Jovinus announced his victory to the emperor at Paris, who, at the same time received the head of the usurper Procopius, which had been sent to him by his brother Valens. Valentinian appears to have passed the close of the year and the winter at Rheims. At this time he built forts on the Rhine to stop the incursions of the Germans, and he recruited his army for the defence of this frontier. His measures secured tranquillity on that side of the empire during the rest of his reign.

The residence of Valentinian at Rheims to the month of June A. D. 367, is proved by the constitutions which he promulgated. One of the 18th of August is dated from Amiens, and addressed to Prætextatus, præfect of Rome. During this time he was suffering so much from illness that there was talk about his successor; but Valentinian recovered, and, on the 24th of August, his son Gratianus, then little more than eight years of age, was declared Augustus at Amiens in presence of the army. About this time Valentinian divorced his wife Severa or Valeria Severa, and married Justina, a Sicilian woman, by whom he became the father of Valentinian II. and of three daughters, one of whom, Galla, was afterwards the wife of Theodosius II. Justina was an Arian, but she concealed her heresy as long as her husband lived.

At the close of A. D. 367 the Alamanni, under Randon, surprised and pillaged Moguntiacum (Maine) during a festival which the Christians were celebrating. The Romans retaliated by ganging over an Alleman to assassinate his king Vistibuchus, a man who in a feeble body possessed a great spirit, and had caused the Romans no small trouble. While the emperor was on his road from Amiens to Trèves on the Mosel, he heard of the ravages which the Picts and other barbarians were committing in Britain. The conduct of this war was finally entrusted to Theodosius, the father of the first emperor Theodosius. [THEODOSIUS.]

To the year A.D. 368 probably belongs a constitution of Valentinian addressed to Olybrius, then prefect of Rome (Cod. Theod. 2. tit. 10. s. 2; Cod. Just. 2. tit. 6. s. 6), for the regulation of the conduct of advocates, who were forbidden to use abusive language, or to say anything which might injure the reputation of the party to whom they were opposed, unless it was necessary to maintain the case of their client. The constitution contains other regulations. By another constitution he ordered that there should be a physician appointed for each of the fourteen regions of Rome, to look after the health of the poor. In the autumn of this year Valentinian left Trèves for an expedition against the Allemani, whom he drove with great loss from a mountain where they had fortified themselves. This place called Solicinium has been conjectured to be Sulz, near the source of the Necker. The emperor returned with his son to Trèves, which he entered in a kind of triumph.

In A.D. 369 Valentinian was occupied with building forts on the left bank of the Rhine, from its mouth to the country of the Rhenati; and he also constructed some forts on the other side of the river at Manheim, at the junction of the 2 Rhine. He intended to be one of these positions. His residence was chiefly at Trèves during this year, but he made excursions to various places on the Rhine. A story recorded in the Alexandrine Chronicle, and also in Zonaras, of the emperor's severity seems hardly credible. An eunuch named Rhodanus, an attendant on Valentinian, had been convicted before Sallustius of defrauding a widow, and he was ordered to make restitution. Instead of doing this he appealed from the judgment, and the widow was advised to present her petition to Valentinian when he was seated in the Circus. The eunuch was near his master, when the widow presented her petition, and the emperor immediately ordered the eunuch to be seized, to be carried round the Circus while proclamation of his crime was made, and then to be burnt alive in the presence of the spectators.

In A.D. 370 Valentinian was still at Trèves, or near it, as appears from the constitutions promulgated in this year. The Saxons now broke loose on the Roman territory, where they plundered all before them; but they were alarmed by the appearance of Severus, commander of the infantry (peditum magister), who made peace with them on condition of their retiring. But the Romans treacherously laid an ambush, and destroyed the Saxons on their march back, at a place called Deuso, according to Hieronymus, which may be Deutz, opposite to Cologne. Anmianus (xxviii. 5) considered this treachery justifiable under the circumstances. A constitution of this year addressed to Damasus, bishop of Rome (Cod. Theod. 2. tit. 32), was intended to check the greediness of the clergy. It is commented on by Gibbon with his usual relish for scandal against the clergy, against whom, however, we have the evidence of the imperial constitution, and that of Hieronymus. Damasus, the bishop of Rome, was himself a man of dubious character, and the virtuous Prætextatus, a pagan, told him that he would turn Christian himself if he could secure the see of Rome, "a reproach," observes Gibbon, "in the form of a jest."

Anmianus (xxviii. 1) gives an account of the cruelties exercised at Rome by Maximinus, who held the office of the Vicaria Praefectura, against persons who were accused of magical arts. Maximinus put many persons to the torture, and even to death, upon the charge of using magic. Maximinus was punished by Gratian, the successor of Valentinian, for all his misdeeds. Magic, or whatever is meant by the term, was a great abomination in the eyes of Valentinian: he permitted all the arts of the Roman aruspices to be practised, and every other ceremonial of the ancient religion, provided no magic was practised. He even maintained the Pontifices in the provinces in all their privileges, and allowed them the same rank as Comites. This was going even beyond toleration, and further than a wise policy can justify. He relieved from all civil duties such ecclesiastics as devoted all their time to the service of the church, and had entered the clerical body before the commencement of his reign; but as to others, they were liable to discharge all civil duties like any layman. These and other constitutions of the first half of A.D. 371 were promulgated at Trèves, the favourite residence of Valentinian, which he left for a short time to conduct operations against the Germans in the neighbourhood of Mainz. He was again at Trèves in December, and he appears to have passed the year A.D. 372 there or in the neighbourhood. The emperor did nothing this year that is recorded, except to promulgate a constitution against the Manichaens, who were always treated with great severity.

The year A.D. 373 was the fourth joint consulhip of the two Augusti, Valentinian and Valens, and Valentinian spent a great part of this year in Italy. Maximinus was made Praefectus (of Gaul, as Tillemont shows), and this brought about the ruin of Remigius, once Magister Officiorum, who had been a partner of Comes Romanus in his maladministration. Remigius had resigned his office and retired to the pleasant neighbourhood of his native Mainz to cultivate the land. Maximinus, who was somewhere near, which is confirmatory of Tillemont's conjecture that he was in this year prefect of Gaul, put to the torture one Caesarius, who had served under Remigius, in order that he might discover what Remigius had received from Romanus. Remigius, being informed of these proceedings against him, hanged himself (Amm. Marc. xxx, 2). Palladius, who had deceived his master in the affair of Comes Romanus, was also arrested by order of Valentinian; and he too pronounced his own sentence, and executed it by hanging himself. Romanus, the chief criminal, was put in prison by Theodosius, when he was sent against Firmus [Theodosius, and proof was found of his knavery in the affair of Lepita. The historian, however, has not the gratification of finding any evidence of the punishment of Romanus either under the reign of Valentinian or that of his successor.
VALENTINIANUS.

Valentinian passed the winter of A.D. 373 at Milan, but he was again at Trèves in May and June of the following year A.D. 374. He was upon the Rhine, probably in the neighbourhood of Bâle, when he received intelligence of the Quadi invading Illyricum: the cause was this. As the emperor was anxious to protect the frontiers, he ordered some forti res to be built north of the Danube, in the country of the Quadi. The Quadi complained of this encroachment to Equitius, master-general of Illyricum, who consented to suspend the works till the emperor had signified his pleasure. But Marcellinus, the son of Maximinus, was made dux of Valeria, a province of Illyricum, by his father's interest, and he continued the fortifications without troubling himself about the Quadi. The king of the Quadi, Gabinius, came to remonstrate with Marcellinus, who received him civilly and asked him to eat; but as the king was retiring after the entertainment, the Roman treacherously caused him to be assassinated. The emperor crossed the river Sava by the Roman province, which was destitute of troops, and destroyed the grain which was ready for the harvest. Probus, Praefectus Praetorio, though much alarmed, prepared to defend Sirmium; but the barbarians did not disturb him, and preferred running after Equitius to whom they attributed the death of their king. The barbarians destroyed two legions, and the province would have been lost, but for the vigour and courage of a young man, who was afterwards the emperor Theodosius.

Valentinian heard of this incursion of the Quadi at his royal residence of Trèves, but he deferred his campaign against the Quadi to the following year, and in the mean time he employed himself in securing the friendship of Macrianus, king of the Alamanni, with whom he had an interview near Mainz. Macrianus accepted the terms which the Roman emperor came to offer, and became the ally, or at least not the enemy, of the emperor. On this, his last winter at Trèves, which he did not quit till the month of April, A.D. 375, to march towards Illyricum. He took with him his wife Justina and his second son Valentinian. Gratian was left at Trèves.

The emperor fixed his head-quarters at Car- nuntum, which was probably on the Danube, and below the site of Vienna. His first care was to inquire into the conduct of Probus, the praefect, who was charged with oppressing the people; but Valentinian did not live long enough to come to any decision about Probus. After preparing for the campaign the emperor crossed the Danube, but his operations were not very decisive, and at the approach of winter he re-crossed the river, and fixed himself at Bregetio, probably near Presburg. While giving an audience to the deputies of the Quadi, and speaking with great heat, he fell down in a fit and expired suddenly on the 17th of November. After a reign of twelve years, all but a hundred days. His body was embalmed and carried to Constantinople to be interred.

Gibbon's sketch of the reign of Valentinian and Valens (c. 25) has great merit: it is rapid, exact and instructive. Tillemont (Histoire des Empereurs, v.) is painfully minute as usual; but his authorities are always valuable, and his judgment, when not biassed by his peculiar way of thinking, is generally sound. The reign of Valentinian is worth a careful study in its extant legislative enactments. His many great qualities entitle him to a place among the most distinguished of the illustrious Romans.

[GL]

VALENTINIANUS II., Roman emperor A.D. 375—392, a son of Valentinian I., was with his mother Justina, about one hundred miles from the camp of Bregetio, when his father died there, A.D. 375. His brother Gratianus was at Trèves. Valentinian and his mother were sum- moned to Bregetio, when the army proclaimed Valentinian Augustus, six days after his father's death. He was then only four or five years of age; and Gratian was only about seventeen. Gratian assented to the choice of the army, and a division of the West was made between the two brothers. Valentinian had Italy, Illyricum and Africa. Gratian had the Gauls, Spain and Britain. This division, however, if it actually took place, was merely nominal, and Gratian as long as he lived was actually emperor of the West. One reason for supposing that Gratian really retained all the imperial power is the fact, that after the death of Valens, and in A.D. 379, Gratian ceded a part of Illyricum to Theodosius I., whom he declared emperor of the East. This seems to show at least that the division of the empire of the West between Gratian and Valentinian was not completed at the time when Theodosius received a part of Illyricum.

In A.D. 383, Gratian was murdered at Lyon. [GRATIANUS; THEODOSIUS I.] If Milan was the chief residence of Valentinian II. from the time of his father's death, and he was in this city during A.D. 384. He made Symmachus prefect of Rome, probably about the close of A.D. 383. Valentinian was still at Milan in the first half of A.D. 386, and afterwards at Aquileia. His mother Justina, who acted in his name, and was an Arian, employed herself in persecuting the Catholics during this and the following year. In A.D. 386, Valentinian addressed a letter to Sallustius, the prefect of Rome, in which he ordered him to rebuild the church of St. Paul, near Rome, on the road to Ostia. The church was rebuilt, but apparently somewhat later than the time of this order.

Maximus, who had usurped the throne of Gratian, left Valentinian a precarious authority out of fear for Theodosius I.; but in August, A.D. 387, he suddenly crossed the Alps, and advanced towards Milan, the usual residence of Valentinian. The emperor and his mother fled to the Hadriatic, where they took shipping and arrived at Thessalonica. In A.D. 388, Theodosius defeated Maximus, and restored Valentinian to his authority as emperor of the West. [THEODOSIUS I.] In A.D. 389, Valentinian went into Gaul to conduct operations against the Franks on the Rhine. Arbogast was at that time commander of the Roman forces in Gaul. Nothing further is recorded of this campaign, except that Valentinian had a conference with Marcomir and Sennen, the chiefs of the Franks, who gave him hostages. Valentinian spent the winter at Trièves, as appears from a constitution dated the 3rd of November.

Tillemont remarks, "that Theodosius, who spent about three years in Italy, after the defeat of Maximus, had by his wise advice effaced from the mind of the youthful emperor all the bad impressions which his mother Justina had fixed in him against the faith and St. Ambrose, and forming himself after the example of Theodosius, he had a fervent devotion towards God, and loved St. Ambrose with such affection, that he cherished him as much as he had formerly persecuted him." In A. D. 391, Q. Aurelius Symmachus, who was consul with Tatinus, was the head of a deputation from the Roman senate to Valentinian, the object of which was to ask of the emperor the restoration of the privileges which Gratian had taken from the temples of the idols. The emperor however positively refused to grant the petition.

At this time, the barbarians were in motion, on the side of the Illyrian Alps, and it was apprehended that they might disturb Italy. Valentinian set out for Italy, with the intention of going to Milan. He was at Vienna (Vienne), when he sent for Ambrosius to baptize him before he entered Italy, for he was yet only a catechumen. There were many bishops in France, but Valentinian wished to receive this Christian rite at the hands of Ambrose. "After having written to Ambrose, he passed the two following days in such inquietude and such impatience to see the saint, that having espachted a courier in the evening, he asked on the morning of the third day, which was the last of his life, if the courier had not returned, and if he saint was not coming." (Tillemont.)

Arbogast, a Franks by origin, a man probably of violent temper, though on this point there is a difference in the testimony, but a rude soldier and a man of courage and address, was aiming at governing Valentinian, who was still a youth. Gratian employed Arbogast and sent him in A. D. 381 under Bauton to assist Theodosius who was pressed by the Goths. After the death of Bauton, Arbogast assumed the command of the troops without, it is said, waiting for the orders of Valentinian. During the usurpation of Maximus, Arbogast was faithful to his master, and contributed greatly to the overthrow of Maximus. Presuming however on his abilities, his influence with the army, and the oath of Valentinian, Arbogast kept the emperor in kind of tutelage, of which Valentinian complained to Theodosius. At last the emperor mustered courage to give into the hands of Arbogast a written order by which he was deprived of his military rank; but the proud soldier told him to his face, that of that day he gave him his office and that it was not in his power to take it away. With these words he tore the writing, threw it on the ground, and quitted the emperor's presence.

There are different accounts of the death of Valentinian. The most probable is, that he was trangled by order of Arbogast. His body was taken to Milan for interment by the side of his father, and Ambrose pronounced the funeral oration to assure us of the salvation of a prince, who had not received the sacrament of salvation, but had asked for it, and was disposed to receive it." (Tillemont.) On this point, see Gibbon, c. 27, note 108.

Justina, the mother of Valentinian, was dead; she had not long survived the restoration of her son to his throne, and her influence expired before she died. Justa and Grata, the sisters of the emperor, remained unmarried; and Gallia, the wife of Theodosius, who deeply lamented her brother's death, died in A. D. 394, in childhood, when Theodosius was leaving Constantinople to avenge the death of Valentinian.

The reign of Valentinian is of little importance; and what concerns the Roman legislation of this period belongs to the history of Theodosius I.

VALENTINIANUS. and Jews and the known of her. for the edict excluded Jews and Heathens from the practice of the law, and from all military rank. Manichaeans and other heretics and schismatics and astrologers were driven out of the towns. Placidia was zealous for the church.

On the 23rd of October, A.D. 425, Valentinian, who was then probably at Rome, received from his cousin Theodosius the imperial purple and the title of Augustus. Placidia also received the title of Augusta, and probably at the same time when her son was made Augustus. In this year Theodoric, king of the Goths, took several places within the limits of the empire, and laid siege to Arleate (Arles) in Gaul, but on the approach of Aetius the Goths retired with some loss. In January A.D. 426, Valentinian was at Rome, as appears from the date of the imperial constitutions, which contained various provisions against informers (delatores), for the maintenance of the privileges of senators and magistrates, and other matters. Some constitutions of this year, dated from Ravenna, were intended to maintain the Christian faith; Jews and Samarians were prohibited from disinheriting their children because they had turned Christians.

Bonifacius, comes of Africa, had assisted the cause of Placidia and her son by refusing to acknowledge the usurper Joannes, while Aetius had supported him; and Bonifacius had received from Placidia during a visit to Italy testimonials of her gratitude. But on his return to Africa, Aetius, who was jealous of Bonifacius, accused him to Placidia of having a design to make himself independent in his province, and advised her to test his fidelity by summoning him to appear before her. With double treachery, he at the same time warned Bonifacius not to come, because Placidia designed him no good, and Bonifacius, believing what he heard, disobeyed the summons of Placidia. Troops were sent against Bonifacius, and he called in to his aid (A.D. 420) the Vandals from Spain and their king Genseric. The subsequent history of Bonifacius is told elsewhere. [BONIFACIUS.]

Aetius, who had stirred up an enemy in Bonifacius, was employed at the same time in fighting against the Franks, whom he defeated A.D. 428, and recovered from them those parts on the Rhine, where they had settled. In the following year Aetius was made commander of the Roman armies, in place of Felix, and he defeated the Goths near Arles, and took prisoner their chief Ataulphus. He also defeated the Juthongi, a German tribe near Rhaetia, and reduced the tribes of Noricum, which had revolted. Aetius had with him in these campaigns Aetius, who was afterwards emperor. In A.D. 431 he also reduced the Vindelici, having the same enemies to contend against whom Tiberius and Drusus had subdued in the time of Augustus. In A.D. 432 Aetius was consul with Valerius; and in the same year apparently while Aetius was in Gaul, Bonifacius was recalled to Italy by Placidia, who had discovered the knavery of Aetius, and gave him the rank of master general of the forces. As early as A.D. 430 Placidia and Bonifacius knew the treachery of Aetius and were reconciled; and Bonifacius then attempted to check the formidable enemy whom he had invited. After maintaining himself against the Vandals for some time in Hippo Regius and losing a battle, he retired from Africa and was welcomed at the court of Ravenna. On hearing of the promotion of his rival, Aetius turned to Italy, and the two generals settled their quarrel by a battle, in which Aetius was defeated, and Bonifacius received a mortal wound from the spear of Aetius, who fled to the Huns in Pannonia; but he was soon pardoned and restored: he was too dangerous a man to make an enemy of.

In February A.D. 435 Valentinian made peace with Genseric; but at the same time disturbances broke out in Gaul, caused by the Bagaudae. The name first occurs in the time of Dioctetian, and appears to have been adopted by the peasants themselves, who rose in arms, as it appears, against the oppression of their governors. [Eutropius, ix. 20, and the note in Verheylk's edition.] The Bagaudae were put down again, but they were not destroyed, for to destroy them it would have been necessary to remove the causes that called forth these bands of armed peasants, and the cause was the evils under which they groaned, heavy taxation, and all kinds of oppression. Theodoric, the king of the Huns, seen no resemblance to the condition of the French peasantry before the revolution of 1789. In this year is also recorded a defeat of the Burgundians on the Rhine by the Romans, under Aetius.

The Western empire had enemies on all sides. The Goths who had been settled in Aquitania and the bordering countries since A.D. 419, broke out in hostilities in A.D. 436, and besieged the ancient Roman colony of Narbonne under their king Theodoric, the son of Alaric. The siege lasted some time, but the Goths finally abandoned the undertaking, when the town had received a supply of provisions through the vigor of some Hunnish auxiliaries, headed by Comes Litorius. At this time the western part of the Mediterranean and the shores of the ocean were infested by pirates, some of whom were Saxons. In the October A.D. 437, Valentinian, being then eighteen years of age, came to Constantinople to celebrate his marriage with Eudocia, the daughter of Theodosius, who had been betrothed to him in A.D. 424. Valentinian surrendered to his father-in-law the western Illyricum, which had been already promised to the Eastern emperor by Placidia. He passed the winter with his wife at Thessalonica, and returned to Ravenna in the following year. By this marriage Valentinian had two daughters, Eudocia and Placidia.

In A.D. 439 the Gothic war still continued, and Litorius was besieging Theodoric in Toulouse, who asked for peace, which Litorius refused. A battle.
VALENTINIANUS.

enured in which Litorius was defeated, and the Goths carried him a prisoner into the city which he had hoped to take. Notwithstanding this success, Theodoric concluded a peace with Aetius, who threatened with a formidable army to dispute the further conquests of the Gothic king. The Western empire was gradually losing its extreme possessions. Merida in Spain was taken by Richila, king of the Suevi; and Genseric seized Carthage by surprise on the 9th of October A.D. 439. This was the more unexpected as a treaty had been made with him in A.D. 435. The capture of Carthage, which had been in the hands of the Romans for near six hundred years, despised the Roman government whose exactions were intolerable. The barbarians were in possession of a large part of western Africa; but Valentinian still retained the two provinces of Mauritania, and some other parts.

Valentinian was at Rome in January and in March A.D. 440, as appears from the date of several Novellae. In the month of June Genseric left Carthage with a great fleet. He landed in Sicily, ravaged the country and laid siege to Palermo. Aetius was still in Gaul, where he restored tranquillity and set out for Italy. It was about this time that Salvianus wrote his work on the Judgment of God, in which he shows that the Romans had brought upon themselves, by their sins, the calamities under which they were then suffering. The grievous burden of taxation and the oppression of the powerful made the Romans prefer the form of servitude under the Franks, Huns, and Vandals, under which they enjoyed real liberty and paid no taxes, to the semblance of liberty under the Roman government whose exactions were intolerable. The barbarians were in possession of a large part of Gaul and a still larger part of Spain; Italy had been ravaged several times, Rome had been besieged, Sicily and Sardinia devastated, and Africa was in the hands of the Vandals. Trèves had been several times sacked, and yet, says Salvianus, while the place was reeking with the blood of the slain, the citizens still eagerly called for the games, which were exhibited in their amphitheatre, the ruins of which still exist on the site of the ancient city of the Trevirii.

By a constitution of the 20th of February A.D. 441, the emperor made some regulations for making the property of the great dignitaries of the church and of the city of Rome liable to equal taxation with other property, and also liable for the repair of the roads and the walls of the towns and all other impost. In A.D. 442 Valentinian made peace with the Vandals, who were left in undisputed possession of part of Africa.

In A.D. 446, the Romans abandoned Britain. The Picts and Scots were ravaging the country, and the Britons in vain applied for help to Aetius who was then consul. A revolt took place in Armoric in A.D. 448 which was however soon settled.

Ravenna was the ordinary residence of the emperor; but he went to Rome early in A.D. 450 with his wife and mother, when, by a constitution, dated the 5th of March, he remitted all the taxes that had become due up to the 1st of September A.D. 448; from which we may conclude that the people were unable to pay them. Sardinia and Africa were excepted from this indulgence. The emperor spoke of the exactions of the commissioners who were sent into the provinces to prevent the exactions of others; they enriched themselves at the expense both of the tax-payers and of the Fiscus. Oppressive taxation is the symptom of vicious government and of the approaching ruin of a state.

Theodosius II. died on the 28th of July A.D. 450, and Marcianus succeeded him without waiting for the approbation of Valentinian, who, however, confirmed his election. On the 27th of November in the same year, Placidia, the emperor's mother, died at Rome just when hostilities were going to break out between Valentinian and Attila, king of the Huns. The result of this war was the defeat of Attila by Aetius, near Châlons sur Marne in the former French province of Champagne, in A.D. 451. [Art. Attila.] The history of Valentinian's unfortunate sister Honoria is connected with that of Attila. [Grata, No. 2.]

The Western empire was in a deplorable state, overrun by barbarians who brought with them "the detestable heresy of the Arians with which they were infected." Italy however seems to have been free from barbarians, though it contained many Goths under the name of confederates; and they were Arians too. The Visigoths, whose capital was Toulouse, had a new king in consequence of the death of Theodoric who fell in the great battle at Châlons, fighting on the side of the Romans. He was succeeded by his son Thorismund.

In A.D. 452 Attila made a descent into Italy and spread consternation. Aetius had returned to Italy, and he and Valentinian sent Pope Leo to Attila to sue for peace, and the barbarian retired after he had devastated the north of Italy. [Art. Attila.] A constitution of Valentinian of this year, in which a zealous Roman Catholic writer calls "a scandalous law and altogether unworthy of a Christian prince," declares that the law does not allow bishops and priests to have jurisdiction in civil affairs, and that they can only take cognizance of matters pertaining to religion; and it requires even bishops to appear before the ordinary judges in all suits to which they were parties, unless the other party consented to submit to the judgment of the church. It also forbid ecclesiastics to traffic, or if they do, they are allowed no particular privilege.

Valentinian was relieved in A.D. 453 from a formidable enemy by the death of Attila, and in the same year Thorismund, king of the Visigoths, who was of a restless and warlike character, was murdered by his brothers, one of whom, Theodoric II., succeeded him.

The power and influence of Aetius had long excited the jealousy and fears of Valentinian, and the suspicious temper of the warlike and feeble emperor was encouraged by the calumnies of the emmarch Heraclius. Aetius was too powerful to be the subject of a contemptible master; and the betrothal of his son Gaudentius to Eudoxia, the daughter of Valentinian, may have excited his ambitious designs and awakened his treacherous disposition. His pride and insolence were shown in a hostile declaration against his prince, which was followed by a reconciliation and an alliance, the terms of which were dictated by Aetius. After this insult he had the imprudence to venture into the emperor's palace at Rome, in company with Boethia, Praefectus Praetorio, and to urge the marriage of the emperor's daughter with his son. In a fit of irritation the emperor drew his sword and plunged it into the general's body. The slaughter was completed by the attendants of Valentinian, and Boethius, the friend of Aetius, also shared his fate. (A. D. 434.) The principal friends of Aetius were singly summoned to the palace, and murdered. Thus the bravest man, the ablest commander of the age, the last great Roman soldier, perished by the treacherous hand of the most unwarlike of the Roman Caesars.

A grievous insult to Petronius Maximus is said to have been the immediate cause of Valentinian's death. Maximus had a handsome wife, who resisted the emperor's solicitations, but he got her within the palace by an artifice, and compelled her to yield to force what she had refused to persuasion. The injured husband resolved on the emperor's destruction, and he gained over some of the domestics of Valentinian who had been in the service of Aetius. While he was amusing himself in the field of Mars with some spectacle, two of these men fell upon him; and, after killing the guilty Heraclius, despatched the emperor without any resistance from those who were about him. A. D. 455. This was the end of Valentinian III., a feeble and contemptible prince, the last of the family of Theodosius. He had ill brought up, and had all the vices that in a princely station disgrace a man's character. Even his zeal for the Catholic faith and the church is not allowed to have been sincere.

VALENTINUS (Ωαλεντίναος), the celebrated Gnostic heresarch of the second century, was a native of Egypt, whence he went to Rome, and there propagated his heresy, having received from the church, if we may believe Tertullian (c. Faust. 4.) the consequence of being thus disappointed in the hope of obtaining a bishopric. The chronographers fix the time at which he flourished in the reign of Antoninus Pius, from a. d. 140, when they represent him as coming to Rome, and onwards. (Euseb. Chron. s. a. 2155; Hieron. s. a. 2156; Syncell. p. 551, a.) Eusebius (H. E. iv. 11) also tells us, on the authority of Irenaeus, that Valentinus came to Rome in the episcopate of Hyginus, flourished under Pius, and survived till the episcopate of Anicetus, about A. D. 140—155. (Comp. Euseb. Chron. and Hieron., s. a. 2159.) Some writers assign to him an earlier date, chiefly on the authority of the tradition, preserved by Clemens Alexander (Stron. vii. p. 764), that he had heard Theodas, a disciple of St. Paul; hence Cave places him at the year A. D. 120. The two opinions may be reconciled by supposing, with Clinton, that Valentinus did not begin to propagate his heresy till late in life; and, supposing him to have been seventy years of age in A. D. 150, the first year of Anicetus, he would be twenty-five in A. D. 105, when it was quite possible that a disciple of St. Paul might be still alive. (Clinton, Post. Rom. s. a. 140, 144.)

Valentinus was one of the boldest and most influential heresarchs of the Gnostic sect, the minute account of his doctrines, into which it is necessary with the plan of this work to enter, will be found in the works quoted below: perhaps, for general readers, the brief but clear exposition of Valentinianism by Mosheim will be found the most useful.

There is also a good and brief account in Giese- ler, which we extract, as the work is not so well known to the English reader, as that of Mosheim: — "From the great original (according to him, Βοθίς, προστάτωρ, προσχή), with whom is the consciousness of himself (ἔννοια, συγνή), eminate in succession male and female aeons (Νους or Μονογενής et καλήια, λόγος and καλήια, λόγος et όνομανος et εκκλησία, &c.), so that 30 aeons together (distinguished into the ὄρθος, Δεκάς, and Ψευδέκας) form the πλευρα. From the passionate striving of the last aeon, the σοφία, to unite with Jesus, he takes off himself an unimportant being (ἕκατον σοφία, ἀνθρώπως, ἀρχαῖος, ἱ. λίπις), which, wandering about outside the pleroma, communicates the germ of life to matter, and forms the αὐθημορία of psychical material, who immediately creates the world. In this three kinds of matter are mixed, τὸ πνευματικόν, τὸ ψυχικόν, τὸ ὄνομα. The result of the course of the world is, that the two first should be separated from the last, and that τὸ πνευματικόν should return to the pleroma, τὸ ψυχικόν into the τόπος μεταθέτοτος, where the Achamoth now dwells. In the mean time, two new aeons, Christ and the Holy Spirit, had arisen, in order to restore the disturbed harmony in the pleroma; then there emanated from all the aeons Jesus (σωτήρ), who, as future associate (αὐγος) of the Acha- moth, shall lead back into the pleroma this and the pneumatic natures. The σωτήρ united itself at the baptism with the psychical Messiah promised by the Demiurgus. Just so is the letter of the doctrines of Jesus for psychical men. On the other hand, the spirit introduced by the Soter or Saviour, is for the spiritual. These two theses were naturally capable of being moulded in many different ways; and, accordingly, among Valentinian's disciples are found many departures from their teacher. The most important of his followers were Heracleon, Ptolemy, and Marcus."

VALENTINUS, TULLIUS, a chiefain of the Treviri, who endeavoured to persuade the Gauls to join in the revolt of Civilis and Classicus (A. D. 70), but was unsuccessful, on account of the opposition of Julia Auspex and the Remi; so that only the Treviri and Lingones rebelled. Valentinus acted as the leader of the Treviri, but took more pains to secure their fidelity by harangues than their success by warlike preparations.

When Cerialis passed the Alps, Valentinus joined Tutor in the attempt to oppose him. In his absence two legions, which had surrendered to Classicus at Nevesium and Bonna some time before, and, after taking the oath to the empire of Gaul, had been marched to the city of Treviri, voluntarily took the oath to Vespasian, and on the return of Valentinus and Tutor after their defeat by Cerialis retired to the friendly state of the Mediomatrici. Valentinus and Tutor roused the Treviri anew to arms, and, in order to make them desperate, killed Herennius and Numiusius, the legates of the above legions. Cerialis soon marched against them from Magontiacum, stormed the strong position of Valentinus at Rigodulum, and entered Treviri, where he harangued and pardoned the two legions just mentioned, as well as the Treviri and Lingones. Valentinus, who had been taken prisoner at Rigodulum, was sent into Italy, and was delivered up to Mucianus and Domitian, who were on their march to support Cerialis. He was condemned to death, and while undergoing his sentence, when some one taunted him with the misfortunes of his country, he replied that he accepted death as a solace for them. (Tac. Hist. iv. 69—74, 85.) [P. S.]

VALENTINUS, VALERIUS, accused C. Cosconius under the Servilia lex (probably De Repetundis); and although the guilt of Cosconius was clear he was acquittted in consequence of an indecent verse of Valentinus being read in court. (Val. Max. viii. 1. abs. 8; comp. Festus, s. v. Tappulam, p. 363, ed. Müller.)

A. VALENTIUS, the Greek interpreter of Verres in Sicily, was one of his instruments of oppression in that province. (Cic. Verr. iii. 37, iv. 26.)

VALERIA. 1. The sister of P. Valerius Publicola, is said to have advised the Roman matrons to go to the court of Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, to go to the camp of Coriolanus in order to deprecate his resentment. (Dionys. viii. 39, foll.) Respecting her connection with the legend of Coriolanus, see Niebuhr, vol. ii. p. 102, foll.

2. The last wife of Sulla, was the daughter of M. Valerius Messala. She attracted the notice of Sulla at the theatre, and he married her towards the end of his life. Soon after his death she bore a daughter. Plutarch calls her a sister of the orator Hortensius, but this is a mistake probably arising from the fact that the sister of Hortensius married a Valerius Messala. (Plut. Sull. 35, 37; Drumm. Gesch. Roms, vol. ii. p. 508.)

VALERIA, GALERIA, the daughter of Dio- clenian and Priscus, was upon the reconstruction of the empire in A. D. 292 [DIOCLETIANUS] united to Galeria, one of the new Caesars, by whom she had no offspring, but adopted his illegitimate son Candidianus. After the death of her husband in 311 Valeria rejected the proposals of his successor Maximinus, who, having become enamoured of her person and her wealth, sought to gain her hand even before the established period of mourning had expired. She was in consequence exposed to the brutal fury of the disappointed prince, stripped of her possessions, and banished along with her mother to the deserts of Syria; nor could the earnest entreaties of Dioecletian, whose end is said to have been hastened by the misfortunes of his wife and child, procure any alleviation of their misery. Upon the death of their enemy in 314, they repaired in disguise to the court of Liciinus, to whose care Valeria had been consigned by her husband with his dying breath; but far from obtaining at Nicomedia the protection and honour which they anticipated, they found themselves, after witnessing the murder of Candidianus and of Severianus, compelled to provide for their safety by a precipitate flight; and having wandered for many months over various provinces in a humble disguise, were at length discovered at Thessalonias, probably in the year A. D. 315, where they were both beheaded and their bodies cast into the sea. It has been conjectured that Valeria and Priscus must at one period have betrayed some favour for Christianity, for we are told that they were the first persons whom Dioecletian required to offer sacrifice to the pagan deities when he commenced his persecution; and Tillemont seems to regard all their subsequent sufferings as a temporal punishment for their weak compliance with the commands of the emperor.

Our chief authority for the history of this unhappy lady is the writer of the treatise De Mortibus persecutorum [CAECILIUS] (cc. 12, 15, 35, 39, 40, 41, 42, 50, 51), whose notices have been collected, combined, and cast in an imposing form by Gibbon in the fourteenth chapter of his history. [W. R.]
make known his own sentiments and wishes. The untimely fate of Decius saved the regulator of public morals from the embarrassment which must have attended the discharge of difficult and invidious duties, while at the same time he was admitted to the full confidence of Gallus, by whom he was employed to quell the rebellion of Ae- millianus, and recall the legions of Pannonia and Moesia to their allegiance. While an army was forming in Noricum and Rhaetia, the rapid movement of the usurper and the murder of the prince completely changed the aspect of affairs. Valerian, who had taken up arms to support the interests of another, now employed them to advance his own. The sudden death, whether caused by disease or treachery, of his rival, whom he found encamped near Spoleto, prevented a hostile encounter. Valerian was chosen (A.D. 254) to fill the vacant throne, not, says the Augustan historians, by the rude clamours of a camp, nor by the disorderly shouts of a popular assembly, but in right of his merits, and, as it were, by the unanimous voice of the whole world. The new sovereign having assumed his eldest son Gallienus as an associate in the purple, prepared to repel, as best he might, the barbarian hosts which, gathering confidence from the increasing weakness of the Roman dominion, were pressing forwards more and more fiercely on the various frontiers. But although the Franks were ravaging Gaul and Spain, although the Alamanni were making repeated descents upon the provinces of the Upper Danube, and threatening Italy itself, although the Goths were loading their boat fleets with the plunder of Asia and of Greece, yet the dismemberment of the empire seemed most imminent in Syria. Scarce had Ardashir Babe- gan, by his crowning victory in Khorsasan, overthrown the dynasty of the Arsacidae, and revived the ancient supremacy of Persia, when he vowed that he would drive the Western usurpers from the regions once swayed by his ancestors. His schemes were baffled by the energy and valour of Severus, but the haughty and ambitious Sapor having at length succeeded in subjugating Armenia, the ally and great outpost of the Roman power, thought that the time had now arrived for realising the mighty projects of his sire. Having driven the garrisons from the strongholds on the left bank of the Tigris, he overran Mesopotamia, then crossing the Euphrates, rushed like a torrent upon Syria, and bearing down all resistance, stormed Antioch, the metropolis of the East. At this juncture Valerian assumed the command of the legions in person, and for a time his measures were both vigorous and successful. Antioch was recovered, the usurper Cyriades [Cyrilades] was slain, and Sapor was compelled to fall back behind the Euphrates; but the emperor, flushed by his good fortune, while his faculties were perhaps impaired by age, followed too rashly. He found himself, like a second Crassus, surrounded, in the vicinity of Edessa, by the countless horsemen of his active foe; he was entraped into a conference, taken prisoner, and passed the remainder of his life in captivity subjected to every insult which Oriental cruelty could devise. After death his skin was stuffed and long preserved as a trophy in the chief temple of the nation.

Although no doubts exist with regard to the leading facts connected with the career of Valerian and his miserable fate, yet so imperfect, confused, and contradictory are the records of this period, that it is impossible to arrange the events in regular order, or to speak with any certainty of the details. We should have imagined that little difficulty could have been found in fixing the precise date of the capture and sack of Antioch, the destruction of its edifices, and the massacre of its population, a catastrophe which must have caused a profound sensation throughout the civilized world, yet we cannot decide whether these things happened during the reign of Gallienus, of Valerian, or of Gallienus. In like manner it is hard to decide in what year Valerian was made prisoner, although the weight of evidence is in favour of A.D. 269. (Trebell. Poll. Frag. IV. Valerian; Auræl. Vict. de Caes. xxxii.; Epit. xxxii.; Evrot. ix. 6; Amm. Marc. xxxii. 5; Zosim. i. 27, foll. iii. 32; Zonar. xii. 23; Eckehl, vol. vii. p. 387.) [W. R.]

COIN OF VALERIANUS.

VALERIANUS JUNIOR, a son of the emperor Valerianus, but not by the same mother as Gallienus. He was remarkable for the beauty of his person, the modesty of his address, the high cultivation of his mind, and the purity of his morals in which he exhibited a marked contrast to his dissolute brother, along with whom he perished at Milan in A.D. 268. [Gallienus.] Trebellius Pollio affirms that he received the title of Caesar from his father, and of Augustus from Gallienus, but this assertion is not supported by the Fasti nor by any other historical evidence, while Eckehl has adduced many weighty arguments to prove that he never could have enjoyed either of these apppellations, and that all the coins ascribed to him belong in reality to his nephew Salonius. (Trebell. Poll. Valerian, jun.; Evrot. ix. 8; Zonar. xii. 24, according to whom young Valerianus was slain not at Milan, but at Rome, along with the son of Gallienus, after the death of the latter. See also Eckehl, vol. vii. pp. 432, 436, and the dissertation of Breguigny in the Méménes de l'Académie des Sciences et Belles Lettres, vol. xxxii. p. 274.) [W. R.]

VALERIANUS, CORNELIUS. [Salonius.] [W. R.]

VALERIANUS, with the title Episcopus Cemeliensis, is the name attached in a single MS. to a discourse De Bono Disciplinæ, frequently printed among the works of St. Augustine, but no author bearing this designation has been remembered by Gennadius, by Isidorus, nor by any other compiler of ecclesiastical biographies. Cemelius was a village in the neighbourhood of Nice, the episcopate of which was, by a decree of Pope Leo the Great, conjoined with that of Nice, so that after that period it did not form an independent diocese — a fact which determines one limit with regard to the age of Valerianus. He is believed to be identical with the Valerianus to whom, in common with other bishops of southern Gaul, a letter was addressed by Leo touching the ordination of the bishop of Vaison (Episcopus Vasionis), and he is further believed to be the Valerianus who assisted at the councils of Ries (A.D. 439) and Arles (A.D. 455), but these and other suppositions rest upon no basis more stable than simple conjecture.

The Sermo de Bono Disciplinæ was first published as the work of Valerianus by Melchior Goldastus, 8vo. Gen. 1601, and ten years afterwards Sirmond discovered in a MS. belonging to the monastery of Corvey on the Weser nineteen discourses together with an Epistola ad Monachos de Virtutibus et Ordine Doctrinae Apostolicae, purporting to be the production of Valerianus Episcopus. Although the codex in question did contain the homily De Bono Disciplinæ, nor indicate the site of the bishopric of this Valerianus, Sirmond concluded from the style that the whole of these pieces must unquestionably be ascribed to Valerianus Cemeliensis, and accordingly printed an octavo volume at Paris in 1612 with the title Sancti Valeriani Episcopi Cemeliensis Homilie XI. Item Epistola ad Monachos de Virtutibus et Ordine Doctrinae Apostolicae. Omnia primum praeter unam homiliam post annos minus illa decennia in lucem edita a Jacobo Sirmondo Societatis Jesu Presbytero anno M.DCCXII. These tracts will be found also in the collected works of Sirmond, vol. i. p. 604. fol. Paris, 1696, in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima, vol. viii. p. 498, fol. Lugd. 1677, and under their best form in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. x. p. 123, fol. Venet. 1774. (Schoenem. Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 38.) [W. R.]

VALERIANUS, C. PILNIUS, a physician, whose date is unknown, who died at the early age of twenty-two, and whose name is preserved in a Latin inscription found at Como. (Gruter, Inscr. i. 635.) To him is attributed (but apparently without any very good reason) a Latin medical work entitled " Medicinae Plinianae Libri Quinque," which is supposed to have been written about the fourth century after Christ. It is a book on domestic medicine, compiled from Pliny, Dioscorides, Galen, Alexander Trallianus, and others, and is not of much value. The first three books treat of different diseases, beginning with the head and descending to the feet, and contain an account of a great number of medicines, taken partly from Pliny and partly from later writers. The fourth book treats of the properties of plants, and is in a great measure taken from Galen; and the fifth, which is almost entirely taken from Alexander Trallianus, treats of the diet suitable to different diseases. The work was first published at Rome 1509, fol., edited by Th. Pighinuccius. There is (according to Haller) a much more accurate edition, published Bonon. 1516, fol. It is also inserted in Albin Thoræus' (Torinus) Collection, Basil. 1528, fol., and in the Aldine Collection of " Medici Antiqui," Venet. 1547, fol. There is a learned dissertation by J. G. Glötz (which the Writer has never seen), entitled "De Veterum Operis de Medica, vulgo Plinio Valeriano addscripti," Lips. 1736, 4to, in which the author tries to prove that the work in question was written by Siburius. (See Fabricius, Bibl. Lat.; Haller, Bibl. Med. Præct.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin; Penny Cyclop.) (W. A. G.)
VALE'RIUS, arista. 1. Of Ostia. The architect of the covered theatre erected at Rome for the games of Libo. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 15. s. 24.) Pliny does not say which Libo he refers to; but it is likely to have been L. Scribonius Libo, who in his curule aedilship, with his colleague C. Attilius Severus, first celebrated the Megalesia as ludi scenici, b. c. 193. [Libo, Scribonius, No. 3.]

2. M. VALE'RIUS M. F. ARTE'MA, an architect, who is mentioned in an extant inscription. (Sillig, Cat. Artif. Append. s. v. Arte'ma; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 422, 2d ed.)

3. D. VALE'RIUS L. F., described as Vasa'leri-us, that is, a maker of bronze vases, in two inscriptions found at Tusculum, of which place he was a native or a citizen, for in one of the inscriptions he is styled Tusculani. (Murratori, Thes. vol. i. p. xii. 12, p. xiv. 6; R. Rochette, l. c.)

4. C. VALE'RIUS ANEMES'TIONE C. IUS, is the name in which a Cordovan inscription gives the name of an architect, who embe the made-embossed vessels called a'myllydr, He is styled in the inscription Ca'sator Ana'myllydrus, but there can be no doubt that the last word is an error for Ana'myllydrus. (Murratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. cmlixxi. 9; R. Rochette, l. c.) [P. S.]

VALE'RIUS A'DITIUUS. In the ninth chapter of the nineteenth book of the Noctes Atti'ne a certain rhetorician Julianus, when challenged to point out anything in the Latin language worthy of being compared with the graceful effusions of Anacreon, and other bards of that class among the Greeks, quotes two short epigrams by Valerius Aeditius, who is simply described as veteris poetae, one by Porcius Licinius, and one by Quintus Catulus. Upon these collectively A. Gel'lius pronounces mundus, venustus, limatius, presius, Graecumve Latinumve nihil quiddum reperti puto. They unquestionably merit high commendation, but are so evidently derived from Greek sources as to deserve unreservedly to be added with fairness as specimens of the Roman lyric muse.

Judging from the language and versification we may assign them to a period about b. c. 100. (Gell. xix. 9; Anthol. Lat. iii. 242, 243, ed. Burmann, or Nos. 27, 28, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

VALE'RIUS AN'TIAS. [Antias.]

VALE'RIUS ASIA'TICUS. 1. P. VALE'RIUS ASIA'TICUS, consul suffectus under Caligula, but in what year is uncertain, and a second time consul under Claudius in a. D. 46 with M. Junius Silanus. Valerius was a friend of Caligula, but, having received a gross insult in him, rejoiced at his death. When the praetorian troops, after the assassination of the emperor, were seeking for the murderer in order to wreak their vengeance on him, Valerius stood up in a conspicuous place and exclaimed, "Would that I had killed him," by which act of courage the soldiers were so astounded that they returned quietly to their quarters. Valerius was very wealthy and this proved his ruin. The empress Messalina coveted his splendid gardens, which were the same as Lucullus had originally laid out, and which Valerius had made still more magnificent. She also suspected him of being one of the paramours of the beautiful Poppaea Sabina, the mother of Nero's wife, whom she both feared and detested; and she therefore resolved to crush Valerius and Poppaea at the same time. She employed Suillius to accuse him, and also instructed Sosibius, who was then a slave or a freedman in the palace, to caution Claudius against the power and wealth of Valerius. This was in A. D. 47, the year following his second consulship. Valerius had in the preceding year voluntarily resigned his consulship after holding it for a short time, in order to avoid the envy of which he was the subject. Suillius accused him of the part he had taken in Caligula's death, and of an intention of setting out to the German armies with a view of aspiring to the empire, since he was born at Vienna (Vienne) in Gaul and had many connections in that part of the Roman world. The weak and credulous emperor was easily persuaded. Valerius was apprehended at Baiae. The senate was not summoned, but he was brought into the emperor's chamber, where Suillius laid various crimes to his charge. Valerius defended himself with spirit, and the emperor would have acquitted him had it not been for Messala, who got Vitellius, then consul for the third time, to summon the emperor to sentence him to death. He was allowed the choice of his death, and died by opening his veins. (Dion Cass. lix. 30; Joseph. xix. i.; Sen. de Const. Sep. 18; Tac. Ann. xi. 1—3, xiii. 43; Dion Cass. lix. 27, 29, 31.)

2. P. VALE'RIUS ASIA'TICUS, the legatus of the province of Gallia Belgica at the death of Nero, espoused the cause of Vitellius at the beginning of A. D. 69, and soon afterwards married the daughter of Vitellius. On the fall of Vitellius he hastened to make his peace with the generals of Vespasian, and as consul designatus spoke in the senate in favour of their proposals. He was allowed in consequence to enjoy the consulship as suffectus in the following year, A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. i. 55, iv. 4, 6.)

3. VALE'RIUS ASIA'TICUS, consul under Hadrian A. D. 125 with Titus Aquilinus (Fasti).

VALE'RIUS BASSIA'NUS, slain by Commodus. (Lamprid. Commod. 7.)

M. VALE'RIUS BRA'DUA, consul under Commodus A. D. 191 with Podo Aprianus (Fasti).

C. VALE'RIUS CABURNUS. [Procilius.]

VALE'RIUS CA'PITO, banished by Agrippina, was after her death recalled from exile by Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 12.)

VALE'RIUS CATUL'IUS, was sent by Julianus to succeed Septimius Severus in the government of Illyricum, when the latter assumed the imperial title. Valerius was afterwards killed by Septimius. (Spartian. Julianus, 5, Sever. 13.)

VALE'RIUS CATO. [Cato.]

VALE'RIUS CATULLUS. [Catullus.]

VALE'RIUS CON' STANTIUS. [Con- stantius I.]

VALE'RIUS CON' STARTIUS. [Constantius II.]

VALE'RIUS DIOCLE'TIA'NUS. [Diocletianus.]

VALE'RIUS DIO'DORUS. [Diodorus, literary, No. 2.]

VALE'RIUS EUTYCHIA'NUS COMA-ZON. [Comazon.]

VALE'RIUS FABIA'NUS. [Fabianus.]

VALE'RIUS FESTUS. [Festus.]

VALE'RIUS GRATUS. [Gratus.]

M. VALE'RIUS HOMULLUS, consul under Antoninus Pius A. D. 152 with M. Acilius Glabrio.
His joke against the emperor is recorded by Cato in the Form Rebus, who proposed the agrarian law in the consulship of Cicero, which was opposed by the latter. It appears from Cicero that Valgius had obtained much confiscated property in the time of Sulla.
(Cic. de Leg. Agr. iii. 1.)
2. A. Valgius, the son of a senator, deserted the Pompeian party in the Spanish war n. c. 45, and went over to Caesar. (Auctor, B. Hisp. 13.)
3. C. Valgius Hippianus, the son of Q. Hip-pius, was adopted by a certain C. Valgius. (Cic.
Ad Fam. xiii. 76.) For details see Hippius.
C. Valgius Rufus. 1. Horace, in the tenth satire of his first book, composed, according to Bentley, not later than n. c. 38, where he defends and explains the criticism he had formerly passed upon Lucilius, ranks Valgius (b. 81) along with Varus, Maecenas and Virgil among those friends of genius and sound judgment whose approbation far more than compensated for the annoyance caused by the attacks of his detractors.
2. Again, in the ninth ode of the second book, written about n. c. 23 or 20, he endeavours to console Valgius whom he represents as giving vent in tearful strains to the grief caused by the loss of his favourite Mystes. The personage here addressed is termed by the old scholar upon Horace “ Val-gius consulam.”
3. Servius, in his commentary on Virgil, twice refers (ad Virg. vii. 22, ad Aen. xi. 457) to “ Val-gius in elegia.” From the expressions used in the first passage we might infer that this Valgius was a contemporary of Virgil, in the second a couplet is quoted from his poems. Another couplet from “ Val-gius” is to be found in Isidorus (Orig. xix. 4.
5. c. v. remulcium).
4. C. Valgius appears from some Fasti to have been consul successively in n. c. 12. Comp. Gruter,
p. cxxvi. 8.
5. Pliny (H. N. xxv. 2) makes mention of a “C. Valgius eruditione spectaturus,” who commenced a treatise upon medicinal plants which he dedicated to Augustus, but did not complete the work.
6. In the Panegyric on Messalla contained among the works of Tibullus we read (180) “Est tibi, qui posit magnis se accingere rebus, Valgius, aeterno propior non alter Homero,” from which it has been concluded that Valgius was the author of heroic streams. No epic poet of that name, however, is mentioned by Quintilian, nor is any notice to be discovered in the grammarians of a work which, if the above couplet is not ridicuously hyperbolical, must have attracted general attention. This circumstance, however, need occasion little surprise when we recollect that the piece in which these lines occur is believed by the best critics not to be the production of Tibullus but a rhetorical essay belonging to a much later period.
7. Philargyrius (ad Virg. Georg. iii. 176) cites two hexameter lines from “ Valgius” which ap-ppear to be taken from a pastoral.
8. Chararius (p. 84, ed. Putach.) produces a verse from “ Valgius in epigrammate ” to illustrate the gender of the word marpaha.
9. Donatus, in his life of Terence, quotes three Imambies from “ Valgius in Actacone,” which affirm that Terence published, under his own name, dramas 4 2
which were in reality the property of Scipio, and hence Valthius has been ranked among the writers of comedy, although there is no proof that Actaeon was a play of any kind.

10. Quintilian tells us (iii. 1. § 18, comp. iii. 5. § 17, v. 10. § 4) that the precepts of the Greek rhetorician Apollodorus who gave instructions at Apollonia to Augustus (Suet. Octav. 89) may best be learned from his disciples, of whom the most diligent in translating them into Latin "fuit C. Valthius Graecus Atticus." He adds that the only genuine production of Valthius upon this subject was entitled Ars edita ad Matium, that others had indeed been ascribed to him, but that he had not acknowledged them in his letter to Domitius.

11. Gallius (xii. 3) speaks of "Valthius Rufus" and Charisius (p. 84, ed. Putsch.) of "Valthius" as the author of some grammatical investigations called Res per epistolas quaeestae. They extended to two books at least, and probably were something of the same kind as the Epistolicae Questiones of Varro (Gell. xiv. 7).

12. Festus (s. v. secus) and Charisius (p. 116, ed. Putsch.) refer to Valthius on matters connected with grammar.

13. Diomedes (p. 382, ed. Putsch.) gives two words from "Valthius de Tralatione."

14. Finally, Seneca says (Ep. xli. § 1) that "Valthius" applied the epithet unicus to mount Aetna, and Charisius (p. 79, ed. Putsch.) gives an example from "Valthius" of locet as a nominative.

It is perfectly manifest that the evidence contained in the above paragraphs is far from being sufficient to enable us to decide anything with certainty in connection with the person or persons named. We may fairly surmise that the Valthius of (1) is the same with the Valthius of (2) and perhaps of (3) and (4) also. Beyond this we cannot advance without losing ourselves in a haze of dim conjecture. The assertion of Broukhuis (ad Tibull. iv. 1. 80) that there were two distinguished writers in the Augustan age both named Valthius Rufus, but distinguished from each other by difference of prænomen, namely, C. Valthius Rufus, the consul and prose writer, and T. Valthius Rufus, the poet, is altogether destitute of any firm foundation, for no authority whatsoever can be adduced for the existence of a T. Valthius Rufus.

(All the matters connected with this inquiry are very fully discussed by Weichert, in his Poetaum Lat. Reliquiae (6vo. Lips. 1830, p. 263—240), who in p. 253, foll. has collected a few mutilated fragments bearing the name of Valthius.) [W.R.]

VARIIUS SYRIACUS, [SYRIACUS.]

VANNIO. [VANNIUS.]

VANNIUS, a chief of the Quadi, was made king of the Suevi by Germanicus in A. D. 19; but after holding the power for thirty years he was driven out of his kingdom in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 50, by Vibillius the king of the Hermunduri, and his own nephews Vangio and Sido, the sons of his sister. Vannius received from Claudius a settlement in Pannonia, and his kingdom was divided between Vangio and Sido. (Tac. Ann. ii. 63, xii. 29, 30; Vannianum regnum, Plin. H. N. iv. 25.)

VARENIAE, the name of six Persian kings of the dynasty of the Sassanidae. [Sassanidae, p. 715.]

L. VARENUM. 1. Was accused, probably about B.C. 90 or 79 under the Cornelia law de Sicariis, of the murder of C. Varenus, and of an attempt to murder Cn. Varenus. He was defended by Cicero in a speech which is lost, but was condemned. (Quintil. x. 13. § 28, vii. 1. § 9, ii. 2. § 56; Cic. Deo. Frug. vol. iv. p. 443, Orelli; Drummann, Geschichte Roms, vol. v. pp. 214, 245.)

2. A centurion in Caesar's army distinguished himself, along with T. Pulio, by a daring act of bravery, when the camp of Q. Cicero was besieged by the Nervii in B.C. 54. (Caes. B. G. v. 45.)

VARIGULA, a friend of C. Julius Caesar Strabo, was noted as a wit. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 60.)

VARGUNTEIUS. 1. L. VARGUNTEIUS, a senator and one of Catiline's conspirators, undertook in conjunction with C. Cornelius, to murder Cicero in B.C. 63, but their plan was frustrated by information conveyed to Cicero through Fulvia. He was afterwards brought to trial, but could find no one to defend him, not even Hortensius, who had defended him on a former occasion when he was accused of bribery. (Sall. Cat. 17, 28, 47, pro Sull. 2.)

2. Vargunteius, legatus of Crassus, in the Parthian war, in which he perished, B.C. 54. (Plut. Crass. 28.)

3. Q. VARGUNTEIUS, a Roman grammarian, who used to lecture on the Annals of Ennius. (Suet. de Ill. Gram. 2.)

4. M. VARGUNTEIUS, is mentioned on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Pallus with M. Varg., the reverse Jupiter in a quadriga with Roma below. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 353.)

COIN OF VARGUNTEIUS.

VARI'LLIA, APPULEIA. [APPULEIUS, No. 9.]

VARINIUS GLABER. [GLABER.]

M. VARI'SIDIUS, a Roman eques, a friend of L. Munatius Planus and of Cicero (Planus, ap. Cic. ad Fam. x. 7, 12.)

VARIIUS. 1. Q. VARIO HYBRIDA, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 90, was a native of Sueco in Spain, and received the surname of Hybrida, because his mother was a Spanish woman. He is called by Cicero vostus homo atque foedus, but nevertheless obtained considerable power in the state by his eloquence. In his tribuneship he proposed a lex de magistrato, in order to punish all those who had assisted or advised the Socii to take up arms against the Roman people. He brought forward this law at the instigation of the equites, who made common cause with the people against the reforms of Drusus; and as they possessed the judicata at this time, they hoped by banishing the most distinguished senators to get the whole power of the state into their hands. The senators used all their influence to prevent the proposition from passing into a law. The other tribunes put their veto upon it, but the equites with drawn swords compelled them to give way, and the law was carried. The equites quickly put the law into execution. Bestia and Cotta went voluntarily into exile, and other dis- tinguished men were condemned. Varus even accused M. Scaurus, the princeps senatus, who was then seventy-two years of age, but was obliged to drop this accusation. [Scaurus, p. 736, b.] Varus himself was condemned under his own hand for the murder of Drusus and Metellus. (Appian. B. C. i. 37 ; Val. Max. vi. 6. § 4 ; Cec. de Oro. i. 25, Brut. 62 ; Val. Max. iii. 7. § 8 ; Cec. pro Secur. 1.; Ascon. in Secur. p. 22, ed. Orelli ; Cec. Brut. 56, de Nat. Deor. i. 33.) Cicero in the passage last quoted accuses Varus of the murder of Drusus and Metellus.

2. M. VARIUS, or M. MARIUS, as he is called by Plutarch and Orosius, a Roman senator, was sent by Sertorius to Mithridates in B. C. 75, when he made a treaty with him, in order that Varus might command the forces of the king. Varus is afterwards mentioned as one of the generals of Mithridates in the war with Lucullus. (Appian, Mithr. 68, 76, foll.; Plut. Sert. 24, Lucull. 8; Oros. vi. 2.)

3. P. VARIUS, defrauded Caecilius, the uncle of Atticus, of a large sum of money. (Cic. ad Att. i. 1.)

4. Q. VARIUS, one of the witnesses against Verres. (Cic. adv. Fann. ii. 43.)

5. P. VARIUS, a judge at the trial of Milo, had been ill-treated by P. Clodius. (Cic. pro Mil. 27.) VARIUS COTYLA. [COTYLA.] VARIUS LIGUR. [LIGUR.] VARIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.] L. VARIVS RUFUS, one of the most distinguished poets of the Augustan age, the companion and friend of Virgil and Horace. By the latter he is placed in the foremost rank among the epic bards, and Quintilian has pronounced that his tragedy of Thyestes might stand a comparison with any production of the Grecian stage. But notwithstanding the high fame which he enjoyed among his contemporaries, and which was confirmed by the deliberate judgment of succeeding ages, there is scarcely any ancient author of celebrity concerning whose personal history we are more completely ignorant. We cannot determine the date of his birth, nor of his death, nor are we acquainted with any of the leading events of his career. This has arisen partly from the absolute silence of those from whom we might reasonably have hoped to glean some information, partly from the circumstance that he upon no occasion mingled in the business of public life, and partly from the confusion which prevails in MSS. between the names Varius, Varro, and Varus, the last especially being an appellation borne by several remarkable personages both political and literary towards the downfall of the republic, and under the early emperors. If we dismiss mere fanciful conjectures the sum total of our actual knowledge may be expressed in a very few words.

1. We may conclude with certainty that he was senior to Virgil. This seems to be proved by the well-known lines of Horace (Sat. i. 10. 44), forte epos acer

Ut nemo Varivs ducit: molle atque facetum Virgilio aduerunt gaudentes rude Camonae);

for from these we may at once infer that Varus had already established his reputation in heroic song while Virgil was known only as a pastoral bard.

2. He enjoyed the friendship of Maceenas from a very early period, since it was to the recommendation of Varus in conjunction with that of Virgil, that Horace was indebted for an introduction to the minister, an event which took place not later than B. C. 39, for we know that the three poets accompanied the great man upon his mission to Brundisium B. C. 39.

3. He was alive subsequent to B. C. 19. This cannot be questioned, if we believe the joint testimony of Hieronymus (Chron. Euseb. Olymp. ex. 4) and Donatus (Vit. Virg. xiv. § 53, 57), who assert that Virgil on his death bed appointed Plotius Tucca and Varus his literary executors, and that they revised the Aeneid, but in obedience to the strict injunctions of its author made no additions.

It has been supposed from a passage of Horace in the Epistle to Augustus (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 247), that Varus was dead at the time when it was published, that is, about B. C. 10, but the words do not warrant the conclusion.

The only works by Varus of which any record has been preserved are:

I. De Morte. Macrobius (Sat. vi. 2) informs us that the eighty-eight line of Virgil's eighth eclogue was borrowed from a poem by Varus, bearing the singular title De Morte. Hence this production must have been written in heroic verse, and it seems highly probable that the chief subject was a lamentation for the death of Julius Caesar on whose glories, John of Salisbury assures us (Polyrat. viii. 14), the muse of Varus shed a brilliant lustre. Four fragments have been preserved by Macrobius (Sat. vi. 1, 2), in all of which Virus had been copied or imitated by Virgil. The longest, extending to six lines, contains a description of a hound couched in highly spirited and sonorous language.

II. Panegyricus in Caesarum Octaveannum, from which Horace, according to the Scholiasts, borrowed the lines inserted by him in the sixteenth Epistle of his first book (27, foll.).

"Tene magis salutum populus velit, an populum tu, Scerot in ambiguo, qui consulti et tibi et urbi Jupiter,"

No other specimen has been preserved.

III. Thyestes. The admiration excited by this drama, the last probably of the works of Varus, was so intense that it seems to have overshadowed the renown which he had previously acquired in epic poetry, and this may account for the omission of his name by Quintilian when enumerating those who had excelled in this department. A strange story grew up and was circulated among the mediæval scholiasts, that Varus was not really the author of the Thyestes, but that he stole it, according to one account (Schol. ad Hor. Ep. i. 4. 4), from Casius of Parma, according to another from Virgil. (Serv. ad Virg. Eel. iii. 20; comp. Schol. ad Virg. Eel. vi. 3; Donat. Vit. Virg. xx. § 81.) Weichert has with much ingenuity devised a theory to account for the manner in which the mistake arose, but it is scarcely worth while to refute a fable which has ever been regarded as ridiculous. No portion of the tragedy has descended to us except a few words, and one sentence quoted by Marius Victorinus (A. G. p. 2563, ed. Patuc.), which critics have in vain endeavoured to mould into verse. It appears from a Codex rescriptus in the royal library of Paris, of which Schneidewin has given an account (Rheinisches Museum, vol. i. p. 106; fol. Nene Folge, 1842), that a MS. of the Theopomps was extant in the eighth century of our cen. It is from this Codex that we learn that Rufus was the cognomen of Varrius; and it is further stated that the Theopomps was performed after the return of Augustus from the battle of Actium, and that the poet received a million of sesterces (sostertium decies) for it. (Hor. Sat. i. 9. 23, Carm.

i. 6, Ar. Poet, 55; Martial, viii. 18, Quintil. x. 1.
$ 98; Macrobr. Sat. ii. 4; Porphyry’s Horat. Carm. i. 6; Donat. Vit. Virg. xv. $ 56.) Weichert has collected with much industry, and combined with much ingenuity all that can be fixed with certainty, or surmised with probability concerning Varrius, but he is obliged to acknowledge that with the exception of the few facts detailed above everything which has been advanced, rests upon simple conjecture. See his essay, “De Lucili Varri ei Cassii Parmensis Vita et Carminibus,” 8vo.

VARRIUS, K. AEMLIUS K. P. QUI-RINA, an architect, known by an extant inscription, in which he is described as Architectus Exerclit., from which it appears that he devoted especial attention to military engineering, which, among the ancients, was always considered a branch of architecture. (Donati, Suppl. vol. i.

VARRO, CINGO’NIUS, a Roman senator under Nero, supported the claims of Nymphidius to the throne on the death of Nero, and was put to death in consequence by Galba, being at the

VARRO, RUBRIUS. [Rubrius, No. 2.]
VARRO, TERENTIUS. I. C. TERENTIUS
VARRO, consul b. c. 216 with L. Aemilius Paulus.
Varro is said to have been the son of a butcher, to have carried on business himself as a factor in his early years, and to have risen to eminence by pleading the causes of the lower classes in opposition to the opinion of all good men. (Livy. xxii.
25, foll.; Val. Max. iii. 4. § 4.) Whether these tales are true or exaggerated, cannot be ascertained; but it may be regarded as certain that he sprung from the lower classes, and was looked upon as the leading champion of the popular party.
He cannot have been such a despicable person as Livy represents, for otherwise the senate would not have gone out to meet him after the battle of Cannae to return him thanks because he had not despaired of his country; nor would he have been employed, as we shall find to have been the case, during the remainder of the war in important military commands. Varro is first mentioned in
b. c. 217, when he supported the bill for giving to M. Minucius Rufus, the master of the horse, power equal to that of the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus.
Varro had been praetor in the year before, and had previously filled the offices ofquestor and of plebeian and curule aedile. The people now resolved to raise him to the consulship, thinking that it only needed a man of energy and decision at the head of an overwhelming force to bring the war to a close. The aristocracy offered in vain the greatest opposition to his election; he was not only returned consul, but returned alone, in order that he might preside at the comitia for the election of his colleague. The other consul chosen was L. Aemilius Paulus, one of the leaders of the aristocratical party. The history of their campaign against Hannibal, which was terminated by the memorable defeat at Cannae, is related elsewhere.
[Hannibal, p. 336.] The battle was fought by Varro against the advice of Paulus. The Roman army was all but annihilated. Paulus and almost all the officers perished. Varro was one of the few who escaped, and reached Venusia in safety, with about seventy horsemen. His conduct after the battle seems to have been deserving of high praise. He proceeded to Cannae, where the remnant of the Roman army had taken refuge, and there, with great presence of mind, adopted every precaution by which the exigencies of the case required. (Dion Cass. xlix. 24, Reim.) His conduct was appreciated by the senate and the people, and his defeat was forgotten in the services he had lately rendered. On his return to the city all classes went out to meet him, and the senate returned him thanks because he had not despaired of the commonwealth. (Livy. xxii. 23, 26, 35—61; Polyb. iii. 106—116; Plut. Fab. 14
— 18; Appian, Annib. 17—26; Zonar. i. 1; Val.
Max. iii. 4. § 4; Oros. iv. 16; Eutrop. iii. 10;
Cic. Brut. 19, Cato, 20.)
Varro continued to be employed in Italy for several successive years in important military commands till nearly the close of the Punic war. In
b. c. 203, he was one of the three ambassadors sent to Philip in Macedonien, and three years afterwards (b. c. 200) was again sent on an embassy to Africa to arrange the terms of peace with Vermina, the son of Syphax. On his return in the course of the same year, Varro was appointed one of the triumvirs for settling new colonists at Venusia.
(Livy. xxii. 32, xxv. 6, xxvii. 33, xxx. 20, xxxi.
11, 49.)
2. A TERENTIUS VARRO, served in Greece in
b. c. 189, and was elected praetor in b. c. 184, when he obtained Neerar Spain as his province.
He carried on the war with success, defeated the Celtiberi in several battles, and on his return to Rome in b. c. 182, received the honour of an ovation, which is recorded in the Triumphal Fasti. In
b. c. 172, Varro was sent on an embassy to the Illyrian King Gensius, and in b. c. 167 was one of the ten commissioners appointed to settle the affairs of Macedonia, in conjunction with Aemilius Paulus after the conquest of Persia. (Livy. xxxvii. 48, 49, xxxix. 32; 38, 41, 56, xl. 2, 16.)
3. M. TERENTIUS VARRO, the celebrated antiquary. See below.
4. M. TERENTIUS VARRO LUCULLUS, consul b. c.
73, was brother of L. Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithridates, and was adopted by M. Terentius Varro. An account of him is given under Lu-cullus, No. 6.
5. A. TERENTIUS VARRO MURENA, is first mentioned in b. c. 69, when he was a witness in the case of A. Caecina, whom Cicero defended in that year. Cicero mentions him in his correspondence as one of his friends. He belonged to the aristocratical party, and served under Pompey in Greece, in b. c. 48. (Cic. pro Orat. xiii. 22, xvi. 12; Cæs. B. C. iii. 19.)
6. A. TERENTIUS VARRO MURENA, consul
b. c. 23, is spoken of under Murena, No. 7.
Drumman conjectures that he was the son of L. Licinius Murer, consul b. c. 62, and was adopted by A. Terentius Varro; but as A. Varro is also called Murer [No. 5], he may have been own son of A. Varro, as Manutius supposed.

7. M. Terentius Varro Gibba, in conjunction with Cicero, defended Sanfeius when he was accused of eis in b. c. 52. He was a young man, whom Cicero had trained in oratory; and in the civil war he passed over from Brundusium to Asia in order to carry a letter of Cicero's to Caesar. In b. c. 46, he was guardian of M. Brutus in Czalpine Gaul, to whom Cicero gave him a letter of recommendation. He died in the course of this year or the following. (Ascon. in Cic. Mil. p. 55; Orelli; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 10, ad Att. xii. 48.)

VARRO, M. TERE^NTIUS, whose vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature earned for him the title of the "most learned of the Romans" (Quintil. x. 1. § 55; Cic. Acad. i. 2, 3; Augustin. de Civ. Doi, vi. 2), was born b. c. 116, being exactly ten years senior to Cicero, with whom he lived for a long period on terms of close intimacy and warm friendship. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 1—6.) He was trained under the superintendence of L. Aelius Silio Praconinus, a member of the equestrian order, a man, we are told (Cic. Brut. 56), of high character, familiarly acquainted with the Greek and Latin writers in general, and especially well versed in the antiquities of his own country, some of which, such as the hymnus of the Salli and the Laws of the Twelve Tables, he illustrated by commentaries. Varro, having imbibed from this preceptor a taste for these pursuits, which he cultivated in after life with so much devotion and success, completed his education by attending the lectures of Antiochus (Acad. iii. 12), a philosoper of the Academy, with a leaning perhaps towards the Stoic school, and then embarked in public life. We have no distinct record of his regular advancement in the service of the state, but we know that he held a high naval command in the wars against the pirataes and Mithridates (Plin. H. N. iii. 11, vii. 36; Appian, Mithr. 95; Varr. R. R. ii. praef.), that he served as the legatus of Pompeius in Spain on the first outbreak of civil strife, and that, although compelled to surrender his forces to Caesar, he remained steadfast to the cause of the senate, and passing over into Greece shared the fortunes of his party until their hopes were finally crushed by the battle of Pharsalia. When further resistance was fruitless, he yielded himself to the clemency of the conqueror, by whom he was most graciously received, and employed in superintending the collection and arrangement of the great library designed for public use. (Caes. B. C. i. 38, ii. 17—20; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 13, de Div. i. 53; Suet. Jul. Caes. 34, 44.) Before, however, it was known that he had secured the forgiveness and favour of the dictator, his villa at Casinum had been seized and plundered by Antonius, an event upon which Cicero dwells with great effect in his second Philippic (cc. 40, 41), contrasting the pure and lofty pursuits which its walls were in the habit of witnessing with the foul excesses and coarse debauchery of its captor. For some years after this period Varro remained in literary seclusion, passing his time chiefly at his country seats near Cumae and Tuscumel, occupied with study and composition, and so indifferent to the state of public affairs that while the storm was raging all around, he alone appeared to have found refuge in a secure haven. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 6.) Upon the formation of the second triumvirate, although now upwards of seventy years old, his name appeared along with that of Cicero upon the list of the proscribed, but more fortunate than his friend he succeeded in making his escape, and, after having remained for some time concealed (Appian, B. C. iv. 47), in securing the protection of Octavianus. The remainder of his career was passed in tranquillity, and he continued to labour in his favourite studies, although his magnificent library had been destroyed, a loss to him irreparable. His death took place b. c. 28, when he was in his eighty-ninth year (Plin. H. N. xxix. 4; Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 188. 1). It is to be observed that M. Terentius Varro, in consequence of his having possessed extensive estates in the vicinity of Reate, is styled Reatius by Symmachus (Ep. 1), and probably by Sidonius Apollinaris also (Ep. iv. 32), a designation which has been very frequently adopted by later writers in order to distinguish him from Varro Ataecius.

Not only was Varro the most learned of Roman scholars, but he was likewise the most voluminous of Roman authors [homo pollygraphos], Cic. ad Att. xiv. 10. He had read so much, says St. Augustine, that we must feel astonished that he found any time to write anything; and so much that we can scarcely believe that any one could find time to read all that he composed. We have his own authority for the assertion that he had composed no less than four hundred and ninety books (septuginta hebdomadas librorum, Gell. iii. 10), several of which, however, were never published, having perished with his library. The disappearance of many more may be accounted for by the topics of which they treated being such as to afford little interest to general readers, and by the somewhat repulsive character of the style in which they were couched, for the warmest admirers of Varro admit that he possessed little eloquence, and was more distinguished by profundity of knowledge than by felicity of expression. Making every allowance for these circumstances, it must still be considered remarkable that only one of his works has descended to us entire, and that of one more only has considerable fragments been preserved. The remainder have either totally disappeared or present merely a few disjointed scraps from which we are unable to form any estimate of their contents or their merits.

1. De Re Rustica Libri IIII., written when the author was eighty years old. This is unquestionably the most important of all the treatises upon ancient agriculture now extant, being far superior to the more voluminous production of Columella, with which alone it can be compared. The one is the well-digested system of an experienced and successful farmer who had seen and practised all that he records, the other is the common-place book of an industrious compiler, who had collected a great variety of information from a great variety of sources, but was incapable of estimating justly the value or the accuracy of the particulars which he detailed. The work before us exhibits to a remarkable extent, perhaps to excess, the methodical arrangement, the technical divisions, and laborious classifications in which Varro appears to have taken such delight. Thus, in the first book, addressed to his wife Fundania, which is occupied... with agriculture proper, that is, with the cultivation of the ground in order to render it susceptible of producing abundantly and profitably various crops, we are told that the science of tilling the earth (agricultura) may be reduced to four great heads.

A. A knowledge of the farm itself (cognitio fundi), that is, of the locality which is to be the scene of the operations to be performed, including the situation, soil, climate, and buildings.

B. A knowledge of the instruments requisite for performing the necessary operations (quae in eo fundo opus sint ac debent esse culturae causa).

C. A knowledge of the operations to be performed (quae in eo fundo coelestis causa sint facienda).

D. A knowledge of the time when each operation ought to be performed (quo quidquid tempore in eo fundo fieri conveniat).

Each of these four heads must be divided into two.

A.
1. a. The things appertaining to the soil itself (quae ad solum pertinent terrae).
   b. The things appertaining to the buildings (ad villas et stabula).

1. a. The human instruments.
   b. All other instruments.

A.
1. a. The various crops to be cultivated.
   b. The localities suitable for each.

b.
1. a. The time when with reference to the course of the sun.
   b. The time when with reference to the course of the moon.

Again, each of these divisions is split up into a number of subdivisions, as for example

A.
1. a. The outward aspect of the ground.
   b. The qualities of soil.
   c. The quantity of ground.
   d. The security of the farm.

1. a. Their situation.
   b. Their size.
   c. The arrangement of the different parts.

A.
1. a. Free labourers.
   b. Slaves.

b.
1. a. Animate, such as oxen, horses, &c.
   b. Inanimate, such as ploughs, harrows, &c.

1. I. Books eight to thirteen were devoted to the inflictions of nouns and verbs, the only two classes of words acknowledged by Varro (De Declinationibus). He here examined into the nature and object of those forms which he separated into two divisions, the natural and the arbitrary, the former falling under lex, the latter under connotation.

II. Books fourteen to twenty-four were occupied with the laws of syntax (Ut verba inter se connotation).
fashion of many of his contemporaries in all cases of difficulty and doubt, is in itself sound; and if not pushed to extravagant excess ought to have led to most important results. But when he proceeds to the actual work of determining roots, that spirit of folly which seems to have taken possession of his countrymen whenever they approached the subject of etymology, asserts its dominion over him, and we find a farrago of absurd derivations. Thus, within the compass of a few lines, we are told that canis is taken from caneo because dogs give signals at night and in the chase, as horns and trumpets give notes to music; and in the field of natural science aqua is so called because it is agnatus to a sheep; that cerei comes from gero (changing g into c) because stags carry (gerunt) great horns; that virgulis is from viridis and viridis from vis, because if the strength (vis) of the sap is dried up the green leaf perishes; that dives is from ditus because the rich man, like a god, is in want of nothing — and examples equally ridiculous abound in every page.

The Editio Princeps of the books De Lingua Latina appeared in quarto without date or name of place; but bibliographers have determined that it was printed at Rome in 1471. The editor was Pomponius Laetus, and the MS. which he employed was full of interpolations. The text however retained some semblance of its true form until Antonius Augustinus, following a MS. which embodied the innumerable changes foisted in by the Italians of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, presented Varro under an aspect totally fictitious (8vo. Rom. 1557). This edition, however, remained the standard until Spigel (8vo. Berol. 1826) and Ottheinrich Müller (8vo. Lips. 1833) by a careful examination of the most ancient and trustworthy codices laboriously separated the genuine matter from the spurious, and gave the scholar safe access to the treasures stored up in this curious repository.

III. Sententiae. Vincentius of Beauvais, who flourished during the first half of the thirteenth century, quotes several pithy sayings which he ascribes to Varro; and in his Speculum Historiale (vii. 58) introduces a collection of these with the words " Extant igitur sententiae Varro ad Atheniensem auditorem morales atque notabilis de quibus has paucas quae sequuntur excepit." Bar-thius, who seems to have been altogether unacquainted with the previous researches of Vincentius, published in his Adversaria (xv. 19) eighteen "sententiae" which he found ascribed to Varro in a MS. of no very ancient date, but written before the invention of printing, and these were reprinted by Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Latina, lib. i. c. vii. § 4. Schneider picked out forty-seven of these sententiae from the works of Vincentius, of which sixteen coincided with those of Barthius, and appended the whole to the life of Varro contained in the first volume of the Scriptores Rei Rusticae Latini veteres (8vo. Lips. 1794). Finally, Professor Devit of Padua greatly increased the number from two MSS. in the library of the seminary to which he belonged, and gave them to the world, together with those formerly known, and some others derived from different sources, making up in all one hundred and sixty-five, in a little volume entitled Sententiae M. Terentii Varroonis maior ex parte inedita, &c. edidit, &c. Vincentius Devit, 8vo. Patav. 1843. Notwithstanding the expression of Vincentius of Beauvais, Sententiæ Var-though they had eluded his eager researches at a later period of life when he was more fully aware of their value. But the words of the poet, although to a certain extent ambiguous, certainly do not warrant the interpretation generally assigned to them, nor does there seem to be any foundation for the story that these and other works of Varro were destroyed by the orders of Pope Gregory the Great, in order to conceal the plagiarisms of St. Augustine. There is no sure evidence that they survived the sixth century, and it is by no means improbable that they may have fallen a sacrifice to the fanatical zeal of ignorant churchmen, who could behold in them nothing save a repository of idle and blasphemous superstition. (See L. H. Krahner, Commentatio de M. Terentii Varri within the fields, or on the borders of the fields only in women's presence. As the chapter proceeds, however, we possess eighteen short effusions, some of them more fragments, which were probably included in his Saturni, or attached to his Imagines, but they can scarcely belong to the piece or pieces to which Cicero alludes when he says (Acad. i. 3), "plurimumque poetae nostri omnino Latinae et litterae luminis atque et varios et euntes uno fere numero poemiae socios." Quinuntii (i. 4. § 4) mentions "Varrem nec Lucretium in Latinis qui praecepta sapientiae versibus tradiderunt," words by no means explicit, and which moreover leave us in ignorance whether Terentius Varro or Varro Ant cinus is the individual indicated. See Eichstaedt, De T. Lucretii Cari Vita et Carmine, prefixed to the first volume of his edition of Lucretius. p. xxxvi.

On Historico-Antiquarian topics we hear of De Cultu Doorum Liber — De Vita Populi Romani, otherwise, De Vita Patrum, dedicated to Atticus, of which the eleventh book is quoted — De Gente Populi Romani Libri IV. — De Ineditis Urbis Romae Liber — De Republca, of which the twentieth book is quoted — De Familias Trojanae — Annales, of which the third book is quoted — Bellum Punicum secundum, of which the second book is quoted — but although we find the whole of the above titles in the grammarians, it seems probable that several of them belong to particular sections of the Antiquitates.

In biography, De Vita sua Liber, and a production of a very singular character, Hbdomades vel De Imaginiibus, which, according to the most natural explanation of the obscure description in Pliny compared with the allusions found elsewhere, must have been a sort of album containing (engraved or painted) portraits of several hundred remarkable personages from Homer and Hesiod downwards, with a biographical notice and an epitaph attached to each. How these representations were executed and multiplied is a problem very hard to solve, and one which has excited much discussion. (See Plineu.

VARRO.

In criticism, De Proprietate Scriptorum — De Poetis Libri, of which the first is quoted — De Poenatis Libri, of which the second is quoted — De Actionibus Scelestis Libri, of which the second and fifth are quoted — De scenici Originibus Libri, of which the first and third are quoted — De Plautinis Comedios Libri — De Plautinis Quaestiones Libri, of which the second is quoted — Rhetoricon Libri, of which the twentieth is quoted — De Utilitate Sermonis Libri, of which the fourth is quoted — De Compositione Saturorum.

In philosophy, De Philosophia Libri, containing, it would appear, a sketch of the different schools and of the peculiar doctrines by which they were characterised. (See Augustin, de Civ. Dei, xii. 4, xix. 1.) To this Cicero may refer when he observes (Acad. i. 5), "philosophiam multí locís inchoasti, ad impellendum satis, ad edoneum parum," although these words seem to point not so much to any single work as to passages scattered up and down in various works. Charisius quotes the second book De Forma Philosophica, and Servius a treatise entitled Atravis s. Cause, of the same nature as those by Callimachus, Butas, Plutarch, and others.

In geography, Ephemeron Navalis — Ephemeron — Libri Navales — De Ora maritima — Litüralia — De Aestuarioru — Propoestico — but all of these belong, it would appear, to a single essay, a sort of Mariner's Directory to the coast of Spain, drawn up for the use of Pompeius when about to proceed thither and assume the command. See the Itinerarium Alexandri, c. 3, published by Angelo Mai in the fifth volume of the Classicæ Antecores et Vaticanis Codicibus editi, 8vo. Rom. 1835, and compare Cic. ad Att. v. 11. For the treatise by Varro entitled Chronographia, see Varro ATACINUS.

Of a miscellaneous character were Epistolicorum Quaestionario Libri, of which the eighth is quoted — Disciplinarum Libri, one of which treated of Architecture and another of Arithmetic — Complexionum Libri, of which the sixth is quoted — Epistolae, addressed to C. Caesar, Fabius, Ser. Sulpicius, Marcellus, and others — Ad Liconem, of which the first book is quoted — De Bibliothecis, of which the second book is quoted — De Gradibus Necessitudinum — Περὶ χαρακτηρων, of which the third book is quoted — Mensuraria s. De Mensuris — and many others, of which several, as remarked above, ought to be classed under the Saturae.

A collection of the fragments of Varro was first printed by Robert and Henry Stephens in their Fragmenta Poetarum veterum Latinarum, Paris, 1564. Ausonio Pope, after having edited (1591) a collection of fragments from the Menippean Satires, the Libri Logistici and the De Philosophia, published a very extensive collection of fragments from all the works of Varro, at Franeker (Franquerue) in 1599, which was reprinted at Leyden in 1601, and has served as the basis of all subsequent collections, such as that appended to the Bipont edition of the books De Lingua Latina, 8vo. 1788, which is the most convenient for general reference.

The annexed coin was struck by Varro, when he served under Pompeius in the war against the pirates; and we learn from the coin that he was at that time the proconsul of Pompeius. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 322.)

COIN OF M. TERENTIUS VARRO.

VARRO, P. TERENTIUS VARRO.

VARRO, a Latin poet of considerable celebrity, surnamed ATACINUS, from the Atas, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, his native province, was born, according to Hieronymus, n. c. 82, and in the thirty-fifth year of his age applied himself with the greatest zeal to the study of Greek literature. Of his personal history nothing further is known. He is believed to have been the composer of the following works, of which a few inconsiderable fragments only have come down to us, but it must be remarked that considerable doubt prevails with regard to several of the pieces commonly ascribed to this writer in consequence of the difficulty experienced in distinguishing between P. Terentius Varro Atacinus and his illustrious contemporary M. Terentius Varro Restatins, when the cognomen alone is mentioned without the characteristic epithet. Hence it is highly probable that several relics assigned to the latter may in reality belong to the former and vice versa.

I. Argonautica, or, as it is termed by Probus (ad Virg. Georg. i. 4), Corpus Argonautarum, a free translation, it would seem, with, perhaps, additions and variations, of the well-known poem by Apollonius Rhodius. Upon this piece the fame of Varro chiefly rested, as we may gather from the criticism of Quintilian (x. 1. § 87). "Atacius Varro in iis, per quae nomen est acceptus, interpretat operis alieni, non spernendus quidem, verum ad angustum facultatem discordi parum locuples." It is referred to by Propercius (ii. 25. 85), by Ovid (Aenam. i. 15. 21), Art. Am. iii. 335, Trist. iii. 439, and by Statius (Silv. ii. 7. 77). Seven lines and a half, in all, have been preserved in five fragments (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. i. 66, Aen. x. 396; Senec. Contra cont. xvi.; comp. Senec. Ep. lvi.; Chars. p. 70, ed. Putsch.; Quintil. i. 5. § 18).

II. Chronographia s. Cosmographia, the same probably with what is sometimes termed Varroinis Iter, appears to have been a metrical system of astronomy and geography. Hence Varro Atacinus is named by Pliny as one of his authorities in Books iii.—vi. of the Historia Naturalis. About twenty lines, supposed to belong to this poem, have been preserved in six fragments. (Marius Victorin. p. 2563, ed. Putsch.; Isidorus, Orig. xviii. 7. § 58; Priscian. pp. 609, 709, ed. Putsch.; Chars. p. 45, ed. Putsch.; Philargyrr. et Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iii. 175; Burmann, Anthol. Lat. v. 48, foll.)

III. Libri Navales. Vegetius (de Re Mil. v. 11), when speaking of the prognostics of the weather afforded by animals, gives as one of his authorities, "Varro in Navalis Libris," and John of Salisbury (Policrat. ii. 2) employs almost the same words. Werndorff endeavours to prove that the work spoken of was a voluminous poem upon navigation, including a description of various coasts and islands, and that the Varro here indicated was not, as has been generally supposed, M. Terentius Varro, but Varro Atacinus. He believes, moreover, that we must interpret the compleat in Ovid (ex Pont. iv. 16. 21),

"Velivolique maris vates, cui credere possis Carmina coeruleus composisse deos," as an allusion to this production, and that Solinus (Polyhist. 11), when he quotes "Varro de Litora-ligus," had in his eye either the Chronographia or the Libri Navales. Eight lines added by Servius (ad Virg. Georg. 1. 575, ed. 494), as the words of "Varro," he supposes to be extracted from these books. (Anthol. Lat. iv. 49. 49, ed. Burmann, or No. 78, ed. Meyer.)

IV. A. Gellius (x. 7) notices a book in which "Varro" descended upon Europe, and Festus cites from "Varro in Europa," the expression tuta sun sub sede fuisse, which lead us to conclude that it was in verse. If we admit that Varro Atacinus is the individual here designated, we may conjecture that the "Europa" formed a portion either of the Chronographia or of the Libri Navales.

V. Bellum Sosquianicum, an heroic poem in not less than two books (Priscian. p. 577, ed. Patsch.) on the campaign of Julius Caesar against the league formed by Vercingetorix, the details of which are given in the seventh book of the Gallic War. One line remains. (See Priscian. l. c.)

VI. Amatory elegies, the title of the collection being, it has been conjectured, Leucadia. Thus Propertius has (ii. 25. 83)

"Hacque quoque perfecto ludebat Basone Varro, Varro Leucadiae maxima fama suae."

(al. leg. max. cura al. max. famma,) and Ovid (Trist. ii. 439),

"Is quoque, Phasiacas Argo qui duxit in undas, Non potuit Veneris furtar tacee suae."

VII. Epigrammata. One of these survives, an epitaph on Licinus, the freedman of Augustus. See Anthol. Lat. ii. 37, ed. Burmann, or No. 77, ed. Meyer.

IX. Satyrae. These, we are assured by Horace (Sat. i. 10. 46), were a failure.

"Hoc erat, experto frustra Varrone Atacino."

If we can trust the old commentators on this passage, Varro was sensible of his own deficiencies, and never formally published his essays in this department, so that we need feel no surprise that no trace of them should have remained.

We may observe that several of the fragments of this author have been quoted by the grammarians, in consequence of the plausibility having been imitated by Virgil, who has appropriated some lines entire without change. (Hieron. Chron. Enaeus. Olymp. clxv. 3; Porphy. ad Hor. Sat. i. 10. 46; Ruhnken. in Hom. hymn, in Cicer. &c., epist. crit. ii.; Wernsdorf. Poetae Lat. Min. vol. v. pt. iii. p. 1835, foll. 7; Willirm, Commentatio de P. Terentii Varronis Vita et Scriptis, 4to. Monaster. 1829. See also the notes of Meyer, in his edition of the Anthologia Latina, No. 77, 78.) [W. R.] of Varro, he supposes to have been expelled from the senate by Tiberius, in a. d. 17, on account of having lost his property by extravagance. (Tacr. Ann. ii. 48.)

VARRO, VISELLIUS. I. C. VISCELLIUS VARRO, the son of the jurist C. Auleo, who married Helvia, the sister of Cicero's mother.

VARRO was consequently the first cousin of Cicero. He was trained by his father in a knowledge of the civil law. He served as tribune of the soldiers in Asia about B. C. 79, and during Cicero's banishment he drew up the rogatio which the tribune T. Fadius Gallus intended to bring forward to recall the orator. Varro died after holding the office of curule aedile. (Cic. Brut. 17, Verr. i. 28, ad Att. iii. 28, where some editions have T. Visellius.) Varro had an intrigue with Otacilla, of which Valerius Maximus (viii. 2. 9) relates a tale, but this is not mentioned by Cicero. (Comp. Drumann, Geschichte Rom, vol. v. p. 214.)

2. C. VISCELLIUS C. F. C. N. VARRO, son apparently of No. 1, consul successus a. d. 12, two years before the death of Augustus. (Fasti Capit.) He appears to be the same as the Visellius Varro, who was legatus of Lower Germany in a. d. 21. (Tacr. Ann. iii. 41.)

3. LVISCELLIUS C. F. C. N. VARRO, son of No. 2, was consul a. d. 24 with Ser. Cornelius Cethegus. In order to please Sejanus, Varro in his consulship accused C. Silius, who had commanded in Germany at the same time as his father, and he covered his disgraceful compliance with the wishes of Sejanus by the pretext of his father's enmity against Silius. (Tacr. Ann. iv. 17, 19.) [SILIIUS, No. 5.]

VARRONIA/NUS, son of the emperor Jovianus, was consul with his father in a. d. 364. (Eutrop. x. 18; Amm. Marc. xxv. 10; Socrat. H. E. iii. 26, 2.)

VARUS, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, was indicative, like many other Roman cognomnes, of a bodily defect or peculiarity; such as Capito, Naso, Paeus, Strabo, Securus, &c. Varus signifies a person who had his legs bent inwards (varum distortis curvulis, Hor. Sat. i. 3. 47), and was opposed to Valgus, which signified a person having his legs turned outwards.

VARUS. 1. L. VARUS, an Epicurean, and a friend of Caesar, mentioned by Quintilian (vi. 3. § 78). See Varus, ATUS, No. 2, sub finem.

2. VARUS, a friend and patron of Virgil, to whom he dedicated his sixth eclogue, and whom he mentions in the ninth (ix. 27). He is perhaps the same as Q. Atius Varus, one of Caesar's officers. [VARUS, ATUS, No. 2.]

3. VARUS, to whom Horace addresses one of his odes (i. 18), is perhaps the same as the critic Quin-tillus (Hor. Ar. Poët. 438), whose death Horace deprecates. (Carmina. i. 24.) Respecting him see Varus, QuINTILiUS, No. 12.

VARUS, ALFENUS, whose praenomen may have been Publius, was a pupil of Servius Sulpicius, and the only pupil of Servius from whom there are any excerpts in the Digest. Nothing is known about him except from a story preserved by the scholar Acron, in his notes on the Satires of Horace. (Sat. i. 3. 130.) The scholar assumes the "Alfenus Vafor" of Horace to be the lawyer, and says that he was a native of Cremona, where he carried on the trade of a barber or a butcher of shoes (for there are both readings, sutor and ton-or); that he came to Rome, where he became a pupil of Servius Sulpicius, attained the dignity of the consulship, and was honoured with a public funeral. Pomponius also states that Varus attained the consular dignity; but this will not prove the rest of the scholar's story to be true. The P. Alfenus Varus, who was consul in a. d. 2, can hardly be the jurat who was the pupil of Servius; and it is conjectured that he may have been the jurist's son. It is impossible to determine what credit is due to the scholar on Horace: he must have found the story somewhere, or have invented it. Indeed he and other scholiasts do sometimes favour us with a commentary which tells us nothing more than the text. On this question, a note of Wieland (No. 12) to his translation of the Satires of Horace may be consulted. The fact of an Alfenus being a native of Cremona, and of an Alfenus having been a pupil of Servius, and a learned jurist, and of an Alfenus having been consul, is quite enough to enable a scholiast with the assistance of the passage in Horace to fabricate the whole story of Alfenus, as he has given it.

There are fifty-four excerpts in the Digest from the forty books of the Digesta of Alfenus; but it is conjectured that Alfenus may have acted only as the editor of a work of Servius. It appears from the fragments of Alfenus, that he was acquainted with the Greek language, and these fragments show that he wrote in a pure and perspicuous style. A passage which appears in the Digest (Dig. tit. 5, s. 76), shows that he was not a stranger to the speculations of the philosophers. According to Gellius (vi. 5), Alfenus was somewhat curious in matters of antiquity, and Gellius quotes a passage from the thirty-fourth book of his Digest in which Alfenus mentions one of the terms of a treaty between the Romans and the Carthaginians. Alfenus is often cited by the later jurists. The fragments in the Digest are taken from the second to the seventh book of the Digest, and there are fragments from the eighth book taken from the epitome by Paulus. The entire number of books appears from the Florentine Index; the passage in Gellius quotes the thirty-fourth book; and a passage of Paulus (Dig. 3. tit. 5, s. 21) cites the thirty-ninth book. Whether the epitome of Paulus went further than the eighth book or not, is uncertain. The epitome of Paulus is sometimes cited, "Libri epitomarum Alfeni Digestorum," sometimes with the omission of the word "Digestorum," and sometimes thus, "Libri Dig. Alfeni a Paulo epitomatorum."

The passage in Gellius (vi. 5), "Alfenus . . . in libro Digestorum trigesimo et quarto, Coniectaneorum (Coniectaneorum is perhaps the better reading) autem secundo," &c., has given rise to some discussion. It is clear that the passage in the Coniectanea is attributed to Alfenus, for the words are "Alfenus says in the Digest and in the Coniectanea," and it is also clear that only one passage is meant; or at most the same passage is referred to as being in two different works. But apparently only one work is meant, and therefore we must conclude that the Digesta, which consisted of forty books, contained a subdivision called the Coniectanea. Some critics have conjectured that the Coniectanea is the compilation of Aufidius Namusa (Namusa), so that the passage cited by Gellius appeared both in the original work of Alfenus, and in the copious compilation of Namusa, which is made from Alfenus and other pupils of Servius. (Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsult.; Puchta, Inst. i. 428; Zimmern, Geschichte des Rom. Privatrechts, i. 293.)

VARUS, ALFENUS or ALFENIUS, perhaps a descendant of the jurist, was one of the generals of Vitellius in the civil war in a. d. 69. He served under Publius Valens as praefect of the camp, when the latter marched with the Vitellian troops from Germany to Italy, and he fought at the decisive battle of Bedriacum, which secured the empire for Vitellius. With Caecina, who had been sent to oppose the generals of Vespasian, he deserted the cause of Vitellius, the latter appointed Varus praefectus praetorio in place of P. Sahinus, who was a friend of the traitor Caecina. After the defeat of the Vitellian troops at Cremona, Varus was sent, along with Julius Priscus, at the head of the praetorian cohorts and some other troops to guard the passes of the Apennines; but on the approach of the Vespasian army, the soldiers of Varus and Priscus deserted in such numbers to the enemy, that they were obliged to abandon their camp and return to Rome. Varus survived the fall of his master, and also, according to the words of Tacitus, ignaviae infirmaeque sua superfuit. (Tac. Hist. ii. 29, 43, iii. 56, 55, 61, iv. 11.)

VARUS, ARIUS, served as praefectus of a cohort under Corbulo in the war against the Parthians a. d. 54, in which he obtained the character of a brave and able officer. He was so much esteemed that he have cumulatis Corbulo to Nero, and to have been advanced in consequence to the rank of chief centurion (primum pilum aedete). At the death of Nero he held this rank in the seventh legion, which was stationed in Pannonia under the command of Antonius Primus, whom he cordially supported, when the latter espoused the cause of Vespasian, and resolved to march into Italy against Vitellius. After Vitellius had been slain, and Primus had obtained possession of Rome, Varus was appointed commander of the praetorian troops (Praefectus Praetorio), and received the insignia of the praetorship. Upon the arrival of Mucianus shortly afterwards, who was jealous both of Primus and of Varus, the latter was deprived of the command of the praetorian troops, which was assumed by Mucianus himself, but Varus, as a compensation, was made Praefectus Annonee. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 9, Hist. iii. 6, 16, 52, iv. 2, 4, 11, 39, 68.)

VARUS, ATTIUS. I. P. ATTUS VARUS, a zealous partisan of Pompey in the civil war. He had already held the office of praetor, but in what year is uncertain, and had obtained Africa as his province. (Caes. B. C. 31; Cic. pro Ligur. 1.) On the breaking out of the civil war at the beginning of a. c. 49, he was stationed in Picenum at the head of a considerable force. At first he took up his quarters at Cingulum, and afterwards at Auximum; but on Caesar's approach, the inhabitants of Auximum declared themselves so strongly in favour of Caesar, that Varus was obliged to evacuate the town, and on his retreat was deserted by most of his own troops. While stationed at Auximum he had levied soldiers throughout Picenum, and with some of these levies he joined Pompey in Apulia. When Pompey resolved to leave Italy, Varus crossed over into Africa, and took possession of the province, which was then governed by Q. Ligarius, who was only the legate of Considius Longus. (Ligarius.) In consequence of his having been praefect of Africa a few years previously, Varus was well acquainted with the country and the people, and was thus able to raise two legions without much difficulty. Meantime L. Aelius Tubero, who also belonged to the Pompeian party, and who had been appointed by the senate to succeed Considius Longus in the government of Africa, arrived to take the command of the province; but Varus would not even allow him to land, and compelled him to sail away. Shortly afterwards C. Curio crossed over from Sicily to Africa with two legions in order to gain Africa for Caesar. Varus attacked Curio in the neighbourhood of Utica, but was defeated with considerable loss, and with difficulty maintained his ground under the walls of that city. He was, however, soon relieved by the Numidian king Juba, who hastened to his support at the head of a powerful army. Curio was now in his turn defeated by Juba. Curio himself fell in the battle with almost all his infantry; Labienus, commander of the slayer, and fled to Varus at Utica, were all put to death by Juba, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Roman general. This victory secured Africa for the Pompeian party. Accordingly, the most distinguished leaders of the party fled thither after their defeat at Pharsalia in the following year (b.c. 48); and Varus was now obliged to resign the supreme command to Scipio, which he did with extreme reluctance. In the war which followed Varus was entrusted with the command of the fleet, and burnt several of Caesar's ships at Adrumetum. After the hopes of the Pompeian party in Spain had been ruined by the defeat of Scipio at Thapsus, Varus sailed away to Cn. Pompey in Spain. He was defeated off Carteia in a naval battle by C. Didius, one of Caesar's commanders, and he afterwards joined the army on shore. He fell at the battle of Munda, and his head, together with that of Labienus, was carried to Caesar (C. Att. viii. 13, 18, 20; Caes. B. C. i. 12, 13, 31; Cic. pro Ligur. 1; Caes. B. C. ii. 23—44; Dion Cass. xii. 41, 42; Appian, B. C. ii. 44—46; Lucan, iv. 713, foll.; Dion Cass. xlii. 57; Hirt. B. Afr. 62, 63; Dion Cass. xliii. 30, 31; Appian, B. C. ii. 105.)

2. Q. Attius Varus, commander of the cavalry under C. Fabius, one of Caesar's legates in Gaul, is praised as a man “singularis et animae et prudentiae.” (Hirt. B. C. viii. 28.) He is probably the same as the Q. Varus, who commanded the cavalry under Domitius, one of Caesar's generals in Greece in the war with Pompey. (Caes. B. C. iii. 37.) It is supposed by many modern writers that he is the same person as the Varus, to whom Virgil dedicated his sixth eclogue, and whose praises he also celebrates in the ninth (ix. 27), from which poem we learn that Varus had obtained renown in war. It is also believed that he is the same as the Varus, who is said to have studied the Epicurean philosophy, along with Virgil under Syro, a philosopher mentioned by Cicero (Serv. ad Virg. Ed. vi. 13; Phocas, Vita Virg. 65; Donatus, Vita Virg. 79; respecting Syro, see Cic. ad Fam. vi. 11, de Fin. ii. 35); but others think that this Varus is the same as the L. Varus, the Epicurean philosopher and friend of Caesar, mentioned by Quintil-ian (vi. 3. § 78). (Comp. Estrée, Horatiana Prosopographica, pp. 118, 294, foll., Amstelod. 1846.)

VARUS, C. Ca'ssius Longinus. [Lon-ginus, No. 10.]

VARUS, C. Licinius, P. P. P. N. (Fasti Capit.), was consul b.c. 236 with P. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus. Varus and his colleague marched into northern Italy in order to oppose the Transalpine Gauls, who had crossed the Alps; and when this danger was averted by the quarrles of the Gauls amongst themselves, Varus was ordered to reduce the Ccorsicans to subjection. The consul sent to the island his legate M. Claudius Glicia, intending to follow shortly afterwards. Glicia concluded a peace with the Corsicans on his own authority; but Varus, on his arrival in the island, refused to acknowledge it, and made war upon the Corsicans till he compelled them to surrender at discretion. (Zonar. viii. 18, p. 460; Liv. Epit. 50; see Glicia.) Probably this Licinius is the same as the C. Licinius, who was sent to Carthage in b.c. 218 with four other ambassadors, all of whom were advanced in life. (Liv. xxx. 18.)

VARUS, Fulvius Pla/Nc/ius. One of praetorian rank, denounced Dolabella on the accession of Vitellius, although he had been one of Dolabella's most intimate friends. (Tac. Hist. ii. 63.) [Dola-

Bella, No. 11.]

VARUS, Pompeius, a friend of Horace, who had fought with the poet at the battle of Philippi, and who appears to have been afterwards proscribed, and to have fled to Sex. Pompeius in Sicily. One of Horace's odes (ii. 7) is addressed to this Pompeius, in which the poet congratulates him upon his unexpected return to his native land. Many commentators accordingly suppose this ode to have been written as early as b.c. 39, when the triumvirs made peace with Sex. Pompeius, and allowed those who had been proscribed to return to Rome; but others maintain, with more probability, that it was not composed till after the battle of Actium in b.c. 31, and that Varus was one of those who had espoused the cause of Antonius, and was then pardoned by Octavianus. (Comp. Estrée, Horatiana Prosopographica, p. 474, foll., Amstelod. 1846.)

VARUS, Quintilius. 1. Sex. Quintilius Sex. P. P. N. Varus, consul b.c. 453 with P. Curiatius Fistus Trigeminus, died while consul of the pestilence which devastated Rome in this year. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. ii. 32; Dionys. x. 55.)

2. M. Quintilius L. F. L. N. Varus, one of the consular tribunes in b.c. 403. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. v. 1.)

3. CN. Quintilius Varus, dictator b.c. 331 clavi fujendi causa. (Liv. viii. 18.)

4. P. Quintilius Varus, praetor b.c. 203, with Ariminum as his province. In conjunction with the proconsul M. Cornelius he defeated Mago, the brother of Hannibal, in the territory of the Insabrians Gauls. [Vol. ii. p. 904, a.] (Liv. xxx. 38, xxx. 1, 18.)

5. M. Quintilius Varus, the son of No. 4, distinguished himself in the battle in which his father defeated Mago. (Liv. xxx. 18.)

6. T. Quintilius Varus, served in Spain in b.c. 185, as legatus of the praetor Calpurnius Piso. (Liv. xxxix. 31, 38.)

7. P. Quintilius Varus, flamini Martialis, died in b.c. 169. (Liv. xlv. 18.)

8. P. Quintilius Varus, praetor b.c. 167. (Liv. xlv. 44.)

9. P. (Quintilius) Varus, is mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Quintius in b.c. 81, and again in his oration for Cluentius as one of the witnesses in the trial of Scamander. (Cic. pro Quint. 17, pro Chrest. 19.)

10. Sex. Quintilius Varus, praetor b.c. 57, was in favour of Cicero's recall from banishment. (Cic. post Red. in Som. 5.)
11. Sixt. Quintilius Varus, questor b.c. 49, belonged to the Pompeian party. He fell into Caesar's hands at the capture of Corinthus at the beginning of b.c. 49; and after being dismissed by Caesar, he crossed over into Africa and fought under P. Atilius Varus against Curio. (Caes. B. C. i. 23, ii. 28, foll.) It appears that this Varus was again pardoned by Caesar; but, like many others, he joined the murderers of his benefactor and fought under Brutus and Cassius against the triumvirs. At the loss of the battle of Philippi, he fell by the hands of his freedman, who slew him at his own request. (Vell. Pat. ii. 71.) He was the father of the Varus who fell in Germany. [No. 13.]

12. Quintilius Varus, of Cremona, a friend of Horace and Virgil, died in b.c. 24. (Hieronym. in Euseb. Chron. 189. 1.) We learn from the ancient Scholiasts on Horace that this Quintilius is the same as the Quintilius, who is mentioned as an eminent critic in the De Arte Poetica (438) and whose death Horace laments in one of his odes (i. 24). He is perhaps the same as the Varus, to whom Horace addresses the eighteenth ode of the first book, and also as the Varus mentioned in the fifth Epode. (Weichert, De L. Varit et Cassii Parnassius Vita, p. 121, foll.; Estré, Horatianus Proseographia, p. 202, foll.)

13. P. Quintilius Varus, son of No. 11, was consul b.c. 13 with Tiberius Claudius Nero, afterwards the emperor Tiberius. (Dion Cass. iv. 25.) Varus was subsequently appointed to the government of Syria as the successor of Sentius Saturninus, and remained in that province for several years, where he acquired enormous wealth. According to the antithetical expression of Velleius Paterculus (ii. 117), "as a poor man he entered the rich country, and as a rich man left the country poor." Shortly after his return from Syria he was made governor of Germany (probably about a.d. 7). Drusus had conquered a great part of central Germany as far as the Visurgis (Weser), and the various German tribes between this river and the Rhine seemed disposed to submit quietly to the Roman rule and to adopt Roman customs and habits. The time appeared favourable to Augustus for introducing into the country the regular administration of a Roman province; but he made an unfortunate choice in the person whom he selected to carry his purposes into effect. Varus was a man of moderate talents and fond of an idle and quiet life; he possessed neither the abilities nor the energy necessary for the important task entrusted to him. In addition to which, he had for years received in Syria the servile obedience of a race, which had long been accustomed to the Roman government; while in Germany he was called to rule over a brave and high-spirited people, who had only recently been subdued, and knew nothing of the jurisdiction of a Roman province.

As soon as Varus had crossed the Rhine, he proceeded to levy taxes and to introduce the Roman jurisdiction in the newly conquered country. For this he is strongly censured by Dion Cassius (iv. 18) and Velleius Paterculus (ii. 117), but without sufficient reason; for there can be no doubt that he acted in accordance with his instructions; and it must be recollected that he was the first governor of Germany, to whom the civil administration as well as the military command had been entrusted. His mistake was in the manner in which he carried his instructions into effect, and in his infatuation in supposing that a brave nation could be governed in the same way as a herd of Syrian slaves. The Germans viewed with dismay and indignation the abolition of their own laws, and the introduction of the Roman jurisdiction, in consequence of which their rights, their property and even their lives would depend upon the decision of a Roman proconsul. They were ripe for revolt, and found a leader in Arminius, a noble chief of the Cherusci, who had previously served in the Roman army and had been rewarded by the Roman franchise and the equestrian rank. The tribes in the north and south of Germany took no part in the insurrection, but most of the people in the central parts of the country joined in the revolt: the Cherusci were at the head with their subjects, and besides them we read of the Marsi, the Catti, and the Bructeri. Varus was blind to the impending danger. In the summer of b.c. 9 he had penetrated as far as the Weser, and took up his quarters on the western bank of the river, probably not far from the spot where it is joined by the Werra. Here, in fancied security, he held courts for the administration of justice, not like a general at the head of his army, but as if he were the city praetor sitting in the Roman forum. According to the preconcerted plan of Arminius, the orders of Varus were obeyed without opposition; and the most distinguished German chiefs, and among them Arminius himself, constantly visited his camp and lived with him on the most friendly terms. Varus therefore finding everything so peaceful and the people so submissive did not consider it necessary to keep all his soldiers together in the summer camp. He had with him three Roman legions with their regular number of auxiliary troops, and a strong body of cavalry; but he had, at the request of Arminius and the other chiefs, sent various detachments into the surrounding country for the protection of the convoys or of the inhabitants against marauders. Such was the posture of affairs, when late in the summer Varus was surprised by the intelligence that a distant tribe of Germans had risen in arms against the Romans. This however was only a feint to draw Varus from his encampment; and it succeeded. He collected his army and commenced his march towards the south accompanied by Arminius and the German chiefs. The latter however left him almost immediately, promising to return as soon as they had collected their forces. Varus allowed them to depart and continued his march without suspicion. His road lay through the valleys of the Salitus Teutobergiensis, a range of hills covered with wood, which extends north of the Lippe from Osnabrück to Paderborn, and is known in the present day by the name of the Teutoburgerwald or Lippische Wald. Varus had entered the pass, not suspecting any danger, his army in a long straggling line, encumbered with baggage, and accompanied by the wives and children, whom the soldiers had brought with them from their summer quarters, when the Germans suddenly appeared and attacked the Romans on all sides. The Romans were unable to form in line of battle, and with difficulty fought their way to a more open spot in the wood, where they pitched their camp for the night. The size and the arrangement of this camp, which Germanicus saw six years afterwards, showed that the three legions had not on the first day sustained any material loss. (Tac. Ann. i. 61.) Varus was now fully aware of his danger. He resolved to destroy almost all his baggage and to make for the strong fortress of Aliso, which had been erected by Drusus on the Lippe. His first camp was probably in the neighbourhood of Salzmoor; and in order to reach Aliso he had to force his way through the pass in the neighbourhood of Detmold. His second day's march was one uninterrupted flight from morning to night, and the contracted extent of the camp, which he pitched at the close of the day, told Germanicus that his numbers had been already greatly reduced. On the morning of the third day Varus continued his march. His difficulties increased more and more. The roads were rendered almost impassable by the rain which descended in torrents; but nevertheless the Romans struggled on, though with continually increasing losses, and at last emerged from the woods into the open country, probably in the neighbourhood of Kreuzburg and Osterholz. Here, however, the main force of the Germans was ready to receive them. With diminished numbers and exhausted bodies, they were unable to penetrate through the vast masses with surrounded them on all sides. The fight at length became a slaughter; the Romans could no longer preserve their ranks; Varus in despair put an end to his own life. Very few of the Romans succeeded in escaping to Aliso. Most perished on the field, but several were taken prisoners. Of these the most distinguished were sacrificed by Arminius to the gods of his country at altars in the forests; and the remainder were reduced to slavery. The ferocity of the enemy did not even spare the dead; the corpse of Varus was mangled, and his head cut off and forwarded, as a sign of victory, to Marobodius, king of the Marcomanni, who, however, sent it to Augustus. The defeat of Varus was followed by the loss of all the Roman possessions between the Weser and the Rhine, and the latter river again became the boundary of the Roman dominions. When the news of this defeat reached Rome, the whole city was thrown into consternation; and Augustus, who was very young and aged, gave way to the most violent grief, tearing his garment and calling upon Varus to give him back his legions. Orders were issued as if the very empire was in danger; and Tiberius was despatched with a veteran army to the Rhine. (Dion Cass. i. 18–25; Vell. Pat. ii. 117–120; Suet. Aug. 23, Tib. 16, 17; Flor. iv. 12; Tac. Ann. i. 60, 61, 71.) The history of the defeat of Varus has been treated by a great number of German writers, who have maintained very different views respecting the locality of his defeat. The best account in a brief compass is given by Höchh, Römische Geschichte, vol. i. pt. ii. p. 84, foll., and by Ukert, Geographie der Griechen und Römer, vol. iii. pt. i. p. 124, foll., in the latter of which works a list of all the treaties on the subject is given.

The following coin was struck by Varus when he was proconsul of Syria.

14. Quintilius Varus, probably the son of No. 13, was accused by Domitius Afer in A.D. 27 (Tac. Hist. iv. 66). He is called by Tacitus the propinquus of the emperor Tiberius; and we learn from Seneca, who had heard Varus declaring, that he was the son-in-law of Germanicus. (Senec. Controv. 4.) Varus may also have been called the propinquus of Tiberius, because his mother Claudia Pulchra was the sobrina of Agrippina. (Tac. Ann. iv. 52, 66.)

VARUS, C. VIBIUS, whose name occurs only on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. On the obverse is the head of M. Antonius, and on the reverse Venus holding a figure of Victory in one hand and a cornucopia in the other. This Varus must have been triumvir of the mint or have held some magistracy after the death of Julius Caesar and the commencement of the triumvirate, as is shown by the beard of M. Antonius, which he allowed to grow at the beginning of the triumvirate. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 342.) The name of Vibius Varus occurs in the reign of Hadrian: there was a C. Vibius Juventinus Varus, who was consul in A.D. 134.

VATIA.

VA/SIUS, T. one of the conspirators against Q. Cassius Longinus, propraetor of Further Spain, in B.C. 48. (Hirt. B. Alex. 42.) [LONGINUS, No. 15.]

VATIA, the name of a family of the Servilia Gens.

1. P. Servilius C. F. M. N. VATIA, surnamed Isauricus, was the grandson of Q. Metellus Macedonicus. (Cic. pro Dom. 47.) He is first mentioned in B.C. 100, where he took up arms with the other Roman nobles against Saturninus. (Cic. pro C.Rolfr. perd. 7.) He was raised to the consulship by Sulla in B.C. 79, along with Ap. Claudius Pulcher, and in the following year (B.C. 78) was sent as proconsul to Cilicia, with a powerful fleet and army, in order to clear the seas of the pirates, whose ravages now spread far and wide. He was a man of integrity, resolution, and energy, and carried on the war with great ability and success. At first he sailed against the pirates, and defeated them in a naval engagement off the coast of Cilicia. The pirates then abandoned the sea and took refuge in their strongholds among the mountains which skirt the southern coast of Asia Minor. Servilius proceeded to attack their fortresses, which were defended with the greatest obstinacy and courage. We have only fragmentary accounts of this war, which occupied Servilius about three years; but it appears that the Romans experienced all the sufferings and dangers to which regular troops are generally exposed in a warfare among mountains defended by brave and hardy inhabitants. Servilius, after landing, first took Olympus, a town of Lycia, situated on a mountain of the same name, which was resolutely defended by a robber chief, called Zenicetus, who perished with his followers in the flames of the place. He next obtained possession of Phaselis in Pamphylia, as well as other places of less importance, in his march through the country; and he then penetrated into Cilicia, where he took the strong fortress of Corycus on the coast. Having thus subdued the strongholds of the pirates on the coast, he resolved to carry his arms against the robber-tribes in the interior of the country, and for this purpose crossed Mount Taurus, which was the first time that a Roman army had passed these mountains. His arms were chiefly directed against the Isauri, and he laid siege to their capital, Isaurum, of which he obtained possession by diverting the course of a river, and thus depriving the inhabitants of water, who were in consequence compelled to surrender. This was reckoned his most brilliant success: his army gave him the title of Imperator, and he obtained the surname of Isauricus. After giving Cilicia and the surrounding country the organization of a Roman province, he sailed home and entered Rome in triumph in b. c. 74. His triumph was a brilliant one. The people flocked to see the formidable Nicon, and the other leaders of the pirates, who walked in the procession, and also the rich booty which he had obtained in the captured cities and which he conscientiously deposed in the public treasury, without appropriating any portion to himself, after the fashion of his celebrated colleague, Servilius Sulpicius Galba. But brilliant as his success had been, it was not complete; the pirates were only repressed for a time, and their ravages soon became more formidable than ever. (Liv. Epit. 90, 93; Oros. v. 23; Flor. iii. 6; Eutrop. vi. 3; Strab. xiv. pp. 667, 671; Frontin. Strat. iii. 7; § 1; Cic. Verr. i. 21, iii. 90, v. 26, 30, de Leg. Agr. i. 2, ii. 18; Val. Max. viii. 5, § 6; comp. Drumm., Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. pp. 396, 397.)

Servilius, after his return, was regarded as one of the leading members of the senate, and is frequently mentioned in the orations and letters of Cicero in terms of great respect. In b. c. 70 he was one of the judges at the trial of Verres; in b. c. 66 he supported the taxation of Manilius for conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; in b. c. 63 he was a candidate for the dignity of pontefex maximus, but was defeated by Julius Caesar, who had served under him in the war against the pirates; in the same year he assisted Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, and spoke in the senate in favour of inflicting the last penalty of the law upon the conspirators; in b. c. 57 he joined the other nobles in procuring Cicero’s recall from banishment; in b. c. 56 he opposed the restoration of Ptolemy to his kingdom; and in b. c. 55 he was censor with M. Valerius Messala Niger. The other occasions on which his name occurs do not require notice. He took no part in the civil wars, probably on account of his advanced age, and died in b. c. 44, the same year as Caesar. By the Lexes Annales, which were strictly enforced by Sulla, Servilius must have been at the least 43 years of age at his consulate, b. c. 79, and must therefore have been about 80 at the time of his death. The respect in which he was held by his contemporaries is shown by a striking tale, which is related by Valerius Maximus and Dion Cassius. (Cic. Verr. i. 21, pro Leg. Man. 23, ad Att. xii. 21, de Proc. Cons. 1, post Red. ad Quir. 7; post Red. in Sen. 10, ad Fam. i. 1, xvi. 23, Philipp. ii. 5; Val. Max. viii. 5, § 6; Dion Cass. xiv. 16.)

2. P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus, the son of the preceding, made Cato his model in younger life, and was reckoned by Cicero among the boni or the supporters of the aristocratic party. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 1, § 10, ad Q. Fr. iii. 3, § 2.) In b. c. 54 he was praetor, when he opposed C. Pompeius in his endeavours to obtain a triumph. (Pomt. II.) On the breaking out of the civil war he deserted the aristocratic party, and in the following year (b. c. 45) was chosen consul along with Julius Caesar. He was left behind at Rome, while Caesar crossed over to Greece to prosecute the war against Pompey, and in the course of this year he put down with a strong arm the revolutionary attempts of the praetor M. Caelius Rufus, a history of which is given elsewhere [Vol. iii. p. 679, b.]

In b. c. 46 he governed the province of Asia as proconsul, during which time Cicero wrote to him several letters (ad Fam. xiii. 66—72). After the death of Caesar in b. c. 44, he supported Cicero and the rest of the aristocratic party, in opposition to Antonius, and took a leading part in the debates in the senate during the war at Mutina. (Dion Cass. xlii. 43, xlii. 17, 29; Appian, B. c. ii. 49; Cass. B. C. iii. 21; Cic. ad Fam. xii. 2, Phil. viii. 3, ix. 6, xi. 8, xii. 2, 7, xiv. 4.) But he soon changed sides again, though the particulars are not recorded in Cicero’s letters. It was probably when Octavian, who was betrothed to his daughter Servilia (Suet. Octav. 62), deserted the cause of the senate, which he had never seriously espoused. Servilius became reconciled to Antonius, probably through the influence of Octavian; accordingly his name did not appear in the proscription lists, and he is called in the letters to Brutus which go under the name of Cicero, “homo furiosus et insolens.” On the formation of the triumvirate in b. c. 43, Octavian broke his engagement with Servilia in order to marry Claudia, the daughter of Fulvia, the wife of Antonius; and it was probably as a compensation for this injury that Servilius was promised the consulship in b. c. 41 with L. Antonius as his colleague. He was at Rome in b. c. 41, when L. Antonius took possession of the city in the war against Octavian, usually called the Perusian. Servilius does not appear to have espoused the cause of his colleague, but owing to his want of energy he offered no opposition to him. (Pseudo-Cic. ad Brut. ii. 2; Dion Cass. xlviii. 4, 13; Suet. Tib. 5.)

VATIÇA/NUS, an agnomen of T. Romilius Rocus, consul b. c. 455, and a member of the first decemvirate [ROMILIUS], and also of P. Sextius Capitoilinus, consul b. c. 452, and likewise a member of the first decemvirate. [CAPITOLINUS, p. 606, a.]

VATIUS I. P. Vatinius, the grandfather of the celebrated tribune [No. 2], was said to have informed the senate in b. c. 168, that as he was returning one night from the praefectura of Reate to Rome he was met by two youths on white horses (the Dioscuri), who announced that king Perusus was taken on that day. The tale went on to say that Vatinius was first thrown into prison for such rash words, but that, when the news came from Aeumilius Paulus that the king had really fallen into his hands on the day named by Vatinius, the senate bestowed upon the latter a grant of land and exemption from military service. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 2, ii. 5.)

2. P. Vatinius, grandson of the preceding, played a leading part in the party strife of the last days of the republic. Cicero, in his oration against Vatinius, which has come down to us, describes him as one of the greatest scamps and villains that ever lived; and without believing all that Cicero says against him, it appears pretty certain that he was, like most other public men of his age, possessed of little or no principle, and ready to sell his services to the highest bidder. His personal appearance was unprepossessing; his face and neck were covered with swellings, to which Cicero alludes more than once, calling him the struma civitatis. (Cic. pro Sest. 65; comp. Plut. Cic. 9; "struma Vatini" ad Att. ii. 5; "fuit strumosa facies et magnum tumescens," Schol. Bob. in reg. 4, c. 40, 54. (Cic. prosul. Orator.) Vatinius commenced public life as quaestor in b. c. 63. According to Cicero he owed his election simply to the influence of one of the consuls of the preceding year, and was returned last on the list. Cicero, who was consul, sent him to Puteoli to prevent the gold and silver from being carried away from that place; but his extortions were so oppressive that the inhabitants were obliged to complain of his conduct to the consul. After his quaestorship he went to Spain as legatus of C. Cosconius, the consul, where, according to Cicero, he was again guilty of robbery and extortion. In b. c. 59 he was tribune of the plebs and sold his services to Caesar, who was then consul along with Bibulus. He took an active part in all the measures which were brought forward in this year, many of which he proposed himself. [Caesar, p. 543.] Cicero accuses him of setting the auspices at defiance, of offering violence to the consuls Bibulus, of filling the forum with soldiers, and of crushing the veto of his colleagues in the tribunate by force of arms; of all which accusations we can readily believe, as he was the most active partisan of Caesar among the magistrates of the year. It was Vatinius who proposed the bill to the people, by which Caesar received the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum for five years, to which the senate afterwards added the province of Transalpine Gaul. It was during his tribunate that Vatinius brought forward the informer L. Vettius, who accused many of the most distinguished men in the state, and among others Cicero, of a plot against the life of Pompey. [Vettius.] In return for these services Vatinius was appointed by Caesar one of his legates, but he did not remain long in Gaul, as he was for the present intent upon gaining the higher honours of the state. Notwithstanding the patronage of Caesar, he was unsuccessful in his first application for the praetorship; and he did not even obtain the votes of his own tribe, the Sergia, which had never previously failed to vote in favour of their own tribemen. In b. c. 56 he appeared as a witness against Milo and Sestius, two of Cicero's friends, who had taken a leading part in obtaining his recall from banishment. Cicero had long had a grudge against Vatinius, because he had induced Vettius to accuse him of being privy to the plot against Pompey's life; and his resentment was now increased by the testimony Vatinius had given against Milo and Sestius. The trial of Milo occurred earlier in the year than that of Sestius. Cicero took no notice of the conduct of Vatinius in the former case, but when he came forward against Sestius also, on whose acquittal Cicero had set his heart, the orator made a vehement attack upon the character of Vatinius in the speech which has come down to us. Nevertheless, he carefully avoids saying a word against Caesar, of whom Vatinius had been only the instrument. The elections at Rome this year were attended with the most serious riots. The aristocracy strained every nerve to prevent the election of Pompey and Crassus to the consulship; and so great were the tumults that it was not till the beginning of the following year (b. c. 55) that the elections took place, and Pompey and Crassus were declared consuls. [Vol. III. p. 486, a.] Not succeeding in securing the consulship for their own party, the aristocracy brought forward M. Cato as a candidate for the tribunician power; but Pompey and Crassus, aware that the election of such an opponent to so high a dignity would prove a serious obstacle to their projects, used all their influence to secure the praetorship for Vatinius. To make the matter more certain, they obtained a decree of the senate, in virtue of which those who might be elected praetors were to enter on their office forthwith, without letting the time fixed by law intervene, during which the magistrates elect might be prosecuted for bribery. Having thus removed one obstacle, they employed their money most freely, and by bribery as well as by force defeated Cato and carried the election of Vatinius. (Plut. Cat. 42, Pomp. 52.) During his year of office (b. c. 55) Vatinius was safe from prosecution; but in the following year (b. c. 54) he was accused of bribery by C. Licinius Calvus. It appears, though the matter is involved in some obscurity, that Licinius had accused Vatinius twice before, once in b. c. 58 of Vt4, on account of his proceedings in his tribunate (comp. Cic. prosul.), but the next year, in 14, with the Schol. Bob. in Vatfn. p. 323, ed. Orelli), and again in b. c. 56, about the same time that Cicero also attacked him. (Comp. Cic. in Vatfn. 4, with the Schol. Bob. p. 316; Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 2. § 4.) The most celebrated prosecution of Licinius, however, was in b. c. 54, and the speech which he delivered on this occasion is mentioned in terms of the highest praise by Quintilian and others. His oratory produced such a powerful impression upon all who heard it, that Vatinius started up in the middle of the speech, and interrupted him with the exclamation, "I ask you, judges, if I am to be condemned because the accuser is eloquent." (Senec. Controv. iii. 19.) On this occasion, to the surprise of all his friends, Cicero, who had only two years before attacked Vatinius in such unmeasured terms, came forward to defend him. The protection of the triumvirs, rather than the eloquence of his advocates, secured the acquittal of Vatinius. Cicero's conduct in defending Vatinius is not difficult to explain, and he has himself given an elaborate justification of himself in an interesting letter to Lentulus Spinther, the proconsul of Cilicia, who had written to ask him his reasons for defending Vatinius (ad Fam. i. 9). The plain fact was, that Cicero had offended Caesar by his former attack upon Vatinius, and that, fearing to be again handed over by the triumvirs to the vengeance of Clodius, he now, in opposition to his conscience and sense of duty, asserted what he knew to be false in order to secure the powerful protection of Caesar and Pompey. (Respecting the accusations of Vatinius by Licinius Calvus, see Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 474, foll., 2nd ed.) From this time Vatinius and Cicero appear on tolerably good terms, though probably neither of them forgot or forgave the injuries he had received from the other. Soon afterwards Vatinius went to Gaul, where we find him serving as one of Caesar's legates in B.C. 51. He accompanied his patron in the civil war, and during the campaign in Greece, B.C. 48, was sent by Caesar with proposals of peace to the Pompeian army. He was not present at the battle of Pharsalia, as he had shortly before returned to Brundisium by Caesar's orders; and about the same time as the battle of Pharsalia, he vigorously defended Brundisium against D. Laelius, who had attacked it with part of the Pompeian fleet. In return for these services Caesar raised Vatinius to the consulship, which he held for a few days as consul successor at the end of December B.C. 47. At the beginning of the following year he was sent into Illyricum to oppose M. Octavius, who held that country with a considerable force for the Pompeian party. Vatinius carried on the war with success in Illyricum, was saluted as imperator by his soldiers, and obtained the honour of a supplicatio from the senate in B.C. 45. At this time some letters passed between him and Cicero, in which they wrote to one another with apparent cordiality. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 9—11.) Vatinius was still in Illyricum at the time of Caesar's death, B.C. 44, and at the beginning of the following year was compelled to surrender Dyrrhachium and his army to Brutus, who had obtained possession of Macedonia, because his troops declared in favour of Brutus (Dion Cass. xlvii. 21; Liv. Epit. 118; Vell. Pat. ii. 69); though Cicero (Philol. x. 6) and Appian (B.C. iv. 75), probably with less truth, speak of it as a voluntary act on the part of Vatinius. At any rate Vatinius did not forfeit the favour of the triumvirs; for we learn from the Capitoline Fasti that he triumphed on the last day of December, B.C. 43. This is the last time we hear of Vatinius. (Cic. in Vatiniunm, passim, pro Sest. 53, 63, 65, ad Q. Fr. ii. 4, iii. 9, § 5, ad Att. ii. 6, 7, Hirt. B.C. vii. 46, Cass. B. C. iii. 19, 100; Appian, Illyr. 13, B.C. iv. 75; Dion Cass. xliii. 55, lviii. 21; Liv. Epit. 118; Vell. Pat. ii. 69; Cic. Philol. x. 5, 6.)

3. Vatinius, of Beneventum, was one of the vilest and most hateful creatures of Nero's court, equally deformed in body and in mind. He was originally a shoemaker's apprentice, next earned his living as one of the lowest kinds of scurvy or buffoons, and finally obtained great power and wealth by accusing the most distinguished men in the state. Dion Cassius relates a saying of his which pleased Nero exceedingly. Well knowing the emperor's detestation of the senate, he said to him on one occasion, "I hate you, Caesar, because you are a senator." (Tac. Ann. xv. 34, Dial. de Orat. 11, Hist. i. 37; Dion Cass. Lxxii. 15.) A certain kind of drinking-cups, having nasi or nozzles, bore the name of Vatinius, probably because he brought them into fashion. Juvenal alludes to a cup of this kind in the lines (v. 46, foll.):

"Tu Beneventani sutoris nomen habebat Sicciad calicem masorum quatum, &c., and Martial also in the Epigram (xiv. 96) :

"Vilia sutoris calicem monumenta Vatini Accipe; sed nasus longior ille fuit."

UCA'LEGON (Ωικαλέγων), one of the elder at Troy, whose house was burnt at the destruction of the city. (Hom. Iliad. 147; Virg. Aen. ii. 312.)

[LS] VECCUS, or BECCUS, JOANNE(a) (Βέκος, Βέκος, or Βέκων), an ecclesiastical of some celebrity in the latter part of the thirteenth century of our era. From the office of Chartophylum in the great church of Constantinople, he was elevated to the patriarchate of that city, by Michael Palaeologus, in A.D. 1274, on account of his friendly dispositions towards the Latin Church. Veccus had at first been warmly opposed to the Latins, but his feelings towards them were changed by the perusal of the writings of Nicephorus Blemmydes. He continued patriarch of Constantinople until the death of the emperor Michael, in A.D. 1283, when the ultra-Greek party regained their ascendency, and Veccus found it necessary to resign his episcopate. He spent the remainder of his life in suffering persecution from the now dominant party, sometimes in exile and sometimes in prison, where he died in A.D. 1298. The most virulent of his opponents and persecutors was George of Cyprus. (Georgius, No. 20.)

There are numerous writings by Veccus, chiefly on the points at issue between the Greek and Latin Churches, and in defence of his own conduct in seeking for their reconciliation. Several of these works are published in the Graecia Orthodoxa of Leo Allatius; others exist only in MSS.

This brief notice of Veccus is thought to be sufficient for the object of this work; for a full account of his life and writings, the reader is referred to the authorities now quoted. (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. a. 1276, vol. ii. pp. 319, foll.; Fabric. Biblioth. Grac. vol. xi. pp. 344, foll.; Schricker, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxix. pp. 433, foll., 446, foll., 455, foll.)

VECTIEN'US. (Vettienus.) VE'C'TIUS. All persons of this name are given under Vettiensis, which appears the more correct form.

P. VE'DIUS, a great scamp, but nevertheless a friend of Pompey's. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1. § 25.)

VE'DIUS À QUILA. (Aquila.)

VE'DIUS POL'LIO. (Pollar.)

VEGETIUS, FLA'VIUS RENATUS, designated as Vir Illustris, to which some MSS. add the title of Comes, is the author of a treatise Reti Militariae Instituto, or Epitome Rei Militaris, dedicated to the emperor Valentinian, known to be the second of that name, from an allusion contained in the body of the work (l. 20) to Gratian, and to the unfortunate contests with the Goths. The materials were derived, according to the declaration of the writer himself (l. 8) from Cato the Censor, De Disciplina militari, from Cornelius Celsus, from Frontinus, from Paterinus, and from the imperial constitutions of Augustus, Trajan, and Hadrian. The work is divided into five books. The first treats of the levying and training of recruits, including instructions for the fortification of a camp; the second of the different classes into which soldiers are divided, and especially of the organization of the legion; the third of the operations of an army in the field; the fourth of the attack and defence of fortresses; the fifth of marine warfare. In the earlier editions the whole of the above matter was comprehended in four books; but Schilderius, on the authority of the best MSS., set apart as a fifth book all the chapters which followed the 30th of the fourth, since this is the point at which the precepts regarding naval affairs commence.

We can speak with little respect of this compilation. The usages of periods the most remote from each other, of the early ages of the commonwealth, of the era of Marius and Caesar, of the first emperors and of the successors of Constantine, are mixed together into one confused mass, and not unfrequently, we have reason to suspect, are blended with arrangements which never existed except in the fancy of the author. From the circumstance that we are here presented with something like a representation of the Roman art of war, the statements have been frequently adopted without modification in manuals of antiquities; and notwithstanding the warning of Salmassius, have been too often quoted with respect by scholars who ought to have been fully aware of their worthlessness. That it is possible to glean some curious and even important information from these pages, may be admitted, but we must act with the utmost caution, and scrutinise with jealous eye every addition thus made to our store of knowledge. We know nothing of the personal history of Vegetius, but it has been inferred from the tone in which he speaks of the military oath (ii. 5) that he was a Christian.

The three earliest editions of Vegetius are without date and have no name of place or printer, but are known, from the researches of bibliographers, to have been printed respectively at Utrecht, Paris, and Cologne between the years 1475—1479. The first with a date is that which appeared at Rome, 4to. 1476, and was reprinted in 1494. The best edition is that of Schwelbach (4to. Norimberg, 1767), containing a selection from the commentaries of Stewecius and Scriverius, together with a French translation. It was reprinted (omitting the translation) with additional remarks by Ouden-dorp and Bessel, 8vo. Argent. 1806. This treatise will be found also in all the collections of the Latin "Veteres de Re militari Scriptores," of which the best edition is that printed at Wesel (Vesaliva Clivorum), 8vo. 1670.

There is a version of Vegetius in German, printed as early as 1474, and in French, printed in 1468, but in neither is the name of the translator given. In 1489 Caxton published "The fayt of armes and chynvalry from Vegetius," to which is appended the following curious notice: "Thus endeth this boke, which Xyne of Pyye" (Chaucer of Pisa) "made and drewe of the boke named Vegecevs de Re Militari, which boke, beyng in frenche, was delievered to me Willm Caxton by the most crysten kyngye, henry vii, the xxxiiij day of Janyuere, the iiiij yeere of his regne, and desired and wyllde me to translate this said boke, and reduce it into our english and natural tonge, and to put it in emprynte. Whiche transla-cyon was finysshed the vijj day of Juylly the said yere and emprynted the xiiiij day of Juylly next follow-lyng, and ful finysshed." [W. R.]

VEHIlius, praetor B.C. 44, refused to receive a province from Antony, and said that he would obey the senate alone. (Cic. Phil. iii. 10.)

VEIA'NIUS. 1. Two brothers of this name belonging to the Faliscus ager are mentioned by Varro (R.R. iii. 16. § 10).

2. A celebrated gladiator in the time of Horace, who had retired to a small estate in the country, after dedicating his arms to the temple of Hercules at Fundi in Latium. (Hor. Ep. i. 5, with the Schol.)

3. VEIANIUS NIGER, a tribune of the soldiers under Nero, put Subrius Flavus to death. (Tac. Ann. xxv. 67.)

VEIANT'ANUS POMPO'NIUS. [Pom-pontius, p. 495, a.]

VEIENTO, was left in the command of Syria by Bibulus, when he quitted the province in B.C. 50. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 3. § 3.) Manutius supposes that Veiento was the quaestor of Bibulus, but we know not whether he held this office (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 17), and we may therefore conclude that Veiento was the legatus of Bibulus. The gentle name of Veiento is not mentioned, but it is not improbable that it was Fabricius, and that he was an ancestor of the following person.

VEIENTO, FABRI'CIUS, was accused in the reign of Nero, A.D. 62, because he had published many libels against the fathers and the priests in books to which he had given the name of Codicilli; and his accuser Fabius Geminus added that he had sold the honours which the emperor was accustomed to grant. Nero thenupon banished him from Italy and ordered his books to be burnt. He is probably the same as the A. Fabricius, whom Dion Cassius mentions as praetor in the reign of Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 50; Dion Cass. lxi. 6.) Veiento afterwards returned to Rome, and became in the reign of Domitian one of the most infamous informers and flatterers of that tyrant. He also enjoyed the intimate friendship of Nerva. Aurelius Victor says that Veiento held the consulship under Domitian; but his name does not occur in the Fasti, nor is his consulship mentioned by any other ancient writer. (Juv. iii. 185, iv. 113, vi. 113, Plin. Ep. iv. 22; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 12; Plin. Ep. ix. 15.)

VEIOVIUS, is explained by Festus (p. 379, ed. Muller) to mean "little Jupiter" (comp. Ov. Fast. iii. 445); while others interpret it "the destructive Jupiter," and identify him with Pluto. (Gell. v. 12; Macrobi. Sat. iii. 9.) But Veiovis and Vedius (Martian. Capell. ii. p. 40), which are only different forms of the same name, seem to designate an Etruscan divinity of a destructive nature, whose fearful lightnings produced deafness in those who were to be struck by them, even before they were actually hurled. (Ann. Marc. xvii. 10.) His temple at Rome stood between the Capitol and the Tarpeian rock; he was represented as a youthful god armed with arrows, and his festival fell before the nones of March. (Gell. v. 4; Vitruv. iv. 8.) [L. S.] Q. VELA'NIUS, a tribune of the soldiers, whom Caesar sent in B.C. 56 among the Veneti for the purpose of obtaining corn. (Caes. B. G. iii. 7.)

VELEDA, a prophetical virgin, by birth belonging to the Bructeri, and was regarded as a divine being by most of the nations in central Germany in the reign of Vespasian. She inhabited a lofty tower in the neighbourhood of the river Lappia (Lippe) but none save her own immediate relations were allowed to enter her presence, in order to preserve the veneratio in which she was held. She encouraged Civillis in his revolt against the Romans, and predicted the success which he at first obtained, but she was afterwards taken prisoner and carried to Rome. (Tac. Hist. iv. 61, 65, v. 22, 24, Germ. 8; Stat. Silv. i. 9. 40, exulaniae prses Veleddae; Dion Cass. lxxvi. 5, who makes the penultimate long, Βηλάδα.) VENOX.

VELIUS CEREA LIS, a friend of the younger Pliny, two of whose letters are addressed to him. (Ep.) iv. 21. ii. 10.

VELIUS LONGUS. [LONGUS.]

VELLIUS. I. C. VELLIUS, a senator, is introduced by Cicero as one of the supporters of the Epicurean philosophy in his De Natura Deorum (i. 6, foll.). He was a friend of the orator L. Crassus. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 21, de Nat. Deor. i. 21.)

2. C. VELLIUS, the grandfather, VELLIUS the father, and VELLIUS CAPITIO, the uncle of the historian Vellius Paterculus, together with Paterculus himself, are all spoken of under Paterculus.

3. P. VELLUS or VELLAUS, commanded an army in the neighbourhood of Thrace in the reign of Tiberius, a. d. 21 (Tac. Ann. iii. 39).

VELLOCATUS. [CARTIMANDUA.]

VENTILIA, a Roman divinity connected with the winds (venti) and the sea. Virgil and Ovid describe her as a nymph, a sister of Amata, and the wife of Fannus, by whom she became the mother of Turmus, Juturna, and Canens. (Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 72; Virg. Aen. x. 75; &c. Od. Met. xiv. 334.)

VENO, the name of a family of the Plautian gens. 1. C. PLAUTIUS VENNO HYPSAEUS, consul b. c. 347 and 341. [HYPSAEUS. No. 1.]

2. L. PLAUTIUS VENNO, consul b. c. 330 with L. Papirius Crassus, carried on war with his colleague against the Pervenates and Fundani. (Liv. viii. 19; Dio. xvii. 82.) [VACCUS.]

3. L. PLAUTIUS L. F. L. N. VENNO, consul b. c. 318 with M. Foslius Flaccinator, received hostages from the Teneanians and Canusini in Apulia. (Fast. Capit. ; Liv. ix. 20; Dio. xix. 2.) VENNO/TVS or VENNO/NIUS. In the enumeration of ancient Roman historians given by Cicero (de Leg. i. 2, comp. ad Att. xii. 3) Venno/nius is placed immediately after Fannius, and he is mentioned by Dionysius in connection with Fabius and Cató. The name does not occur in any other classical work except in the tract Origo Gentis Romanae, falsely ascribed to Sex. Aurelius Victor [VICTOR]. We know nothing regarding the life of Venno/nius, nor are we acquainted with the title of his book, nor can we determine what period it embraced. We merely gather from Cicero that he composed in Latin, and that his writings were not less meagre than those of other early annalists. (Krause, Vitae et Fragmenta veterum Historiorum Romanorum, 8vo. Berolini, 1633; Orelli, Onomasticon Tullianum s. v. Ven/ novius.) [W. R.]

VENNO/NIUS. A few other persons of the name are mentioned by Cicero.

1. SEX. VENNO/NIUS, one of the instruments of Verres in oppressing the Sicilians. (Cic. Verr. iii. 39.)

2. C. VENNO/NIUS, a negotiator or money lender in Cilicia, was a friend of Cicero, who nevertheless refused him a praefectura which he solicited (ad Att. vi. i. § 25, vi. 3 § 8, comp. ad Fam. xiii. 72).

3. VENNO/NIUS VINCICUS, mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Balbus (c. 25).

VENOX, C. PLAUTIUS, censor b. c. 312 with Ap. Claudius Caecus, resigned his office at the end of eighteen months in accordance with the Aemilian law, which had limited the duration of the censorship to that time; while his colleague, Appius, continued to hold the censorship, in violation of the law, and thus gave his name to the Appian road and the Appian aqueduct, which were completed by him. (Fasti Capit. ; Liv. ix. 29, 33; Front. de Aqvaed. 5; CLAUDIUS, No. 10.) Frontinus states (l.c.) that Plautius obtained the surname of Venox from his discovering the springs which fed the aqueduct ("ob inquisitias aquae venox Venocis cognomen"), and in the Fasti Capitolini it is said that he was called Venox during his censorship; but this explanation of the name, though repeated by Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 303), looks suspicious; and it is most likely that Venox is merely another form of Venno, which was borne before the time of the censor by other members of the gens. [VENNO.] The tale of Plau/tius bringing back the tibicides to Rome in his censorship, which is commemorated on a coin of Plautius Planeus, is related elsewhere. [Vol. III. p. 384, b.] VENTI (Ventus), the winds. They appear personified even in the Homeric poems, but at the same time they are conceived as ordinary phenomena of nature. The master and ruler of all the winds is Aeolus, who resides in the island Aeolia (Virg. Aen. i. 52, &c.; comp. AEOLUS); but the other gods also, especially Zeus, exercise a power over them. (Hom. II. xii. 281.) Homer mentions by name Boeas (north wind), Eurus (east wind), Notus (south wind), and Zephyrus (west wind). When the funeral pile of Patro/cclus could not be made to burn, Achilles promised to offer sacrifices to the winds, and Iris accordingly hastening to them, found them feasting in the palace of Zephyrus in Thrace. Boreas and Zephyrus, at the invitation of Iris, forthwith hastened across the Thracean sea into Asia, to cause the fire to blaze. (Hom. II. xxiii. 183, &c.; comp. ii. 145, &c., v. 534, ix. 5, Od. v. 295.) Boreas and Zephyrus are usually mentioned together by Homer, just as Eurus and Notus. (Comp. BOEAS and ZEPHIRUS.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 376, &c., 869, &c.), the beneficent winds, Notus, Boreas, Argestes, and Zephyrus, were the sons of Aestius and Eos, and the destructive ones, as Typhon, are said to be the sons of Typhonius. Later, especially philosophical writers, endeavoured to define the winds more accurately, according to their places in the compass. Thus Aristotle (Meteor. ii. 6), besides the four principal winds (Boreas or Aartias, Eur s, Notus, and Zephyrus) mentions three, the Meae, Caecias, and Apelottes, between Boreas and Eurus; between Eurus and Notus he places the Phoenicians; between Notus and Zephyrus he has only the Lips, and between Boreas and Zephyrus he places the Argestes (Olympia or Sciron) and the Thrascias. It must further be observed that according to Aristotle, the Eurus is not due east, but south-east. In the Museum Pio-Clementinum there exists a marble monument upon which the winds are described with their Greek and Latin names, viz. Septentrio (Aartias), Eurus (Euros, or southeast), and between these two Aquilo (Boreas), Vulturinus (Caecias) and Sullanus (Apelottes). Between Eurus and Notus (Notox) there is only one, the Euroaunted (Euronotus); between Notus and Favonius (Zephyrus) are marked Austro-Africaus (Libonotus), and Africaus (Lips); and between Favonius and Septentrio we find Chrus (lapyx) and Circius (Thracius). See the tables of the winds figured in Göttingen's ed. of Hesiod, p. 39. The winds were represented by poets and artists.

VENTIDIUS.

in different ways; the latter usually represented them as beings with wings at their heads and shoulders (Ov. Met. i. 264, &c.; Philostr. Ion. i. 24). On the chest of Cypselus, Boreas in the act of carrying off Oretithya, was represented with serpents in the place of legs (Paus. v. 19. § 1). The most remarkable monument representing the winds is the octagonal tower of Andronicus Cyrrhestes at Athens. Each of the eight sides of the monument represents one of the eight principal winds in a flying attitude. A moveable Triton in the centre of the cupola pointed with his staff to the wind blowing at the time. All these eight figures have wings at their shoulders, all are clothed, and the peculiarities of the winds are indicated by their bodies and various attributes. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 140, &c.) Black lambs were offered as sacrifices to the destructive winds, and white ones to favourable or good winds. (Aristoph. Ran. 845; Virg. Aen. iii. 117.)

Bo-reas had a temple on the river Iliuss in Attica (Herod. vii. 189; comp. Paus. viii. 27. § 9), and between Titane and Sicyon there was an altar of the winds, upon which a priest offered a sacrifice to the winds once in every year. (Paus. ii. 12. § 1.) Zephyrus had an altar on the sacred road to Eleusis. (i. 37. § 1.)

P. VENTIDIIUS BASSUS. "This man was a native of Picenum, and having fought against the Romans, when the allies were at war with them, he was made prisoner by Pompeius Strabo, and appeared in his triumphal procession in chains: after this, being manumitted, he was admitted into the Senate in course of time, and was then made praetor in the time of Caesar, and attained to such power as to conquer the Parthians and to enjoy a triumph for his victory." (Dion Cass. xlviii. 51.)

Pompeius Strabo triumphed B.C. 89, and Ventidius B.C. 38, fifty years later, whence we must infer that he was quite a youth when he was captured by the Romans. A. Gellius (xv. 4; with which compare Val. Max. vi. 9. § 9; Juv. vii. 199), who has a short chapter on Bassus, says that he was of mean parentage, and that when Pompeius Strabo took Asculum, Bassus and his mother were made prisoners; and that Bassus lay in his mother’s lap when she appeared in the triumphal procession. When he grew up to man’s estate, he got a poor living by undertaking to furnish mules and vehicles for those magistrates who went from Rome to administer a province. This early occupation of Bassus was not forgotten when he became consul, and the Romans, who have always had a taste for satire, reminded Bassus of that which was not his disgrace, but his honour, in the following verse, which is recorded by Gellius:

Nam mulos qui fricabat consul factus est.

Plancus, in a letter to Cicero (ad Fam. x. 18), calls Bassus, Ventidius Mulio, in allusion to his early occupation.

In this humble employment Bassus became known to C. Julius Caesar, whom he accompanied into Gaul; but he is not mentioned in Caesar’s Commentaries. In the civil war he executed Caesar’s orders with ability, and became a favourite of his great commander. He obtained the rank of tribunus plebis, a seat in the Roman senate, and he was made a praetor B.C. 43.

After Caesar’s death Bassus sided with M. Antonius in the war of Mutina (B.C. 43). During the siege of Mutina he raised two legions in the colonies of Caesar, and a third in Picenum, his native country, and he stayed there, says Appian, waiting to see how things would turn out. He afterwards conducted his legions through the Apennines without any opposition from Caesar Octavius, who had already defeated Antonius before Mutina, and he joined Antonius at Vada Sabatia on the Ligurian coast. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 33 and 84, xi. 10.) After the reconciliation between Antonius and Octavius near Bononia, Ventidius was made consul suffectus with C. Carrinas (B.C. 43), Octavius having resigned his consularship, and Q. Petius being dying. (Vell. Pat. ii. 63, Dion Cass. xlvii. 15.) In B.C. 42 Ventidius was one of the legates of Antonius in Gallia Transalpina, with Q. Publius Calenus, and stopped some soldiers of Caesar Octavius from crossing the Alps, whom Caesar had sent into Spain. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 10.)

This took place during the quarrel of Caesar with Fulvia and the consul L. Antonius, the brother of Marcus. Ventidius and the other legate of Antonius made no great effort to relieve L. Antonius when he was besieged by Caesar in Persia (Appian, Bell. Civ. v. 31, 35); but there appear to have been some reasons why they could not safely move from their position. After the capture of Persia (B.C. 40) Ventidius kept his forces together, and was joined by those of Plancus, who had run away. In this year M. Antonius and Caesar came to terms.

While M. Antonius was engaged in Italy (B.C. 39), he sent Bassus as his legatus into Asia to oppose Labienus, whom he pursued to the mountains of Taurus. Bassus, instead of fighting the Parthians, and Bassus for re-inforcements. Ventidius, being afraid of the Parthian cavalry which had arrived, posted himself on high ground, where he was attacked by the Parthians, whom he repelled and defeated. The Parthians made their escape towards Cilicia, followed by Bassus, who halted when he came in sight of the camp of Labienus. The men of Labienus, being discouraged by the defeat of the Parthians, he attempted to escape by night; but many of his men were cut off, and the rest came over to Bassus. Labienus was caught in Cilicia by Demetrius, a freedman of Caesar, and put to death. (Dion, xlviii. 39, 40; Florus, iv. 9.) Bassus sent forward Poppedeus Silo to occupy the passes of Anamnus, but Barzaphanes, or, as Dion calls him, Pharmates, who commanded under Pacorus, was in possession of the passes, and Silo was in great danger of being destroyed with his troops, when Bassus, came to his assistance and defeated Barzaphanes, who fell in the battle. Bassus now took possession of all Syria easily, except Aradus, and Palestine also. Bassus exacted large sums from King Antigonus, Antiochus of Commagene, and Malchus, a Nabataean chieftain, on the ground of their having aided Pacorus. The senate conferred no honours on Bassus for his victories, because he was only acting as the legatus of Antonius.

In the following year (Dion Cass. xlix. 19, 21) Pacorus collected his troops and advanced towards Syria. The troops of Ventidius were dispersed in winter quarters, and he wished to gain time. He contrived to deceive Pacorus by making him believe that he feared that the Parthians would not cross the Euphrates at the Zeugma, the usual place; for if they did cross there, as he hoped they would, he should be able to take advantage of the high ground at that place to oppose the Parthian cavalry. Bassus confidentially communicated this to a petty chieftain, a native of Cyrrhestica, who was about him; and, as he expected, the chieftain, who was favourable to the Parthians, sent the information to Pacorus. It turned out as Bassus wished: Pacorus, believing that Ventidius wished to meet him at the Zengma, did not cross the Euphrates there, but advanced by a longer route, which took him forty days, and gave Bassus time to collect his forces. (Frontin. Strateg. i. 6. § 6.) The Parthians were defeated in Cyrrhestica, and Pacorus fell in the battle. The head of Pacorus was sent round to the Syrian cities, which induced them to keep quiet. Eutropius (vii. 3) says that Bassus killed Pacorus, the son of king Orodes, on the same day on which Orodes had killed Crassus through the means of his general Suraea. Bassus then moved against Antiochus, king of Commagene, on the pretext that he had not given up some slaves to him, but in reality to ease king Antiochus of some of his money.

In the mean time Antonius arrived, and so far from being pleased with the success of Ventidius, he showed great jealousy of him, and treated him in an unworthy manner. It is said that Antiochus had offered Ventidius a thousand talents as the price of peace, and that Antonius, who undertook the siege of Samosata, was obliged to be content with three hundred. (Plut. Anton. c. 34.)

The Senate decreed to Antonius a suppliant and a triumph for the victories of Ventidius; and Antonius rewarded his general by dismissing him from his employment. Yet the services of Ventidius were too great to be overlooked; and on his coming to Rome he had a triumph in November B.C. 38. Nothing more is known of him.

Bassus was often cited (Plin. H. N. vii. 43) as an instance of a man who rose from the lowest condition to the highest honours; a captive became a Roman consul and enjoyed a triumph; but this was in a period of revolution. It is probable that the talents of Bassus made Caesar and Antonius think it prudent to reward such a man and secure his services.

As to Publius Ventidius, who is named in the text of Appian (Bell. Civ. i. 47) as a commander in the Masic war, see the note in Schweighaüser's edition of Appian. It is very improbable that P. Ventidius Bassus commanded in that war; and besides this, some authorities state that he was a child when he was taken prisoner.

The annexed coin, struck by Ventidius Bassus, has on the obverse the head of M. Antonius.

VENETI.

VENETI DIUS CUMANUS, procurator of Judaea about A.D. 50, is spoken of more at length under Antonius Felix. [Vol. II. p. 143, a.]

VENULEIA, the wife apparently of P. Licinius Crassus Dives, consul B.C. 97. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 24.)

VENULEIUS. 1. A Roman senator put to death by Sulla in B.C. 62. (Florus, iii. 21. § 26; Oros. v. 21.)

2. A decemvir in Sicily, one of the nine instruments of Verres in oppressing the province. (Cic. Ferr. iii. 42.)

3. A legatus apparently of C. Calvisius Sabinus in Africa, was deprived of his lictors by Q. Cornificius, when he took possession of the province in B.C. 43. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 30. § 7.) [Comp. Vol. III. p. 689, a.]

VENULEIUS SATURNIUS. [Saturnius.]

VENUS, the goddess of love among the Romans, and more especially of sensual love. Previously to her identification with the Greek Aphrodite, she was one of the least important divinities in the religion of the Romans, and it is observed by the ancients themselves, that her name was not mentioned in any of the documents relating to the kingly period of Roman history. (Macrobr. Sat. i. 12.) This is further evident from the fact that at no time a festival was celebrated in honour of Venus, for the Vinalia (on the 23d of April and 19th of August) were quite a different festival, and were connected with this goddess only by a misinterpretation of the name (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Vinalis), which led courtesans to regard the 23d of April as a holiday of their own, and to worship the goddess on that day in their peculiar way in a temple outside the city. (Ov. Fast. iv. 865.) In later times several other solemnities were celebrated to Venus in the month of April, partly because that month being the beginning of spring, was thought to be particularly sacred to the goddess of love, and partly because the belief had gradually gained ground that Venus, as the beloved of Mars, was concerned in the origin of the Roman people. This latter point gained support from the legend which made Aeneas a son of Anchises and Aphrodite (identified with Venus; see Ov. Fast. iv. 135; Plut. Num. 19; Macrobr. l. c.; Laur. Lyd. De Mens. iv. 45). There was at Lavinium a sanctuary of Venus common to all Latium, the ceremonies at which were performed by the people of Ardea, but its age cannot be defined. (Strab. p. 292.) At Rome we may notice the following circumstances as proving the worship of Venus to have been established there at an early time. There was a stone chapel with an image of Venus Murtea or Murcia in the Circus near to the spot where the altar of Consus was concealed. (Pest. 149, ed. Müller; Apul. Met. vi. 303; Tertull. De Spect. 8; Varro, De L. L. v. 154; Liv. i. 33; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 16.) The surname Murtea or Murcia shows that the myrtle-tree stood in some relation to the goddess, and it is actually said that in ancient times there was a myrtle grove in front of her sanctuary below the Aventine. (Plin. H. N. xv. 36; Serv. ad Aen. i. 724; Plut. 48 4.) VENUS.

Quo.qu. Rom. 20.) It must however be observed that some of the ecclesiastical writers preferred taking the surname Murcia in the sense of "stupid" or "dull" (from muror). Another ancient surname of Venus was Clodia, which, according to Lactantius (i. 20), was derived from the fact that her image was found in the great sewer (clodoca), and was set up by the Sabine king, T. Tatius, in a temple near the forum. (Comp. Liv. iii. 48; Plaut. Careas, iv. 1. 10.) If Venus had been one of the divinities of the lower world, this story might be intelligible enough, but as such was not the case, it appears to be nothing but an etymological inference from the name. Clodia is connected with cluere, Cluita, Clodia, x&f<iv, lucre (i. e. purpare), and there is a tradition that T. Tatius and Romaulus, after the war which had arisen out of the rape of the Sabine women, ordered their subjects to purify themselves before the image of Venus Clodia. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 29; comp. Serv. ad Aen. i. 724, where purpare must be read for puynara.) This explanation agrees perfectly with the belief of the ancients that T. Tatius was the founder of marriage; and Venus Clodia, accordingly, is the goddess presiding over and purifying the sexual intercourse in marriage. A third ancient surname of the goddess is Calva, under which she had two temples in the neighbourhood of the Capitol. Some believed that one of them had been built by Ancus Marcus, because his wife was in danger of losing her hair; others thought that it was a monument of a patriotic act of the Roman women, who, during the siege of the Gauls cut off their hair and gave it to the men to make strings for their bows, and others again to the fancies and caprices of lovers, calva signifying "to be tied." (Serv. ad Aen. 1. 724; Lactant. i. 20; Nonius, p. 6.) But it probably refers to the fact that on her wedding day the bride, either actually or symbolically, cut off a lock of hair to sacrifice it to Venus. (Pers. Sat. ii. 70, with the Schol.) In these, the most ancient surnames of Venus, we must recognise her primitive character and attributes. In later times her worship became much more extended, and the identification with the Greek Aphrodite introduced various new attributes. At the beginning of the second Punic war, the worship of Venus Erycina or Erucina was introduced from Sicily, and a temple was dedicated to her on the Capitol, to which subsequently another was added outside the Colline gate. (Liv. xxii. 9, 10, xxiii. 30, 31, xl. 54; Ov. Rem. Am. 549; P. Victor, Reg. Urb. v.) In the year B.C. 114, a Vestal virgin was killed by lightning, and her body was found naked; as the general moral corruption, especially among the Vestals, was the cause of this disaster, the Sibylline books were consulted which contained the order to build a temple of Venus Verticordia (the goddess who turns the hearts of men) on the via Salaria. (Ov. Fast. iv. 160; Val. Max. viii. 15. § 12.) After the close of the Samnite war, Fabius Gurges founded the worship of Venus Olseogens and Postvota; Scipio Africanus the younger of that of Venus Genitrix, in which he was afterwards followed by Caesar, who added that of Venus Victrix. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 724.) The antiquity of the worship of Venus Militaris, Barbata and Equestris is unknown (Serv. l. c.; Macrob. Sat. iii. 8); but the sanctuaries of Venus Rhanmusia, Pluclis, and Alma are all of a very late date. (P. Victor, Reg. Urb. v. x. xi.) Lastly, we may remark, that Venus is also said to have presided over gardens. (Varro, De R. R. i. 1; Plin. H. N. xix. 4; Fest. p. 58, ed. Müller; compare Hargt, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. ii. p. 248, &c.)

VENUSTUS, artist. This name is found on the celebrated marble of Antium, as that of a freedman of the imperial family, in the time of Claudius, whose profession is described by the letters SPEC, which Vulpi interprets Speculator, but which, according to Raoul-Rochette, should be read Specularius, that is, a manufacturer of the glass ornaments employed in the decoration of houses. M. R. Rochette brings forward strong arguments in support of his opinion, showing that there was a distinct class of such artists, specularii, specularor or speculariorum fabri, and that they existed in Rome as a body corporate, Collegium Speculariorum. (Tabul. Antit. v. 23, p. 15, Rom. 1726, 4to; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 422—425, 2d ed.)

VENUTIUS. [CARTIMANDUA].

VERA'NIA, the wife of Piso Licinius, who was adopted by the emperor Galba. After the murder of her husband in A. D. 69, she obtained his head from Otho and buried it together with his body. (Tac. Hist. i. 47; Plut. Gab. 28; Plin. Ep. ii. 20.) (Piso, No. 31.)

Q. VER'A'NIUS, was appointed by Tiberius the Caesar's legatus or governor of Cappadocia, when the country was reduced to the form of a Roman province in A. D. 18. Veranius was one of the friends of Germanicus, and accordingly took an active part in A. D. 20 in the prosecution of Cn. Piso, who was believed to have poisoned Germanicus. After the death of Piso in this year [Piso, No. 23], Veranius was rewarded with one of the priestly dignities. He was consul in the reign of Claudius A. D. 49 with C. Pompeius Gallus. In the reign of Nero, A. D. 58 he succeeded Didius Gallus as governor of Britain, but died there within a year, and was followed in the government by Suetonius Paulinus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 56, 74, iii. 10, 13, 17, 19, xii. 5, xiv. 29, Agr. 14.) It was probably to this Veranius that Onosander dedicated his work on military tactics. [ONOSANDER.]

VERATIUS, CN. EGNATIUS, a Roman historian, mentioned only by Aurelius Victor (de Orig. Gent. Rom. init.).

VERATIUS or NERATIUS, P. PULVLIUS, called by Cicero lectorissimus homo, accused Milo in B. C. 52. (Cic. pro Flacc. 20; Ascon. in Mil. pp. 40, 54, ed. Orelli.).

VERAX, the nephew of Civilis, assisted the latter in his war against the Romans, A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 38; Liv. ci.)

VERCINGETORIX, the celebrated chieftain of the Arverni, who carried on war with great ability against Caesar in B. C. 52. The history of this war, which occupies the seventh book of Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic war, has been related elsewhere. [CAESAR, p. 548.] It is only necessary to mention here that after Vercingetorix fell into Caesar's hands on the capture of Alesia, he was kept in chains and subsequently taken to Rome, where he adorned the triumph of his conqueror in B. C. 45 and was afterwards put to death. (Dion Cass. xi. 41, xii. 19; Plut. Caes. 27.)

VERGASILLAUNUS, a chief of the Arverni and a consobrinus of Vercingetorix, was one of the generals of the latter in the war against Caesar in b.c. 52. He was defeated and taken prisoner in the great battle which was fought to relieve the siege of Alesia. (Cass. B. G. vii. 76, 83, 86.)

VERGILIUS. [Virgilius.]

VERINA, AE'LLA, the wife of Leo I, by whom she had a daughter Ariadne, married to Zeno. Leo left the kingdom to his grandson Leo II, the son of Ariadne and Zeno, who only lived a few months, and was succeeded by his father Zeno. The subsequent history of Verina is given under Zeno.

VERMINA, the son of Syphax, king of the Massaeans, the westernmost tribe of the Numidians, is first mentioned in b.c. 204, when he took the field with his father against their rival Masinissa, whom they defeated. After the defeat and capture of his father in the following year [Syphax], Vermin continued faithful to the Carthaginians. He joined Hannibal soon after he landed in Africa, but he was not present at the battle of Zama, as he was probably engaged in collecting forces in his own dominions. He arrived very soon after the battle at the head of a considerable army, but was attacked by the Romans and defeated with great loss. Fifteen thousand of his men were slain and twelve hundred taken prisoners; Vermina himself escaped with difficulty accompanied by only a few horsemen. He had now no alternative but submission. In b.c. 200 he sent an embassy to Rome, praying for forgiveness, and begging that the senate would call him a king, an ally, and a friend. The senate replied that he must first sue for peace, and that they would send commissioners into his kingdom to dictate the terms on which it would be granted. When the commissioners arrived in Africa, they were received by Vermina with the greatest respect. A peace was concluded with him, the terms of which are not mentioned, but we know that the greater part of his hereditary dominions was bestowed upon Masinissa. (Liv. xxxix. 33; Appian, Pan. 33; Liv. xxx. 36, 40, xxxi. 11, 19.)

VERRES, C. [CORNELIUS?] 1. Was a Roman senator, who appears to have been connected by birth, adoption, or emancipation with the Cornelia gens. Cicero, whose anger Verres had incurred by interfering in his election for the aedilship b.c. 70, calls him a veteran brier and manager of votes. Verres took alarm at his son's reckless proceedings in Sicily, b.c. 75—71; and although he supplicated the senate in his behalf, despatched special messengers to Syracuse with wares and presents. The elder Verres had a share in his son's pillage of the Sicilians. (Verrin. i. 8, 9, ii. 1. 23, 30, 40; Pseud. Ascon. in Verrin.; in Q. Caecil. proem.)

2. Son of the preceding, was born about b.c. 112. It is remarkable that the gentle name of the Verres family is nowhere mentioned. In more than one passage of the Verrine orations, Cicero seems to point on the giving of their full appellation to the Verres, but always-withholds it apparently as notorious. It was probably Cornelius, although there seems to have been some connection also with the Caecili Metelli. (Verrin. ii. 2. 26, 56.)

Sulla, on his return from Greece b.c. 83, created a numerous body of Corneli by emancipating slaves and filling up vacancies in the senate with aliens and freedmen (Appian, B. C. i. 100); and at the time of the younger Verres's praetorship Cornelius was the most ordinary surname at Rome. (Cic. Corin. p. 450, Orelli.) Now we know of no extraordinary increase of the gens Caecilia at this period, while the augmentation of the gens Cornelia is certain. (Comp. Appian, l. c. with Cic. Verrin. iii. 28, 49.) The connection of the Caecilli Metelli with Verres, if not assumed for a temporary purpose (ii. 2. 26, 56), may perhaps be thus explained. If the elder Verres were originally a freedman or a kinsman of Sulla, and raised by him to senatorian rank, he would take in the one case or he would bear in the other the gentle name of Cornelius. That he was Sulla's kinsman is not altogether improbable, since that branch of the gens Cornelia had fallen into decay (Plut. Sull. 1), and may have contained more than one cognomen. But Sulla's fourth wife was Caecilia Metella, daughter of L. Caecilius Metellus Dalmatianus [No. 13], and through her Verres, when it suited him, may have claimed affinity with the Metelli. Verres may even have derived his relationship to this house or to the Cornelli from his mother's family, whom Cicero mentions with respect (ii. 1. 49). On the other hand, among Cicero's innumerable taunts, none directly reproaches Verres with a servile or even an obscure origin, although he mentions many ignoble Cornelii, e. g. Artemidorus Cornelius, a physician and others "jamypridem improbi, repentem Cornelli" (ii. 1. 26, 27. 3. 28, 49, iv. 13, § 30). The elder Verres and his kinsman Q. Verres are described as veteran briers and corrupters (i. 8, 9), but without allusion to servile or libertin birth. Verres itself too is a genuine Italian name, like Capra, Taurus, Ovinius, Sui- lius, and seems to have had its proper correlate in Sorofa (Varr. R. R. ii. 1). The question probably admits of no positive solution, and it is even possible that as in the cases of Marius, Mammius, and Sertorius, who bore no family-name, the family of Verres may have borne no gentle name. (See Muræus, Var. Lect. iii. 8.)

The impeachment of Verres derives its importance from the cause rather than the criminal. We have no evidence to his character beyond the charges of his great antagonist, and even the defence of him which Hortensius published and Quintilian read (Inst. x. 1. § 23), referred to some other prosecution. To depict Verres in Cicero's colours would be to draw an anomalous monster, and to transcribe the greater portion of the impeachment. It will be more consistent, therefore, with our purpose and our limits to refer generally to the Verrine orations for the catalogue of his crimes and the condemnation of his character, especially since the notorious licence of ancient inver- tive, and the circumstances under which Cicero spoke, render exaggeration certain, while we have no means of sifting or softening it. Individually Verres was a very ordinary person, with brutal in- stincts, manners, and associates, conspicuous in a demoralized age, and in an incurably corrupt class of men,—the provincial governors under the commonwealth,—for his licentiousness, rapacity, and cruelty. Generically as the representative of that class Verres became an important personage, since upon the issue of his trial depended the senate's tenure of the judicata, the prevalence of the oligarchy, and the very existence of the provincial and colonial and him, Verres in Verres been his empire J242 Verres Dolabella on it. He was therefore at that period of the Marian faction (Schol. Gronov. in Verrin. p. 387, Orelli), which he quitted for that of Sulla, betraying Carbo by desertion, and the republic by embellishing the monies with which as quaestor he was intrusted for the administration of Cisalpine Gaul. Sulla sent his new adherent to Beneventum, where he was allowed a share of the confiscated estates, but at the same time narrowly watched by the veterans, as Malleolus, called to account for his receipts from the treasury by the quaestores aerrari for b.c. 81, with what result is unknown. Verres next appears in the suite of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella (No. 6), praetor of Cilicia in b.c. 80—79, and one of the most rapacious and oppressive of the provincial governors. On the death of the regular quaestor C. Malleolus, Verres, who had been Dolabella’s legatus, became his pro-quaestor. In Verres Dolabella found an active and unscrupulous agent, and, in return, connived at his excesses. But the proquaestor proved as faithless to Dolabella as he had been to Carbo; turned evidence against him on his prosecution by M. Scaurus in b.c. 78, and by shifting his own crimes to the praetor’s account, and stipulating for a pardon for himself, mainly contributed to the verdict against Dolabella. During this pro-quaestorship Verres first acquired or affected a taste for the fine arts. Whether he considered the legate’s appropriations as a mere brutal lust of pillage, and a means of purchasing the support of the oligarchy at Rome. The criminality of the acts was the same. But Cicero at one time describes Verres, ironically, as a fine gentleman and a connoisseur; and, at another, as better fitted for a porter than an artist (Verrin. ii. 44, 45). The wealth Verres acquired in Achaia and Asia, he employed in securing a praetorship in b.c. 74. The lot assigned to him the urbana jurisdictio, and he reaped at Rome the plunder, the venality, and the licence, which afterwards marked his Sicilian administration. His official duties were mostly discharged by his clerks and his freedwoman and mistress Chelidon. Without the interest of the latter, indeed, nothing could be obtained from him, and she, accordingly, charged him for exempting it. The city-praetor was the guardian of orphans; the curator of public buildings, civil and religious; the chief judge in equity; and the sitting magistrate within the bounds of the pomae­rium, during his year of office. In each of these departments, according to Cicero, Verres violated a trust. He defrauded the son of his pro-decessor in the Cilician quaestorship, C. Malleolus, of his patrimony; he exacted from the heir and executors of P. Junius a heavy fine for neglecting to repair the temple of Castor; and intercepted the fine from the state’s coffers; and, instead of rebuilding, whitewashed the decayed columns of the temple; his edicts varied with the person or rather with the price, and were drawn in defiance of precedent, law, and common sense; and unless his political preferences were for the moment suspended by his avarice or his lust, his summary decisions were invariably favourable to the oligarchic party. In b.c. 74, occurred the notorious Judicium Junium (Junius, No. 5). In this transaction, Verres was not so deeply involved as others of his party; but neither was he exempt from the ignominy attached to the verdict, since he declared that the list of the judices had been tampered with, and their signatures forged, himself having previously subscribed the list, and sanctioned the verdict officially. The repeal of Sulla’s laws had been guarded against by the dictator himself, who imposed a mulct on any person who should attempt to abrogate or modify them by prosecution. But Cicero, in b.c. 73, M. Aurelius Cotta as commissary brought forward a bill for exempting the tribunes of the plebs from that clause of the Lex Cornelia which excluded them from the higher offices of the commonwealth, and Q. Opiminius, tribune of the plebs, introduced it to the comitia. Opiminius, in the following year, was condemned and fined by Verres for this offence: his property was put up to auction, and Verres enriched himself equally at the expense of the defendant and the treasury. On the expiration of his praetorship, Verres obtained the wealthiest and most important province of the empire. Sicily was not merely the granary of Rome, but from its high civilisation, its productive soil and vicinity to Italy, had long been the favourite resort of Roman capitalists. The yoke of conquest pressed more lightly on this island than on any other of the state’s dependencies. The ancient Greek nobility had rather gained than lost by Roman legislation. The regulations of the Hieros and Gelos were retained: the exemptions which the Mancalli had granted and the Scipios confirmed, were respected; and the Sicilians hardly regretted their turbulent, democracies in the enjoyment of personal freedom and social luxury. Verres and his predecessor Sacerdos came to the government of that province at a critical period. Two servile wars had recently swept over the island, and during the two years of Verres’s administration, Italy itself was ravaged by Spartans, and the Mediterranean swarmed with the Cilician pirates. The loss or the retention of Sicily was, therefore, an object of higher moment than ever to Rome; and even an ordinary praetor might have risked by supineness or cupidity this portion of the state’s dominions. But in Verres, Sicily received a governor, who, even in tranquill times, would have tried its allegiance or resistance. Accompanied by his son, his daughter’s husband, and a suite of rapacious clerks, parasites and pandars, he began his extortions even before he landed in the island. No class of its inhabitants was exempted from his avarice, his cruelty, or his insatiates. The wealthy had money or works of art to yield up; the middle classes might be made to pay heavier in-posts; and the exports of the vineyards, the arable land, and the loom, be saddled with heavier burdens. By capricious changes or violent abrogation of their compacts, Verres reduced to beggary both the producers and the farmers of the revenue. On the mortmain of Greeks, he accumulated worse evils than the worst of their ancient despots, the worst of their mobs, or the worst of their previous prefects had inflicted. His three years' rule desolated the island more effectually than the two recent servile wars, and than the old struggle between Carthage and Rome for the possession of the island. Messana alone, where he deposited his spoils and provided for himself a retreat, was spared by Verres; but even Messana sighed for the mild government of Sacerdos, and for the arrival of the new praeator Arrius, whom the war with Spartacus detained in Italy, and whose detention added eighteen months to the sufferings of the Sicilians. Verres, therefore, instead of returning to Italy in B.C. 72, remained nearly three years in his government, and so diligently employed his opportunities, that he boasted of having amassed enough for a life of honor, even if the proles were compelled to dispose two-thirds of his plunder in stilling inquiry or purchasing an acquittal. The remainder of Verres's life is contained in the history of the Verrine orations, which we shall presently examine. On his condemnation, he retired to Marseilles, retaining so much of his ill-gotten wealth, as to render him careless of public opinion, and so many of his treasures of art, as to cause, eventually, his proscription by M. Antonius in B.C. 43. Before his death, Verres had the consolation of hearing the murder of his great enemy Cicero, and during his long exile of twenty-seven years, had the satisfaction of witnessing from his retreat the convulsions of the republic, and the calamities of the friends who abandoned, and of the judges who convicted him. Verres married a sister of a Roman eques, Vettius Chilo (Verr. ii. 3. 71, 72), by whom he had a son, whom, at fifteen years of age, he admitted as the spectator and partner of his vice (Iib. 9. 68; Pseudo Ascon. in loc.), and a daughter, who was married at the time of her accompanying Verres to Sicily. (Sen. Sues. p. 43. Bip. ed.; Laec. Dent. Div. Inst. ii. 4.)

The trial of Verres was a political as well as a judicial cause. From the tribunate of the Gracchi (B.C. 132—123), when the judicia were transferred to the equites, to the dictatorship of Sulla (B.C. 81—79), who restored them to the senate, there had been an eager contest at Rome for the judicial power. The equites and the senators had proved equally corrupt, and the Marian party, supported by the Italians and the provincials, clamoured loudly for a reform of the courts. Verres was a criminal whose condemnation might justify Sulla's law, whose acquittal would prove the unfitness of the senate for the judicial office. Cicero, accordingly, in his introductory speech (Verr. i.), puts "this alternative promiently forward." In Verres's condemnation, he urges upon the senatorial bench of judes, "lies your order's safety; in his acquittal, your degradation now and henceforward." This rather than the weight of evidence adduced was the à priori ground for Verres's condemnation. The defendant himself had neither previous reputation nor ancestral honours to recommend him. At first, guilty compliance, and afterwards unblushing corruption, had been his steps to preferment. He was supported by the Metelli, the Scipios, and Hortensius, because their interests were accidentally involved with his. But the reasons which detrac from the individual im- portance of Verres's condemnation, and the greater value to the improvement of the public welfare. Verres was the representative of the grosser elements of a revolutionary era, as Catiline was of its periodical crimes and turbulence. And with every allowance for exaggeration on Cicero's part, Verres was a type of Roman provincial governors, and, as such, his career forms no unimportant chapter in the annals of the expiring commonwealth.

Cicero had been Lilybaean quaestor in Sicily in B.C. 73, and on his departure from that island had promised his good offices to the Sicilians, whenever they might demand them. They committed to him the prosecution of Verres. For a rising advocate at the bar, depending on his own exertions alone for preferment, the opportunity was critical, whether for advancement or defeat. On the one hand, Cicero's attack on the aristocracy, and on the equites, and the people; on the other, it closed upon him the last source of patronage, and involved him with a party which he deseterd on the first occasion. He seems, however, without scruple to have redeemed his promise to the Sicilians, and to have heartily entered into their cause. The Verrine trial is one of the three eras of Cicero's life, and perhaps that in which his cause was best, and his motives were most pure. He may have amplified the vices of Verres; he could scarcely exaggerate the faults of the provincial government of Rome. In the conduct of the prosecution, he infringed upon no law by obtaining it verdict, he displayed no offensive vanity. In Catiline and Antonius, he was opposed to political rivals: in Verres, he encountered the enemy of the law, of social and domestic sanctities, of the faith of compacts, and the security of life and property. Neither during his administration, nor after his return to Rome, had Verres neglected to enlist for himself staunch and numerous supporters. With some, a bribe in its crudest form sufficed; but in many cases it was accompanied with some choice production of the chisel, the easel, or the loom. But his services were most in demand when his partisans in their official characters exhibited games in the forum. Hortensius and the Metelli were thus enabled to exhibit, for the first time, to a Roman mob many of the most exquisite specimens of Mentor, Myron, and Polycleitus, collected from nearly every province from the foot of Mount Taurus to the Lilybaean promontory. The practice of borrowing works of art from the provincials with which to adorn the capital on festivals, was not indeed peculiar to Verres or his age. But neither the refined Cornelii nor the rude Mummiu had, when the occasion ended, adored their own villas with these treasures, or distributed them among the galleries of their friends and adherents.

Meanwhile, neither threats nor offers were spared. Hortensius and Verres at Rome, and M. Metellus, the successor of Verres in Sicily, alternately flattered and bullied the deputies of that island, and Cicero more than once insinuates that money was indirectly offered to himself. The prosecutors, however, had nothing further to lose, and were desperate; Cicero had reputation to win, and was firm. Upon this, Hortensius changed his tactics. The impeachment could not be stopped entirely; but it might be carried. Q. Caecilius Niger had been quaestor to the defendant, had quarreled with him, and had the means of exposing officially his abuse of the public money. To this prosecutor, said Hortensius, we do not object; he is seeking redress; but Cicero, notoriety. But the Sicilians rejected Caecilius altogether, not merely as no match for Hortensius, but as foisted into the cause by the defendant or his advocate. By a technical process of the Roman law, called Divinatio, the judges, without hearing evidence, determined from the arguments of counsel alone, who should be appointed prosecutor. The case was decided in Cicero's favor. Of all the Verrine orations, the Divinatio in Q. Caecilius is the most argumentative, and the most in accordance with modern practice. The orator demonstrates that the Sicilians rejected Caecilius, and demanded himself: that a volunteer accuser is as objectionable as a volunteer witness: that Caecilius cannot come into court with clean hands, since, as quaestor, he must officially have been cognizant of the peculations of his principal: and that his quarrel with Verres — the ground of his alleged fitness for prosecutor — was all a pretence. [Niger, Q. Caecilius.]

The pretensions of Caecilius were thus set aside. Yet hope did not yet forsake Verres and his friends. Evidence for the prosecution was to be collected in Sicily itself. Cicero was allowed 110 days for the purpose. Verres once again attempted to set up a sham prosecutor, who undertook to impeach him for his former extortions in Achaea, and to gather the evidence in his favor. Had Cicero's name been known, the effect would have been that, the false impeachment would have taken precedence, and the Sicilian cause either been referred to a packed bench, or indefinitely adjourned. But the new prosecutor — one Piso or Damianius — never went even so far as Brundisium in quest of evidence, and the design was abandoned. [Verrin. i. 2; Schol. Gronov. p. 338, Orelli; ii. 1, 11; Pseud. Ascon. p. 165, 6.] Instead of the 110 days allowed, Cicero, assisted by his cousin Lucius, completed his researches in 50, and returned with a mass of evidence and a crowd of witnesses gathered from all parts of the island, from the rich and the poor, the agriculturist and the artisan, differently. At Syracuse and Messana alone did Cicero meet with reluctance or opposition. At the former city he completely overcame Verres's partisans, carried away with him a huge budget of vouchers and documents, and procured the erasure from the public register of an honorary decree, which had been extorted by Verres from the Syracusans. At Messana he was less successful. That city had, comparatively, been favoured by the ex-praetor. Here also Cicero encountered his old enemy Caecilius Niger, and the praetor L. Metellus, an alleged kinsman of Verres. The praetor forbade the Messanese to aid or harbour the orator or his suite: reproached him for tampering with Greeks, and addressing them in their own tongue: and threatened to seize the documents he brought with him. Cicero, however, eluded the praetor and all attempts of Verres to obstruct his return, and reached the capital nearly two months before either friends or opponents expected him.

Hortensius now grasped at his last chance of an acquittal, and it was not an unlikely one. Could the impeachment be put off to the next year, Verres was safe. Hortensius himself would then be consul, with Q. Metellus for his colleague, M. Metellus would be city-praetor, and L. Metellus was already praetor in Sicily. For every firm and honest judex whom the upright M. Aciellus Glabrio [No. 5], then city praetor, had named, a partial or venal substitute would be found. Glabrio himself would give place as quaestor or president of the court to M. Metellus, a partisan, if not a kinsman of the defendant; public curiosity would cool; the witnesses be frightened or conciliated; and time be allowed for forging and organising a chain of counter-depositions. It was already the month of July. The games to be exhibited by Cn. Pompey were fixed for the middle of August, and would occupy a fortnight; the Roman games would immediately succeed them, and thus forty days intervene between Cicero's charge and the reply of Hortensius, who again, by dexterous adjournments, would delay the proceedings until the games of Victory, and the commencement of the new year. Cicero therefore abandoned all thought of eloquence or display, and merely introducing his case in the first of the Verrine orations, rested all his hopes of success on the weight of testimony alone. The "king of the Forum," — so Hortensius was called — was disarmed. His histrionic arts of dress, intonation, pathos, and inventive, found no place in dry cross-examinations. He was quite unprepared with counter-evidence, and after the first day, when he put a few petulant questions, and offered some trivial objections to the course pursued, he abandoned the effort, and retired from the field. But the next day occupied in hearing evidence, Cicero prepared the defendant was on his road to Marseilles. The impeachment of Verres presented a scene for the historian and the artist. The judges met in the temple of Castor — already signalised by one of the defendant's most fraudulent acts (Verrin. ii. 1, 49, ff.) They were surrounded by the senate, whose retention of the judicia depended on their verdict. They were watched by the equites, whose recovery of the judicia rested on the same issue. But neither the senate nor the equites were probably the most anxious spectators of the proceedings. The range of the defendant's extortions had been so wide, that the witnesses alone formed no inconsiderable portion of the audience. From the foot of Mount Taurus, from the shores of the Black Sea, from many cities of the Grecian mainland, from many islands of the Aegean, from every city and market-town of Sicily, deputations thronged to Rome. In the porticoes and on the steps of the temple, in the area of the Forum, in the colonnades that surrounded it, on the house-tops and on the overlooking declivities, were stationed dense and eager crowds of impoverished heirs and their guardians, bankrupt publicans and cornmerchants, fathers bewailing their children carried off to the praetor's harem, children mourning for their parents dead in the praetor's dungeons, Greek nobles whose descent was traced to Crecrops or Eurysthenes or to the great Ionian and Minyan houses, and Phoenicians whose ancestors had been priests of the Tyrian Melcarth, or claimed kindred with the Zidonian Jah. "All these and more came flocking," and the usual multitude was swelled by thousands of spectators from Italy partly attracted by the approaching games, and
Cicero's own division of the impeachment is the following:

1. Preliminary
2. Proemium — Actio Prima — Statement of the Case.
3. Verres's official life to b. c. 73.
4. Jurisdiction Siciliensis.
5. Oratio Fruenturiana.
7. De Supplicia.

These were circulated as documents or manifestoes of the cause after the flight of Verres. A good abstract of the Verrine Impeachment is given by Drumm (Geschichte Romes, vol. v. p. 265—328, Tullii, 1870, p. 203, Drumm.)

VE'RTICO/RIA. [Verus.]

VE'RTUMNUS OR VORTUMNUS, is said to have been an Etruscan divinity whose worship was introduced at Rome by an ancient Vulscian colony occupying at first the Caelian hill, and afterwards the vicus Tuscus. (Propert. iv. 2, 6, &c.; Ov. Met. xiv. 642.) The name is evidently connected with vero, and formed on the analogy of alumnus from alio, whence it must signify “the god who changes or metamorphoses himself.” For this reason the Romans connected Vertumnus with all occurrences to which the verb vero applies, such as the change of seasons, purchase and sale, the return of rivers to their proper beds, &c. (Comp. Horat. Sat. ii. 7, 13.) But in reality the god was connected only with the transformation of plants, and their progress from being in blossom to that of bearing fruit. (Schol. ad Horat. Epist. i. 20, 1; Ascon. in Cic. Verr. i. 59; Propert. iv. 2, 10, &c.) Hence the story, that when Vertumnus was in love with Pomona, he assumed all possible forms, until at last he gained her end by metamorphosing himself into a blooming youth. (Propert. iv. 2, 21, &c.; Ov. l. c.)

But the whole people celebrated a festival to Vertumnus on the 23d of August, under the name of the Vertumnalia, denoting the transition from the beautiful season of autumn to the less agreeable one. He had a temple in the vicus Tuscus, and a statue of him stood in the vicus Jugarius near the altar of Ops. (Propert. l. c.; Cic. in Ver. l. 50.) The story of the Etruscan origin seems to be sufficiently refuted by his genuine Roman name, and it is much more probable that the worship of Vertumnus was of Sabine origin, which in fact is implied in his connection with T. Tatus. (Varro, De L. L. v. 75.)

The importance of the worship of Vertumnus at Rome is evident from the fact, that it was attended by a special flamen (flamen Vertumnalis; see Varro, De L. L. vii. 45, with Müller's note; Festus, p. 379; Plin. H. N. xxiii. 1; Müller, Anc. Art. and its Rem. § 404.) [L. S.]

VER'ULA/NUS SEVER'US. [Severus.]

VERUS, ATTILIUS, a primipil centurio, A. d. 69. [Tae. Hist. iii. 22.]

VERUS, whose other name is sometimes written VIDIUS (Capitol. Anto. i. 12), and sometimes VINDIUS, which different modes of partly by curiosity to behold a criminal who had scourged and crucified Roman citizens, who had respected neither local nor national shrines, and who boasted that wealth would even yet rescue the murderer, the violator, and the temple-rober from the laws of man and from the nemesis of the Gods. The provincials scurried not to avow that if Verres were acquitted, they would petition the senate to rescind at once the laws against malversation, that for the time to come provincial governors might plunder, merely to enrich themselves, and not also to provide the means of averting penalties which were never enforced.

The fact that of the seven Verrine orations—

for the Divinatio in Caecilius belongs to them two only, and the Accusation, Actio Prima, were spoken, while the remaining five were compiled from the depositions after the verdict, may seem at first sight to detract from their oratorical if not from their literary value. But so perfectly has Cicero imparted to the entire series the semblance of delivery, and so rarely did the orators of antiquity pronounce extempore speeches, that we probably lose little by the course which necessity imposed on the orator. For while following the various moods and evolutions of this great impeachment, it seems almost impossible to believe that Verres was not actually writhing beneath the scourge, that Hortensius was not listening in impotent dismay, that the judges were not hurried along by the burning words and the glowing pictures of vice, ignominy, and crime, that the senate was not panic-struck, that the equites and the plebes were not hailing the dawn of retribution, and that the provincials were not gazing in fear and wrath upon the panorama of malversation exhibited by Cicero. In the Catilinarian orations the inductive is perhaps more condensed, and the tone of the speech more strictly forensic: in the Philippi the assault is deadlier since the struggle was internecine. But in neither does the imagination of the orator embrace so wide a range of topics, expatiate so genially on whatever was collateral to the cause, or wield with such absolute sway the powers of language and rhetoric as in the Verrine orations. It is almost needless to point out instances of satire, invective, argument, and description which have ever since furnished works of rhetoric with examples and the practical orator with studies in his art. A few of the most striking in each kind may be ranged under the following heads.

1. Sacriilege. The details of this crime are summed up in the peroration of the 5th book of the 2d. Pleading. The oration itself may be compared with Burke's conclusion to his general charge against Warren Hastings. Special narratives of sacrilege are found (ii. 1, 18, 19, 20), and throughout the oration De Signis.

2. Tampering with law and ignorance of precedents.

See the whole account De Praetura Urbana (ii. 1. 40—60; the introduction to Jurisdiction Siciliensis (ii. 2. 7—ff.) and (ii. 3) Leges Documanae Hieronice.

3. Extortion of money, works of art, &c. (ii. 1. 17, 34, 2. 6. 22—28); and the oration de Signis generally.

4. Corruption of morals (ii. 1. 24), and the oration de Suppliciea generally.

5. Negligence in administration (ii. 5. 23—46), and "Practura Urbana."
writing have clearly arisen from the confusion between the first stroke of an s and the letter t. He is apparently the jurist who is cited by Maecianus, lib. ix. Fideicom. (Dig. 35. tit. 2. s. 32. § 4) under the name of "Vindius noster;" and if he be the same, Vindius is probably the true name. He was one of the jurists who were in the consilium of Antoninus Pius, with Ulpius Marcellus, Volusius Maecianus, and others. He is cited twice by Ulpius, and once by Paulus. He probably wrote something, but there is no excerpt in the Digest.

VERUS, ANNIUS, the son of the emperor M. Aurelius and Faustina, was born a.d. 163, two years after Commodus and his twin brother Antoninus Geminus. Antoninus died in a.d. 165, and the two surviving princes, Verus and Commodus, were raised to the rank of Caesares, in October, a.d. 166, at the request of L. Aurelius Verus on his return from the East in that year. Annius Verus did not enjoy his dignity long, for he died at Praeneste, a.d. 170, in the seventh year of his age, in consequence of the excision of a tumour under his ear, when his father was on the point of setting out on his expedition against the Marcomanni. The annexed coin has on the obverse the head of Annius Verus with annius verus caes. antonini avg. p. l., and on the reverse, the head of Commodus, with commodus caes. antonini avg. p. l. (Capitol. Antonin. Phil. 12, 21; Lamprid. Commod. I, 11; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 82, foll.)

VERUS, L. AURELIUS, the colleague of M. Aurelius in the empire, a.d. 161—169. His original name was L. Ceionius Commodus, under which head his life is given [Commodus, No. 4, Vol. I. p. 817, a.]; but as a coin of him has been omitted in that place, it is inserted below.

VESICAL'RIUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.] VESPA, TERENTIUS, whose witticism at the expence of Titus is quoted by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 62).

VESPA'S'NUS, T. FLAVIUS SABINUS, Roman emperor, a.d. 70—79, was born in the Sabine country on the 17th of November, a.d. 9. His father was a man of mean condition, of Reate, in the country of the Sabini. His mother, Vespasia Polla, was the daughter of a Prefectus Castrorum, and the sister of a Roman senator. She was left a widow with two sons, Flavius Sabinus and Vespasian. On laying aside the toga virilis, Vespasian, with reluctance and at the urgent solicitation of his mother, took the latus clavus. He served as tribunus militum in Thrace, and was questor in Crete and Cyrene. He was afterwards Aedile and Praetor. About this time he took to wife Flavia Domitilla, the daughter of a Roman eques, by whom he had two sons, both of whom succeeded him. In the reign of Claudius, and by the influence of Narcissus, he was sent into Germany as legatus legionis; and in a.d. 43 he held the command in Britain, and reduced the Isle of Wight. (Sueton. Vespa. 4.) He was consul during the last two months of a.d. 51, and after consul of Africa under Nero, in which capacity Tacitus says (Hist. ii. 97) that he was much disliked. He was at this time very poor, and was accused of getting money by dishonourable means. Love of money indeed is said to have always been one of his faults. But he had a great military reputation, and he was liked by the soldiers. He was frugal in his habits, temperate, and an enemy to all ostentation; of a kind disposition, without the passions of hatred or revenge. He had many great qualities, with some mean ones,—a combination not at all rare. His body was strong and his health good; and it is recorded that he used to fast one day in every month. (Sueton. Vespa. 6.)

Nero, who did not like Vespasian because he was no admirer of Nero's vocal powers, forbade him to appear in his presence; but when he wished to appear, he thought nobody was fitter than Vespasian. He sent him to the East at the close of a.d. 69, at the head of a powerful army. (Vitellius.) His conduct of the Jewish war had raised his reputation, when the war broke out between Otho and Vitellius after the death of Galba. He was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the first of July and a.d. 69, in Judæa, where he then was, on the third of the same month, and soon after all through the East. He arranged that Mucianus, governor of Syria, should march against Vitellius, and that his son Titus should continue the war against the Jews. Titus, however, did little until the following year; and Antonius Primus defeated or gained over the troops of Vitellius, who was put to death about the 20th of December. Vespasian was in Egypt when he heard the news of the victory which his troops had gained at Cremona on the 25th of October; and he entered Alexandria, where he saw Apollonius of Tyana. Dion Cassius says that he made himself odious to the Alexandrians by increasing the taxes and imposing new ones, and the Alexandrians, according to their fashion, retaliated by satire and sarcasm. His object in going to Egypt was to cut off the supplies of grain from Alexandria to Rome, so as to compel Vitellius to yield; but this was unnecessary, for Domitian, the second son of Vespasian, then at Rome, was proclaimed Caesar upon the death of Vitellius. (Tacit. Hist. iii. 86.) The Senate conferred on Vespasian the imperial title with a specific enumeration of powers, and released him from all the laws from which Augustus, Tiberius, and Claudius had been released; and the Senate-consul trusted was confirmed by a Lex. A fragment of this Lex still remains. Titus was made consul for the following year with his father.
Mucianus, who arrived at Rome the day after the death of Vitellius, acted with full authority, for Vespasian had given him all powers. Domitian, also as Caesar, took a share in public business, and availed himself of his new rank to commit many acts of violence.

Vespasian then put several persons to death, and among them Galerius, the son of C. Piso, who had aspired to the empire in the time of Nero. In A. D. 70 Titus was consul with his father, though neither of them was in Rome on the 1st of January; and Domitian was praetor. Antonius Primus had anticipated Mucianus in the defeat of Vitellius; and as Mucianus did not like Primus, who was also a turbulent man, he compelled his legion, which were much attached to their commander, to quit Rome. Mucianus also deprived Arrius Varus of the charge of Praefectus Praetorio, which he gave to Clemens Aretinus. The first care of the senate after the death of Vitellius was to rebuild the Capitol, which had been recently burnt; and Helvidius Priscus laid the first stone on the 21st of June with great solemnity. (Tacit. Hist. i. 57.) Vespasian restored three thousand plates of bronze, which had been consumed in the conflagration, the invaluable records of the Roman state. (Sueton. Vespas. c. 8.) For this purpose all copies of the lost originals were carefully looked for. In this year the Sarmatians invaded Maesia and killed the governor, Fonteius Agrippa. Rubrius Gallus, who was sent by Vespasian, compelled the Sarmatians to retire across the river.

The Romans had now to carry on a war against the Batavi, who were situated near the mouth of the Rhine. These Batavi furnished soldiers for the Roman armies in Germany and Britain, and were so far in the relation of subjects to Rome. Claudius Civilis, a one-eyed man like Hannibal and Sertorius, and one of the most illustrious of the Batavi, had begun to excite his countrymen to resistance by preventing the march of the new recruits whom Vespasian had ordered to be enlisted. Having induced the Caninefates to join them, the Batavi attacked and defeated the Romans under Aquilius. Hordeonius Flaccus, who commanded the troops in Germany, sent Mummius Lupercus against Civilis with two legions, part of which joined Civilis, and the rest were driven back to Castra Vetera, perhaps Xanten in Clèves. Eight cohorts of Batavi and Caninefates, which Vespasian had ordered to march into Italy, turned back from Mainz and defeated Herennius Gallus near Bonn. (Tacit. Hist. iv. 19.) Civilis made his troops take the oath to Vespasian, and shortly after he was informed of the defeat of the Vitellians at Cremona, and that he ought now to lay down his arms, if he had taken them up for the cause of Vespasian; but Civilis had no intention to do so, and he declared that his object was to free his country and the Gaula from the Roman yoke. (Tacit. Hist. iv. 52.) The history of this war is told under Civilis, Claudius.

Domitian left Rome on the news of the revolt of the Gaula with the intention of conducting the war against Civilis, and Mucianus, knowing his character, thought it prudent to accompany him. On their route the news arrived that Cerialia had ended the war with Civilis, and Mucianus persuaded Domitian to go no farther than Lyon. Domitian returned to Italy before the end of the year to meet his father.

When Vespasian heard at Alexandria of the defeat of the party of Vitellius, his first care was to send vessels to Rome with supplies of corn, which were much wanted. He also forwarded an edict to Rome, by which he repealed the laws of Nero and his three successors, as to the crime of laesa majestas, and also banished astrologers, and yet he consulted astrologers himself, for all his good sense had not placed him above this superstition. (Tacit. Hist. ii. 28.) At Alexandria Vespasian is said to have cured a man who had a disease of the eyes, and a man with a paralysed hand, though probably neither of them was beyond the ordinary means of the healing art. (Tacit. Hist. iv. 81.) Vespasian, in his voyage from Egypt, visited Rhodes and several cities of Asia Minor. He landed in the south of Italy, and was joyfully received by the Italians on his journey to Rome and on his arrival there.

Vespasian worked with great industry to restore order at Rome and in the empire. He disbanded some of the mutinous soldiers of Vitellius, and maintained discipline among his own. He cooperated in a friendly manner with the senate in the public administration. Many sites in Rome still remained unbuilt since the great conflagration in Nero's time, and Vespasian allowed any person to build on these sites, if the owners did not do so, after a certain lapse of time. (Sueton. Vespas. c. 8.) In this year Vespasian as censor purged the Senate and the Equites of many unworthy members, and made up the deficient members by new nominations. He also raised several persons to the rank of Patrician, and among them Cn. Julius Agricola, afterwards the conqueror of Britain. The simplicity and frugality of his mode of life formed a striking contrast with the profusion and luxury of some of his predecessors, and his example is said to have done more to reform the morals of Rome than all the laws which had ever been enacted. He lived more like a private person than a man who possessed supreme power; he was affable and easy of access to all persons. The personal anecdotes of such a man are some of the most instructive records of his reign. He was never ashamed of the meanness of his origin, and ridiculed all attempts to make out for him a distinguished genealogy. (Sueton. Vespas. 12.) He often visited the villa in which he was born, and would not allow any change to be made in the place. When Volusius, the Parthian king, addressed to him a letter commencing in these terms, "Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasianus," the answer began, "Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces, king of kings." If it be true, as it is recorded, that he was not annoyed at satire or ridicule, he exhibited an elevation of character almost unparalleled in one who filled so exalted a station. Vespasian was mainly indebted to Mucianus, governor of Syria, for his imperial title, and he was not ungrateful for the services that Mucianus had rendered him, though Mucianus was of an arrogant and ambitious disposition, and gave Vespasian some trouble by his behaviour. He knew the bad character of his son Domitian, and as long as he lived he kept him under proper restraint.

The stories that are told of his avarice and of his modes of raising money, if true, detract from the dignity of his character; and it seems that he had a taste for little savings, and for coarse humour. Yet it is admitted that he was liberal in all his expenditure for purposes of public utility. Love of getting money and niggardliness in personal matters are by no means inconsistent with bountiful outlay for great and noble objects.

In A.D. 71 Vespasianus was consul, for the third time with M. Cocceius Nerva, the same probably who was afterwards emperor, for his colleague. The senate had decreed a triumph to Vespasian and Titus separately, for the conquest of the Jews; but Vespasian thought that one triumph was enough for both, and for the first time, it is said, in the history of Rome, a father and a son triumphed together. Vespasian was very weary of the pompous ceremony before it was over. The temple of Janus was closed as the signal of war being ended, and the emperor commenced the erection of a temple to the Vestal Virgin.

Titus at this time began to assist his father in the administration, and undertook the important functions of Præfectus Praetorio. In A.D. 72 Caesennius Paetus, whom Vespasian had made governor of Syria in place of Mucianus, informed the emperor that Antiochus, king of Commagene, and his son Epiphanes, were in treaty with the Parthian king and preparing to revolt. Whether the charge was true or false, Vespasian gave Paetus full powers to act, and the governor entered Commagene and took possession of the country. Antiochus was ultimately settled at Rome, where his two sons joined him, and Commagene was made a Roman province.

Petilius Cerealis, who had terminated the war with the Batavi at the close of A.D. 70, was afterwards sent into Britain, and reduced to subjugation a large part of the Brigantes. Julius Frontinus, after him, subdued the Silures, or people of South Wales, which was already disordered. But he still attended to business, just as if he had been in perfect health; and on feeling the approach of death he said that an emperor should die standing; and in fact he did die in this attitude on the 24th of June A.D. 79, being 69 years of age, seven months and seven days. He reigned ten years all but six days, for his reign is dated from his proclamation as emperor at Alexandria on the first of July A.D. 69.

The wife of Vespasian died before her husband's elevation to the imperial dignity, and also her daughter Domitilla. After his wife's death he cohabited with a freed woman named Caenis, whom, after he became emperor, he had, says Suetonius, almost as a lawful wife. A marriage with Caenis would not have been a Roman marriage, and she was a concubine, in the Roman sense. Caenis is accused of selling places under the emperor. (Suetonius, Vespasianus; Tacitus, Hist.; Dion Cassius, lxvi.; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. ii.)

COIN OF VESPASIANUS.

VESPA SIUS POLLIO. [POLLIO.]

VESPILLO, the name of a family of the Lucetia gens. L. LUCRETIVS VESPILO, aedil b.c. 133, is said to have thrown the corpse of Tib.
Gracchus into the Tiber and thus to have obtained the surname of Vespillo. (Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 64; respecting the Vespillones, see Dict. of Antiq. p. 559, a. 2d ed.)

2. Q. LUCRETIUS VESPILLO, an orator and a jurist, was proscribed by Sulla and put to death. (Cic. Brut. 48; Appian, B. C. iv. 44.)

3. Q. LUCRETIUS VESPILLO, the son of No. 2, served in the Pompeian fleet in b. c. 48. He was proscribed by the triumvirs in b. c. 43, but more fortunate than his father, was concealed by his wife Thuria in his own house at Rome, till his friends obtained his pardon. In b. c. 20, he was one of the deputation which the senate sent to Augustus at Athens to request the latter to assume the consulate for the following year, but he declined the honour, and appointed Vespillo, who was accordingly consul with C. Sentius Saturninus in b. c. 19. (Caes. B. C. iii. 7; Appian, B. C. iv. 44; Val. Max. vi. 7 § 2; Dion Cass. liv. 10.)

Vesta, one of the great Roman divinities, identical with the Greek Hestia both in name and import. She was the goddess of the hearth, and therefore inseparably connected with the Penates, for Aeneas was believed to have brought the eternal fire of Vesta from Troy, along with the images of the Penates; and the praetors, consuls, and dictators, before entering upon their official functions, sacrificed not only to the Penates, but also to Vesta at Laviniun. (Virg. Aen. ii. 296, &c.; x. 259, v. 744; Macrobi. Sat. iii. 4.) In the ancient Roman house, the hearth was the central part, and around it all the inmates daily assembled for their common meal (coena, comitii), and every meal thus taken was a fresh bond of union and affection among the members of a family, and at the same time an act of worship of Vesta combined with a sacrifice to her and the Penates. (Ov. Fast. vi. 305; Virg. Georg. iv. 384; Serv. ad Aen. i. 734.)

Every dwelling house therefore was, in some sense, a temple of Vesta (August. De Civ. Dei. iv. 11), but a public sanctuary united all the citizens of the state into one large family. This sanctuary stood in the Forum, between the Capitoline and Pala- tile hills, and not far from the temple of the Penates. (Dionys. i. 65.) That temple was round with a vaulted roof, like the impluvium of private houses, so that there is no reason to regard that form as an imitation of the vault of heaven (Ov. Fast. vi. 299, &c.; 292; Plut. Num. 11.) The goddess was not represented in her temple by a statue, but the eternal fire burning on the hearth or altar was her living symbol, and was kept up and attended to by the Vestals, her virgin priestesses. As each house, and the city itself, so also the country had its own Vesta, and the latter was worshipped at Laviniun, the metropolis of the Latins, where she was worshipped and received the regular sacrifices at the hands of the highest magistrates. The goddess herself was regarded as chaste and pure like her symbol, the fire, and the Vestals, who kept up the sacred fire, were likewise pure maidens. Respecting their duties and obligations, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Vestales. As regards her worship, it is stated, that every year, on the 1st of March her sacred fire, and the laurel tree which shaded her hearth, were renewed (Macrobi. Sat. iii. 145), and on the 15th of June she was worshipped and purified. The dirt was carried into an angipterus behind the temple, which was locked by a gate that no one might enter it. (Ov. Fast. vi. 227, &c.; Fest. p. 344, ed. Muller.) The day on which this took place was a dies nefastus, the first half of which was thought to be so inauspicious, that the priestess of Juno was not allowed to comb her hair, to cut her nails, or to approach her husband, while the second half was very favourable to contracting a marriage or entering upon other important undertakings.

A few days before that solemnity, on the 9th of June, the Vestal was celebrated in honour of the goddess, on which occasion none but women walked to the temple, and that with bare feet. On one of these occasions an altar had been dedicated to Jupiter Pistor. (Ov. Fast. vi. 350; comp. Hartung, Die Religion der Röm. vol. ii. p. 111, &c.) [L. S. J.]

Vestiliius, Sex., a man of praetorian rank, put to death, a. n. 32. (Tac. Ann. vi. 9.)

Vestinus Atticus. [Atticus]

Vestinus, julius, a sophist, made an abridgment of the lexicon of Pamphilus [Pamphilus, No. 4], and a selection of words from Demosthenes, Thucydidés, Isaeus, Isocrates and others. (Suidas, s. v. Οὐρνίτος.) The name of Julius Vestinus ought to be substituted for that of Julius Justinus, which is prefixed as the name of one of the lexicographers to the work of Suidas.

C. Vestorius, of Puteoli, a money-lender, with whom Cicero had large dealings, and who was also a friend of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 6, 14, vi. 2, 5, ad Att. xiv. 9, 12, 14, et alibi.)

Vestritius Spurinna. [Sparinna.]

P. Vestritius, a Roman eques and a Pompeian, was taken prisoner in Africa in b. c. 46, and pardoned by Caes. (Hirt. B. Afr. 64.)

Vetilius, 1. C. or m. Vetilius, praetor b. c. 147, was defeated in Spain by Viraithus, taken prisoner and put to death. For an account of his defeat, and the authorities, see Viriathus.

2. Vetilius, a leno, was refused by Q. Metellus, the praetor, the honorum possessio in accordance with the will of Juventus, on account of his infamous mode of life. (Val. Max. vii. 7 § 7.)

3. P. Vetilius, a relation of Sex. Aebutius, and a witness in the case of Caccina. (Cic. pro Caccin. 9.)

Vetranio, an officer far advanced in years, who had long served with high reputation, and who was much and generally beloved on account of his simple manners and amiable temper, commanded the legions in Illyricum and Pannonia, at the period (A. D. 350), when Constantine was treacherously destroyed, and his throne seized by Magnentius. The first impulse of the veteran induced him to write a letter to Constantius promising firm allegiance, and urging him to advance with all speed that he might in person chastise the usurper. Soon afterwards, however, he was prevailed upon by the solicitations of his troops, and by the pressing representations of the notorious Constantius [Constantina], eldest sister of Constantine the Great, himself to assume the purple at Sirnum, about the beginning of March, A. D. 350. Being now courted by both of the contending parties, he concluded a treaty with Constantius whom he soon abandoned; he next entered into close alliance with Magnentius, and finally, as detailed in a former article [Constantius], was accepted by dextrous management at the famous conference held on the 25th December near Sardica to abridge the power which he had exercised for less than ten months, and to resign all his pretensions in favour of Constantius, by whom he was treated with great kindness, and permitted to retire to Prusa, in Bithynia, where he passed the remaining six years of his life in contented tranquillity, practising the virtues of the Christian faith which he professed. It is tolerably clear, as far as we can pretend to draw any conclusion from the confused and contradictory accounts transmitted to us regarding the above transactions, that the extraordinary conduct of Vetranio must be ascribed to natural indecision or to the vacillating imbecility of old age, rather than to a system of complicated treachery altogether foreign to his character, which is painted in very favourable colours by almost all the historians of this epoch, except Aurelius Victor who describes him as little better than a mischievous idiot. COIN OF VETRANIO.

VETTIA or VECTIAGENS, plebeian, is not mentioned till the latter end of the republic, but obtained considerable eminence under the empire, where its name frequently appears in the consular Fasti. In many editions and some MSS. of the ancient writers, the name occurs in the form of Vettius; but Vettius is the true orthography, as we see from coins. We find coins of the Vetil of the republican period, bearing the cognomn Judex Sabinus, a specimen of which is given under Judex.

VEITTE'NUS, or VECTTE'NUS, a friend of Cicero and Atticus, was a money-lender. (Cic. ad Att. x. 5, 11, 13, 15, xii. 3, xv. 13.)

VEITIIUS, or VEITIIUS. 1. P. VEITIIUS, quaestor of C. Verres in Sicily, is spoken of by Cicero as an honourable man. (Cic. Ver. v. 44.)

2. T. VEITIIUS, praetor b. c. 59, presided at the trial of L. Flaccus, whom Cicero defended. (Cic. pro Flacc. 34.)

3. VEITIIUS, one of the lovers of Clodia, gave her some copper coins instead of silver, and was in consequence shamefully treated by two other lovers of Clodia. (Cic. pro Cael. 30; Plut. Cic. 29.)

4. VEITIIUS, of whom Cicero purchased a house. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 5. § 2.)

5. SEX. VEITIIUS, a friend of Atticus, and a coheres of Cicero. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 12.)

6. L. VEITIIUS, a Roman eques, was in the pay of Cicero in b. c. 63, to whom he gave some valuable information respecting the Catilinarian conspiracy. Hence he is called by Cicero noster index. Among others he accused Caesar of being privy to the conspiracy. (Comp. Suet. Caes. 17, where we ought to read a L. Vetio index instead of a L. Vettio judicis.) He was an unprincipled fellow, who was ready to sell his services to any one who would pay him well. He again appears in b. c. 59 as an informer. In that year he accused Curio, Cicero, L. Lucullus, and many other distinguished men, of having formed a conspiracy to assassinate Pompey. Dion Cassius, who always thinks the worst about every man, asserts (xxviii. 9) as a positive fact that Vettius had been purchased by Cicero and L. Lucullus to murder Caesar and Pompey; but this statement is in opposition to all other authorities, and deserves no credence. It seems almost certain that the conspiracy was a sheer invention for the purpose of injuring Cicero, Curio, and others; and there is more difficulty in determining who were the inventors of it. Cicero regarded it as the work of Caesar, who remained in the background while its success was uncertain, and who used the tribune Vatinius as his instrument. At a later period, when Cicero had returned from exile, and feared to provoke the triumvirs, he threw the whole blame upon Vatinius. However this may be, the history of the affair is briefly as follows. Vettius was said to have insinuated himself into the friendship of Curio, and then to have informed him that he intended, along with his slaves, to kill Pompey, hoping to elicit from Curio an approval, if not a promise, of co-operation in the plot. Curio, however, did not fall into the snare, but disclosed what he had heard to his father. The latter informed Pompey. Vettius, therefore, was apprehended and brought before the senate, where he stated that Curio was at the head of a conspiracy which had been formed against Pompey's life, in which some of the most distinguished young men of the state had a share; among others, L. Aemilius Paulus, M. Brutus, and L. Lentulus. The senate ordered him to be cast into prison. On the following day Vatinius brought him before the assembly of the people, that he might confirm what he had already said before the senate; but he now contradicted himself, and his evidence became much more suspicious than it had been on the previous day. Some names which he mentioned in the senate, he now passed over entirely, but he added many others of still greater celebrity, such as Lucullus and L. Domitius Ahenobarbus. He did not mention Cicero by name, but he said that an eloquent consular, who lived near the consul Caesar, had said to him that the state needed a Servilius Ahala, or a Brutus. He was sent back to prison, and on the following morning was found strangled in his cell. It was given out that he had committed suicide; but the marks of violence were evident on his body, and Cicero at a later time charged Vatinius with the murder. Suetonius says (Caes. 20) that Vettius was poisoned, but this is in opposition to the direct statement of Cicero, who must have known the manner of his death, and could have had no reason for giving a false account on this point at least. (Dion. Cass. xxxvii. 41; Suet. Caes. 17; Cic. ad Att. ii. 24, pro Sest. 63, in Vatin. 10, 11, with the Schol. Bob. pp. 308, 320, ed. Orelli; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 9; Suet. Caes. 20; Appian, B. C. ii. 12; Plut. Lucull. 42; Drummann, Geschichts Roms, vol. ii. p. 233, foll.) The coin of the Vettia gens, with the surname of Judex upon it, has nothing to do with this Vettiius [Judex.]

VETTIUS AQUIL'INUS JVENCUS. [JVENCUS.]

C. VETTIUS ATTICUS, consul under Gordianus III. A. D. 342 with C. Asinius Praetextatus. (Fasti; Capitol. Gord. 26.)

VETTIUS BOLANUS. [BOLANUS.]

VETTIUS CATO or SCATO. [SCATO.]

P. VETTIUS CHILIO, a Roman eques engaged in farming the taxes in Sicily, was a witness against Verres. (Cic. Verr. iii. 71.)

VETTIUS CRYSIPPUS. [CRYSIPPUS.]

VETTIUS MESSIUS. [MESSIUS.]

VETTIUS PIRCIUS. [PIRCIUS.]

VETTIUS PRO'CULUS. [PRO'CULUS.]

VETTIUS SABINUS. [SABINUS.]

VETTIUS SALASSUS. [SALASSUS.]

VETTIUS SCATO. [SCATO.]

VETTIUS VALEN.S. [VALEN.S.]

Q. VETTIUS VETTIV'IUS, a Marsian, was a contemporary of Cicero, by whom he is mentioned among the orators of the Socii and Latini. (Cic. Brut. 46.)

VETUL'INUS, was proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, and collected a considerable force in the south of Italy, with which he for a long time resisted the troops sent against him, but was at length killed when he was on the point of embarking to cross over to Messana. (Appian, B.C. iv. 23.)

VET'ULIO, SENTIUS SATURNI'NUS. [SANTURNUS, SENTIUS, No. 2.]

VETU'RIA, the mother of Coriolanus. [CORNIO-LANDUS.]

VETUR'IA GENS, anciently called VETU'SIA, patrician and plebeian. The patrician branch of the gens was of great antiquity: according to tradition one of their number, Mamurius Veturius, lived in the time of Numa, and made the sacred ancilia. [See below.] From the fact of Mamurius Veturius being connected with the history of Numa, and also from his having two gentle names, we may conclude that the Veturi were of Sabine origin, and belonged to the second tribe at Rome, the Titii or Titinienses. The Veturi are also mentioned in the early times of the republic, and one of them, P. Veturius Geminus Cicurinus, was consul in the eleventh year of the republic, B.C. 499. The Veturi rarely occur in the later times of the republic, and after the year B.C. 206, when L. Veturius Philo was consul, their name disappears from the Fasti. They were divided into families, bearing respectively the names of CAL'VINUS, CRASSUS CICURINUS, GEMINUS CICURI'NUS (both of which are given under CICURINUS), and PHILO. The coins of the Veturia gens have no cognomen upon them. The following specimen represents on the obverse a head wearing a helmet with TI. VEX., and on the reverse a man kneeling down holding in his arms a pig, which two other men are touching with their staves. The subject represented on the obverse has been variously interpreted; but there can be no doubt that it refers to the conclusion of a treaty, but what the particular treaty may have been is useless to conjecture. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 337.)

COIN OF THE VETURIA GENs.

VETUR'IA MAMURIUS is said to have been the armourer who made the elven anciilia exactly like the one that was sent from heaven in the reign of Numa. His praises formed one of the chief subjects of the songs of the Saulli. (Plut. Num. 13; Ov. Fast. iii. 384; Dionys. ii. 71; Festus, s. v. Mam. Vet.; comp. Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Saulli.) Even the ancients themselves doubted in the reality of his existence: Varro interpreted his name as equivalent to vetus memoria (Var. L. i. vi. 46, ed. Müller.) Some modern writers regard Mamurius Veturius as an Etruscan artist, because he is said to have made a brazen image of the god Vertumnus. (Propert. iv. 2, 61; comp. Müller, Etrusker, vol. ii. p. 252.)

VETUS, the name of a family of the Antistia gens. 1. ANTISTIUS VETUS, proprætor in Further Spain about B.C. 68, under whom Caesar served as questor. (Vell. Pat. ii. 43; Plut. Caes. 5; Suet. Caes. 7.)

2. C. ANTISTIUS VETUS, son of the preceding, was taken as questor by Caesar out of gratitude to his father, when he was proprætor in Further Spain in B.C. 61. In B.C. 37 Vetus was tribune of the plebs and supported Cicero in opposition to Clodius. In the civil war he espoused Caesar's party, and we find him in Syria in B.C. 45, fighting against Q. Caecilius Bassus, who had formerly been on the Pompeian side, and who now attempted to seduce the troops in the East from their allegiance to Caesar. He besieged Bassus in Apameia, but was obliged to retire on the approach of the Parthians. In B.C. 34 Vetus carried on war against the Salassi, and in B.C. 30 was consul suffectus. He accompanied Augustus to Spain in B.C. 25, and on the illness of the emperor continued the war against the Cantabri and Astures, whom he reduced to submission. (Plut. Caes. 5; Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 1. § 3, ad Att. xiv. 9. § 3; Dion Cass. xlvi. 27; Appian, Illyr. 17; Dion Cass. liii. 25; Vell. Pat. ii. 50; Plut. Florus, iv. 12. § 21.) The annexed coin seems to have been struck by the C. Antistius Vetus, as triumvir of the mint. It contains on the obverse a female head with ANTISTIUS VETVS IIIVIN, and on the reverse various utensils of the pontifices with IMP. CAESAR AVGV(T) COS. XL

COIN OF C. ANTISTIUS VETUS.

3. C. ANTISTIUS VETUS, son of No. 2, was VIBIENUS.

Consul in B.C. 6 with D. Laelius Balbus; and as he lived to see both his sons consuls, he must have been alive at least as late as A.D. 28. (Dion Cass. iv. 9; Vell. Pat. ii. 43.) He was a friend of Vel- lius Paterculus, from whom we learn (L.c.) that Vetus was a pontifex.

4. C. ANTISTIUS VETUS, son of No. 3, was consul A.D. 23 with C. Asinius Pollio. (Vell. Pat. ii. 43; Dion Cass. Index, lib. ivii; Tac. Ann. iv. 17; Frontin. AquaeQ. 102.)

5. L. ANTISTIUS VETUS, son of No. 3, was consul suffectus A.D. 28. (Vell. Pat. ii. 43; Fasti.)

6. C. ANTISTIUS VETUS, probably son of No. 4, was consul under Claudius A.D. 50 with M. Sufius Nerulinius. (Tac. Ann. xii. 25.)

7. L. ANTISTIUS VETUS, probably also a son of No. 5, was consul with the emperor Nero in the first year of his reign, A.D. 55. Three years afterwards, A.D. 58, Vetus commanded a Roman army in Germany, and as he had no war to carry on, he formed the project, in order that his soldiers might not remain idle, of connecting the Mosella (Moselle) and the Arar (Saone) by a canal, by which means a water communication would be established between the Mediterranean and the Northern Ocean, as troops could be conveyed down the Rhone and the Saone into the Moselle through the canal, and down the Moselle into the Rhine, and so into the Ocean. The daughter of Vetus was married to Rubellius Plautus; and when Nero resolved upon the death of the latter in A.D. 62, his father-in-law pressed him to take up arms against the emperor. [Plautus, p. 411, b.] Plautus was put to death, but Vetus escaped for a time. Three years later, A.D. 65, the tyrant resolved upon his death, and Vetus accordingly anticipated his sentence by opening his veins in the bath. His mother-in-law Sexia and his daughter Polumia likewise opened their veins and perished along with him. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 11, 53, xiv. 57, 58, xvi. 10, 11.)

8. C. ANTISTIUS VETUS, consul with C. Manlius Valens in the last year of the reign of Domitian, A.D. 96. (Dion Cass. ixvii. 14.)

9. ANTISTIUS VETUS, consul under Trajan, A.D. 116, with Aelius. (Fasti.)

10. ANTISTIUS VETUS, consul under Antoninus Pius, A.D. 150, with Gallicanus. (Fasti; Cod. 2. tit. 13. s. 1.)

VIBIENNA CAELES or CAELIUS. [CAELES VIBIENNA.]

VIBIA GENS, plebeian. No Romans of this name are mentioned till the latter end of the republic; but we meet with several persons of the name among the Italian nations in the second Punic war. [See below, VIBIUS, Nos. 1, 2; VIBIUS VIRRIUS.] The first of this gens, who obtained the consulship, was C. Vibius Paninus in B.C. 43; and several Vibii appear in the Consular Fasti under the empire. Two of the Roman emperors, TREBONIANUS GALLIUS and VOLUSIUS, bore the name of Vibius. The coins of the Vibia gens have on them the surnames of Pansa and Varsi. [Pansa; VARUS.]

VIBIDIA, the eldest of the Vestal virgins, besought the emperor Claudius to spare Messalina. (Tac. Ann. xi. 32, 34.)

VIBIUS VARRO. [VARRO.]

C. VIBIUS, a senator, lost his life in the riots which took place at the burial of Clodius in B.C. 52. (Cic. pro Mil. 14; Ascon. in Mil. p. 32, Orelli.)

VIBIUS or VIBIUS, king of the Hermunduri, expelled Catulda from his dominions at the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, and subsequently united with Vangio and Sido in expelling Vannius, king of the Suevi, from his country, in the reign of Claudius. (Tac. Ann. ii. 63, xii. 23.) [CATUALDA; VANNIUS.]

VIBIUS. 1. VIBIUS ACCAEUS, apparently so called from the town of Accus, was a commander of a Pelignian cohort in the Roman army in B.C. 212, and distinguished himself by his bravery. (Liv. xxv. 14; Val. Max. iii. 2 § 20.)

2. VIBIUS, one of the Brutii, the brother of Pacius, B.C. 209. (Liv. xxvii. 15.) [PACCIUS, No. 2.]

3. VIBIUS, bore such a striking resemblance to Pompeius Magnus, that he was frequently mistaken for the latter. (Val. Max. ix. 14. § 1; Plin. H. N. vii. 10. s. 12.)

4. L. VIBIUS, a Roman eques, was magister or manager of the company, which farmed the customs at Syracuse. (Cic. Verri. ii. 74.)

5. SEX. VIBIUS, of Larinum, slain by Oppianicus. (Cic. pro Cluenti. 8.)

6. VIBIUS CAPPADOX, of Larinum, said to have been poisoned by A. Cluentius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 60.) The cognomen Cappadox is suspicious, but it is found in all the best MSS.

7. VIBIUS, from whom Cicero received the books of the poet Alexander Lychnus (Cic. ad Att. ii. 20), is probably the same person as Vibius Curius. [CURIUS, p. 904, a.]

8. C. VIBIUS, one of the accusers of Libo Drusus, A.D. 16. (Tac. Ann. ii. 30.)

VIBIUS, the engraver of a precious stone, namely, a cornelian engraved in intaglio, representing an Othriad, on whose buckle the artist's name is inscribed thus, VIBIUS F. (Caylus, Recueil iii. pt. xxi. No. 5, pp. 83, 84; B. Rotchere, Lettre a M. Schorn, p. 158, 2d ed.) [P.S.]

VIBIUS CRISPUS. [CRISPUS.]

VIBIUS CURIUS. [CURIUS.]

VIBIUS FRONTO. [FRONTO.]

VIBIUS MARCUS. [MARCUS.]

VIBIUS PACIACUS. [PACIACUS.]

VIBIUS PANCE. [PANSA.]

VIBIUS PO'STUMUS. [POSTUMUS.]

VIBIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

VIBIUS SECUNDUS. [SECUNDUS.]

VIBIUS SEQUESTER. [SEQUESTER.]

VIBIUS SERENUS. [Serenus.]

VIBIUS TREBONIANUS. [TREBONI-

ANUS.]

VIBIUS VARUS. [VARUS.]

VIBIUS VIRRIUS, of Capua, induced his countrymen to revolt from the Romans and to oppose the assault of Hispabio at the battle of Cannae, B.C. 216. When Capua, after its long siege by the Romans, could hold out no longer, B.C. 211, Vibius recommended the senators to put themselves to death, rather than fall into the power of the Romans. Twenty-seven of the senators resolved to follow his advice, and accompanied him to his house, where after a sumptuous banquet they all took poison. (Liv. xxiii. 6, xxvi. 13, 14.)

VIBULANUS, the name of the most ancient family of the Fabia gens. It was so powerful in the early times of the republic that three brothers of the family held the consulship for seven years.
in succession, b.c. 485—479. The last person of the gens who bore this surname was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul, b.c. 412. This Vibulanus assumed the agnomen of Ambustus; and his descendants dropped the name of Vibulanus and took that of Ambustus in its place. In the same way Ambustus was after a time supplanted by that of Maximus. [Ambustus; Maximus.]

1. Q. Fabius K. F. Vibulanus, consul b.c. 486 with Ser. Cornelius Cosus Maluginensis, carried on war with success against the Volsci and Aequis; but instead of dividing the booty among the soldiers, he sold it, and deposited the money arising from the sale in the public treasury. In this year Sp. Cassius Viscellinus was condemned to death. In b.c. 482 Fabius Vibulanus was consul a second time with C. Julius Julus. Both consuls marched against the Veientes, but as the army did not appear in the field, they devastated their land and returned home. In b.c. 480 Fabius fought under his brother Marcus [No. 3] against the Etruscans, and was killed in battle. (Liv. ii. 41—43, 46; Dionys. viii. 77, 82, 90, ix. 11.)

2. K. Fabius K. F. Vibulanus, brother of the preceding, was quaeator parricidi in b.c. 465, and along with his colleague L. Valerius accused Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, who was in consequence condemned by the votes of the populii. Although the name of the Fabii had become hateful to the plebeians in consequence of Q. Fabius, who was consul this year, depriving the soldiers of the booty they had gained in the war, nevertheless the patricians carried the election of K. Fabius, who was accordingly consul in the following year b.c. 484 with L. Aurelius Mamecurus. Kaeo took an active part with his colleague in opposing the agrarian law, which the tribunes of the people attempted to bring forward. According to Dionysius Kaeo came to the assistance of his colleague, who had been defeated by the Volsci, but Livy says nothing of Kaeo, and represents Mamecirus as conquering the Volsci. (Liv. ii. 41, 42; Dionys. viii. 77, foll., viii. 82—86.) Niebuhr supposes that a great change in the constitution was effected on the election of K. Fabius and his colleague to the consulate. He maintains that the election of the consuls was then transferred from the Comitia Centuriata to the Comitia Curiata, and that the choice of the latter assembly was only ratified by the former. He further supposes that a compromise took place three years afterwards, b.c. 482, in virtue of which the centuriae had the election of one consul and the curiae of the other, and that this continued to be the practice till the decemvirate. (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 177, foll.) Our limits do not permit us to go to an investigation of this point, and we can only remark that Niebuhr's view is supported by no positive testimony, and has been rejected by most subsequent scholars. (Götting, Römische Staatsverfassung, p. 308; Becker, Handbuch der Römischen Alterthümer, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 93.) There can be little doubt that the consuls were at all times, without exception, elected by the comitia centuriata; and there is no difficulty in understanding how the patricians were able to carry the elections of their own candidates at these comitia. (Comp. Becker, ibid., p. 12, note 19.)

In b.c. 481 K. Fabius was consul a second time with Sp. Furius Medullinus Fuscus. At the be-resolved to quit Rome altogether, where they were regarded as apostates by their own order. They determined to found a settlement on the banks of the Tiber, a small stream that falls into the Tiber a few miles above Rome. According to the legend, the consul Kaeso went before the senate and said, that the Fabii were willing to carry on the war against the Veientes, alone and at their own cost. Their offer was joyfully accepted, for the patricians were glad to see them expose themselves voluntarily to such dangers. The departure of the Fabii from the city was celebrated in Roman story. On the day after Kaeso had made the proposal to the senate, 306 Fabii, all patricians of one gens, assembled on the Quirinal at the house of Kaeso, and from thence marched with the consul at their head through the Carmental gate. They proceeded straight to the banks of the Tiber, where they erected a fortress. Livy and the writers who follow him speak of the 306 patrician Fabii as departing alone to the Tiber; but other authorities with more probability represent them as accompanied by their wives, children and clients. The latter were understood to be very numerous, and Dion Cass. Fragm. No. 26, ed. Reim.; Festus, s. v. Scelerata porta.) Ovid says (l. c.) that the Fabii perished on the Ides of February; but all other authorities state that they were destroyed on the day on which the Romans were subsequently conquered by the Gauls at the Allia, that is, on the fifteenth before the Kalends of Sextilis, June the 18th (Liv. vi. 1; Tac. Hist. ix. 91; Plut. Camill. 19); hence Niebuhr supposes that Ovid mistook the day of their departure for that of their destruction (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. note 14.) It is unanimously stated by the ancient writers that all the Fabii perished at the Tiber with the exception of one individual, the son of Marcus, from whom all the later members of the gens were descended. The same accounts relate that he was left behind at Rome on account of his youth; but this could not have been the reason, if we are correct in the supposition that the Fabii migrated from the city with all their families, and it is moreover refuted by the fact that this Fabius was consul ten years afterwards, From the fact of his being raised to the consulship, and from the opposition which he then offered to the tribunes, it is probable, as Niebuhr supposes, that he maintained the former opinions of his gens, when the latter changed their sentiments and refused to leave Rome with them. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 194.)

VIBULANUS.

The Fabii has been followed by Dionysius who has worked up the tale in his usual manner, as well as by Livy, Ovid, and other ancient writers. The fortress on the Tiber must have been taken immediately afterwards, and the whole of the settlement must have been put to the sword. In whatever way the Fabii may have perished, it seems clear that they might have been saved, for the consul Menenius Lanatus was in the neighbourhood with an army, and was condemned in the following year as the guilty cause of the disaster. [Lana- tus, No. 2.] (Livy. ii. 45—50; Dionys. ix. 14—22; Gell. xvi. 21; Ov. Fast. ii. 195, foll.; Dion Cass. Fragm. No. 26, ed. Reim.; Festus, s. v. Scelerata porta.) Ovid says (l. c.) that the Fabii were killed on the Ides of February; but all other authorities state that they were destroyed on the day on which the Romans were subsequently conquered by the Gauls at the Allia, that is, on the fifteenth before the Kalends of Sextilis, June the 18th (Liv. vi. 1; Tac. Hist. ix. 91; Plut. Camill. 19); hence Niebuhr supposes that Ovid mistook the day of their departure for that of their destruction (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. note 14.) It is unanimously stated by the ancient writers that all the Fabii perished at the Tiber with the exception of one individual, the son of Marcus, from whom all the later members of the gens were descended. The same accounts relate that he was left behind at Rome on account of his youth; but this could not have been the reason, if we are correct in the supposition that the Fabii migrated from the city with all their families, and it is moreover refuted by the fact that this Fabius was consul ten years afterwards, From the fact of his being raised to the consulship, and from the opposition which he then offered to the tribunes, it is probable, as Niebuhr supposes, that he maintained the former opinions of his gens, when the latter changed their sentiments and refused to leave Rome with them. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 194.)

3. M. FABII K. F. VIBULANUS, the brother of the two preceding, was consul b.c. 483 with L. Valerius Potitus. He resisted the efforts of the tribunes to carry the Agrarian law of Sp. Cassius into effect; and as they in consequence impeded the levy of troops, the consuls removed their tribunals outside the city, where the power of the tribunes did not extend, and by heavy punishments compelled the citizens to enlist. The consuls then carried on war against the Volscians, but without any decisive result. (Livy. ii. 42, Dionys. viii. 87, 88.) In b.c. 480 M. Fabius was consul a second time with Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus. The two consuls marched against the Veientes, but did not venture at first to attack the enemy, lest their own soldiers should desert them as they had done K. Fabius in the preceding year. They accordingly kept their troops in their intrenchments, till the soldiers, roused at length by the taunts and scoffs of the enemy, demanded to be led forth to battle, and swore that they would not leave the field except as conquerors. The bravery of the Fabii in the battle which followed has already been related in the life of Kaeso, who fought under his brother. The Romans gained the victory, but bought it dearly. The consul Cincinnatus and Q. Fabius were killed; and the surviving consul, on account of the loss which he had sustained, refused the triumph which the senate offered him. The care which M. Fabius showed for the wounded and his reconciliation to the plebeians have been related above [No. 2]. Dionysius says that Fabius resigned his consulship two months before the expiration of his year, because his wounds prevented him from discharging the duties of his office. (Livy. ii. 43—47; Dionys. ix. 5—13; Frontin. _Strat._ i. 11; Val. Max. v. 5, § 2.) In the following year, b. c. 479, M. Fabius accompanied the rest of his gens to their fatal settlement on the Cremera and perished along with them two years afterwards. Dionysius (ix. 15) represents Marcus as the leader of the Fabii in their migration from Rome, but Livy (ii. 49) undoubtedly follows the genuine legend in making the consul Kaeso head his gens on that occasion.

4. Q. Fabius M. F. K. F. Vibulanus, the son of No. 3, is said to have been the only one of the Fabii who survived the destruction of his gens at the Cremers, but he could not have been left behind at Rome on account of his youth, as the legend relates. [See above, No. 2, sub finem.] He was consul in b. c. 467 with T. Aemilius Mame- renus, when he supported the patriotic party against the tribunes. The latter, having the co-operation of the other consul, made a vigorous effort to carry the agrarian law; but Fabius effected a compromise by proposing that a colony should be founded at Antium, which had been conquered by the Romans in the preceding year. He subsequently marched against the Aequians, who sued for peace, which was granted them; but they soon afterwards broke it and made an inroad into the Latin territory. (Livy. iii. 1; Dionys. ix. 50.)

In b. c. 465 Fabius was consul a second time with T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus. He was appointed to carry on the war with the Aequians, which had been continued ever since his first consulship. The ambassadors whom he sent to the Aequians were treated with contempt, at which the Romans were so much enraged that Quintius marched one of the colonies of the army to support his colleague. According to Livy the consuls defeated the Aequians, who withdrew from Mount Algidus into their own territory; but Dionysius says that the battle was not decisive, which is more in accordance with Livy's subsequent narrative, in which it is stated that the Aequians made incursions into the Roman territory for plunder, which were avenged by Fabius devastating the lands of the Aequians. (Livy. iii. 2, 3; Dionys. ix. 61.) Three years afterwards, b. c. 462, Fabius was appointed Praefectus Urbis, while the two consuls were absent from the city. The tribune C. Terentullius Arsa took advantage of the absence of the consuls to propose a rogation for appointing five commissioners, who might draw up laws to limit the power of the consuls. Thereupon Fabius called together the senate and inveighed with such vehemence against the rogation and its author, that even both the consuls could not have inspired greater fear. On the advice of his colleagues Terentullius withdrew his proposal. (Livy. iii. 9; Dionys. ix. 69.)

In b. c. 459 Fabius was consul a third time with L. Cornelius Maluginensis. In this year he defeated the Volscians, who had laid siege to Antium, and also the Aequians, who had taken Tusculum, and on account of these victories celebrated a triumph on his return to Rome. In the following year, b. c. 458, when the two consuls marched with their two armies against the Sabines and Aequians, Fabius was left behind with a third for the protection of Rome. This is the account of Dionysius, but Livy simply says that he was one of the three ambassadors sent in that year to Cloelia. Vibulanus, the leader of the Aequians. (Livy. iii. 22—23; Dionys. x. 38—39.)

In b. c. 450 Fabius was elected a member of the second decemvirate, and along with his colleagues continued illegally in power in the following year. Ap. Claudius and Fabius were the two leading members of the second decemvirate, and Fabius supported his colleague in all his tyrannical acts. When the war with the Aequians and Sabines broke out Fabius was appointed to the command with two colleagues, while Appius remained in the city. Fabius must have ordered the murder of L. Siccius [Siccius], who was serving in the army against the Sabines, but his name is not mentioned in connection with this foul deed. This probably arose from Livy and Dionysius having the Annals of Fabius Pictor before them, in which the virtues of the Fabii were exalted and their faults omitted. After the abolition of the decemvirate and the death of Aemilius Capitolinus and Oppius, Fabius shared the fate of his remaining colleagues; he went into exile and his property was confiscated. (Livy. iii. 35, 41, 58; Dionys. x. 58, xi. 23, 46.)

Q. Fabius is said to have married the daughter of Numerius Atelcius of Maleventum on account of her wealth, with the condition that his first child should receive the praenomen of its maternal grandfather; and it is stated that it was in this way that Numerius became a praenomen in a patrician gens, which it had not been before. (festus, s. n. _numerius_, pp. 170, 175, ed. Müller.) We find however that the elder of his two sons bore the praenomen Marcus, and the younger that of Numerius [Nos. 5 and 6]; but it has been conjectured that the elder may have been a son by a former marriage.

5. M. Fabius Q. F. M. N. Vibulanus, eldest son of No. 4, was consul b. c. 442 with Postumus Aebutius Elva Cornicen, in which year a colony was founded at Ardea. In b. c. 437 he served as legatus of the dictator Mam. Aemilius Mame- rinus in the war against the Veientes and Fidenates. In b. c. 433 he was one of the consular tribunes; and in b. c. 431 he served as legatus of the dictator A. Postumius Tubertus in the great war against the Aequians and Volscians. He lived till the capture of Rome by the Gauls, b. c. 390, where he is spoken of as pontifex maximus, and is said to have rehearsed the solemn formula, which was repeated after him by the aged sacerdotes who had resolved to await the entrance of the Gauls into the city, and who accordingly dedicated themselves to death. (Livy. iv. 11; Dionys. xii. 34; Livy. iv. 17, 19, 25; _Diod. xii. 59_; Livy. iv. 27, 28, v. 41.)

6. N. Fabius Q. F. M. N. Vibulanus, second son of No. 4, was consul b. c. 421 with T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus. He carried on war against the Aequians, whom he put to flight without any difficulty: he was refused a triumph, but received the honour of an ovation. It was in this year that the consuls proposed that in addition to the two city quaestors, two others should be appointed to attend upon the consuls in time of war. This proposal gave rise to great contests, as the tribunes insisted that some of the quaestors should be chosen from the plebeians. In B. C. 415 Fabius was one of the consular tribunes, and again in B. C. 407. (Liv. iv. 43, 49, 58; Diod. xiii. 24, xiv. 3.)

7. Q. Fabius Q. F. M. N. Vibulanus, third son of No. 4, was consul B. C. 423 with C. Sempronius Attratius, consular tribune for the first time B. C. 416 (omitted through accident by Livy, iv. 47), and for the second time B. C. 414. (Liv. iv. 37, 49; Diod. xiii. 9, 30.) At the beginning of the following year he was interrex. (Liv. iv. 51.)

8. Q. Fabius M. F. Q. N. Vibulanus Ambustus, son of No. 5, was consul B. C. 412 with C. Furius Pacinus. (Liv. iv. 52.) He was the last Fabius of the name of Vibulanus. Ambustus now became the name of the family. [AMBUSTIUS.]

VIBULE'NUS AGRIPPA. [AGrippa.]

L. VIBUL'LIUS RUfUS, a senator and an intimate friend of Pompey, is mentioned on one or two occasions by Cicero before the breaking out of the civil war. He was a man of resolution and energy, and was much trusted by Pompey, who made him Praefectus Fabrum in the civil war. When Caesar marched into Italy at the beginning of B. C. 49, Pompey sent Vibullius to Picenum to strengthen his cause in that quarter, but he was unable to effect any thing, as all the towns declared in favour of Caesar, and he accordingly threw himself into Corfinium, which was held by Domitius Ahenobarbus. Vibullius was one of the senators who fell into Caesar’s hands and was sent as a prisoner to Rome and was along with the others dismissed unjubred by the conquerors. A few days afterwards Pompey sent him into Spain to assist Afranius and Petreius in carrying on war against Caesar. He was again taken prisoner by Caesar on the conquest of Pompey’s troops in that country, and was again pardoned. When Caesar landed in Greece in B. C. 48, he despatched him to Pompey with offers of peace, and Vibullius made the greatest haste to reach Pompey, not from any desire to favour the views of Caesar, but in order to give Pompey the earliest intelligence possible of the arrival of his enemy in Greece. (Cic. ad. Q. Fr. iii. 1 § 3, ad Att. vii. 24, vili. 1, 2, 11, 13; Caes. B. C. i. 13, 23, 34, 38, iii. 10, 11.)

VICA POTA, that is, “the Victor and Conqueror” (“vainct et poëte”), was a Roman divinity of victory, whose temple was situated at the foot of the hill Velia. (Liv. ii. 7; Cic. de Leg. ii. 11.)

VICTOR, an abandoned man, whom it was supposed that M. Antonius would recall from exile in B. C. 44. (Cic. ad Fam. xiv. 14.)

VICTOR, SEX. AURELIUS, who is commonly ranked among the Latin historians, flourished in the middle of the fourth century under the emperor Constantin and his successors. According to his own account (de Caesar. 20), that is, supposing the work from which we quote to be a genuine document, he was born in the country of very humble parents, but rose to distinction by his zeal in the cultivation of literature. Having attracted the attention of Julian when at Sirmium, he was appointed by that prince governor of one division of Pannonia. At a subsequent period, he was elevated by Theodosius to the high office of city prefect, and there seems no good reason to doubt that he is the Sex. Aurelius Victor, who was consul along with Valentinian in A. D. 373. With regard to the period of his death, nothing is known, nor can we collect any further information concerning his life, except that it has been inferred from certain observations in the memoir of Hadrian (de Caes. 14) that he was a pagan. (Vict. de Caes. 16, 20, 28, 41; Amm. Marc. xxi. 10, and the notes.)

The following works, which present in a very compressed form a continuous record of Roman affairs, from the fabulous ages down to the death of the emperor Theodosius, have all been ascribed to this writer, but the evidence upon which the determination of authorship depends, is very slender, and in all probability the third alone belongs to the Sex. Aurelius Victor whom we have noticed above.

1. Origo Gentis Romanæ, in twenty-three chapters, containing the annals of the Roman race, from Janus and Saturnus down to the era of Roranus. We here find many curious tales and traditions derived apparently from ancient sources, and it may be regarded as a valuable contribution towards the legendary history of the city. Joannes Metellus, Ausonius Popna, and others, have assigned this tract to Asconius Pedianus, influenced chiefly by some expressions in which they conceived that the author spoke of Livy and Virgil as his contemporaries, but the passages in which these occur (xxiii. § 7, iii. § 7, vii. § 4), do not fairly admit of any such interpretation, while the general tone of the phraseology certainly bears no resemblance to that of the Augustan age. On the other hand, it seems clear that the writer, in the whole, that it cannot have proceeded from the same hand with the two pieces which we shall next describe; and for this and other reasons Amnuszen has pronounced it to be the production of some of the later grammarians who were desirous of prefixing a suitable introduction to the series. The Origo was first printed at Antwerp, 8vo. 1579, with the commentary of Andreas Schottus in a volume, containing also the three following:

II. De Viris illustris Urbis Romae, in eighty-six chapters, commencing with the birth of the twin sons of Mars and Iliæ, and concluding with the death of Cleopatra. The whole, or nearly the whole of the MSS. attach the name of Plinius to this piece: by some scholars it has been given to Cornelius Nepos, by others to Aemilius Probus. The numerous mistakes with which it abounds forbid us to fix upon any one belonging to the brighter epochs of Roman literature. It was first printed at Naples, by Sixtus Rivesinger, about 1470, and again by Jac. de Ripoli, at Florence, in 1478.

III. De Caesariis, in forty-two chapters, exhibiting short biographies of the emperors, from Augustus to Constantinus. This, as we have stated, may reasonably be regarded as the work of Sex. Aurelius Victor, who was prefect of the city under Theodosius. It was first printed at Antwerp, 8vo. 1579, with the commentary of Schottus.

IV. De Vita et Moribus Imperatorum Romænorum Excerpta ex libris Sex. Aurelii Victoris, or as it is frequently styled Sex. Aurelii Victoris Epitome de Caesaribus, in forty-eight chapters, commencing with Augustus and concluding with Theodosius. These lives agree for the most part almost word for word with the preceding, but variations may here and there be detected, some points being lightly passed over, or altogether omitted, in the one collection, which are dwelt upon at considerable length in the other. This will be seen clearly by comparing the sections in each on Nerva and Hadrian. Moreover, it will be remarked, that while the first series terminates with Constantius, the second comes down as low as Arcadius and Honorius. All the MSS. are inscribed with the words Epitome Victor., or Victoris, or Victorini, and a keen controversy has been maintained as to the real name of the abbevior. It seems clear, at all events, that he cannot be the Aurelius Victor who compiled the De Caesaribus: he followed or rather copied the latter very closely, but consulted other sources, and did not consider himself bound to adhere slavishly to his statements. The Epitome was first printed at Strasburg, 8vo. 1505, and again by Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1516, at the end of his edition of Suetoniuns.

These four pieces were first published together by Andreas Schottus (8vo. Antw. 1579), who brought to light the Origina and the De Caesaribus from the only MS. of them known to exist, and laboured with great earnestness to prove that the whole were the work of the same writer, and that the writer was Sex. Aurelius Victor. The best edition which has yet appeared, is that of Jo. Arntzenius, Amst. et Trag. 1733, forming one of the Dutch Variorum Classics, in 4to. An elaborate edition was commenced by Schroeter, of which two volumes only have been published (8vo. Lips. 1829, 1831) comprising the Origina and the De Viris illustrius.

Victor, Claudio, the nephew of Civilis, served under his uncle in the revolt of the Batavi in a.d. 69-70, and was sent with Julius Maximus against Vocaia. (Tac. Hist. iv. 33.)

Victor, Flavius, the son of Maximus, who ruled as emperor in Spain, Gaul, and Britain, was associated by his father in the government with the title of Augustus. While Maximus marched into Italy to wrest that country from the feeble hands of Valentinian II., Victor was left behind in Gaul. Theodosius himself conquered Maximus; and shortly afterwards Arbogastes, the general of Theodosius, defeated Victor and put him to death. For further details see Maximus, p. 997, and Theodosius, p. 1065.

Coin of Flavius Victor.

Victor, Publius, the name prefixed to an enumeration of the principal buildings and monuments of ancient Rome, distributed according to the regions of Augustus, which has generally been respected as a work of great authority by Italian local antiquaries, from Nardini downwards. Bunser, however, in his Beschreibung der Stadt Rom (vol. i. p. 173, 8vo. Stutt. 1830), after a careful examination into the history of this tract and of the similar production ascribed to Sextus Rufus, has arrived at the conclusion that, in their present state, they cannot be received as ancient at all, but must be regarded as mere pieces of patchwork fabricated not earlier than the fifteenth century. To this opinion Becker in his Handbuch der Römischen Alterthümer fully subscribes, and does not hesitate to characterise them as wilful impostures. (Consult the excellent papers on the Topography of Rome by E. H. Bunbury, published in the Classical Museum, and especially the remarks in No. x. p. 328.)

The De Regionibus Urbis Romae, as this production is usually entitled, was first printed by Joannes de Tridino, at Venice, 4to. 1505, in a volume containing also "Beda de Temporibus;" it will be found under its best form in the Theosaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum of Graevius, vol. iii. p. 37. fol. Trag. ad Rhen. 1694.

Victoria, the personification of victory among the Romans, as Nice was among the Greeks. Dionysius (33) relates that Evander by the command of Minerva dedicated on mount Palatine a temple of Victoria, the daughter of Pallas. On the site of this ancient temple a new one was built by L. Postumius, during the war with the Summities; and M. Porcius Cato added to it a chapel of Victoria Virgo. In later times there existed three or four sanctuaries of Victory at Rome. (Liv. x. 33, xxix. 14, xxxv. 9; P. Victor, Reg. Urb. iv. viii. v.; [LS.]

Victoria or Victorina, the name given by Trebellius Pollio to the mother of Victorinus, and with her he completes his catalogue of the thirty tyrants [see Aureolus], two more being thrown in as supernumeraries. According to this historian after the death of her son she was hailed as the mother of camps (Mater Castrorum); and coins were struck, bearing her effigy, in brass, silver, and gold. Feeling herself however unequal to the weight of empire, she transferred her power first to Marius, and then to Tetricus, by whom some say that she was slain, while others affirm that she died a natural death. Two medallions have been described, one bearing the legend IMP. VICTORIA. AUG., the other IMP. VICTORINA AUG.; but they seem to be unique and are open to suspicion. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. iv. vi., xxx., mentions both of the above names; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxi. 4; the former only; comp. Eckehel, vol. vii. p. 454.)

Victorinus, C. Auffidius, a chosen friend and counsellor of M. Aurelius, was distinguished alike for his high principles and for his eloquence, in which he was excelled by no one among his contemporaries. He was legate in Germany, proconsul of Africa, and praefect of the city under Commodus. Although detested by that emperor on account of his virtues, he escaped destruction by his bold and fearless bearing, died a natural death soon after the ruin of Perennis [PAEKE唯，and was honoured by the erection of a statue to his memory. He is probably the same person with the C. Auffidius Victorinus who is marked in the Fasti as consul for the second time in a.d. 183, the year in which the first great plot against Commodus was organised and failed. (Dion Cass. lxx. 4, 11; Gruter, eccl. ii. 2; Capitoli. M. Aurel. 38.)

Victorinus, Furius, praefect of the praetorians under M. Aurelius. (Capitoli. M. Aurel. 14.)

Victorinus, M. Piavy, who is included by Trebellius Pollio in his list of the thirty tyrants [see Aureolus], was the third of the usurpers who in succession ruled Gaul while it was dismembered from the empire during the reign of the imbecile son of Valerian. Victorinus, however, had previously been assumed as a colleague by Postumus to whom he afforded important aid in the war against Gallienus, and after the destruction of Gallienus alone enjoyed the sovereignty. He is said to have possessed many of the highest qualities both of a general and a statesman, but was unhappily a slave to his passions, which eventually proved his ruin, for he was assassinated at Agrippina by one of his own officers whose honour he had wounded. This event seems to have taken place in A.D. 269 after he had reigned for something more than a year. (Trebell. Pollio, Tr ig. Tyranus, v.; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxx. II.; Eutrop. ix. 7; it would be a vain task however to attempt to reconcile these authorities with each other.)

COIN OF VICTORINUS.

VICTORINUS JUNIOR, son of the foregoing according to Pollio, by whom alone he is mentioned, being numbered among the thirty tyrants, was proclaimed Caesar immediately before the death of his father whose fate he shared. (Trebell. Pollio, Trig. Tyranus, vi.) [W. R.]

VICTORINUS, literary and ecclesiastical. The subjects of the three following articles have proved a source of considerable embarrassment to the historian of literature. Both the first and second appear to have been rhetoricians before they became theologians, both wrote commentaries on the Scriptures and both are believed to have been Christian poets, a series of coincidences which, combined with identity of name, rendered confusion almost inevitable, while the second and third, if we admit the existence of the third, having both compiled essays upon the same departments of grammar, became in like manner mixed up with each other. The difficulties connected with the subject have been in some degree removed by Rivinus in a book entitled Sanctae Religiaeae dvsnium Victorinorum, Pictaviensis unius Episcopi Martyris, Afrl alterius Catii Martii, &c. 8vo. Goth. 1652, and by Launoy in his dissertation De Victorino Episcopo et Martyre, Par. 1664, in the appendix to which we find a discussion on five distinguished persons who bore the name of Victorinus; but several points are still involved in much obscurity.

1. VICTORINUS, bishop of Pettaw on the Drave in Styria, hence distinguished by the epithet Petaviensis, or Pictaviensis, flourished towards the close of the third century (A.D. 270—290), and suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Diocletian, probably in A.D. 303. St. Jerome tells us that he understood Greek better than Latin; and that, in consequence, his works, though pregnant with great thoughts, were couched in poor language; a criticism which has been thought inconsistent with the fact recorded by Cassiodorus that he was originally a rhetorician (Victorinus, de ora tore episcopus, Inst. Div. 5). The difficulty, however, will be removed if we suppose that Greek was his native language, but that he felt himself constrained to write in Latin, with which he was less conversant, because it was the tongue spoken in the province where he exercised his episcopal functions. It is to be remarked that this Victorinus was long supposed to have been bishop of Poitiers, an error first dissipated by the dissertation of Launoy, who demonstrated that Peta um in upper Pannonia, and not Victorium, was the see from which he derived his designation.

St. Jerome informs us that he wrote commentaries In Genesim; In Exodon; In Lectitium; In Iesvram; In Ezahzidem; In Abago; In Ec clesiation; In Cantica Cantorciorum; In Apocalypse cin Joannis adversus omnes haereses (some editors place a stop after Joannis and suppose Adversus omnes haereses to be the name of a separate tract); and many other pieces. Of all these it is doubtful whether any one remains. In the third volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum Maximum (fol. Lugdun. 1677) we find a Commentarius in Apocalypse bearing his name; but the best judges have for the most part either rejected it altogether or regarded it as much altered and interpolated by different hands, both on account of the discrepancies in style which may be here and there detected, and also from the circumstance that the millenarian doctrine is here directly impugned, while we know that it was advocated by Victorinus. The prologue is given up by all. The fragment published by Cave (H. L. vol. i. p. 147), from a MS. in the archiepiscopal library at Lamb eath, entitled De Fabricis Mundis, has, with better reason, been supposed to be an extract from the annotations on Genesis or on the Apocalypse, and here the opinions of the Chilists are avowedly supported.

Various foundling poems have been fathered upon this Victorinus without any evidence direct or circumstantial. Such are De Jesu Christo in 137 hexameters and Hymnus de Psecho Domini s. De Lygo Vitate in 70 hexameters, both contained in the collection of Fabricius; the De Cruce Domini found among the works of Cyprian (see Bed. de locis sanct. c. 2;) and the five books Adversus Marcionem generally appended to editions of Ter tullian.

theil. § 14, 2te Abtheil. § 33.)

2. C. (or according to some MSS. Fabius) MA
RIS VICTORINUS, surnamed Afer from the country of his birth, taught rhetoric at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, with so much reputation that his statue was erected in the forum of Trajan. Convinced by diligent study of the Scriptures, he, in old age, openly embraced the true faith; and when the edict of Julian, prohibiting Christians from giving instruction in polite literature, was promulgated, Victorinus chose to shut up his school rather than deny his religion. The history of his conversion is detailed at length, upon the authority of Simplicianus, bishop of Milan, in the Confessions of St. Augustine, a work not a little in some distinguished a proselyte. The following works ascribed to this author are still extant.

I. Commentarius s. Expositio in Ciceronis libros De Inventione. First printed at Milan by Zarotus fol. 1474, again by Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1522, along with the Annotations of Asconius upon the Ora- tions of Cicerio; and again by R. Stephens, 4to. Par. 1537. It will be found in the Antiqui Rhea- tores Latinii of Pithou, 4to. Par. 1599, pp. 79—239; and in the same collection as re-edited by Caperomier, 4to. Argentor. 1756, pp. 162—255. It is likewise included in the fifth volume of Orelli's edition of Cicerio.

II. Ars Grammatica de Orthographia et Ratio- ne Metrorum, a complete and voluminous treatise upon metres in four books, first printed by Urice. Mer- lard in the collection of Latin grammarians, published under the inspection of Jo. Camerinus, 4to. Tuhing. 1537. It will be found in the Gram- matico Latino Audores Antiqui of Putschius, 4to. Hanov. 1605, pp. 2450—2622. The translations from Plato mentioned by St. Augustine (Confess. viii. 2) have perished.

III. De Trinitate contra Arium Libri IV., finished it would appear about A. D. 365. IV. De Hystem incipie- reciendo, an abridgment of the foregoing. V. Hymni tres de Trinitate. The three last mentioned pieces were first printed at Basle, fol. 1528, in the Anti- dotum contra omnem Hæresem, and will be found also in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. fol. Lugdun. 1677, vol. iv. p. 253 and p. 294; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. fol. Venet. 1772.

VII. Ad Justum Manichaeum contra duo Prin- cipia Manichaeorum et de vera Carne Christi. VIII. De Verbis Scripturae “ Factum est Vespere et Mane Dies Unus.” The two last mentioned pieces were first published by Simond and inserted in his Opera Dogmatica Vetera, 8vo. Par. 1630. They will be found also in his collected works, fol. Par. 1636, vol. i. 1; and in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. The titles were fabricated by the editor, most of them being found in the Codex Vaticanus.

IX. Commentarius in Epistolam Pauli ad Galata- tas, in two books. X. Commentarius in Epistolam Pauli ad Philippenses, in one book. XI. Com- mentarius in Epistolam Pauli ad Ephesios, in two books. XII. De Physica, composed for the purpose of defending religion against those philosophers who attacked the Mosaic account of the Creation. The four last mentioned pieces have only recently been brought to light. St. Jerome twice refers to the commentaries of Victorinus upon the epistles of Paul; and although we learn from Simond (Opera, vol. i. p. 345), that the MS. from which he de- erived the Opuscula which we have marked VII. VIII. contained also commentaries upon the epistles of Paul by the same author, yet, for some reason not known, he did not publish the latter which were altogether lost sight of, until no less than three MSS. of them were discovered in the library of the Vatican by Angelo Mai, by whom they were included in the third volume of the Scripturum Victorius. Nova Collectio ex Vaticanis codicibus edita, 4to. Rom. 1828. Whether Victorinus wrote commentaries upon all the epistles of Paul is left in doubt by the words of St. Jerome, and cannot now be determined. The De Physica is found in all the three Vatican MSS. subjoined to the commentary on the Ephesians; and although not actually inscribed with the name of Victorinus seems to be alluded to by himself (Ad Ephes. lib. ii. p. 120); and bears strong external evidence of his manner.

In addition to all these a descriptive epic in seven books, entitled De Praetribus VII. Maccebeis inter- pactis ab Antioche Epiphane, has been ascribed sometimes to Victorinus of Pettaw, sometimes to Victorinus Afer, and sometimes to Hilarius of Arles. If it belongs to any one of these three personages, the last is probably the rightful owner. The fame enjoyed by Victorinus as a public instructor does not gain any accession from his theological works. In style, weak, cramped, and involved, in phraseology often barbarous, sustained by no depth of learning and relieved by no brilliance of illustration, they merit the severe criticism of St. Jerome, who pronounces their author to be both obscure and ignorant. The exposition of the essay De Inventione is more difficult to comprehend than the text which it professes to explain, the hymns are destitute of all poetical spirit, and set the laws of prosody and metre so completely at defiance that they could scarcely have proceeded from the compiler of the grammatical treatise which displays much research and contains many valuable observations. (Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 101; Prosem. in Epit. ad Galatas. Chronique. ad A. D. 360. Adr. Rufus. vol. iv. p. 367, ed. Bened. ; Augustin. Con- fess. viii. 2, 4, 5; Trithem. 71; Honor. i. 102; Lardner, Credibility of Gospel History, c. xvii.; Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, vol. vii. Proleg. c. iv. p. vii.; Schoenemann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. i c. 4 § 13.)

3. MAXIMUS VICTORINUS. We possess three short tracts—1. De Re Grammatica; 2. De Car- mine Heroico; 3. De Ratione Metrorum, all ap- parently the work of the same author and usually ascribed to a Maximus Victorinus; but whether we ought to consider him the same with the rhetorician who flourished under Constantinus or as an independent personage it is impossible to decide. They were first printed in the collection of ancient grammarians published by Adamius Petri, 8vo. Bas. 1527, where the two former are assigned to Marius Victorinus Afer and the third to Maximus Victorinus; they will be found also in the Gram- matico Latino Audores Antiqui of Putschius, 4to. Hanov. 1605, pp. 1938—1974; and under a greatly improved form in the Corpus Grammaticorum Latinorum Veterum of Lindemann, vol. i. 4to. Lips. 1831, pp. 267—304. Both Putschius and Linde- mann prefix the name of Maximus Victorinus to the whole three. [W.R.]

Q. VICTORIUS, primi pili centurio, distin- guished himself by his bravery, b. c. 194. (Liv xxxiv. 48.)

VICTORIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]
VICTRIX. [VENUS.]

M. VIGELLIUS, a Stoic philosopher, who lived with Panaceus. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 21.)

VIGELLIUS. Dupin enumerates six ecclesiastics who bore this name.

I. VIGELLIUS TRIDENTINUS. 2. VIGELLIUS, of Africa, who wrote upon the Apocalypse, as we learn from Cassiodorus. (Inst. Dic. v. 3.) 3. VIGELLIUS, the Deacon. 4. VIGELLIUS TAPSENNIS. 5. VIGELLIUS, bishop of Brescia. 6. VIGELLIUS, a bishop who signed the acts of the council of Agde. Of these, the first, third, and fourth only deserve particular notice.

VIGELLIUS, bishop of Trent, hence distinguished by the epithet Tridentinus, flourished towards the close of the fourth century and suffered martyrdom, probably in the second consilium of Stilicho, A. D. 405. The poet this Vigilius, who, according to Gennadius, addressed to a certain Simplicianus, a letter and a tract containing Gestis seu tempore apud barbaros martyriam. We do not doubt that two Epistles still exist under the name of Vigiulius De Martyrio Sancum e Sociorum, one addressed to Simplicianus, bishop of Milan, the other to John, bishop of Constantinople, are the pieces here indicated. They will be found under their best form in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. (fol. Venet. 1772), p. 263. (Ambros. Epist. xxiv.; Gennad. de Viris Ill. 37; Galland, Prolog. vol. vii. c. v. p. x.; Dupin, Ecclesiastical History of the Fifth Century; Schoenemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. i. c. 4 § 26; Bahr, Geschichte der Röm. Lit. Suppl. Band, 2te Abtheil. § 80.)

VIGELLIUS, a deacon who flourished under Arcadius and Honorius, is mentioned by Gennadius and Thretimius, as the compiler of a Regula Monachorum, which is still extant, and will be found under the title Regulae Orientales ex Patrum Orientatum Regulis collectae a Vigilio Diacono, in the Codex Regularum, published by L. Holstein, 4to. Reguli, p. 173. In the English translation, by Brocke, fol. Aug. Vind. 1759, vol. i. p. 60. (Schoenemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 23.)

VIGELLIUS, bishop of Thapsus, in Byzacium, hence, designated Tapseennis, flourished towards the close of the fifth century when Africa was overrun by the Arian Vandals. Being an orthodox Catholic, he was driven from his see by Hunneric, in A. D. 484, and took refuge at Constantinople, where he composed several works, chiefly of a polemical character. Of those enumerated below, the first has always borne the name of Vigilius, although frequently ascribed to Vigilius of Trent; the others have been found in MSS., some bearing the name of Athanasius, some of Idacius Clarus, some of Augustine, and it has been conjectured by Dupin that they were originally given to the world under these false colours, either for the sake of avoiding persecution, or in the belief that the arguments would be listened to with more respect, and make a more forcible impression if supposed to proceed from such illustrious fathers. It is manifest that such a proceeding must have given rise to the greatest confusion, and it is now almost impossible to determine with certainty the real history of these tracts.

I. Adversus Nestorium et Eutychian Libri quinque pro definitione Synodi Chalcedonensis; the nature and object of this piece are sufficiently indicated by the title. It was first printed at Tübingen, fol. 1528, again at Cologne, 3vo. 1578, and appears under its last form, in the works of Vigiliius, as collected by Chifflet, and published at Dijon, 4to. 1664, in the same volume with Victor Vitenis.

II. Altercatio sub nomine Athanasii adversus Arium. Two dialogues between Athanasius and Arians before an arbiter named Probus. Often included in the works of Athanasius.

IV. De Trinitate s. De unita Trinitate Dextatis Libri XII., often included among the works of Athanasius.

While Chifflet assigns the whole of these books to Vigilius, some scholars maintain that the first eight belong to Idacius, the ninth, tenth, and eleventh to some unknown composer, and the twelfth, which bears the separate title De Trinitate et Spiritus Sancto, to Athanasius. V. De Unitate Trinitatis et Opusculum s. Dialogus inter Augustinum et Felicianum Arianum. Generally included in the works of Augustinus.

VI. De Trinitate adversus Varvianum (a Mariavum) Libri tres. Published under the name of Idacius Clarus. VII. Centra Palladinae Arianum episcopum. Included in many editions of the works of Ambrose, and also of Gregory of Nazianzus. The whole of the six last mentioned treatises will be found in the edition of Chifflet, where the authenticity of each is elaborately discussed, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum Max. fol. Lugd. 1677, vol. viii. p. 743. (Walch, Bibliotheca Patrist. c. x. § 104.)

VII. GENS, plebeian, is mentioned as early as B. C. 449 [VILLIUS, No. 1], but the only member of the gens who obtained the consilium was P. Villius Tappulus, who was consul B. C. 139. The Villii were divided into the two families of ANNALIS and TAPPLUS: a few persons of the name are mentioned without any cognomen.

VILLIUS. I. P. VILLIUS, one of the tribunes of the seven hundred in the expulsion of the decemvirs in B. C. 449. (Liv. iii. 54.)

2. C. VILLIUS, a friend of Tib. Gracchus, was cruelly put to death by the ruling party after the murder of Gracchus in B. C. 133. He is said to have been shut up in a vessel with snakes and vipers, which was the manner in which purificides were put to death. (Plut. Tib. Gracch. 20.)

VINCENTIUS, surnamed LIRINENSIS, from the celebrated monastery in the island of Lerins, where he officiated as a presbyter, was by birth a native of Gaul. We are not acquainted with any particulars regarding his career, except that he died in the reign of Theodosius and Valentinian, about A. D. 450. His name rests upon a treatise against heretics, composed, as we are told in the body of the work itself, three years after the council of Ephesus, that is, in A. D. 434. It commonly bears the title Commentarium pro Catholico fidei antiquitate et universitate adversus haereses fundamenta cum recens decorsa argumento ad Gennadius, when first published, it did not exhibit the name of the writer, and was designated Peregriini (i.e. the Pilgrim) adversus Haereticos. We are farther told that it was originally divided into two parts, but that the second of these having been stolen from the repositories of the author, he contented himself with briefly recapitulating the substance of what it had contained, and gave his work to the world in one book. The great aim of this production, which is composed in a very lively and impressive style, is in the first place to collect the opinions of the early fathers on the points which had given rise to the most important doctrinal controversies; and, in the second place, to establish some rule by which error may be detected and avoided, and the true faith maintained in purity. He determines that the means for accomplishing this object are two-fold: 1. The authority of Holy Scripture. 2. The tradition of the Catholic church, the latter being indispensable for the right understanding of the former. We are to hold that as a Catholic tradition, which has been believed in the Catholic church everywhere, always, and by all (quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus credidit est), thus obtaining universality, antiquity and consensum.

The Commonitorium, being the first work on which the proposition, which now forms the broad line of demarcation between the Protestant and Roman churches, is broadly and distinctly affirmed, it has always been regarded with great interest and studied with much care, while the opinions formed with regard to its merits have depended, in a great measure, on the theological predilections of its critics. The charge of Semi-Pelagianism frequently urged against Vincentius seems altogether unfounded, and indeed probably originated in the erroneous belief that Vincent of Lerins was the author of the tract first published by Sirmond (4to. Paris, 1643), entitled Praedestinatus s. Praedestinatorum Haeresis et libri S. Augustino tenero adscripi Refutatio, and also of the attack upon the tenets of Augustine known to us only from the reply of Prosper, Pro Augustini Doctrinae Responsiones ad capitula objectionum Vincentianarum.

The Commonitorium was first printed in the Antidotum contra diversa omnium fore sacculatorum Haereses of Jo. Sichardus, fol. Basil, 1528, and has, since that period, been very frequently republished both in a separate form, and in all the larger collections of the Fathers. The standard edition is that of Baluzius, 8vo. Paris, 1663, 1669, 1684, and the last of these is followed by Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. x. p. 103, ed. Venet. 1774. The most recent edition is that of Klüpfel, 8vo. Vienna, 1809, which deserves to be consulted. (Gennadius, de Viris Illustrib. 64.; Trithemius, de Script. Eccl. 145.; Schoenemann, Biblioth. Patrum Latt. vol. ii. § 37.; Bühl, Geschicht. der Römisch. Litteratur. Suppl. Bande 2te Abtheil. § 154. Consult also the historians of Semi-Pelagianism [Cassianus] and the Prolegomena of Galland and Klüpfel.)

VINDEX, C. JU'LIUS, was the son of a Roman senator, but was descended from a royal family in Aquitanian Gaul. He was appointed prœtor of Gallia Cœtina towards the latter end of the reign of Nero; and there he resolved to make an effort to get rid of the tyrant, of whose oppressive rule the Roman world had become weary. Accordingly, he called together the people of his province about the month of March, A. D. 68, and after describing their grievances and the despotic character of their oppressor, he urged them to revolt. His call was eagerly responded to by the greater part of Gaul, and he soon found himself at the head of a formidable army. He did not however aspire to the empire himself, but wrote to Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis, to offer his assistance in raising him to the throne. Galba, however, would not assume the title of emperor, but nevertheless took up arms against Nero, contenting himself with the title of legatus of the senate and of the Roman people.

Most of the governors of the Roman provinces in Europe now declared in favour of Galba; Virginian Rufus, however, the governor of Upper Germany, who had been offered the sovereignty by his own soldiers, not only refused it himself, but said that he would not acknowledge any one as emperor except the person upon whom the senate had conferred the title. He accordingly marched with his army against Vindex, and proceeded to lay siege to the town of Vesontio (Besançon). Vindex marched to its relief; and the two generals had a conference, in which they appear to have come to some agreement; but as Vindex was going to enter the town, the soldiers of Rufus, thinking that he was about to attack them, fell upon him. Many of his troops were killed, and Vindex, who believed that it was a plot for his destruction, put an end to his own life. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 22—26; Tac. Ann. xlv. 74, Hist. i. 6, 8, 51, iv. 17, 57; Plut. Galb. 4—6; Suet. Ner. 40, 41, 45, Galb. 9, 11; Plin. Ep. ix. 19.)

VINDEX, MACR/NIUS, praefectus praetorio under M. Aurelius, perished in the war against the Marcomanni. The emperor erected three statues in honour of him. (Dion Cass. lxxxi. 3, with the note of Reimarqs.)

VINDEX, C. OCTAvIUS, consul suffectus under Commodus, A. D. 184 (Fasti, 1547). VINDEXIUS, an eminent Christian physician in the fourth century after Christ, tutor to Theodorus Priscianus (Theod. Prisc. Rer. Med. lvi. p. 81, ed. Argent.), who attained the rank of Comes Archiatrorum (see Dict. of Aut. s. v. Archiater), and was physician to the Emperor Valentinian, A. D. 364—375. He was also a proconsul in Africa, and in this capacity crowned St. Augustine in a rhetorical contest (Aug. Conf. iv. 3 § 5), probably A. D. 376. It was perhaps this incident which gave Vindicianus an interest in the young man's welfare, for St. Augustine says that he tried to divert him from the study of astrology and divination, to which he was at that time addicted. (Ibid. and vil. 6 § 6.) St. Augustine gives him a high character, calling him "an acute old man," "a wise man, very skilful and renowned in physic," and in another place (Epist. 138. § 3) "the great physician of our times." There is attributed to him a short Latin hexameter poem, consisting chiefly of an enumeration of a great number of medicinal substances; which, however, some persons suppose to be the conclusion of the poem by Serenus Samonolocus, while others think it belongs to Marcellus Empiricus. It is to be found at the end of several editions of Celsus, in Burmann's Poëtes Latini Minores, and in Fabricii Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 446, ed. vel. There is also extant a letter addressed to the Emperor Valentinian by Vindicianus, in which he makes mention of a medical work which he had written, but which appears to be lost. This letter is by Sprengel (Hist. de la Méd.) supposed to be spurious, but perhaps without sufficient reason. It is to be found in the Aldine edition of Medicinae Antiquae Venet. 1547, fol.; in H. Stephani Medicæae Artis Prælectiones Paris, 1567, fol.; and in Fabricii Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 448, ed. vel. One of the medical formulae of VINICIUS.

VINICIUS. is preserved by Marcellus Empiricus, De Medioc. c. 16. p. 316. [W. A. G.]

VINCIUS, the name of a slave, who is said to have given information to the consuls of the conspiracy, which was formed for the restoration of the Tarquins, and who was rewarded in consequence with liberty and the Roman franchise. He is said to have been the first slave manumitted by the Vindicta, the name of which was derived by some persons from that of the slave; but it is unnecessary to point out the absurdity of this etymology. (Liv. iii. 4, 5; comp. Dict. Antig. s. v. Mummius.)

VINDULLUS, POMPEUS, a freedman of Cn. Pompey, died at Laodicea in B.C. 50. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1. § 25.)

VINCIUS, ANNUS, was accused of treason (majestas) together with his father Annius Pollio, towards the latter end of Nero's reign, but was not brought to trial. He afterwards conspired with Camillus Serbonianus against the emperor Claudius, and, when the conspiracy was detected, put an end to his own life. (Tac. Ann. vi. 9; Dion Cass. ix. 14.)

VINCIUS, M. CAELIUS, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 53, exerted himself to raise Pompey to the dictatorship, and was in consequence defeated when he became a candidate for the curule aedileship in B.c. 51. In the civil war he espoused the cause of Caesar, who left him behind in Pontus with two legions after the conquest of Pharmaces in B.C. 48. (Caelius, op. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 4. § 8; Hirt. B. Aen. 17.)

VINCIUS, or VINCIUS. The latter form occurs in inscriptions and in the Fasti, but the former in MSS. and editions. 1. L. Vinius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 51, put his veto upon a senatusconsultum, directed against Caesar. (Caelius, op. Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8. § 6.)

2. L. Vinius, L. P., consul suffectus B.C. 53, was perhaps the same person as the preceding. The accompanying coin was struck by this Vinicius, since we learn from other coins bearing on the obverse the head of Augustus, that L Vinicius was triumvir of the mint under Augustus. The coin annexed has on the obverse the head of Concordia, and on the reverse a figure of Victory with L Vinius. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 343.)

COIN OF L. VINICIUS.

3. M. VINICIUS, P. F., consul suffectus B.C. 19, commanded in Germany in B.C. 25, and in consequence of his successes received the triumphal ornaments; but as he declined these, an arch was erected to his honour in the Alps. (Dion Cass. iii. 27.) He again commanded in Germany in A.D. 2, and again received the triumphal ornaments and an inscription to his honour, perhaps on his statue in the forum. (Vell. Pat. ii. 104.)

4. P. Vinicius M. F. P. N., the son of No. 3, was consul A.D. 2 with P. Aelius Varus, when Tiberius returned to Rome from Rhodes. (Vell. Pat. ii. 103.) Seneca mentions this P Vinicius and his brother Lucius as two celebrated orators.

VINICIUS.

5. M. Vinicius, P. F., M. N., the son of No. 4, was born at Cales, a town in Campania, and is spoken of by Tacitus as "mitis ingenio et compaete facundiae." He was consul in A.D. 50 with C. Cassius Longinus, and it was in this year that the historian Velleius Paterculus dedicated his work to him. [PATERCUL. iu.d. 33 Tiberius gave Julia Livilla, the daughter of Germanicus, in marriage to Vinicius; and as Germanicus was by adoption the son of Tiberius, Vinicius is called the progener of Tiberius. Vinicius was consul a second time in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 45, with Taurus Statilius Corvinus. He was put to death by Messalina in the following year, to whom he had become an object of suspicion, because she had previously put to death his wife [Julia, No. 8], and likewise an object of hatred because he had refused her embraces. (Tac. Ann. vi. 15, 45; Dion Cass. ix. 23, 27.)

6. Vinicius, the author of a conspiracy against Nero, detected and crushed at Beneventum. (Suet. Ner. 36.)

7. T. Vinicius Julianus, consul suffectus under Titus, A.D. 80. (Fasti.)

VINIUS. 1. T. Vinius was proscribed by the triumvirs B.C. 43, and owed his life to his wife Tanusia, who concealed him in a chest at the house of his freedman Philopoemen, and gave out that he was dead. She afterwards obtained his pardon from Octavian, who raised Philopoemen to the equestrian rank for his fidelity to his former master. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 7; Suet. Oct. 27; Appian, B. C. iv. 44, where Vinius is erroneously called Juvinus, and Philopoemen is also erroneously called Philomor.) [PHILOPOEMEN, p. 521, a.]

2. T. Vinius, consul in A.D. 69 with the emperor Galba. Tacitus says that his father was of a praetorian family, and that his maternal grandfather was one of the proscribed; but as he bears the same name as No. 1, it is probable that the historian has made a mistake, unless he had by adoption taken the name of his maternal grandfather. He first served under Calvisius Sabinus; and one night he accompanied the wife of his commander, who was advanced to a common soldier, through the camp, and committed adultery with her in the Principia, which was reckoned a sacred spot by the Romans, because the eagles and standards were deposited there. For that offence he was put in irons by order of Caligula, but by the change of times was released and obtained successively the praetorship and the command of a legion. He was subsequently exposed to the imputation of having stolen a gold goblet at the table of the emperor Claudius. He was notwithstanding appointed, probably during the reign of Nero, to the government of Gallia Narbonensis, with the title of pro-consul, where he ruled with justice and integrity, and he was afterwards in Spain as the legatus of Galba. Through his friendship with Galba he was raised to the consulship on the accession of the latter to the empire. During the short reign of Galba the government devolved almost entirely upon Vinius and Cornelius Laco, the praefect of the praetorian troops. The possession of such great power developed his evil passions, and he is called by Tacitus "deterriment mortuorum." Vinicius recommended Galba to choose Otho as his successor, and he was supposed by some to have been privy to the conspiracy against Galba. He was notwithstanding killed by Otho's soldiers after the death of Galba, his head cut off and carried in triumph to Otho. He was buried by his daughter Crispina, who purchased his head of his murderers; but his testament was disregarded on account of the large wealth which he left behind him. (Tac. Hist. i. 1, 6, 11, 12, 13, 32, 37, 42, 48; Suet. Gall. 14, Videl. 7; Plut. Gall. 12, foll. 27.)

VIPSA/NIA AGrippina, a. 1. The daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa by his first wife Pomponia, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. [POMPONIA, No. 3.] Augustus gave her in marriage to his step-son Tiberius, by whom she was much beloved; but after she had borne him a son, Drusus, and at a time when she was pregnant, Tiberius was compelled to divorce her by the command of the emperor, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of the latter. Vipsania afterwards married Asinius Gallus, whom Tiberius always disliked in consequence, more especially as Gallus asserted that he had previously carried on an adulterous intercourse with Vipsania, and that Drusus was his son. Vipsania died a natural death in A.D. 20. (Dion Cass. liv. 31, lvii. 2; Suet. Tib. 7; Tac. Ann. i. 12, iii. 19.)

2. The daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa by his second wife Julia, is better known by the name of Agrippina. [AGrippina.]

VIRBIUS, an ancient mythical king of Arcidia and a favourite of Diana (dea Nemorensis), who, when he had died, called him to life and intrusted him to the care of the nymph Aegeria. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 761.) The fact of his being a favourite of Diana (the Taurian goddess) seems to have led the Romans to identify him with Hippolytus who, according to some traditions, had established the worship of Diana. (Ov. Met. xv. 545.) [L.S.]

VIRGILLIUS, Q. FABIUS, the legatus of App. Claudius Pulcher in Cilicia in B.C. 51. He espoused the cause of Pompey on the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 3, 4, ad Att. viii. 11, 13.)

VIRGILLIUS/NIA JUNCUS. [JUNCUS.]

VIRGILLIUS/NIA PEDO. [PEDO.]

VIRGI/LIUS, or VERGI/LIUS. The latter appears to be the more correct orthography, as in the name of Virginius or Verginius, but custom has given the preference in modern times to Virgil. 1. M. VIRGILIIUS, the foster or first cousin of T. Aufidius, was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 67, when, at the instigation of the consul Cinna, he brought an accusation against Sulla, when the latter was on the point of crossing over to Greece to conduct the war against Mithridates; but Sulla left Rome without paying any attention to Virgil or his accusation. He is called Virginius by Plutarch. (Cic. Brut. 48; Plut. Sull. 10.)

2. C. VIRGILIIUS, was praetor B.C. 62, and had Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, as one of his colleagues. In the following year, B.C. 61, he governed Sicily as propraetor, where P. Clodius served under him as quaestor. He was still in Sicily in B.C. 58, when Cicero was banished; and notwithstanding his friendship with Cicero, and his having been a colleague of his brother in the praetorship, he refused to allow Cicero to seek refuge in his province. (Cic. pro Pison. 40, ad Q. Fr. i. 2. § 2; Schol. B. in Cicid. p. 333, ed. Orelli; Plut. Cic. 32.) In the civil war Virgil espoused the Pompeian party, and had the command of Thapsus, together with a fleet in B.C. 46. After the battle of Thapsus, Virgiliius at first refused to surrender the town; but when he saw that all resistance was hopeless, he subsequently surrendered the place to Caninius Rebilus, whom Caesar had left to besiege it. (Hirt. B. Afr. 28, 86, 93.)

3. C. VIRGILIIUS, legatus of Piso in Macedonia in B.C. 57, must probably have been a different person from the preceding, since the propraetor of Sicily could hardly have returned to Rome in time to accompany Piso to his province. (Cic. de Prov. Cons. 4.)

P. VIRGILIIUS, or VERGI/LIUS MARO, was born on the 15th of October, B.C. 70 in the first consulship of Cn. Pompeius Magnus and M. Licinius Crassus, at Andes, a small village near Mantua in Cisalpine Gaul. The tradition, though an old one, which identifies Andes with the modern village of Pietola, may be accepted as a tradition, without being accepted as a truth. The poet Horace, afterwards one of his friends, was born B.C. 65; and Octavianus Caesar, afterwards the emperor Augustus, and his patron, in B.C. 63, in the consulship of M. Tullius Cicero. Virgil's father probably had a small estate which he cultivated; his mother's name was Maia. The son was educated at Cremona and Mediolanum (Milan), and he took the toga virilis at Cremona on the day on which he commenced his sixteenth year in B.C. 55, which was the second consulship of Cn. Pompeius Magnus and M. Licinius Crassus. On the same day, according to Donatus, the poet Lucrètius died, in his forty-first year. It is said that Virgil subsequently studied at Neapolis (Naples) under Parthenius, a native of Bithynia, from whom he learned Greek (Macrob. Sat. v. 17); and the minute industry of the grammarians has pointed out the following line (Georg. i. 487) as borrowed from his master:

Glanco et Panopeae et Ino Melicertae.

(Compare Gallus xiii. 26; and Parthenius.) He was also instructed by Syron an Epicurean, and probably at Rome. Virgil's writings prove that he received a learned education, and traces of Epicurean opinions are apparent in them. The health of Virgil was always feeble, and there is no evidence of his attempting to rise by those means by which a Roman gained distinction, oratory and the practice of arms. Indeed at the time when he was born, Cisalpine Gaul was not included within the term "Italy," and it was not till B.C. 69 that a Lex Pompeia gave even the Jus Latii to the inhabitants of Gallia Transpadana, and the privilege of obtaining the Roman civitas by filing a magistratus in their own cities. The Roman civitas was not given to the Transpadanii till B.C. 49. Virgil therefore was not a Roman citizen by birth, and he was above twenty years of age before the civitas was extended to Gallia Transpadana.

It is merely a conjecture, though it is probable that Virgilius retired to his paternal farm, and here he may have written some of the small pieces which are ascribed to him by Suetonius, Culex, Cirsia, Moretum, and others. The defeat of Brutus and Cassius by M. Antonius and Octavius Caesar at Philippi B.C. 42, gave the supreme power to the two victorious generals, and when Octavius returned to Italy, he began to assign to his soldiers lands which had been promised them for their services (Dion Cass. xlvi. 5, &c.). But the soldiers could only be provided with land by turning out many of the occupiers, and the neighbourhood of Cremona and Mantua was one of the districts in which the soldiers were planted, and from which the former possessors were dislodged. (Appian, Bell. Civ. v. 12, &c.) There is little evidence as to the circumstances under which Virgil was deprived of his property. It is said that it was seized by a veteran named Claudius or Clodius, and that Asinius Pollio, who was then governor of Gallia Transpadana, advised Virgil to apply to Octavius at Rome for the restitution of his land, and that Octavius granted him his request. It is supposed that Virgil wrote the Eclogue which stands first in our editions, to commemorate his gratitude to Octavius Caesar. Whether the poet was subsequently disturbed in his possession and again restored, and whether he was not firmly secured in his patrimonial farm till after the peace of Brundusium B.C. 40 between Octavius Caesar and M. Antonius, is a matter which no extant authority is sufficient to determine.

Virgil became acquainted with Maecenas before Horace was, and Horace (Stat. i. 5, and 6. 55, &c.) was introduced to Maecenas by Virgil. Whether this introduction was in the year B.C. 41 or a little later is uncertain; but we may perhaps conclude from the name of Maecenas not being mentioned in the Eclogues of Virgil, that he himself was not on those intimate terms with Maecenas which ripened into friendship, until after they were written. Horace, in one of his Satires (Sat. i. 5), in which he describes the journey from Rome to Brundusium, mentions Virgil as one of the party, and in language which shows that they were then in the closest intimacy. The time to which this journey relates is a matter of some difficulty, but there are perhaps only two times to which it can be referred, either the events recorded in Appian (Bell. Civ. v. 64), which preceded the peace of Brundusium B.C. 40, or to the events recorded by Appian (Bell. Civ. v. 78), which belong to the year B.C. 38. But it is not easy to decide to which of these two years, B.C. 40 or B.C. 38, the journey of Horace refers. It can hardly refer to the events mentioned in Appian (Bell. Civ. v. 93, &c.) which belong to the year B.C. 37, though even this opinion has been maintained. [HORATIUS FLACCUS.]

The most finished work of Virgil, his Georgica, an agricultural poem, was undertaken at the suggestion of Maecenas (Georg. iii. 41), and it was probably not commenced earlier than B.C. 37. The supposition that it was written to revive the languishing condition of agriculture in Italy after the civil war, and to point out the best method, may take its place with other exploded notions. The idea of reviving the industry of a country by an elaborate poem, which few farmers would read and still fewer would understand, requires no refutation. Agriculture is not quickened by a book, still less by a poem. It requires security of property, light taxation, and freedom of commerce. Maecenas may have wished Virgil to try his strength on something better than his Eclogues; and though the subject does not appear inviting, the poet has contrived to give it such embellishment that his fame rests in a great degree on this work. The concluding lines of the Georgica were written at Naples (Georg. iv. 559), but we can hardly infer that the whole poem was written there, though this is the literal meaning of the words, "Haece super arvorum cultu pecorumque canebam."

We may however conclude that it was completed after the battle of Actium B.C. 31, while Caesar was in the East. (Compare Georg. iv. 560, and ii. 171, and the remarks of the critics.) His Eclogues had all been completed, and probably before the Georgica were begun (Georg. iv. 565). The epic poem of Virgil, the Aeneid, was probably long contemplated by the poet. While Augustus was in Spain B.C. 27, he wrote to Virgil to express his wish to have some monument of his poetical talent; perhaps he desired that the poet should dedicate his labours to his glory as he had done to that of Maecenas. A short reply of Virgil is preserved (Macrob. Sat. i. 24), in which he says, "with respect to my Aeneas, if it were in a fit shape for your reading, I would gladly send the poem; but the thing is only just begun; and indeed it seems something like folly to have undertaken so great a work, especially when, as you know, I am applying to it other studies, and those of much greater importance." The inference that may be derived from a passage of Propertius (Eleg. ii. 34, v. 61), in which he speaks of the Iliad as begun and in progress, and from the recent death of Gallus, also mentioned in the same elegy, is that Virgil was engaged on his work in B.C. 24 (Clinton, Past. b.c. 24). An allusion to the victory of Actium in the same elegy, compared with the passage in Virgil (Aeneid, viii. 675 and 704) seems to show that Propertius was acquainted with the poem of Virgil in its progress; and he may have heard parts of it read. In B.C. 23 died Marcellus, the son of Octavius, Caesar's sister, by her first husband; and as Virgil lost no opportunity of gratifying his patron, he introduced into his sixth book of the Aeneid (v. 883) the well-known allusion to the virtues of this youth, who was cut off by a premature death.

Octavius is said to have been present when the poet was reciting this allusion to her son and to have fainted from her emotions. She rewarded the poet munificently for his excusable flattery. As Marcellus did not die till B.C. 23, these lines were of course written after his death, but that does not prove that the whole of the sixth book was written so late. Indeed the attempts which modern critics make to settle many points in ancient literary history, are not always managed with due regard to the nature of the evidence. This passage in the sixth book was certainly written after the death of Marcellus, but Virgil may have sketched his whole poem and even finished in a way many parts in the later books before he elaborated the whole of his sixth book. A passage in the seventh book (v. 606),

“Auroramque sequi Parthosque reposcere signa,” appears to allude to Augustus receiving back the standards taken by the Parthians from M. Licius Crassus b. c. 53. This event belongs to b. c. 20 (Dion Cass. liv. 8); and if the passage of Virgil refers to it, the poet must have been working at his seventh book in b. c. 20.

When Augustus was returning from Samos, where he had spent the winter of b. c. 20, he met Virgil at Athens. The poet it is said had intended to make a tour of Greece, but he accompanied the emperor to Megara and thence to Italy. His health, which had been long declining, was now completely broken, and he died soon after his arrival at Brundusium on the 22d of September b. c. 19, not having quite completed his fifty-first year. His remains were transferred to Naples, which had been his favourite residence, and placed on the road (Via Puteolana) from Naples to Puteoli (Pozzuoli) between the first and second milestone from Naples. The monument, now called the tomb of Virgil, is not on the road which passes through the tunnel of Posilipo; but if the Via Puteolana ascended the hill of Posilipo, as it may have done, the situation of the monument would agree very well with the description of Donatus.

The inscription said to have been placed on the tomb,

“Mantua me genuit, Calabri rapuere, tenet nunce Parthenope. Cecini pascua, rura, duces.”

we cannot suppose to have been written by the poet, though Donatus says that it was.

Virgil named, as heredes in his testament, his half-brother Valerius Proculeus, to whom he left one half of his property, and also Augustus, Macenas, L. Varrus and Plotius Tucca. It is said that in his last illness he wished to burn the Aeneid, to which he had not given the finishing touches, but his friends would not allow him. Whatever he may have wished to be done with the Aeneid, it was preserved and published by his friends Varius and Tucca. It seems from different extant testimonies that he did express a wish that the unfinished poem should be destroyed.

The poet had been enriched by the liberality of his patrons, and he left behind him a considerable property and a house on the Esquiline Hill near the gardens of Maecenas. He used his wealth liberally, and his library, which was doubtless a good one, was easy of access. He used to send his parents money every year. His father, who became blind, did not die before his son had attained a mature age. Two brothers of Virgil also died before him. Poetry was not the only study of Virgil; he applied to medicine and to agriculture, as the Georgica show, and also to what Donatus calls Mathematica, perhaps a jumble of astrology and astronomy. His stature was tall, his complexion dark, and his appearance that of a rustic. He was modest and retiring, and his character is free from reproach, if we except one scandalous passage in Donatus, which may not tell the truth.

In his fortunes and his friends Virgil was a happy man. Munificent patronage gave him ample means of enjoyment and of leisure, and he had the friendship of all the most accomplished men of the day, among whom Horace entertained a strong affection for him. He was an amiable good-tempered man, free from the mean passions of envy and jealousy; and in all but health he was prosperous. His fame, which was established in his life time, was cherished after his death, as an inheritance in which every Roman had a share; and his works became school-books even before the death of Augustus, and continued such for centuries after.

The learned poems of Virgil soon gave employment to commentators and critics. Annius Gelius has numerous remarks on Virgil, and Macrobius, in his Saturnalia, has filled four books (iii—vi.) with his critical remarks on Virgil's poems. One of the most valuable commentaries of Virgil, in which a great amount of curious and instructive matter has been preserved, is that of Servius [SERVIUS]. Virgil is one of the most difficult of the Latin authors, not so much for the form of the expression, though that is sometimes ambiguous enough, but from the great variety of knowledge that is required to attain his meaning in all its fulness. To understand the Aeneid fully requires great labour and every aid that can be called in from the old commentators to those of the present day.

Virgil was the great poet of the middle ages too. To him Dante paid the homage of his superior genius, and owned him for his master and his model. Among the vulgar he had the reputation of a conjurer, a necromancer a worker of miracles; it is the fate of a great name to be embalmed in fable.

The ten short poems called Bucolica were the earliest works of Virgil, and probably all written between b. c. 41 and b. c. 37. These Bucolica are not Bucolica in the same sense as the poems of Theocritus, which have the same title. They have all a Bucolic form and colouring, but some of them have nothing more. They are also called Elegoe or Selections, but this name may not have originated with the poet. Their merit consists in their versification, which was smoother and more polished than the hexameters which the Romans had yet seen, and in many natural and simple terrors. But as an attempt to transfer the Syracusan muse into Italy, they are certainly a failure, and we read the pastorals of Theocritus and of Virgil with a very different degree of pleasure. The fourth Elegoe, entitled Pollio, which may have been written in b. c. 40 after the peace of Brundusium, has nothing of the pastoral character about it, as the poet himself admits in the first lines, “Sicelides Musae paulo majora cananum,

Non omnes arbustu juvant humilesque myricae,
Si canimus sylvas, alvae sunt consule dignae.”

Virgil was aware that he was not following his professed model, and that the poem was Bucolic only in name. It is all-oral, mystical, half historical and prophetical, enigmatical, anything in fact but Bucolic. Pope's Messiah, a kind of imitation of Virgil, is also not an Elegoe. The first Elegoe is Bucolic in form and in treatment, with an historical basis. The second Elegoe, the Alexia, which the critics suppose to have been written before the first, is an amatory poem, with a Bucolic colour.
ing, which indeed is the characteristic of all Virgil's Eclogues, whatever they may be in substance. The third, the fifth, the seventh, and the ninth are more clearly modelled on the form of the poems of his Sicilian prototype: and the eighth, the Pharmacoeutria, is a direct imitation of the original Greek.

The tenth, entitled Gallus, perhaps written the last of all, is a love poem, which, if written in elegant verse, would be most appropriately called an elegy than a Bucolic. All the Eclogues of Virgil abound in allusions to the circumstances and persons of the time; but these allusions are often obscure. Though the Eclogues contain many pleasing lines, they present very great difficulties arising both from the construction of the poems, and the language. Those who find them easy are not persons who are much alive to the perception of difficulties; and those who bestow upon them very liberal praise, have the merit at least of being easily satisfied. Virgil borrowed many lines from Theocritus; but the adaptation of a few lines does not give to his poems the genuine rustic cast of some of the best pieces of Theocritus. We do not feel that the Eclogues of Virgil represent rural life or rural manners in Italy; and such a representation, even if Virgil could have given it, is incompatible with the leading idea that pervades some of the Eclogues. Julius Caesar Scaliger preferred Virgil's Eclogues to those of Theocritus, a curious instance of perverted judgment.

The "Georgica" or "Agricultural Poem" in four books is a didactic poem, which Virgil dedicated to his patron Maecenas. He treats of the cultivation of the soil in the first book, of fruit trees in the second, of horses and other cattle in the third, and of bees in the fourth. In this poem Virgil shows a great improvement both in his taste and in his versification. If he began this poem before he had finished the Eclogues, he went on working at it and correcting it after he had laid his Eclogues aside. It has been attempted to show that the first book was written before B.C. 53, but there is no conclusive evidence on this point. It has been stated when it was finished. Neither in the Georgics nor elsewhere has Virgil the merit of striking originality; his chief merit consists in the skilful handling of borrowed materials. His style is more prosaic, and his treatment in a manner both instructive and pleasing: for he has given many useful remarks on agriculture and diversified the dryness of didactic poetry by numerous allusions and apt embellishments, and some occasional digressions without wandering too far from his main matter. In the first book (v. 1, &c.) he enumerates the subjects of his poem, among which is the treatment of bees; yet the management of bees seems but meagre material for one fourth of the whole poem, and the author accordingly had to complete the fourth book with matter somewhat extraneous—the long story of Aristaeus. The Georgica is the most finished specimen of the Latin hexameter which we have; and the rude vigor of Lucretius, and the antiquated crudeness of Ennius are here replaced by a versification, which in its kind cannot be surpassed. The Georgica are also the most original poem of Virgil, for he found little in the Works and Days of Hesiod that could furnish him with hints for the treatment of his subject, and we are not aware that there was any work which he could exactly follow as a whole. For numerous single lines he was indebted to his extensive reading of the Greek poets.

The Aeneid, or adventures of Aeneas after the fall of Troy, is an epic poem on the model of the Homeric poems. It was founded upon an old Roman tradition that Aeneas and his Trojans settled in Italy, and were the founders of the Roman name. In the first books we have the story of Aeneas being driven by a storm on the coast of Africa, and being hospitably received by Dido queen of Carthage, to whom he relates in the episode of the second and third books the fall of Troy and his wanderings. In the fourth book the poet has elaborated the story of the attachment of Dido and Aeneas, the departure of Aeneas in obedience to the will of the gods and the suicide of the Carthaginian queen. The fifth book contains the visit to Sicily, and the sixth the landing of Aeneas at Cumae in Italy, and his descent to the infernal regions, where he sees his father Anchises, and has a prophetic vision of the glorious destinies of his race and of the future heroes of Rome. In the first six books the adventures of Ulysses in the Odyssey are the model, and these books contain more variety of incident and situation than those which follow. The critics have discovered an anachronism in the visit of Aeneas to Carthage, which is supposed not to have been founded until two centuries after the fall of Troy, but this is a matter which we may leave without discussion, or admit without allowing it to be a poetical defect. The last six books, the history of the struggles of Aeneas in Italy, are founded on the model of the battles of the Iliad. Latium, the king of the Latini, offers the Trojan hero his daughter Lavinia in marriage, who had been betrothed to Turnus, the warlike king of the Rutuli. The contest is ended by the death of Turnus, who falls by the hand of Aeneas. The fortunes of Aeneas and his final settlement in Italy are the subject of the Aeneid, but the glories of Rome and of the Julian house, to which Augustus belonged, are indirectly the poet's theme. In the first book the foundation of Alba Longa is promised by Jupiter to Venus (Aeneid, i. 254), and the transfer of empire from Alba to Rome; from the line of Aeneas will descend the "Trojan Carthage," which will be "the greatest city of all the world," which will not be "extinguished by the ocean," and whose glory by the heavens. The future rivalry between Rome and Carthage, and the ultimate triumphs of Rome are predicted. The poem abounds in allusions to the history of Rome; and the aim of the poet to confirm and embellish the popular tradition of the Trojan origin of the Roman state, and the descent of the Julii from Venus, is apparent all through the poem. It is objected to the Aeneid that it has not the unity of construction either of the Iliad or of the Odyssey, and that it is deficient in that antique simplicity which characterises these two poems. Aeneas, the hero, is an insipid kind of personage, and a much superior interest is excited by the savage Mezenius, and also by Turnus, the unfortunate rival of Aeneas. Virgil imitated other poets besides Homer, and he has occasionally borrowed from them, especially from Apollonius of Rhodes. If Virgil's subject was difficult to invest with interest, that is his apology; but it cannot be denied that many parts of his poem are successfully elaborated, and that particular scenes and incidents are treated with true poetic spirit. The historical colouring which pervades it, and the great amount of antiquarian learning which he has scattered through it, make the Aeneid a study for the historian of Rome. Virgil's good sense and taste are always conspicuous, and make up for the defect of originality. As a whole, the Aeneid leaves no strong impression, which arises from the fact that it is not really a national poem, like the Iliad or the Odyssey, the monument of an age of which we have no other literary monument; it is a learned poem, the production of an age in which it does not appear as an embodiment of the national feeling, but as a monument of the talent and industry of an individual. The Aeneid contains many obscure passages, which a long series of commentators have laboured to elucidate. Virgil has the merit of being the best of the Roman epic poets, superior both to Ennius who preceded him, and on whom he levied contributions, and to Lu- can, Silius Italicus, and Valerius Flaccus, who belong to a later age. The passion for rhetorical display, which characterises all the literature of Rome, is much less offensive in Virgil than in those who followed him in the line of epic poetry.

The larger editions of Virgil contain some short poems, which are attributed to him, and may have been among his earlier works. The Culex or Gnat is a kind of Bucolic poem in 415 hexameters, often very obscure; the Ciris, or the mythus of Seylla the daughter of Nius, king of Megara, in 541 hexameters, has been attributed to Con- nius Gallus and others, but Scaliger maintains that it is by Virgil; the Moretum, in 123 verses, the name of a compound mess, is a poem in hexameters, on the daily labour of a cultivator, but it contains only the description of the labours of the first part of the day, which consist in preparing the Moretum: the female servant of the rustic Simulus is a negress; none was ever better de- scribed,

"Afra genus, tota patrimin testante figura, Torta comam, labroque tumens et fusca color- rem, Pectora lata, jacens mammis, compressior alvo, Cruribus exilis, spatiosa prodiga planta."

The Copa, in elegiac verse, is an invitation by a female tavern keeper or servant attached to a Caupona, to passengers to come in and enjoy them- selves. There are also fourteen short pieces in various metres, classed under the general name of Catacteta. That addressed "Ad Venerem," shows that the writer, whoever he was, had a talent for elegiac poetry.

The first edition of Virgil, a small folio, was printed at Rome about A. D. 1469 by Sweynheym and Pannartz, and dedicated to Pope Paul II. This rare edition was reprinted in 1471, but it is of no great value. The Virgil printed by Aldus at Venice in 1501, 8vo, is also very scarce. At the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the six- teenth centuries there were many prints of Virgil, with the commentary of Servius and others. The edition of J. L. de la Cerda, which is valued for the commentary, appeared at Madrid in 3 vols. folio, 1608—1617. The valuable edition of Nic. Hein- sius was published at Amsterdam in 1676. The well printed edition of P. Masvicius, Leeuwarden, 1727. 2 vols. 4to, contains the complete commentaries of Servius, Philargyrius, and Pierius, with the "Index Erythraei," the Life of Virgil by Tib. Claudius Donatus, an "Index absolutissimus in Mauri Servii honorati Commentarios in Virgilium," and an "Index Auctorum in Servii Commentariorum citatorum." All these matters make the edition of Mavicius very useful. P. Burmann's edition appeared at Amsterdam, 1746, 4 vols. 4to. C. G. Heyne bestowed great labour on his edition of Virgil, 1762—1775. Leipzig, 4 vols. 8vo, with a copious index; it was reprinted with improvements in 1788. In the fourth edition of Heyne's Virgil, by G. P. E. Wagner, Leipzig, 1830, 4 vols. 8vo, the text has been corrected after the best MSS., the punctuation improved, and the ortho- graphy altered or amended. The text of this edition is also published separately in a single volume with the title "Publil Virgili Maronis Carmina ad pristinam Orthographam quaed ejus fieri potuit revoca. edidit P. Wagner, Leipzig, 1831, 8vo." It also contains the "Orthographia Vergiliana," or remarks on the orthography of many words in Virgil, arranged in alphabetical order.

The works of Virgil have been more fortunate than those of most of the writers of antiquity, for there are many very old MSS. of his poems. That which is called the Medicina, may probably have been written before the downfall of the Roman empire. An exact fac-simile of it was published by Foggini at Florence, 1741, 4to. The Codex Vaticanus, which is also of great antiquity, was published by Bottari, Rome, 1741, folio; but it is said not to be so accurate a copy as the fac-simile of Foggini. Wagner in his Praefatio has briefly discussed the relative ages of these two MSS.; but there seem to be no grounds for deciding the question. They are both undoubtedly very old.

The editions of the several parts of Virgil and the school editions are very numerous. The "Hand- buch der Classischen Bibliographie" of Schweigger, ii. pp. 1145—1258, contains a long list. The edition of A. Forbiger, 3 vols. 8vo, Leipzig, 1836, and a second edition, 1845—1846, contains a sufficiently copious commentary for ordinary use, which is composed of selections from the comment- tators and his own notes.

The Bucolica were translated into German verse by J. H. Voss with useful notes; and a second edition by A. Voss, appeared at Altona, 1830. J. H. Voss's poetical translation of the Georgics is highly esteemed. His complete translation of Virgil appeared at Brunswick in 3 vols. 8vo, 1799. Martyn, professor of Botany at Cambridge, published a prose version of the Georgica, London, 1741, and of the Georgica, 1749, with many valuable notes. The commentary of Martyn on the Georgica is perhaps the best that has appeared for the elucidation of the matter of the poem. Gawin Douglas, bishop of Dunkeld, translated the Aeneid into Scottish verse, London, 1553. Ogilby's verse translation was published at London, 1649 and 1659; and Dryden's was published by Tonson, London, 1697. The blank verse translation of Dr. J. Trapp is very poor. The Aeneid translated by C. Piti, and the Bucolica and Georgica by Joseph Warton, were published by Dodsley, Lon- don, 1783, 4 vols. 8vo. Sotheby's poetical version of the Georgica contains the original text and the versions of De Lille, Soave, Guzman, and Voss.

The chief authority for the Life of Virgil is the Life by Donatus, which, though not a critical performance, is undoubtedly founded on good materials. It is printed in Wagner's edition of Virgil with notes. The editions, translations, commentaries, and essays on Virgil form an enormous mass of literature, in which the poet is rather buried than embalmed.

VIRGINIA. I. The daughter of L. Virginius, a brave centurion, the attempt made upon whose chastity by App. Claudius was the immediate cause of the downfall of the Decemvirs, who had in violation of law continued in possession of their power at the beginning of B.C. 449. The story ran that Virginia was a beautiful and innocent girl, betrothed to L. Iclius, who had rendered her tribunals memorable by his law which assigned the Aventine to the plebeians. The maiden had attracted the notice of the decemvir App. Claudius. He at first tried bribes and allurements; but when these failed, he had recourse to an outrageous act of tyranny, which he could perpetrate with all the greater ease, as her father was absent from Rome, serving with the Roman army on Mount Algidus. One morning, as Virginia, attended by her nurse, was on her way to school, which was in one of the booths round the forum, M. Claudius, a client of Appius, laid hold of the damsel and claimed her as his slave. The cry of the nurse for help brought a crowd around them; but M. Claudius said that he did not mean to use violence, and that he would bring the case before App. Claudius for decision. All parties went accordingly before the decemvir. In his presence Marcus repeated the tale he had learnt, asserting, that Virginia was the child of one of his female slaves, and had been imposed upon the reputed father by his wife, who was childless. He further stated that he would prove this to Virginius, as soon as he returned to Rome, and he demanded that the girl should meantime be handed over to his custody as his slave. The friends of the maiden, on the other hand, pleaded that by the old law, which had been re-enacted in the Twelve Tables, it was provided that every person who was reputed to be free, and whom another claimed as his slave, was to continue in possession of his rights, till the judge declared him to be a slave, though he was bound to give security for his appearance in court. They therefore offered to give security for the maiden, and begged the decemvir to postpone his judgment till her father could be fetched from the camp. Appius, however, replied that the girl could not in any case be free; that she must belong either to her father or her master, and that as her father was absent, he adjudged her to the custody of M. Claudius, who was to give sureties to bring her before his judgment-seat when the case should be tried. At this unjust sentence the crowd exhibited signs of the greatest indignation. P. Numitorius, the maiden's uncle, and Iclius, to whom she was betrothed, spoke so loudly against the sentence, that the multitude began to be roused. Appius, fearing a riot, said that he would let the cause stand over till the next day; but that then, whether her father appeared or not, he should know how to maintain the laws and to give judgment according to justice. The greatest exertions, however, were necessary to bring Virginius to the city, lest Appius should have detained him in the camp. Accordingly, while Appius was kept in court receiving bail for the appearance of Virginia on the following day, two of the friends of the family made all haste to the camp. They reached the camp the same evening. Virginia immediately obtained leave of absence, and was already on his way to Rome, when the messenger of Appius arrived, instructing his colleagues to detain him.

Early next morning Virginius and his daughter came into the forum with their garments rent. The father appealed to the people for aid, warning them that all were involved in a like calamity. Iclius spoke still more vehemently; and the women in their company sobbed aloud. But, in truth until gratification of his last, Appius cared nought for the misery of the father and the girl. He came into the forum attended by a great train of clients, and took his seat upon the tribunal. M. Claudius renewed his claim. Appius hastened to give sentence, by which he consigned the maiden to the party who claimed her as his slave, until a judge should decide the matter. M. Claudius stept forward to take possession of the maiden, but was driven back by the people. Thereupon Appius, who had brought with him to the forum a large body of armed patricians and their clients, ordered his lictors to disperse the mob. The people drew back in alarm, leaving Virginia and her daughter alone before the judgment-seat. All help was gone. The unhappy father then prayed the decemvir to be allowed to speak one word to the nurse in his daughter's hearing, in order to ascertain whether she was really his daughter. The request was granted; Virginia drew them both aside, and matching up the father's knife from one of the stalls, plunged it in his daughter's breast, exclaiming, "There is no way but this to keep thee free." In vain did Appius call out to stop him. The crowd made way for him, and holding his bloody knife on high, he rushed to the gate of the city, and hastened to the Roman camp. The result is known. Both camp and city rose against the decemvirs, who were deprived of their power, and the old form of government was restored. L. Virginius was the first who was elected tribune, and he hastened to take revenge upon his cruel enemy. By his orders Appius was dragged to prison to await his trial, and he there put an end to his own life in order to avoid a more ignominious death. M. Claudius, who had claimed the maiden as his slave, was condemned to death, but Virginius himself did not allow the last sentence of the law to be carried into effect, but permitted him to go into exile. (Liv. iii. 44—50; Dionys. xi. 28—46; Val. Max. vi. i. 2.) Cicero in one passage gives him the praenomen Lucius, in conformity with the other ancient writers (de Fin. ii. 20).

2. The daughter of Anlus, was a patrician by birth, but married to the plebeian L. Volumnius Flamma, who was consul in B.C. 307 and 296. In consequence of her marriage the patrician women excluded her from the worship of the goddess Pudicitia, and she thereupon dedicated a chapel to the plebeian Pudicitia. (Liv. x. 23.)

VIRGINIA or VIRGINIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. Virginius is usually found in MSS. and inscriptions, but modern editors generally adopt the other orthography, Virginus. The patrician branch of the gens was of great antiquity, have frequently filled the highest honours of the state during the early years of the republic. They all bore the cognomen of TRUCOSUS, but were divided into various families with the surnames of Viriathus, Caetilomontanus, Esquilinus, and Rutulus respectively. The first of them who obtained the consulship was T. Virginius Tricostus Caetilomontanus in b.c. 496. The plebeian Virginii are also mentioned at an early period among the tribunes, but none of them had any cognomen. Under the empire we find Virginii with other surnames, a list of which is given below.

Virginius. 1. A. Virginii, tribune of the plebs. b.c. 461, accused K. Quininius, the son of L. Cincinnatus, and after a severe struggle obtained his condonation. (Liv. iii. 11—13.)

2. L. Virginius, the father of Virginii, whose tragic fate occasioned the downfall of the democrats, b.c. 449. [Virginii.]

3. A. Virginii, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 395, was condemned with his colleague P. Pomponius, two years afterwards. (Liv. v. 29.) For details see Pomponius, No. 3.

4. L. Virginii, a tribune of the soldiers in the second Punic war, b.c. 207. (Liv. xxvii. 43.)

5. Virginii, tribune of the plebs, b.c. 87, who accused Sulla, is spoken of under Virgilius, No. 1.

6. Virginius, proscribed by the triumvirs b.c. 48, escaped to Sicily by promising large sums of money to his slaves, and to the soldiers who were sent to kill him. (Appian, B. C. iv. 48.)

Virginius Capito. [Capito.]

Virginius Flavus. [Flavus.]

Virginius Romanus, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, wrote comedies and mimia, which are much praised by Pliny. (Ep. vi. 21.)

Virginius Rufus. [Rufus.]

Viriathus (Ovpiration, Dioi, and Dion Cass.; Ovpirationis, Appian), a Lusitanian, commanded his countrymen in their war against the Romans, whose power he defied, and whose armies he vanquished during many successive years. He is described by the Romans as originally a shepherd or huntsman, and afterwards a robber, or, as would be called in Spain in the present day, a guerilla chief. His character is drawn very favourably in a fragment of Dion Cassius (Fragm. 78, p. 33, ed. Reimar), and his account is confirmed by the testimony of other ancient writers, who celebrate especially his justice and equity, which was particularly shown in the fair division of the spoils he obtained from the enemy. (Comp. Diod. vol. ii. p. 519, ed. West; Cic. de Off. ii. 11.)

The Lusitanians had long been accustomed to support themselves by robbery and rapine; and as they still continued their predatory mode of life after the Romans had become masters of the neighbouring countries, the Roman commanders in Spain resolved to reduce them to submission. Accordingly in b.c. 151 their country was invaded by the proprietor Ser. Galba, and in the following year (b.c. 150) by the consul L. Lucullus as well as by Galba. The Lusitanians in alarm sent offers of submission to Galba, who enticed them to leave their mountain fastnesses by promising to give them fertile lands, and when they had ascended into the plains, relying on the word of a Roman general, he surrounded them with his troops and treacherously butchered them. Very few of the Lusitanians escaped, but among the survivors was Viriathus, who was destined to be the avenger of his country's wrongs. The Lusitanians, who had not left their homes, rose as a man against the rule of such treacherous tyrants, and they found in Viriathus a leader who was well versed with the country, and who knew how to carry on the war in the way best adapted to the nature of the country and the habits of his countrymen. At first he avoided all battles in the plains, and waged an incessant guerilla warfare in the mountains. It was not, however, till b.c. 147 that the Lusitanians were able to collect any formidable body of men; and in this year having invaded Tardeiana, they were attacked, while ravaging the country, by the Roman proprietor C. or M. Vetilius, defeated with loss and obliged to take refuge in a fortress, to which the Romans laid siege. The want of provisions prevented them from holding out long, and they accordingly endeavoured to make terms with Vetilius, who promised to assign to them a place where they might settle. Viriathus, who was serving among his countrymen, but who had not yet been formally recognised as their general, reminded them of the treachery of the Romans, and promised, if they would obey his commands, to save them from their present danger. His offer was gladly accepted, and he was unanimously elected their commander. By a bold and skilful stratagem he eluded the Roman general, and again assembled his forces at Tribola, a town to the south of the Tagus in Lusitania. Thither he was followed by Vetilius; but Viriathus, pretending to retreat, led the Romans into an ambush, where they were attacked by the Lusitanians, and defeated with great loss: Vetilius himself was killed; and out of 10,000 Romans scarcely 6000 escaped. The survivors took refuge under the command of the queneot within the walls of Carpeus, which Appian supposes to be the same as the ancient Tarsettus. Fearing to meet the enemy in the field, the queneot obtained 5000 men from the Beli and Tithi, Celtiberian tribes, who were then allies of the Romans, and sent them against Viriathus; but they were also defeated by the Lusitanian general, who now laid waste Carpetania without encountering any opposition.

On the arrival of the praetor C. Plautius in the following year, b.c. 146, with a fresh army, Viriathus abandoned Carpetania and retreated into Lusitania. He was eagerly followed by Plautius, who crossed the Tagus in pursuit of him, but while the Romans were engaged in fortifying their camp on a mountain, covered with olives, which the Roman writers call the Hill of Venus, they were attacked by Viriathus and put to the rout with great slaughter. Plautius was so disheartened with this defeat that he made no further attempt against the enemy, but led his army into winter quarters, although it was still only the middle of summer. The country of the Roman allies was thus again left exposed to the ravages of Viriathus, who compelled the inhabitants to pay to him the full value of their crops, and destroyed them if they refused. He also took Segobriga, the chief town of the Celtiberians. (Fron. Strat. iii. 11. § 4.)

The war in Spain had now assumed such a threatening aspect that the senate resolved to send a consul and a consular army into that country. Accordingly, in b.c. 145, the consul Q. Fabius Aemilius, the son of Aemilius Paulus, who conquered Macedonia, received Spain as his province.
VIRIATHUS.

He levied two new legions at Rome, consisting for the most part of new recruits, in order to give some repose to the veteran troops, who were worn out by the wars in Greece and Macedonia. He likewise obtained some forces from the allies; and when he mustered his troops at Urso or Orso, the modern town of Osuna in Andalusia, his army amounted to 15,000 foot and 2000 horse. But before his arrival in Spain the Romans had again experienced another disaster. The army of the praetor Claudius Uninamus had been nearly annihilated, and the fases and other spoils taken from the Romans had been erected by Viriathus as trophies in the mountains. (Flor. i. 17. § 16.) Fabius appears not to have arrived in Spain till the middle of the summer; and as he would not fight with the enemy till his raw troops had received further training, he left his army under the command of his legate, while he himself went over to Gades to offer a sacrifice to Hercules. In his absence his foragers were attacked by Viriathus, who slew many of them; and the legate of Fabius having thereupon ventured to offer battle to Viriathus, was defeated. When Fabius returned from Gades, he could not be tempted by Viriathus to any regular engagement, but passed the remainder of the year in exercising his troops and in occasional skirmishes with the enemy, by which his soldiers acquired confidence and experience. In the following year (b. c. 144) Fabius was continued in the government of Spain, and he now felt sufficient reliance upon his troops to venture to attack Viriathus with all his forces. Viriathus was defeated and driven out of the Roman dominions in Spain, and his two chief towns fell into the hands of Fabius. After these successes Fabius led his troops into winter quarters at Corduba.

These successes of Fabius, however, were more than counterbalanced by another formidable insurrection in Spain. The Arevaci, Belli, and Titthi, Celtiberian people, inhabiting that part of Spain now called Old Castile, had been subdued by the Romans some years previously, and two of them, the Belli and Titthi, had, as we have already seen, sent assistance to the Romans in their war against Viriathus. They were now, however, induced to follow the example of Viriathus, and to take up arms against the Romans, and thus almost the whole of central Spain was in open revolt. The war against the Celtiberians became even more protracted than that against the Lusitanians, and is usually known by the name of the Numantine war, from Numantia, the principal town of the Arevaci.

In n. c. 143 the consul Q. Metellus Macedonicus was sent into Nearer Spain, and the propretor Q. Pompeius into Further Spain, as the successor of Fabius Aemilianus.* While Metellus conducted the war with success against the Celtiberians, Pompeius was not equally fortunate in his campaign against Viriathus. He had at first gained a victory over the Lusitanian general, and pursued him as far as the mountain south of the Tagus, which has been already mentioned under the name of the Hill of Venus. Here Viriathus turned upon his pursuers, and drove them back into their camp with the loss of 1000 men and several standards. This defeat so disheartened Pompeius that he allowed the enemy to lay waste the country around the Guadalquivir without resistance, and led his army early in the autumn into winter-quarters at Corduba.

In the following year, b. c. 142, the consul Q. Fabius Servilius was sent into Further Spain as the successor of Pompeius. Q. Metellus remained as proconsul in Nearer Spain. Servilius brought with him two Roman legions and allied troops, amounting in all to 16,000 foot and 1600 horse, and he also obtained from Micospa some elephants. He at first carried on the war with great success, defeated Viriathus, and compelled him to retire into Lusitia, took by storm many of his cities, and exterminated several guerilla bands. Next year, however, b. c. 141, when Servilius remained in Spain as proconsul, the fortune of war changed. The Romans had laid siege to Erisane; Viriathus stole into the town by night, and at the dawn of day made a successful sally against the besiegers. The Romans lost a great number of men, who were put to flight. In their retreat they became enclosed within a mountain pass, where they were surrounded by the Lusitanians, much in the same way as their ancestors had been by the Samnites at the celebrated Caunide Forks. Escape was impossible, and they had no alternative but an unconditional surrender. Viriathus used his victory with moderation. He agreed to allow the Romans to depart uninjured, on condition of their permitting the Lusitanians to retain undisturbed possession of their own territory, and of their recognising him as a friend and ally of the Roman people. Servilius concluded a treaty with Viriathus on these terms, and it was ratified by the Roman people.

Thus the war with Viriathus appeared to have been brought to a conclusion; but the consul Q. Servilius Caepio, who succeeded his brother Servilius in the command of Further Spain in b. c. 140, was greatly disappointed at the unexpected termination of the war. He had looked forward to the war in Spain as an opportunity for gaining both wealth and glory; and he therefore used every exertion to induce the senate to break the treaty by representing it as unworthy of the Roman people. The senate, however, had not the effrontery to give their approval to an open violation of the peace, but connived at Caepio's injuring Viriathus as far as he could without any open attack. But after a short time we are told that the senate allowed Caepio to declare open war against Viriathus, probably having obtained meantime some pretext for this act of faithlessness. Caepio forthwith took the field against Viriathus; but the latter sent three of his most faithful friends, Audax, Ditalio, and Minurus, to the Roman general, to offer him terms of peace. Caepio persuaded the envoys by promises of large rewards to murder Viriathus. Accordingly, on their return they murdered Viriathus, while he was asleep in his tent, and made their escape to the Roman camp before any of the Lusitanians became aware of the death of their general. The murderers, however, did not receive the rewards which had been promised them; and when they demanded them of the consul, he coolly replied that the Romans did not approve of the murder of a general by his own soldiers. The death of Viriathus did not put an immediate stop to the war. After burying Viriathus with great magni-VICELLINUS.

In the following year, B.C. 501, Cassius was appointed first magister equitum to the first dictator, T. Lucius Flavius, but in some authorities a different year is given for the first dictatorship. After the battle of the lake Regillus in B.C. 498 or 497, Cassius is said to have urged in the senate the destruction of the Latin towns. (Liv. ii. 18; Dionys. v. 75, vi. 20.) In B.C. 493 he was consul a second time with Postumus Cominius Auruncus; and they entered upon their consularship during the secession of the plebeians to the Sacred Mount. The second consulsipship of Cassius is memorable by the league which he formed with the Latins. As soon as the plebeians had become reconciled to the patricians, and had returned to Rome, Cominius marched against the Volscians, while his colleague remained at Rome to ratify the league with the Latins. According to Niebuhv the campaign of Cominius against the Volscians is only an inference adopted by Livy, who recorded the absence of the consul, who, he supposes, had left Rome in order to take the oath to the treaty among the Latins. In the same year Cassius consecrated the temple of Ceres, Bucchus, and Proserpine, which the dictator A. Postumius Albus had vowed in B.C. 498. (Liv. ii. 33; Cic. de Rep. ii. 33, pro Balb. 23; Dionys. vi. 49, 94, 95; respecting the league with the Latins, see Niebuhv, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 38, foll.)

In B.C. 486 Cassius was consul a third time with Proculus Virginius Tricostus Rutulius. He marched against the Volscians and Hernicans, but no battle took place as the enemy sued for a peace. Notwithstanding he obtained a triumph over these people on his return to Rome, which is recorded in the triumphal Fasti. Whether he really marched against these people or not, may be doubted; but that he formed a league with the Hernicans, admits of no question. By his league with the Latins in his second consulship, and with the Hernicans in his third, he had again formed that confederacy to which Rome owed her power under the later kings. Livy says (ii. 41) that Cassius deprived the Hernicans of two thirds of their land; but this is a complete misconception. It is much more probable that by this treaty the Hernicans were placed on equal terms with the Romans and the Latins, and that each of the three nations was entitled to a third part of the lands conquered in war by their mutual arms. After the treaty with the Hernicans Cassius proposed his celebrated agrarian law. The account of this law given by Dionysius cannot be safely trusted; according to Niebuhr it betrays distinct marks of a writer of the second half of the seventh century of the city, and is compiled with great ignorance of the ancient times. The law must have been simply a restoration of the old law of Servius Tullius, and must have directed that the portion of the patricians in the public land should be strictly defined, that the remainder should be divided among the plebeians, and that the title should again be levied from the lands possessed by the patricians. The patricians, headed by the other consul, Virginius, made the most vehement opposition to the law; but it seems almost certain that it was legally passed, though neither carried into execution. It must be recollected that the comitia of the tribes had no share in the legislation till the time of the Pubilillian law, and that the tribunes before the latter time had no power to bring forward a law of any kind: consequently, when we read of their agrarian law, as we do almost every year down to the time of the decemvirs, it must refer to a law which had been already enacted, but never carried into execution.

In the following year, B.C. 483, Cassius was brought to trial on the charge of aiming at regal power, and was put to death. The manner of this trial is obscure; and the charges that were brought against him were differently stated in the ancient writers; but there can be little doubt that he was accused before the assembly of the curies by the quaestores parricidii, K. Fabius and L. Valerius, and was sentenced to death by his fellow patriots, who regarded him as a traitor to their order. Like other state criminals, he was scourged and beheaded. His house was razed to the ground, and the spot where it stood in front of the temple of Tellus was left waste. A brazen statue of Ceres was erected in her temple, with an inscription recording that it was dedicated out of the fortune of Cassius (ex Cassiana familia datum). Dionysius stated that Cassius was buried from the Tarpeian rock, which mistake arose from his strange supposition, which was also shared by Livy, that Cassius was condemned by the assembly of the tribes. Other accounts related that Cassius was condemned by his own father, which statement probably arose, as Niebuhr has suggested, from a desire to soften down the glaring injustice of the deed; while other writers again, who thought it impossible that a man who had been thrice consul and had twice triumphed, should still be in his father's power, restricted the father's judgment to his declaring that he considered his son guilty. (Livy i. 43; Dionys. viii. 68—80; Cic. de Rep. ii. 27, 35. Philipp. ii. 44. Lael. 8, 11, pro Dom. 38; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 1; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 14.) Whether Cassius was really guilty or not, cannot be determined with certainty. All the ancient writers, with one exception, speak of his guilt as an universally admitted fact; and the statement of Dion Cassius (Exeo. de Sentent. 19, p. 150, ed. Mal) that he was innocent, and was condemned to death out of malice, must be regarded as simply the expression of Dion's own opinion, and not as a statement for which the writer had met with any evidence. So strong in antiquity was the belief in his guilt, that the censors of B. C. 159 molten down his statue, which was erected on the spot in front of his house, and which must have been set up there by one of his descendants, for it is impossible to believe that the quaestors would have spared it, if it had been erected, as Pliny states (ib.), by Cassius himself. On the other hand, such a general belief is no proof of his guilt; and it is far more probable that the patricians invented the accusation for the purpose of getting rid of a dangerous opponent; and as they were both the accusers and the judges, the condemnation of Cassius followed as a matter of course. Dionysius relates (viii. 80) that Cassius left behind him three sons, whose lives were spared by the senate, although many were anxious that the whole race should be exterminated. The Cassii mentioned at a later time were all plebeians. The sons may have been expelled by the patricians from their order, or they or their descendants may themselves have voluntarily passed over to the plebeians, because the patricians had shed the blood of their father or ancestor. VITELL'II. In the time of Suetonius it was disputed whether the origin of the Vitellii was ancient and noble, or recent and obscure, and even mean. The adulators of the emperor Vitellius and his enemies were the partizans of the two several opinions. The name of the Vitellii at least was ancient, and they were said to derive their descent from Faunus, king of the Aborigines, and Vitellia, as the name is in the text of Suetonius, (Vitell. c. 1.) The family, according to tradition, went from the country of the Sashini to Rome, and was received among the Patricians. As evidence of the existence of this family (stirps), a Via Vitellia, extending from the Janiculum to the sea, is mentioned, and a Roman colony of the same name, Vitellia, in the country of the Aequi. (Livy, v. 29, ii. 35.) The name of the Vitellii occurs among the Romans who conspired to restore the last Tarquiniius, and the sister of the Vitellii was the wife of the consul Brutus. (Livy, ii. 4.)

Cassius Severus and others assigned the meanest origin to the Vitellii: the founder of the stock, according to them, was a freedman. Suetonius leaves the question undecided.

1. P. VITELL'IIUS, whatever his origin may have been, was a Roman eques, and a procurator of Augustus. His native place was Nuceria, but Suet. does not say which of the places so called. He had four sons, Aulus, Quintus, Publius, and Lucius. (Sueto. Vitel. 2.)
VITELLIIUS.

2. A. Vitellius was consul suffectus A.D. 32, in the same year with Cn. Domitius, the father of the emperor Nero, and he died in that year. He was distinguished for the splendour of his entertainments.

3. Q. Vitellius was one of those whom Tiberius (Tacit. Annal. ii. 40) removed from the senate or allowed to withdraw, on the ground of their scandalous life and the wasting of their property.

4. P. Vitellius served under Germanicus in Germany (Tacit. Ann. i. 70), and he conducted the second and fourteenth legions in their return from the expedition against the Catti and other German tribes A.D. 15. He was afterwards sent with C. Antonio to make the census of the Gauls. (Tacit. Ann. ii. 6.) Vitellius was one of the protectors of Cn. Plancus, who was charged with the death of Germanicus, and Vitellius was eloquent in his accusation. (Tacit. Ann. iii. 10, 13.) He subsequently obtained the dignity of the praetorship. After the death of Sejanus, among whose friends he was, he was accused on some vague charges; while he was in custody, he asked for a penknife, with which he inflicted a slight wound on himself. The wound was not mortal, but Vitellius died shortly after from grief and vexation. (Tacit. Ann. v. 8; Suet. Vitell. c. 2.) His wife Aelia was tried on the charge of Majestas, and convicted. (Tacit. Ann. vi. 47.)

5. L. Vitellius was father of the emperor and of the emperor's brother Lucius. Lucius, the father, was a consummate flatterer, and by his arts he gained promotion. He set the example of adoring Caesar Caligula as a god, but this was done mainly to save his life. After being consul in A.D. 34, he had been appointed governor of Syria, and he had induced Ariabanus, the king of the Parthians, not only to come to a conference with him, but also to make his obeisance to the signs of the legions, which were apparently marked with the Roman emperor's effigy, or were accompanied by it. (Dion Cassius, lxi. 27.) Vitellius had got favourable terms of peace from Ariabanus. But all this only excited Caligula's jealousy, and he sent for Vitellius to put him to death. The governor saved himself by his abject humiliation and the gross flattery, which pleased and softened the savage tyrant. A story is told so extravagant as hardly to be credible, if anything were not credible of a madman like Caligula. The emperor on one occasion said that he had commerce with the moon, and asked Vitellius if he had ever seen their brides. Vitellius, affecting profound veneration, with his eyes on the ground, and in a faint tremulous voice replied, "To you gods alone, my master, is it permitted to see one another." Nobody ever beat this, and Vitellius reigned the king of flatterers. He paid the like attention to Claudius and to Messalina. He was rewarded by being twice consul with Claudius, and censor. He and Messalina are accused of being the chief cause of the death of Valerius Asiaticus. (Tacit. Annal. xi. 1—3.) After the execution of Messalina, he artfully removed the difficulty which Claudius had about celebrating his marriage with his niece Agrippina, by making it appear that the Senate and the people wished for the marriage. The Senate carried their adulation and hypocrisy so far as to say that they would compel the emperor to the marriage, if he hesitated. (Tacit. Ann. xii. 5, &c.) When Claudius was celebrating the Secular Games, the compliment of this outrageous flatterer was, "Saepe facias;" which is as much as to say, "O king, live for ever." Vitellius, though one of the strong partisans of Agrippina, was accused (A.D. 52) of majestas by Junius Lupus, a senator; but the accusation only ruined the accuser. (Tacit. Ann. xii. 42.) Lucius died of paralysis soon after he was attacked. He saw his two sons by Sexilia consuls before he died, and indeed both of them were consuls in the same year, A.D. 48, in which the emperor Claudius and Lucius Vitellius were censors. The Senate honoured the man with a public funeral and a statue in front of the Rostra, bearing the inscription "Pietatis immobili erga Principem." "As to L. Vitellius," says Tacitus (Ann. vi. 32), "I am not ignorant that he had a bad name in Rome, and that many scandalous things were said of him, but in the administration of the provinces he showed the virtues of a former age."

6. L. Vitellius, the son of Lucius, and the brother of Aulus, afterwards emperor, was consul in A.D. 48. He was one of those who advised the death of Cæcina (Tacit. Hist. iii. 37); and he is accused of taking off Junius Blaesus by poison. When A. Vitellius quitted Rome for the camp in the Apennines, Lucius was left to defend the city; but on the coming of Tarracina, occupied by the partizans of Vespasian, the emperor sent his brother Lucius with six cohorts and five hundred horse to put down the insurrection in Campania. Lucius took Tarracina (Tacit. Hist. iii. 76, &c.), and made a great slaughter. If he had marched to Rome after this success, he might have made a formidable resistance to the party of Vespasian, for Lucius was a man of great activity and energy. But the feeble conduct of the emperor at Rome soon brought the contest to an end. Lucius was on his march from Tarracina to Rome, when he surrendered to the party of Vespasian, and was taken to the city and put to death. (Tacit. Hist. iv. 2; Dion Cass. lxxv. 22.)

VITELLIIUS, AULUS, the son of L. Vitellius, who was three times consul and censor, was born probably on the 24th of September, A.D. 15. Aulus was consul during the first six months of A.D. 48, and his brother Lucius during the six following months. He was proconsul of Africa for a year, and during another year legatus of the same province under his brother, in which capacities he is said to have behaved with integrity. He had some knowledge of letters and some eloquence. His vices made him a favourite of Tiberius, Caius Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who loaded him with favours. People were much surprised when Galba chose such a man to command the legions in Lower Germany, for he had no military talent. His great talent was eating and drinking. When he left Rome for his command, his affairs were so embarrassed that he had to put his wife Galeria Pandana and his children in lodgings, and to let his house. Some of his creditors wished to prevent him from leaving Rome; and he only got rid of their importunity by dishonest proceedings against some, and giving security to others. When he became emperor he compelled his creditors to give up their securities, and told them that they ought to be content with having their lives spared. (Sueton. Vitellius, c. 3, &c.; Dion Cass. lxxv.)

The way in which Vitellius was elevated to the supreme power on the third of January A.D. 69, has been told in the life of Otho. After Otho's death his soldiers submitted to Cæcina, and took the oath of fidelity to Vitellius, Flavius Sabinus, who was prefect of Rome, made the soldiers who were there take the oath to Vitellius, and the senate as a matter of course decreed to him all the honours which previous emperors had enjoyed. Vitellius had not advanced far from Cologne, where he was proclaimed emperor, when he received intelligence of the victory of his generals and of the death of Otho. All the empire submitted to Vitellius, and even Mucianus, the governor of Syria, and Vespasian, who was conducting the war against the Jews, made their legions take the oath of fidelity to the new emperor.

Vitellius, on his road to Rome, passed by Lyon, where he gave to his young son the title of Germanicus with the insignia of imperial dignity. (Tacit. Hist. ii. 58.) The generals of the victorious and of the vanquished armies met Vitellius at Lyon. Salvius Titianus, the brother of Otho, was pardoned for fighting on his brother's side. Marius Cælius was allowed to retain the consularship, the functions of which he was to commence in the July following. Suetonius Paulinus and Proculus, after being kept for some time in a state of anxiety, were at last pardoned, upon the scandalous pretence, on their part, that they had voluntarily lost the battle of Bedriacum. But Vitellius offended the army by putting to death the bravest of the centurions of Otho. He published an edict by which astrologers (mathematici) were ordered to leave Italy before the first of the following October. Vitellius continued his journey by way of Vienna (Vienne in Dauphîne), without paying any attention to the discipline of the troops which accompanied him. On crossing the Alpes he found North Italy full of soldiers, those of his own armies and those of Otho, who were quarrelling with another. To prevent further disorder, Vitellius dispersed the legions of Otho in different places. He sent back to Germany eighteen Batavian cohorts, which were very turbulent; and he also sent back to their country many Gallic auxiliaries. On arriving at Cremona, about the 25th of May, he went to see the battle field of Bedriacum, which was covered with putrefying bodies; and when some of his attendants expressed their disgust at the stench, he said, "that a dead enemy smelled sweetest, and still sweeter when he was a citizen." (Sueton. Vitellius, 10.) He went to see the modest tomb of Otho; and he sent to Cologne the dagger with which Otho had killed himself, to be dedicated to Mars.

Vitellius was followed to Rome by sixty thousand soldiers and an immense body of camp attendants. His progress was marked by licentiousness and disorder. (Tacit. Hist. ii. 87.) He seems to have entered Rome August ii. His entry is described by Tacitus (Hist. ii. 89). He found his mother in the Capitol, and conferred on her there the title of August; and he assumed the title of Pontifex Maximus on the 18th of July, the inauspicious day on which the Roman armies were once slaughtered at the Cremo and the Allia. P. Sabinus and Julius Priscus were made Praefecti Praetorio, and the number of praetorian cohorts was increased. Caecina and Valens had great influence, but they could not agree. The chief favourites of Vitellius were a freedman named Asiaticus, and actors and buffoons. The vileness of the populace were pleased to see honour paid to the memory of Nero by this worthy successor, but the better sort were disgusted. He did not disturb any person in the enjoyment of what had been given by Nero, Galba, and Otho; nor did he confiscate any person's property. Though some of Otho's adherents were put to death, he let the next of kin take their property; and he restored to the relations of those who had been put to death in former reigns such part of the property of the deceased as was in possession of the fiscus. But though he showed moderation in this part of his conduct, he showed none in his expenses. He was a glutton and an epicure, and his chief amusement was the table, on which he spent enormous sums of money. It is said that he was not greedy of money simply for money's sake, but his extravagant way of living caused a prodigious expenditure.

There was a report of his compelling his mother Sextilia to die of starvation, because of a prediction that he would reign a long time if she survived her; but there are good reasons for not believing this story. (Sueton. Vespas. c. 14; Tacit. Hist. iii. 67.) She seems to have been a woman of good character and of good sense. Galeria Fundana, the second wife of Vitellius, conducted herself with prudence and moderation during her husband's short reign, as Tacitus says. What Dion Cassius (Ixx. 4) says of her, is not contradictory of the statement of Tacitus, even if Dion's story be true.

Vespasian, who had been appointed to the command in the Jewish war by Nero in A.D. 66, had conquered all the country in two campaigns, except the city of Jerusalem, and had acquired a great reputation. But no one had yet thought of him as a candidate for the imperial dignity, on account of the meanness of his origin. On the accession of Galba, Vespasian sent his son Titus to pay his respects to the new emperor. The death of Galba's death, and of the contest between Otho and Vitellius, went no farther than Corinth, whence he returned to his father. Between Liciinus Mucianus, the governor of Syria, and Vespasianus, there was some jealousy; but the death of Nero and the troubles of the times brought them together for their mutual safety, and they laboured at securing the affection of their soldiers, who soon began to think of giving a new master to the empire. After the death of Otho the two generals made their troops take the oath of fidelity to Vitellius. But Mucianus now urged Vespasian to assume the imperial power, a measure which he was slow to adopt, being old and cautious. At last, during an interview with Mucianus, he consented, perhaps as much from a conviction that it was necessary for his personal security, and the good of the empire, as from ambitious views. Mucianus went back to Antioch, and Vespasian to Cæsarea, his usual place of residence; and after a short time, hearing of Vespasian was taken by Tiberius Alexander, the governor of Egypt, who caused his soldiers in Alexandria to take the oath of fidelity to Vespasian on the first of July A.D. 69. Thus within the space of a year and a few days, the Roman empire had witnessed the death of Nero, the accession and death of Galba and Otho, the accession of Vitellius, and the proclamation of Vespasian. The new emperor was speedily recognised by all the East; and the legions of Illyricum under Antonius Primus entered North Italy and declared for Vespasian. This movement in favour of Vespasian began with the third legion, which was stationed in Maestia, and had formerly been in Syria. Vitellius heard of the revolt of this legion before he heard of the revolt of Vespasian, and he endeavoured to stop the report of it from circulating in Rome. He summoned troops from various quarters, but showed no great vigour in his preparations, being unwilling to let it be thought that he was afraid of the revolt. Primus reached Aquileia with some of the infantry and part of the cavalry, where he was well received, and also at Padua and other places. He also made preparations to besiege Verona; and he was joined by many of the old Praetorian soldiers, whom Vitellius had disband ed.

Roused by this intelligence Vitellius despatched Caecina with a powerful force to North Italy. But Caecina was not faithful to the emperor; he had already formed treacherous designs and communicated with Sabinus the brother of Vespasian, who still remained praefect of Rome. Caecina ordered part of his troops to assemble at Cremona and part at Hostilia on the Po; and he went to Ravenna to see Lucius Bassus, commander of the fleet, who shortly afterwards delivered it up to the party of Vespasian. Caecina now moved the troops at Hostilia towards Verona, and posted them in an advantageous position. But instead of attacking the enemy with his superior forces, he waited till two other legions from Maesia joined Primus, and then urged them to submit, and be induced part of them to take the oath to Vespasian. His men however put him in chains and went to Cremona to join the troops which were there. The history of this campaign is told under PRIMUS, M. ANTONIUS.

Primus left Verona and encamped at Bedriacum about the 26th of October, where he defeated the Vitellians in two battles, and afterwards took and pillaged the city of Cremona. Valens left Rome a few days after Caecina, and he was in Etruria when he heard of the victories of Primus. Upon this he attempted to escape by sea to Gaul, but he was thrown upon the Stockehades islands on the coast, where he was seized by order of Valerius Paulinus, governor (procurator) of Gallia Narbonensis, and shortly thence to part V death. (Tacit. Hist. iii. 43, 62.) When Vitellius heard of the treachery of Caecina, he deprived him of the consulsiphip, and put Alfenus Varus in the place of P. Sabinus, the Praefectus Praetorio. Cornelius Fuscus with some troops of Vespasian had invested Rimini and occupied all the country to the Apennines, before Vitellius was roused from his torpor. At last he sent a strong force to guard the passes of the Apennines; the station of this force was at Mevania (Bevagna) in the country of the Umbri. He remained at Rome, employed in distributing magistracies for the next ten years and in giving every thing away in the hopes of retaining popular favour (Tacit. Hist. iii. 56). His presence being loudly called for by the soldiers, he went to the camp of Mevania, where he only displayed his stupidity and his incompetence. He was recalled from Mevania by the news of the revolt of the fleet at Misenum; and the army at Mevania having retreated to Narnia, part of this force was left there, and the other part was sent under the command of L. Vitellius, the emperor's brother, to put down the insurrection in Campania, and the revolt of the fleet at Misenum. Primus took advantage of the retreat of the troops to cross the snows of the Apennines, for it was now the month of December, and encamped at Carsulae, between Mevania and Narnia, where he was joined by Q. Petullus Cerialus, who was connected with Vespasian by marriage, and had made his escape from Rome in the dress of a rustic. Domitian, the son of Vespasian, was in Rome watched by Vitellius; and Flavius Sabinus, Vespasian's brother, was still Praefectus urbi.

Primus now took Internamna (Terni) and was joined by many of the officers of Vitellius, who had now nothing left but the city of Rome. Pro- provials had already been made to Vitellius both from Primus and Macianus to resign; and it is said that in a conference between Flavius Sabinus and Vitellius, the terms of the emperor's resigna- tion were settled. On the 16th of December, after hearing that his troops at Internamna had surren- dered, he left the palace in the dress of mourning with his infant son, and declared before the people with tears that he renounced the empire. But receiving some encouragement from the people he returned to the palace. The news of his intended resignation had brought a number of senators, equites, and others about Sabinus; and nothing seemed left except for Sabinus to compel Vitellius to resign. But the force of Sabinus, which was not strong, was repelled in the streets by some soldiers of Vitellius, and Sabinus and his party retired to the Capitol. On the following day Sab- binus sent to summon Vitellius to resign, and to complain (Tacit. Hist. iii. 70) of the attack of his soldiers. Vitellius answered that he could not control his soldiers, who immediately, without any leader, attacked the Capitol, which by some acci- dent was fired during the contest and burnt. Domitian, who was with Sabinus in the Capitol, escaped, and also the son of Sabinus, but the father and the consul Quintius Atticus were taken pris- oners. Vitellius had influence enough to save Atticus from the fury of the soldiers, but Sabinus was torn in pieces. (Hist. iii. 74.)

In the mean time L. Vitellius took Tarracina and defeated the partizans of Vespasian, but this advantage was not followed up by an advance upon Rome. The troops of Primus were close upon the city on the evening of the day on which Sabinus was killed; and Petullus Cerialus who reached the suburbs before Primus received a check. Vitellius now attempted to arm the slaves and the populace; but he still hoped to come to terms and sent mes- sengers to Primus and Cerialis. But it was now too late; the partizans of Vespasian entered the city, and various fights took place, in which many persons were killed; Rome was filled with tumult and bloodshed. Vitellius having gorged himself at his last meal left the palace for the house of his wife on the Aventine, with the intention of stealing away to his brother Lucius at Tarracina; but with his usual unsteadiness of purpose he re- turned to the palace, which he found nearly de- serted, and even the meanest of the slaves shank away from him. Terrified at the solitude he hid himself in an obscure part of the palace, from which he was dragged by Julius Placidus, a tri- bunus cohortis. He was led through the streets with every circumstance of ignominy and dragged to the Gemonian Scala, where the body of Sab- binus had been exposed. There he was killed with repeated blows. He uttered one expression to the tribune who was insulting him, which was not unworthy of his former dignity: he told him that he had once been his emperor. His head was carried about Rome, and his body was dragged into the Tiber; but it was afterwards interred by his wife VITRUVIUS.

Galeria Fundana. He was in his fifty-seventh year according to Tacitus, in his fifty-fifth according to Dion. He reigned a year all but ten or twelve days, reckoning from the time of his proclamation, and a little more than eight months from the death of Otho. His brother Lucius was put to death; and his infant son in the following year by order of Mucianus. Vespasian provided the daughter of Vitellius with an honourable marriage. The period between the death of Nero and the accession of Vespasian was a period of anarchy, in which the several successors of Nero play only a subordinate part; and the events of this period can only be treated properly in an historical work, not in biographical articles.

VITRUVIUS, architects. L. L. VITRUVIUS L. L. CERDO ARCHITECTUS is an inscription twice repeated on the arch of the Gavii at Verona. (Grun Der, p. clxxvi.; Orelli, Inser. Lat. Sol. No. 4145.) The genuineness of these inscriptions, which has been questioned, is successfully defended by Maffei (Veron. Illust. pt. ii. p. 20, pt. iii. p. 90, Art. Crit. Lat. p. 197). There is no precise indication of the time at which Vitruvius Cerdio lived; but it is most probable that he was much subsequent to the celebrated writer on architecture, Vitruvius Pollio. We mention him, however, first, in order to dispose at once of the question as to the identity of these two architects, which was raised by Andreas Alciatus, who attempted to support his theories in their identity by changing Pollio, which is the name of Vitruvius in all the MSS., into Pollio, which he explained, not as a cognomen, but as a designation, synonymous with Cerdio. It really seems almost superfluous to refute an opinion which rests on such an argument alone; but, to remove all doubt, it may suffice to remark, firstly, that the praenomen, as well as the cognomen, of the two artists are different, the one being Lucius, and the other Marcus, by the unanimous consent of the MSS.; secondly, that, whereas Vitruvius Cerdio was a freedman, as we learn from the inscription (L. L. = Lucii Libertis), Vitruvius Pollio was a man of free birth and liberal education, as we are informed by himself; and, thirdly, that the arch

VITRUVIUS. erected by Vitruvius Cerdio exhibits an arrangement which is strongly condemned by Vitruvius Pollio, namely, the placing of dentils under modillions. This arrangement belongs to the period when the Roman architects had given themselves up to that tendency, of which Vitruvius complains, to neglect altogether the more minute precepts of the Greeks. It is seen in the triumphal arches of Titus, Nerva, and Constantine, in the portico of Nerva, and in the baths of Diocletian. The inscription also refuses the opinion which has been thrown out, evidently as a mere guess, that Vitruvius Cerdio was the freedman of Vitruvius Pollio, for then, of course, we should have had M. L. instead of L. L.

2. M. VITRUVIUS POLLIO. There is scarcely an ancient writer of equal eminence, of whom so little is recorded, as of the author of that treatise on Architecture, without which the remains of ancient buildings would have been extremely difficult to understand, and which still forms a most important text-book of the science. Beyond the mere mention of his name by Pliny, in one of those lists of his authorities, which many critics believe not to be genuine, and one reference to him by Frontinus (de Aquaed. § 25), and passing allusions to him by Servius and Sidonius Apollinaris, all the information we possess respecting him is contained in scattered passages of his own work. Respecting his birth-place, we have no information. The statement of some writers, that he was a native of Verona, arises from the mistake of identifying him with Vitruvius Cerdio. Bernardinus Baldus, in his valuable Life of Vitruvius, prefixed to the Bipont edition, suggests the probability that he having been a native of Fundi or Formiae, on account of several inscriptions being found at those places, relating to the Vitruvia gens, and to individuals of it with the praenomen Marcus. See Vaccus, Vitruvius.

We learn from Vitruvius himself that his parents gave him a liberal education, both of a general and of a professional character. (Lib. vi. Praef.) He tells, however, that he pursued his studies chiefly with a view to his profession, and only followed other branches of knowledge so far as they might appear to be useful for that object. On this ground he apologizes, and not without cause, for his style of composition, inasmuch as he had not trained himself in literature, so as to become a first-rate philosopher or orator or grammarian, "sed ut Architectus his litteris inambitus, hoc nius sum scribere." In the digressions, into which he is led by his plan of ascending to the first principles of each part of his subject, he shows a fair general knowledge of various branches of Greek philosophy. In the theoretical part of physical science he is weak; but this was a general defect of the ancient philosophers. Baldus shows reason for supposing that, in his views of natural philosophy, Vitruvius was a follower of Epicurus. That he was well acquainted with the literature both of Greece and Rome, is evident from his references to the numerous Greek authors, and to the few Romans, who had written upon architecture, and also to the great writers of both nations in the different departments of general literature. So much respecting his education. Of his station in life he says but little. That it was respectable may be inferred from his education, and from other circumstances referred to in his works; but there are several passages in his prefaces, which show that he neither inherited great wealth, nor succeeded in acquiring it. The patronage of the emperor, to whom his work is dedicated, had early placed him beyond the reach of want for the remainder of his life (Lib. i. Praef.,) and he was able to look with contentment, though not without indignation, upon the greater success of his rivals in obtaining the substantial rewards of their profession. His allusions to this subject are couched in that tone of semi-conceited contentment and half dissatisfied moderation, which judges of human character will interpret according to the bias of their own dispositions. He had no great advantages of person, being of low stature, and, at the time when he wrote his work, suffering from old age and bad health.

He appears to have begun his course in public life as a military engineer. He tells us that he served in Africa; and it is important to quote his own words, as introducing the question of the time at which he lived: "C. Julius, Masintha (or Masinissus) filius, cujus erant tatius oppidi agrorum possessiones, cum patre Caesare minister. Is hospitio nero est usus; iba quotidiana concita, &c. &c." (vii. 4. 3. § 25, ed. Schneider.) Again, in the dedication of his work to the reigning emperor, he uses the language: "Vetustus tuus, domine, quinquagesimam annum autem concilium coelestium in sedibus immortalium cum dedicavit, et imperium parentis in tua postestatem tranzultulis, idem studium meum in ejus memoria permanens in to contulit favorem." (The last words, by the way, are no bad specimen of the obscurity of his style.) He then goes on to say that he was appointed, with M. Aurelius and P. Numisius and Cn. Cornelius, to the office of superintending and improving the military engines (ad apparitionem balistarum et scorpionum reliquarumque tormentorum perfectionem fui praeceps), with a pecuniary provision (commoda); and that the emperor, through his sister’s recommendation, continued his patronage to Vitruvius, after he had conferred upon him these favours. This emperor, we further learn from the dedication, was one who "had obtained possession of the empire of the world, and by his unconquered valour had overthrown all his enemies, while the citizens gloried in his triumph, and all the nations subdued under him waited on his nod, and the Roman people and senate, delivered from fear, were governed by his deliberations and counsels; and who, so soon as he had brought into a settled state those things which related to the public welfare and social life, devoted especial attention to public buildings, with which he adorned the empire, which he had augmented by new provinces." We have set forth this passage at length, that the reader may judge for himself whether the emperor thus addressed can be any other than Augustus, when it is remembered that, by the confession of all scholars, the time at which Vitruvius wrote is confined between the limits of the reigns of Augustus on the one hand, and of Titus on the other. Of course no proof is needed that he wrote after the death of Julius Caesar, whom he also expressly mentions as dead (divi Iulii. iii. 2); and that he did not live after Titus is proved, apart from the mention of him by Pliny already referred to, by his silence respecting the Coliseum, and most irrefragably by his allusion to Vesuvius and the surrounding country, the volcanic nature of which he takes pains to prove, one of his arguments being a tradition that there had been eruptions of the mountain in ancient times (ii. 6). We think it unnecessary to pursue the discussion through all its details. The judgment of scholars is now quite decided in favour of considering Augustus to be the emperor to whom the treatise of Vitruvius is dedicated; and abundant confirmatory evidence of that position has been derived from other passages of the work. The other opinion, that that emperor was Titus, is elaborately maintained by Newton, in the Observations on the Life of Vitruvius prefixed to his translation of the work. Some of Newton’s arguments are ingenious, but unsound; many are weak, and even puerile; some are at direct variance with the evidence, and some inconsistent with one another; and the best of them, which are intended to prove that Vitruvius wrote after the time of Augustus, only prove, allowing them their utmost force, that he wrote somewhat later in that emperor’s reign, a fact which he himself states in the Dedication, where he says that he formed the design of his work at the beginning of the new reign, but that he feared to incur the emperor’s displeasure by intruding upon him when he was fully occupied with public affairs; but that, when he saw that he was about to set up buildings, which his patron bestowed upon buildings, both public and private, and that he had both erected and was erecting many edifices, he hastened to execute his design, and to present the emperor with a set treatise, explaining the exact rules and limits of the art, as a standard by which to test the merits of the buildings he had already erected, or was intending to erect. (Conscripti praecriptiones terminales, ut eas attendens et antefacta et futura qualia sint opera per te, noto posses habere.) Before noticing the further light which this somewhat remarkable language throws on the design of the treatise, it is necessary to observe the more exact limits within which the time of the author may now, with great probability, be defined. We may assume him to be a young man when he served under Julius Caesar, in the African war, B. C. 46, and he was old, may be broken down with age (see above) when he composed his work, at a period considerably subsequent to the complete settlement of the empire under Augustus, and after the erection of several of that emperor’s public buildings. Moreover, that his book was written some time after the name of Augustus had been conferred upon the emperor (B. C. 27) is evident from the passage (v. 1) in which he speaks of the basilica at Panum, of which he himself was the architect, as erected subsequently to the temple of Augustus at that place. Again, from the way in which he mentions the emperor’s sister in his dedication, it appears probable, though, it must be confessed, not certain, that she was still alive. Now Octavia, the favourite sister of Augustus, died in B. C. 11. Hence the date of the composition of the work lies probably between B. C. 20 and B. C. 11. At the former date, Vitruvius would be about 56, if we assume him to have been about thirty when he was in Africa with Caesar. This date is confirmed by the way in which he speaks of Lucretius, Cicero, and Varro, as quite recent authors. The object of his work appears to have had reference to himself, as well as to his subject. We have seen that he professes his intention to furnish the emperor with a standard by which to judge of the buildings he had already erected, as well as of those which he might afterwards erect; which can have no meaning, unless he wished to protest against the style of architecture which prevailed in the building already erected. That this was really his intention appears from several other arguments, and especially from his frequent references to the unworthy means by which architects obtained wealth and favour, with which he contrasts his own moderation and contentment in his more obscure position. The same thing appears from his praise of the pure Greek models and his complaints of the corruptions which were growing up; and also from his general silence about those of the great buildings of the age of Augustus, which, if the date assigned to him be correct, must have been erected before he wrote. This silence is perfectly intelligible if we understand those to be the very buildings, which he wished the emperor and his other readers to compare with his precepts, while he himself was content to furnish the means for the comparison, without incurring the odium of actually making it. In a word, comparatively unsuccessful as an architect, for which the reasons of his cantions except the basilica at Fanum, he attempted, like other artists in the same predicament, to establish his reputation as a writer upon the theory of his art; and in this he has been tolerably successful. His work is a valuable compendium of those written by numerous Greek architects, whom he mentions chiefly in the preface to his seventh book, and by some Roman writers on architecture. Its chief defects are its brevity, of which Vitruvius himself boasts, and which he often carries so far as to be unintelligible, and the obscurity of the style, arising in part from the natural difficulty of technical language, but in part also from the author’s want of skill in writing, and sometimes from his imperfect comprehension of his Greek authorities.

His work is entitled De Architectura Libri X. In the First Book, after the dedication to the emperor, and a general description of the science of architecture, and an account of the proper education of an architect, he treated of the various buildings of the Roman Empire, which he considers as the most important of the Roman art. He then proceeds to the description of the several buildings within it. The Second Book is on the materials used in building, to his account of which he prefixed some remarks on the primeval condition of man and the invention and progress of the art of building, and on the views of the philosophers respecting the origin of matter. The Third and Fourth Books are devoted to temples and the four orders of architecture employed in them, namely, the Ionic, Corinthian, Doric, and Tuscan. The Fifth Book relates to public buildings, the Sixth to private houses, and the Seventh to interior decorations. The Eighth is on the subject of water; the mode of finding it; its different kinds; hot-springs, mineral waters, fountains, rivers, lakes, and the curious properties ascribed to certain waters; the use of water in levelling; and the various modes of conveying it for the supply of cities. The Ninth Book treats of various kinds of sundials and other instruments for measuring time; and the Tenth of the machines used in building, and of military engines. Each book has a preface, upon some matter more or less connected with the subject; and these prefaces are the source of most of our information about the author.

The work of Vitruvius was first published, with that of Frontinus de Aquae ductibus, by Jo. Sulpiutius, at Rome, without a date, but about A. D. 1486, fol.; then at Florence, 1496, fol., at Venice, 1497, fol., reprinted from the Florentine edition, which was more accurate than the Edition Prima Nova; these three editions all follow the MSS. closely. A more critical recension was attempted by Jucundus of Verona, Venet. 1511, fol., with rude wood-cuts; and another edition by the same editor, and with the same wood-cuts, but smaller and ruder, was printed by Giunta, Florent. 1513, 8vo., and reprinted in 1522 and 1523; the conjectural emendations in these editions are extremely rash. Of the numerous subsequent editions, a full account of which (up to 1801) will be found in Ernestei’s edition of Fabric. Bibli. Lat. vol. i. c. 17 (also prefixed to the Bipont edition), the most important are those of J. de Laet, Amat. 1640, fol.; of A. Bode, in 2 vols. Berol. 1809, 4to., with a volume of plates, Berol. 1801; the Bipont, 1807, 8vo.; that of J. G. Schneider, in 3 vols. Lips. 1807, 1808, 8vo., and another, in a more rational arrangement of the chapters of each book, but without plates; of Stratico, in 4 vols., Udine, 1825—30, with plates and a Lexicon Vitruvianum; and of Marini, in 4 vols., Rom. 1836, fol. The work has been translated into Italian by the Marquess Galiani, with the Latin text, Neapol. 1758, fol., and by Viviani, Udine, 1830; into German, by D. Gualtherus and H. Rivius, Nürnberg, 1548, fol., Basel, 1575, fol. and 1614, fol.; and by August Bode, in 2 vols. Leipzig, 1796, 4to.; into French, by Perrault, Paris, 1763, fol.; 2d ed. 1864, fol.; abridged 1874, 1881, fol.; and into English (besides the translation of Perrault’s abridgment, Lond. 1892, 8vo., often reprinted), by Robert Castell, with notes by Ingis Jones and others, 2 vols. Lond. 1730, fol.; by W. Newton, with notes and plates, 2 vols., Lond. 1771, 1791, fol.; by W. Wilkins, R. A., Lond. 1812, containing only the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth books, and those not complete; and by Joseph Gwilt, 1826, 4to. There are several other translations of less importance, especially into Italian.

P. S. VITULUS. the name of a family of the Mamilia and Voconia gentes. Niebuhr supposes that Vitulus is merely another form of Itatus, and remarks that we find in the same manner in the Mamilia gens a surname Turrinus, that is, Tyrrenus. It was customary, as is proved by the oldest Roman Fasti, for the great houses to take distinguishing surnames from a people with whom they were connected. In public buildings, or the ties of blood (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 14.) The ancients, however, as we see from the coin figured below, connected the surname Vitulus with the word signifying a calf.

2. Q. Mamilius Q. f. M. n. Vitulus, brother of the preceding, was consul b.c. 262 with L. Postumius Magellus, the third year of the second Punic war. In conjunction with his colleague Vitulus took Agrigentum. (Polyb. i. 17—20; Zonar. viii. 10, who erroneously calls him Q. Ae-nilius.)

3. C. Mamilius Vitulus, was elected maximus curio in b.c. 208, being the first plebeian who had held that office. He was praetor in b.c. 208 with Sicily as his province, and was one of the ambassadors sent to Philip, king of Macedonin, in b.c. 203. He died in b.c. 174 of the pestilence which visited Rome in that year. (Liv. xxvii. 8, 35, 36, 38, xxx. 26. xli. 26.)

VITULUS, Q. VOCO'NIUS, is only mentioned on coins, a specimen of which is given below, from which it appears that he was triumvir of the mint under Julius Caesar, and was quaestor de-signatus at the time the coin was struck. The obverse represents the head of Julius Caesar; the reverse a vitulus, or calf with Q. voconi

COIN OF Q. VOCONIUS VITULUS.

VIVIA'NUS, a Roman, jurist of uncertain time, who is often cited by Ulpian and Paulus. It apppears that he referred to the authority of Sabinus, Cassius, and Proculus, and must therefore have been junior to them. (Dig. 29. tit. 7. s. 14.) Pon-ponius appears to have annotated Vivianus, and therefore wrote after him. (Dig. 13. tit. 6. s. 17.
§ 4.) Vivianus may accordingly have lived under Hadrian and Trajan. [G. L.]

VIVIA'NUS, A'NNIUS, the son-in-law of Corbulo, served under the latter in the East in the reign of Nero. (Tac. Ann. x. 28.)

ULPIA'NUS, DOMITIUS, derived his origin from Tyrsus in Phoenicia, as he states himself, "unde mihi origo." (Dig. 50. tit. 1. s. 1.) These words do not prove that he was a native of Tyre, as some have supposed; they rather prove that he was not, and that his ancestors were of that city. The time of Ulpian's birth is unknown. Some of his juridical works may have been written during the joint reign of Septimius Severus and Antoninus Caracalla (a. d. 211), but the greater part were written during the sole reign of Caracalla, especially the two great works Ad Edictum and the Libri ad Sabinum. He was banished or deprived of his functions under Elagabalus (Lamprid. Helig. c. 16), who became emperor a. d. 217; but on the accession of Alexander Severus a.
d. 222, he became the emperor's chief adviser, who is said to have followed Ulpian's counsel in his administration. (Lamprid. Alex. Sever. 51.)

The emperor once designed to assign a peculiar dress to every office and rank, so that the condition of persons might be known from their attire; and he also proposed to give slaves a peculiar dress that they might be recognised among the people, and that slaves and ingenii might not mingle together. Ulpianus and Paulus dissuaded the emperor from this measure by good reasons. (Lamprid. Alex. Severus, c. 27.) As a proof of his confidence the emperor never saw any one of his friends alone, except the Praefectus Praetorio and Ulpian; and whenever he saw the prefect, he invited Ulpian. The emperor conferred on Ulpian the office of Scriniorem magister, and made him a consiliarius: he also held the office of Praefectus Annonae, as we see from a constitution of Alexander in which he entitles him "Domitius Ulpianus praefectus annoneae jurisconsultus amicus meus." (Cod. 3. tit. 38. a. 4.) He also was made Praefectus Praetorio, but it is doubtful whether he first held this post under Elagabalus or under Alexander Severus. The epitomator of Dion says that Ulpian prepared the way for his promotion to the place of Praefectus Praetorio by causing his two predecessors, Flavi-ianus and Chrestus, to be put to death. But there is no other evidence than this. (Dion Cass. lxxx. 2.) Zosimus (i. 11) says that Ulpian was made a kind of associate with Flavianus and Chrestus in their office, by Mamæa, the mother of Alexander, and that the soldiers hereupon conspired against Ulpian, but their designs were anticipated by Mamæa, who took off their instigators, by whom, we must suppose, he means Flavianus and Chrestus; and Ulpianus was made sole praefectus praetorio. Ulpian perished by the hands of the soldiers, who forced their way into the palace at night, and killed him in the presence of the emperor and his mother, a. d. 228. As this happened so early in the reign of Alexander, the remark of Lampri dus that the emperor chiefly availed himself of the advice of Ulpian in his administration, is only a proof of the carelessness of this writer. His promotion to the office of praefectus praetorio was probably an unpopular measure. A contest is mentioned between the Romans and the praetorian guards, which lasted three days, and was attended with great slaughter. The meagre epitome of Dion only leaves us to guess that Ulpian's promotion may have been connected with it.

A great part of the numerous writings of Ulpian were still extant in the time of Justinian, and a much greater quantity is excerpted from him by the compilers of the Digest than from any other jurist. The number of excerpts from Ulpian is said to be 2462; and many of the excerpts are of great length, and altogether they form about one-third of the whole body of the Digest. It is said that there are more excerpts from his single work Ad Edictum than from all the works of any single jurist. The excerpts from Paulus and Ulpian together make about one half of the Digest. Those of Ulpian compose the third volume of the Pallinigenesis of Hommelius.

The following are the works of Ulpian which are mentioned in the Florentine Index, and excerpted in the Digest. The great work Ad Edictum was in 83 libri; and there were 51 books of the work entitled Libri ad Sabinum [SABINUS MA-SURUS]. He also wrote 20 libri ad Leges Julian et Papian; 10 de omnibus Tribunaliibus; 3 de Office Consulis; 10 de Office Proconsulis; 4 de Appellatio nibus; 6 Fideicommissorium; 2 libri Institutionum; 10 Disputationum; 6 de Censibus; a work de Adulteria; libri singulares de Office ULPIANUS.

Praefecti urbi; de Officio Curatoris Reipublicae; de Officio Praetoris Tutelaris. All these works were probably written in the time of Caracalla. The work of which we still possess a fragment, under the title "Domitii Ulpiani Fragmenta," was, perhaps, written under Caracalla (xvii. 2); and it is generally supposed to be taken from the liber singularis Regularum. There are also excerpts from Regularum Libri septem, which some suppose to have been a second edition of the Regularum liber singularis; but it may have been a work on a different plan.

Ulpian wrote also libri duo Rerum orientalium, libri singulares de Sponsalibus; de Officio Praefecti Vigilium, de Officio Quaestorii; and libri sex Oppinionum. The time when these works were written is uncertain.

The Index mentions Πανδεκτον βιβλία δεκα, but there is no excerpt from the work in the Digest; yet there are two excerpts (12. tit. 1. s. 24; 40. tit. 12. § 34), from a liber singularis Pandectarum. Accordingly the emendation of Grotius, ut for δεκα, in the title of the Florentine Index may be accepted.

The Florentine Index omits the libri duo ad Edictum Aedilium Curulum, the libri ad legem Aeliam Sentiam, of which there were at least four, and the libri singulares de Officio Consulurium and Exactionum; and also the notae ad Marcellum (Dig. 9. tit. 2. s. 41) and ad Papinianum (Dig. 3. tit. 5. s. 31. § 2) from which there are no excerpts.

We learn from the Vaticana Fragmenta (§ 90 — 93) that he also wrote a work De Interdictis in four books at least, and a liber singularis de Officio Praetoris Tutelaris (Vat. Fr. § 232).

Ulpian's style is perspicuous, and presents fewer difficulties than that of many of the Roman jurists who are excerpted in the Digest. Compared with his contemporary, Paulus, he is somewhat diffuse, but this is rather an advantage for us, who have to read the Roman jurists' fragments. The easy economy of Ulpian, and the length of many of the extracts from his works, render the study of his fragments a much easier task than that of such a writer as Papinian. The great legal knowledge, the good sense, and the industry of Ulpian place him among the first of the Roman jurists; and he has exercised a great influence on the jurisprudence of modern Europe, through the copious extracts from his writings which have been preserved by the compilers of Justinian's Digest.

The fragments entitled "Domitii Ulpiani Fragmenta," or as they are entitled in the Vatican MS. "Tituli ex corpore Ulpiani," consist of twenty-nine titles, and are a valuable source for the history of the Roman law. They were first published by Jo. Tilius (du Tillet) Paris, 1549, 8vo.; and they are printed in the Jurisprudentiae, &c. of Schulting. The edition of Hugo, Berlin, 1834, 8vo., contains a fac-simile of the Vatican MS. The edition of the Fragments, by E. P. van der Bend, 8vo., contains also the fragments of the first book of the Institutiones of Ulpian, which were discovered by Endlicher in 1835 in the Imperial Library at Vienna; but they are too meagre to enable us to determine the plan of this Institutional work.

There occurs in Ulpian (Dig. 1. tit. 1. s. 1. § 2, 3, 4. s. 4. s. 6) and in Tryphoninus and Hermogenianus a threefold division of law, viewed with respect to its origin — Juris Naturae, Gentium, Civile. In Gaius and other writers there is only a two-fold division, for Juris Naturale and Juris Gentium in Gaius and those other writers are equivalents. Savigny (System, &c. vol. i. Beyleige i.) has explained the meaning of Ulpian's threefold division. The authors of the Institutiones of Justinian have introduced great confusion by first giving Ulpian's threefold division, which they apply to the case of slavery, and then taking the passages of Gaius, Marciusianus and Florentinus, in which the twofold division is either expressed or clearly implied. (Inst. 1. tit. 1. § 4; tit. 2. pr.; tit. 5. pr.) The confusion is completed by their taking a passage of Gaius in which the twofold division occurs, and by the addition of the remark that the Juris Naturale (sicut diximus) is the same as the Juris Gentium. (Inst. 2. tit. 1. § 11.)

It is generally assumed that Ulpian the Tyrian, who is named in the argument to the Deinoposophiae of Athenaeus, is the jurist, because he is called the Tyrian; but the jurist was not a Tyrian. Athis was a celebrated Tyrian, who died in the fifth century of the Tyrian (p. 680, ed. Casai) speaks of the happy death of his Ulpian; but the jurist died a wretched death; he was murdered by infuriated soldiers. Athenaeus does not call his Ulpian a jurist, and it is clear that he did not consider him one. This assumption leads to a great deal of confusion, and is totally unfounded. See the article Athis, in "Biographical Dictionary of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge."

Some attempt has been made to prove both that Ulpian and Paulus were very hostile to the Christians. The charge is founded on a passage of Laetantius (Div. Inst. v. 11); but it is not certain that the Domitius whom he mentions is Domitius Ulpianus. And if the passage refers to Ulpian, it proves nothing against him. If among the imperial rescripts directed to proconsuls, there were some which imposed penalties on the Christians, a writer de Officio Proconsulis could not omit a part of the law which regulated a proconsul's office, even if the law was severe and describes a collection of the ancient law of England on religion would not have been complete a few years ago, if it omitted those statutes which contained severe penalties against certain classes of religious persons.

(Puchta, Inst. i. p. 457; Zimmerm, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, i. 370; Grotius, Vitae Jurisconsultorum.)

ULPIANUS: a name of three persons mentioned by Suidas.

1. Of GAZA, the brother of Isidorus of Pelusium, was celebrated for his knowledge of mathematics which he taught at Athens. He lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era. Suidas does not mention any works as written by this Ulpianus.

2. Of EMESA, a sophist, wrote several works, of which an Art of Rhetoric was one.

3. Of Antioch, a sophist, lived in the time of Constantine the Great, and wrote several rhetorical works which are enumerated by Suidas.

The name of Ulpianus is prefixed to extant Commentaries in Greek, on eighteen of the orations of Democritus; and it is usually stated that they were written by Ulpianus of Antioch. But Suidas does not mention these Commentaries at all; and it is evident that in their present form they are of much later origin. The Commentaries may originally have been written by one of the sophists of the name, either of Emesa or Antioch, but they have received numerous additions.
and interpolations from some grammarian of a very late period. This is the opinion of Fr. A. Wolf, who remarks that there are scarcely twenty passages in Demosthenes in which the writer throws light upon difficulties, which could not be equally well explained without his aid. These Commentaries were printed for the first time along with the lexicon of Harpocratus by Aldus Manutius, Venice, 1503, fol., and are likewise printed in the 10th volume of Dobson's edition of the Attic orators, London, 1828, as well as in other editions of the Attic orators. (Comp. Wolf, In Demosthenis Leptac. p. 210 ; Westermann, Geschichte der Griechischen Beredsamkeit, § 104, note 13.)

Ulpianus Crinitus, a general in the reign of Valerian, claimed descent from the emperor Trajan. He had the command of Illyricum and Thrace, where Aurelian, afterwards emperor, was his legatus. The latter distinguished himself so much that Ulpian adopted him as his son in the presence of Valerian. (Vopisc. Aurel. 10—15.) Ulpian was consul successively along with his son-in-law Valerian in A. D. 257. (Aurelianus, p. 436, b.)

Ulpianus Julia'nus, was employed to take the census under Caracalla, and was praefectus praetorio under Macrinus. He was sent to Antioch to put down the rebellion of Elagabalus, but was slain by his own troops, A. D. 218. (Dion Cass. LXXXV. 4, 15 ; Herodian. v. 4 § 5 ; Capitol. Maecrin. 10.)

Ulpianus Marcellus. (Marcellus.) Ulpianus Trajanus. (Trajanus.) Ultor, "the avenger," a surname of Mars, to whom Augustus built a temple at Rome in the forum, after taking vengeance upon the murderers of his great-uncle, Julius Caesar. (Sueton. Aug. 21, 29; Calig. 24; Ov. Past. v. 577.) [L. S.]

Ulysses, Ulyxes, Ulixes. [Odyss.]

Umbonius Spio. [Silio.]

P. Umbre'nus, one of Catiline's crew, had formerly carried on business in Gaul as a moneylender (nepotator, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. 2d ed.), and was therefore employed by Lentulus to persuade the ambassadors of the Allobroges to take part in the conspiracy, B. C. 63. (Sall. Cat. 40; Cic. Cat. iii. 6.)

Umbriacus, an heroumbarus, predicted to Galba sacrificing shortly before his death, that a plot threatened him. (Tac. Hist. i. 27.)

Ummidia Quadratilla. [Quadra-tilla.]

Ummidia Quadratus. [Quadra-tus.]

Voc'o'nus Naso. [Naso.]

Voc'o'nus Romanus. [Romanus.]

Voc'o'nus Saxa. [Saxa.]

Voc'o'nus Vitulius. [Vitulus.]

Voc'ula, D'lli'us, legate of the 18th legion of the Roman army on the Rhine, at the time of the Batavian revolt (A. D. 69). On account of the firmness with which he opposed a mutiny against Horatius Flaccus and he was made commander-in-chief by the soldiers in place of that general. Not venturing to attack Civilia in the field, he fixed his camp at Geluduba, and shortly afterwards quelled another mutiny, which had broken out during his absence on an incursion against the Gugerni. (Herennius Gallus.) He afterwards carried on the war with some success, but neglected to follow up his advantage, in all probability because, like the other commanders, he was a partizan of Vespasian, and did not wish that, by the destruction of Civilia, the legions of Germany should be set at liberty to go to the aid of Vitellius. On the other hand, the common soldiers, who were strongly attached to Vitellius, were for this reason in a state of almost constant mutiny, and on one occasion, when Hordeonius Flaccus was killed, Voca only escaped by flying from the camp dressed as a slave. He was soon after joined again by three legions, with which he took possession of Magnesium. In the revolt of Trebius, under Classicus and Tutor (A. D. 70), Voca was forsaken by his army at Novesium, and was put to death by a deserter named Aemilius Longinus, whom Classicus sent into the camp for that purpose. His soldiers were marched off to Trebius, and meeting on their way with Longinus, they put him to death. (Tac. Hist. iv. 24—26, 33—37, 36—59, 77.) [P. S.]

Vloc'lianus, an architect, known by the inscription on a monument erected to his memory by his wife Selene. (Fabretti, Inscrip. p. 176, No. 353; Muratori, Thes. vol. ii. p. cmxxxvi. 4; Sillig, Catal. Artif. Append. s. v.; R. Rochette, Lettre a M. Schorns, p. 426, 2d. ed.) [P. S.]

Volcatia or Volcatia Gens, is not mentioned till the latter end of the republic. The first member of it who obtained the consulship was L. Volcatius Tullius in B. C. 66. Tullus is the only cognomen borne by the Volcatii in the time of the republic, but under the empire we meet with other surnames, a list of which is given below. Volcatius, a Roman equest, one of the agents of Verres in oppressing the Sicilians. (Cic. Verr. ii. 9, 23, iii. 73.) Volcatius Gallia'nus. [Galli-canus.]

Volcatius Gurges. [Gurges.]

Volcatius Moschus. [Moschus.]

Volcatius Sedigutus. [Sedigutus.]

Volcatius Terentia'nus, wrote a history of his own times. He lived under the Gordians. (Capitolin. Gordian. Jun. 21.)

Volcatius Tertullinus. [Ter-tullinus.]

Volcatius Tullinius. [Tullinus.]

Volesus. [Volusus.]

Volero Publius. [Publius.]

Volniius, not Volunnius, wrote some Tuscan tragedies, and is quoted by Varro for the statement that the names of the three ancient Roman tribes, Rameses, Titienes, and Luceres, were Etruscan. (Varr. L. l. v. 55, ed. Müller; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. note 415.)

Volgeses, the name of five kings of Parthia. (Arsaces XXIII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXIX, XXX.)

M. Vol'scius Fictor, who had been previously tribune of the plebs, came forward in B. C. 461 to bear witness against K. Quintius, the son of L. Cincinnatus, and declared that soon after the plague he and his elder brother fell in with a party of patrician youths who came rushing through the Saburn, when their leader Kaeso knocked down his brother, who was still feeble from the sickness he had just got over, and injured him so much that he died shortly afterwards. Dionysius makes Volscius tribune of the plebs in this year. In consequence of this testimony Kaeso was con-

COIN OF M. VOLTEIUS.

VOLTEIUS or VULTEIUS. 1. L. VOLTEIUS, a friend of L. Metellus, who was propomter of Sicily, B.C. 70. (Cic. Verr. iii. 66.)
2. A tribune of the soldiers in Caesar's army, B.C. 40. (Flor. iv. 2. § 33.)
3. VOLTEIUS MENAS, a praece mentioned by Horace (Epist. i. 7. 55, fii.).
T. VOLTRUCIUS, or VOLTURCIUS, of Crotona, one of Catilina's conspirators, was sent by Lentulus to accompany the ambassdoros of the Allobroges to Catiline. Arrested along with the ambassadors on the Mulvanian bridge, and brought before the senate by Cicero, Volturnius turned informer upon obtaining the promise of pardon, and after giving his evidence was amply rewarded by the senate. (Sall. Cat. 44, 45, 47, 50; Cic. Cat. iii. 2, 4, iv. 3; Appian, B.C. ii. 4.)

VOLUMNIA. 1. The wife of Coriolanus. (Coriolanus.)
2. The freedwoman of Volumnius Eutrapelus, and the mistress of Antony, is better known under her name of Cytheris. (Cytheris.)

VOLUMNIA GENs, patrician and plebeian. It was of great antiquity, for the wife of Coriolanus belonged to it, and one of its members, P. Volumnius Gallus, held the consulship as early as B.C. 461, but it never attained much importance. The Volumnii bore the cognomina of Gallus with the agnomen Asininius, and of Flamma with the agnomen Violens. A few persons of the name are mentioned without any surname. [VOLUMNIUS.]

VOLUMNIUS. 1. M. Volusius, slain by Catiline, at the time of Sulla. (Ascon. in Top. Cand. p. 84, ed. Orelli.)
2. P. Volumnius, a judex on the trial of Cluentius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 70.)
3. L. VOLUMNUS, a senator with whom Cicero was intimate (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 32; comp. Varr. R. R. ii. 4), is perhaps the same as the Volumnius Flaccus, who was a friend of D. Brutus. (Cic. ad Fam. xi. 12, 18.)

4. VOLUSIUS, or more correctly Volumnius, the author of some Tuscan tragedies. (Volumnius.)
5. P. Volumnius, described by Plutarch as a philosopher, accompanied M. Brutus in his campaign against the triumvirs, and wrote an account of the prodigies which appeared before the death of Brutus, probably in a life of the latter. (Plut. Brut. 48.)

6. VOLUMNIUS EUTRAPELIUS. (Eutrapelus.)

VOLUSIANUS, the son of the emperor Trebonianus Gallus, upon whose elevation in A.D. 251 he was styled Caesar and Princeps Junius. The year following he held the office of consul, and was invested with the title of Augustus. As far as we can gather from the scanty notices of historians, his character resembled that of his father, along with whom he perished at Interamna in A.D. 253 or 254. (Gallus Trebonianus.) The names borne by this prince, as collected from medals and descriptions, appear to have been C. Vibius Volusianus Trebonianus Asinius Gallus Volumnianus or Volumnianus Aurelius. (Aurel. Vict. de Caes. 30, Epit. 50; Eutrop. ix. 5; Zosim. i. 24; Zonar. xii. 21; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 369.) (W.R.)

COIN OF VOLUSIUS.

VOLUSIUS. 1. An harnspex in the cohorts of Verres. (Cic. Verr. iii. 11, 21.)
2. Q. Volusius, a pupil of Cicero in oratory, accompanied Cicero to Cicilia, where he held some office under him. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 10, 20, ad Att. v. 21.) In one passage (ad Att. v. 11) he is called Ca. Volusius, for there can be little doubt that this Cneius is the same person who is elsewhere called Marcus.
3. M. Volusius, is mentioned by Cicero in B.C. 49 (ad Fam. vii. 12). He is probably the same as the M. Volusius who was plebeian nobile in B.C. 43, and was proscribed by the triumvirs, but escaped by assuming the disguise of a priest of Isis. (Val. Max. vii. 3, § 8; Appian, B.C. iv. 47.)

L. VOLUSIUS MAECIA'NUS, a jurist, was in the consilium of Antoninus Pius. (Capitol. Antonin. Pius, c. 12.) Among the many illustrious men who formed the character of Marcus Aurelius, was Maccianus: Aurelius was one of his auditores. (Capitol. Antonin. Philosoph. c. 3.) A rescript of the Divi Fratres (Dig. 37, tit. 14. a. 17), speaks of him in these terms: "Volusius Maecianus amicus noster, &c." Marcus in his Tavtes lauris VOPISCUS.

(Vopiscus) mentions Maecianus, in place of which it is proposed to read Mecianus, but Marcus does not speak of him as a jurist. Valutaxis (Avid. Cass. c. 7) says that Maecianus was entrusted with the government of Alexandria, and that he was killed by the army for having joined Cassius in his usurpation, a.D. 175.

Maecianus wrote sixteen books on Fideicommissa, and fourteen books on Judicia Publica. A Liber Questionum is also mentioned (Dig. 29. tit. 2. s. 86), but it may have been a part of the work on Fideicommissa. He also wrote that Legem Rhodiam, from which there is a single excerpt in the Digest (14. tit. 2. s. 9) in Greek, from which we may conclude that this was a collection of the Rhodian laws relating to maritime affairs, and Maecianus may have accompanied the collection with a commentary. This work is not mentioned in the Florentine Index.

There are forty-four excerpts from Maecianus in the Digest. He is cited by Cervidius Scaevola, Papinian, Ulpian and Paulus. A treatise, De Asse et Ponderibus, is attributed to Volusius Maecianus, but there is some doubt about the authorship. It is printed in Graevius, Antiq. Roman. xi., and at Paris, 1563, 8vo. There is a dissertation by Wunderlich, De L. Volusio Maecianus; and a recent edition of Maecianus de Asse, and of Balbus by E. Eobking, Bonn, 1831, 12mo. [G.L.]

VOLUSIUS PROCLUS. [Proculus.] VOLUSIUS SATURNINUS. [Saturnius.]

VOLUSIUS or VOLESUS, the reputed ancestor of the Valerian gens, who is said to have settled at Rome with Titus Tatius [Valeria gens].

The name afterwards became a cognomen in the Valerian gens. Thus we read of M. Valerius Volusius, the brother of Publicola, who was consul b.c. 505, the fifth year of the republic, with P. Postumius Tubertus. He fought, together with his colleague, against the Sabines, and obtained a triumph on account of his victory over them. He fell at the battle of the Lake Regillus, b.c. 498 or 496 (Liv. ii. 16, 20; Dionys. v. 37; Plut. Public. 20). We also read of another brother of Publicola, who bore the same cognomen, namely, M. Valerius Volusius Maximus, who was dictator in b.c. 434, and to whom the family of the Valerii Maximi traced their origin. [Maximus, p. 1001, a.] It may be, however, that a mistake has been made in the Annals, and that Munius, the dictator, was the same person as Marcus, the consul: his praenomen would have been changed, because it was stated in some of the Annals that the consul fell at the battle of the Lake Regillus. Volusius likewise occurs as a praenomen of one of the Valerii Potiti. [Pottius, No. 3.] At a later period the name was revived in the Valeria gens, and was borne as an agnomen by L. Valerius Messalla, who was consul a.d. 5. [Messalla, No. 11.]

VOLUX, the son of Bocchus, king of Mauretania. (Sall. Jug. 101, 105, 107.) [Bocchus.]

VONONES, the name of two kings of Parthia. [Arsages XVIII., XXII.]

VOPISCUS, a Roman praenomen, signified a twin-child, who was born safe, while the other twin died before birth. (Plin. H.N. vii. 6. s. 10; Solin. 1.; Val. Max. Epit. De Nominatione Rationes, pp. 878, 879, ed. Torrenius.) Like many other ancient Roman praenomina, it was afterwards used as a cognomen.

VOPISCUS, FLAVIUS, Syracusian, one of the six "Scriptores Historiae Augustae" [see Capitolinus], probably the latest, since he refers directly to three, Trebellius Pollio, Julius Capitolinus, and Aelius Lampridius, the last being very probably the same with Spartanus [Lampridius; Spartanus]. Volucius Gallicus, the sixth, is alike unknown and insignificant. The name of Vopiscus is prefixed to the biographies of, 1. Aurelianus; 2. Tacitus; 3. Florianus; 4. Probus; 5. The four tyrants, Firmus, Saturninus, Proculus and Bonoous; 6. Carus; 7. Numerianus; 8. Carinus; at this point he stops, declaring that DioCletian, and those who follow, demand a more elevated style of composition. Although we observe the same want of judgment in selecting, arranging, and combining his materials, which characterizes the other authors of this collection, yet he appears to have exercised considerable industry in consulting the Greek writers who had preceded him in the same department, in availing himself of the treasures of the Ulpius and other public libraries, and in examining the public records of different branches of the administration, and the private papers of various distinguished individuals, especially the journals and commentaries of the emperor Aurelianus. Considerable authority and interest are communicated to his narrative by the insertion of original letters written by Hadrianus, Valerianus, Claudius, Aurelianus, Zenobia, Tacitus, Probus, Carus, and other public characters, together with quotations from acts of the senate, and orations delivered on great occasions. From the epithe Syracusian we conclude that Vopiscus was by birth a Sicilian; he informs us that he undertook the task of writing the life of Aurelianus, at the suggestion and by the request of Junius Tiberianus, prefect of the city (about a.d. 291), who placed at his disposal a variety of important documents, and we find that the life of Curianus was written after the elevation of Constantius Chlorus to the rank of Caesar, that is, later than a.d. 292. For editions, translations, etc. see Capitolinus. [W.R.]

VOPISCUS, JULIUS CAESAR. [Casra, No. 10.]

VOPISCUS, P. MANLIUS, consul under Trajan, a.d. 114 with Q. Ninius Hasta. (Fasti.)

VOPISCUS, M. ANLIUS, a friend of the poet Statius. (Sili. i. 3.)

VOPISCUS, L. POMPEIUS or POPPAEUS, was consul successively with T. Virginius Rufus, a.d. 69. (Tac. Hist. i. 77.)

VORANUS, a chief mentioned by Horace, is said by the scholar to have been a freedman of Q. Lutatius Catulus. (Hor. Sat. i. 8. 39.)

VOTIE'NUS MONTANUS. [Montanus.]

UPIUS, (Ovius.) 1. A surname of Artemis, as the goddess assisting women in child-birth. (Callim. Hymn. in Deian. 240.)

2. The name of a mythical being said to have reared Artemis (Schol. ad Callim. l. c.), and who is mentioned by Virgil as one of the nymphs in her train. (Aen. xi. 532.) The masculine Upis is mentioned by Cicer (De Nat. Deor. iii. 29), as the father of Artemis.

3. A Hyperborean maiden, who together with Argo carried an offering, which had been vowed for the birth of Apollo and Artemis, to Eileithyia, at Delos. (Herod. iv. 35.)
4. A surname of Nemesis at Rhamnus. (Paus. i. 33. § 2.)

URBICA. 1. One of the Muses, a daughter of Zeus by Mnemosyne. (Hes. Theog. 78; Ov. Fast. v. 55.) The ancient bard Linus is called her son by Apollo (Hygin. Fab. 161), and Hymenaeus also is said to have been a son of Urania. (Catull. ixi. 2.) She was regarded, as her name indicates, as the Muse of Astronomy, and was represented with a celestial globe to which she points with her hand. (Hier. Mythol. Bilderd. p. 210.)

2. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys (Hes. Theog. 350), who also occurs as a nymph in the train of Persephone. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 424.)

3. A surname of Aphrodite, describing her as "the heavenly," or spiritual, to distinguish her from Aphrodite Pandemos. Plato represents her as a daughter of Uranus, begotten without a mother. (Sympos. p. 180; Xenoph. Sympos. 8. § 9.) Wine was not used in the libations offered to her. (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 101; Herod. i. 105; Suid. s. v. νεφαδία.)

URBICA. 1. One of the Muses, a daughter of Zeus by Mnemosyne, who was said to have been the mother of the poet Linus. (Hes. Theog. 78; Ov. Fast. v. 55.)

URBICA, MAGNIA. A considerable number of coins are extant in all the three metals, which exhibit on the obverse a female head with the legend MAGNIA (s. MAGN.) URBCA AUG., or, MAGNIAE URBCAE AUG., and on the reverse PUBICTIA AUG., with a woman seated and two boys standing by her side, or some of the ordinary types characteristic of the Auguste. To what epoch these medals ought to be assigned, has been a subject of lively controversy among numismatologists. By some they are believed to belong to the age of Maxentius, and Patin has pronounced that Urbica was his wife; others, again, maintain that she was married to Carus, while Stosch asserted that she was one of the numerous consorts of Carinus, bringing forward in support of this opinion a third brass, bearing on the obverse a male head with the words IMP. CARINUS AUG., and on the reverse the head of Urbica with MAGNIA URBCA AUG. If this piece were genuine it would at least establish the fact that Urbica was closely connected with the family of Carus; but unfortunately there is great reason to believe that it is a modern forgery, and consequently we are still left without sure information concerning an empress who is not named by any historian. (See Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 517.)

URBICUS, or more correctly ORBICUS, a writer on tactics. [ORBICUS.]

URBICUS, POMPRIUS, put to death by the emperor Claudius as one of the parties privy to Messalina's marriage with Silius. (Tac. Ann. xi. 33.)

URBICUS, PANOPION. [PANOPION.]

URGULA, NIA, a favourite of Livia, the mother of the emperor Tiberius. The empress had raised Urgula above the laws, says Tacitus, who gives two instances of her arrogance. When cited by L. Piso, to whom she owed a sum of money, to appear before the praetor, she refused to obey the summons; and on another occasion she would not appear in the senate to give evidence in a case, and a praetor had to be sent to examine her in her own house. She was the grandmother of Plautius Silvanus, to whom she sent a dagger when it was evident that he would be condemned to death on account of the murder of his wife in a. d. 24. (Tac. Ann. ii. 34, iv. 21, 22.)

URGULANILLA, PLAUITIA, one of the wives of the emperor Claudius. [PLAUTIA.]

C. URSAN'NIUS, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 197. (Liv. xxxii. 22.) In some editions of Livy the reading is C. Afranius. We do not meet with the name of Ursanius elsewhere.

URSEIUS FEROX. [FEROX.]

URSICINUS, or more correctly ORBICUS, a writer on tactics. [ORBICUS.]

URSICINUS, a poet, and an author of a collection of the works of the ancient writers on rhetoric. (Plut. De orat. 1029 b.)

URSUS, a son of Mars and Rhea Silvia. He was the first Latin who was trained for the fighting of wild beasts. (Livy. vii. 26.)

URSUS, a name given to some of the wild beasts which were kept in the Roman circus. (Plaut. Aul. 907.)

VULCA’NIUS. The Roman god of fire, whose name seems to be connected with fulgere, fulgur, and fulmen. His worship was of considerable political importance at Rome, for a temple is said to have been erected to him close by the comitium as early as the time of Romulus and Tatius, in which the two kings used to meet and settle the affairs of the state, and near which the popular assembly was held. (Dionys. ii. 50, vi. 67; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 47.)

Tatius is reported to have established the worship of Vulcan along with that of Vesta, and Romulus to have dedicated to him a quadriga after his victory over the Fidenates, and to have set up a statue of himself near the temple. (Dionys. ii. 54; Plut. Rom. 24.) According to others the temple was built by Romulus himself, who also planted near it the sacred lotus-tree which still existed in the days of Pliny. (H. N. xvi. 44; P. Victor, Reg. Urb. iv.) These circumstances, and what is related of the lotus-tree, shows that the temple of Vulcan, like that of Vesta, was regarded as a central point of the whole state, and hence it was perhaps not without a meaning that subsequently the temple of Concord was built within the same district. (Liv. iv. 46, xi. 19, xxxvi. 46.) The most ancient festival in honour of Vulcan seems to have been the Fornacalia or Furnalia, he being the god of furnaces (Isidor. xix. 6. 2; Fest. p. 89); but his great festival was called Vulcanalia, and was celebrated on the 23rd of August. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) The Roman poets transfer all the stories which are related of the Greek Hephaestus to their own Vulcan, the two divinities having in the course of time been completely identified. [L. S.]

VULCATIUS. [Volcatius.]

VULCATIUS GALLICA’NUS. [Gallica’nus.]

VULSO, the name of a distinguished patrician family of the Manlia gens.

1. (CN.?) MANLIUS VULSO, consul b. c. 474 with L. Furius Medullinus Fusus, marched against the Velientes, and concluded a forty years' truce with them without fighting, in consequence of which he obtained the honour of an ovation on his return to Rome.

In the following year (b. c. 473) Manlius Vulso and his colleague were accused by the tribune Cn. Genucius, because they had not carried into effect the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius Viscellinus; but the accusation fell to the ground in consequence of the assassination of Genucius. (Dionys. ix. 36–38; Liv. i. 54; comp. Genucius, No. 2.) In Livy the praenomen of Manlius Vulso is Caius, but most modern writers give him the praenomen of Aulus, and suppose him to be the same as the decemvir [No. 2], who is called Aulus in the Capitoline Fasti. But since No. 4, who is represented as the son of No. 2, was consul tribune for the third time as late as b. c. 397, we can hardly suppose that Nos. 1 and 2 are the same person, since in that case the son would have held the consul tribunate 77 years after the consulship of his father. We may therefore conclude that the consul of b. c. 474 was the grandfathers, and the decemvir the father of Nos. 3 and 4. If so the praenomen of the consul would be Caius, as the decemvir is called in the Capitoline Fasti Cn. f. P. n.

2. A. MANLIUS CN. P. N. VULSO, probably son of No. 2, was one of the ambassadors sent to Athens in b. c. 454, for the purpose of gaining information about the laws of Solon and the other Greek states, and in b. c. 451 he was a member of the first decemvirates. (Liv. iii. 31, 33; Dionys. x. 54.)

3. M. MANLIUS (A. F. CN. N.) Vulso, probably son of No. 2, was consul tribune b. c. 420. (Liv. iv. 44.)

4. A. MANLIUS A. F. CN. N. VULSO CAPITOLINUS, son of No. 2, thrice consul tribune, in b. c. 405, 402 and 397. (Fasti Capit.; Liv. iv. 61, v. 8, 16.) In b. c. 394 he was one of the ambassadors sent to Delphi to present a golden crater as a present to Apollo, but was captured on his voyage thither by the Liparaean pirates. They were however Released by Timaiatheus, the chief magistrate of the island, in that year, and allowed to prosecute their voyage. (Liv. v. 28.)

5. L. MANLIUS A. F. P. N. VULSO LONGUS, was consul b. c. 256 with M. Attilius Regulus, and along with his colleague invaded Africa. Their victory over the Carthaginians by sea, and their successful campaign in Africa are fully related in the life of Attilius Regulus. (Regulus, No. 3.) Vulso returned to Italy at the fall of the year with half of the army, and obtained the honour of a triumph. (Polyb. i. 26–29; Zonar. viii. 12, 13; Oros. iv. 8.) In b. c. 250 Vulso was consul a second time with C. Attilius Regulus Serranus, and with his colleague commenced the siege of Lilybaeum. For details see Regulus, No. 4. (Polyb. i. 39, 41–48; Zonar. viii. 15; Oros. iv. 10.)

6. L. MANLIUS VULSO, one of the unsuccessful patrician candidates for the consulship for b. c. 216, when C. Terentius Varro was elected. (Liv. xxii. 35.)

7. P. MANLIUS VULSO, praetor b. c. 210, received Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xxiv. 23, xxvii. 6, 7.)

8. CN. MANLIUS CN. F. L. N. VULSO, was co-rule aedile B.C. 197, praetor with Sicily as his province B.C. 195, and one of the triumvirs for founding a Latin colony in the territory of Thurii in B.C. 193, in which year he was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship. (Liv. xxxiii. 25, 42, 43, xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 9, 10.) In B.C. 189 Cr. Manlius Vulso was consul with M. Fulvius Nobilior. He was sent into Asia in order to conclude the peace, which his successor Scipio Asiaticus had made with Antiochus, and to arrange the affairs of Asia. He arrived at Ephesus in the spring of B.C. 189, and as he was anxious to obtain both glory and booty he resolved to attack the Gallograeci or Galatians in Asia Minor without waiting for any formal instructions from the senate. He carried on the war with success against them, conquered in battle the three chief tribes into which they were divided, called the Tolistobogi, Tectosagi and Troadini, and compelled them to submit unconditionally to the Roman power. After bringing this war to an end by the middle of the autumn, he led his troops into winter quarters. The Gallograeci had by their many conquests in Asia acquired immense wealth, a large portion of which now fell into the hands of Vuls and his army. (Liv. xxxviii. 12—27; Polyb. xxii. 16—22; Zonar. ix. 29; Appian, xxxi. 35—37.)

Manlius Vulso remained in Asia as proconsul in the following year, B.C. 188, when he formally concluded the treaty with Antiochus and settled the affairs of Asia. In the middle of the summer he crossed over from Asia into Europe, marched through Thrace into Macedonia and Epirus, and passed the winter at Apollonia. In his march through Thrace his army suffered much from the heat and the attacks of the Thracians, and he lost a considerable part of the booty he had obtained in Asia. He reached Rome in B.C. 187 and demanded a triumph, which he obtained with difficulty in consequence of the opposition of the majority of the ten commissioners, who had been appointed by the senate to conclude the peace with Antiochus in conjunction with Vuls. The triumph of Vuls was a brilliant one, but his campaign in Asia had been a perilous influence upon the morals of his country. He had allowed his army every kind of licence, and his soldiers had grown into the habit of the luxuries of the East. (Liv. xxxviii. 37—41, 44—50, xxxix. 6, 7; Polyb. xxii. 24—27; Appian, Syr. 42, 43.) In B.C. 184 Vuls was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship. (Liv. xxxix. 40.)

9. L. MANLIUS VULSO, the brother of No. 8, was praetor B.C. 197 with Sicily as his province, and served under his brother in Asia in B.C. 189 and 188. (Liv. xxxiii. 27, 28, xxxviii. 20; Polyb. xxii. 25, 26.)

10. A. MANLIUS CN. P. L. N. VULSO, the brother of Nos. 8 and 9, was consul B.C. 178 with M. Junicus Brutus. He received Gaul as his province, and without consulting the senate marched against the Istri, but was unsuccessful in his campaign. At the commencement of the following year he and his collague Brutus renewed the war, and with better fortune; but they were prevented from bringing it to a conclusion by the arrival of the new consul C. Claudius Pulcher. (Liv. xii. 1—5; 10, 11.)

VULTEIUS. [VOLTIEUS.]
VULTU'RCIUS. [VOLTURCIUS.]

XANTHUS.

XANTHE (Ξανθή), one of the daughters of Oceanus. (Hes. Theog. 356; Virg. Georg. iv. 336.) Xanthus was a king of Crete.

XANTHICLES (Ξανθικλῆς), an Achaean, was chosen to be one of the generals of the Cyrean Greeks in the place of his countryman Socrates, when the latter, with Clearchus and three other colleagues, had been treacherously arrested by Tissaphernes, B.C. 401. When the army had reached Cotyora, a court was held to inquire into the conduct of the generals, and Xanthicles was one of those who were fined for a deficiency in the cargoes of the ships, which had brought the soldiers from Trapezus, and of which he was a commissioner. (Xen. Anab. iii. 1 § 7, v. 8 § 1.)

XANTHIPPE, mythological. [PLURON.]
XANTHIPPE (Ξανθιππη), wife of Socrates.

[SOCRATES.]

XANTHIPPUS (Ξανθίππος). 1. One of the sons of Melas, who revolted against Oenetus, and were slain by Tydeus. (Apollod. i. 8 § 5.)

2. A son of Deiphontes. (Paus. ii. 28 § 3.)

3. A hero who had an heromum at Daulia, in Phocis. (Paus. iv. 4 § 7.) [L. S.]

XANTHIPPUS (Ξανθίππος). 1. The son of Ariphron and father of Pericles. In B.C. 490, he impeached Miltiades on his return from his unsuccessful expedition against the island of Paros. In B.C. 484 he left Athens together with the other inhabitants on the approach of Xerxes, and in the following year (B.C. 479) he succeeded Themistocles as commander of the Athenian fleet. He commanded the Athenians at the decisive battle of Mycale, which was fought on the coast of Ionia on the same day as the battle of Platea, September, B.C. 470. The Grecian fleet then sailed to the Hellespont; and when they found that the bridge had been broken down, Lestychides and the Peloponnesians returned home forthwith. Xanthippus, however, remained with the Athenian fleet in order to subdue the Chersonese, where several of the Athenians had previously held considerable property. The Persians threw themselves into the town of Scione, which Xanthippus laid siege, and which was obliged to surrender early in the following spring (A.C. 478). The Persian general Artayctes attempted to escape, but was overtaken and abandoned by Xanthippus to the vengeance of the inhabitants of Eleusis, who crucified him. [AR TAYCTES.] Xanthippus then returned to Athens with his fleet. (Herod. vi. 131, 136; Plut. Them. 10; Herod. viii. 131, ix. 114—120.)

2. The elder of the two legitimate sons of Pericles. For an account of him, as well as for the authorities, see PARALUS, the name of his younger brother.

3. The Lacedaemonian, who commanded the Carthaginians against Regulus, is spoken of in the life of the latter. [REGULUS, p. 643, b.] Xanthippus appears to have left Carthage a short time after his victory over Regulus.

XANTHIUS (Ξάνθιος). 1. A son of Trirops and onions. He was a king of the Pelagians at Argo, and afterwards settled in the island of Lesbos. (Hygin. Fab. 145; Diod. v. 81; Callin. Hygn. in Del. 41.)

2. A son of Phaeon, and a brother of Theon, was slain by Diomedes in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. v. 152.)

3. A son of Erymanthus, and father of Psopis. (Paus. viii. 24. § 1.)

4. The last king of Thebes, was slain in single combat by Melanthos or Andropompus. (Strab. ix. p. 393; Paus. ix. 5. § 5.)

5. One of the sons of Aegyptus. (Hygin. Foh. 220.)

The name Xanthus is also given to some horses in Greek mythology, as to one of Achilles (Hom. Il. xvi. 149), and of Hector (viii. 185). [L. S.]

XANTHUS (Ξάνθος), literary. 1. A lyric poet, older than Stesichorus, who mentioned him in one at least of his poems, and who borrowed from him in some of them. Among the rest, Stesichorus composed his poem entitled Orestea (Ὀρεστεία), in imitation of Xanthus. We also learn from Megalexides, on the authority of Steisichorus himself, that Xanthus represented Hercules as equipped, not in the dress and arms ascribed to him by Stesichorus and the later poets, but in the fashion in which he is described by Homer. (Megalexid. ap. Ath. xii. p. 516, a; Klein, Steisich. Frag. xxviii. p. 83; on the general subject of the mention of the older poets by their successors, see Klein, p. 7.)

Xanthus is also mentioned by Aelian (V. H. iv. 26), who quotes a statement regarding Electra, the daughter of Agamemnon, which is no doubt taken from the Orestea. Clinton places Xanthus about b. c. 650, before Peisander, and 45 years before Stesichorus. No fragments of his poetry survive. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 159; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Diälekstein, vol. ii. pt. 2, pp. 82, 83; Clinton F. H. vol. i. p. 365.)

2. A celebrated Lydian historian, older than Herodotus, who is said to have been indebted to the work of Xanthus (Ephor. ap. Ath. xii. p. 515, ἤροδουτος τὰς ἀφορμὰς θεωρῶν; the statement about his influence on Herodotus is questioned by Dahlmann, de Herod. p. 121.). Suidas makes him the son of Candaules, and native of Sardis; but there is reason to believe that these statements rest on no good authority. Strabo (xiii. p. 628, a.) mentions him in the following terms:—"And Xanthus, the ancient historian, is said to have been a Lydian; but whether he was of Sardis, we do not know." Suidas fixes his date "at the taking of Sardis," which, if there be any truth in it, must refer to the taking of Sardis by the Ionians in b. c. 499. This date, however, appears to be rather too high, when compared with the mention of Xanthus by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (de Jud. Thuc. p. 818), among the writers who were "a little older than the Peloponnesian war, and whose time reached down to that of Thucydidès." There is another indication of the date of Xanthus, proving, if the quotation be genuine, that he wrote, or continued to write, his history after b. c. 464; for Strabo (i. p. 49, c.) tells us that he mentioned a great drought in the reign of Artaxerxes, who came to the throne in b. c. 464. It is therefore the opinion of critics, either that the date given by Suidas must be that of the birth of Xanthus, which is a most unusual sense of γεγονός in Suidas, or else that the passage has been corrupted by a transcriber, who accidentally repeated the word Ζάρδεως. (The passage is Ξάνθος, Καναδάλων, Λυδὸς ἐκ Ζάρδεων ισ- τορίας γεγονός ἐπὶ τῆς Ἀλώσεως Ζάρδεων.) This is the suggestion of Creuzer, who proposes to substitute Ἀθηνόνων for Ζάρδεων, thus referring the time of Xanthus to the taking of Athens by Xerxes, in b. c. 480; but, though this correction may give a truer date for Xanthus, it can hardly be accepted as being what Suidas wrote.

A far more important question, than this difference of twenty years or so, is that of the genuineness of the Four Books of Lydian History (Ἀθηναία καὶ Σιθαλία τῷ Σεύτορι[:Σεύτων]), which the ancients possessed, as well as an epitome of them by a certain Menippos (Diog. Laërt. vi. 101, [Μενίππος] ὁ γράφας τὰ περὶ Δοῦνος καὶ Ξάνθουν ἔπειταμο,νος), and of which some considerable fragments have come down to us. The genuineness of the work was questioned by some of the ancient grammarians themselves. The most important testimony on this subject is in the passage above cited from Athenaeus, who quotes a statement as made "by Xanthus the Lydian, or by the author of the Histories ascribed to him, namely Dionysius Scytobrachion, as Artemon of Cassandreia says (ἐν τῷ περὶ συναγωγής [Ἀναγωγῆς Ἐπιθέων]), not knowing that Ephorus the historian mentions him, &c." It will be seen that the reply of Athenaeus to the statement of Artemon only proves, what no one doubts, the existence and time of Xanthus, not the genuineness of the work ascribed to him. An argument in support of the genuineness of the work has been drawn by the exalted terms of praise in which Dionysius of Halicarnassus speaks of Xanthus (ι. οἰστρακή πολλαίων εἰ καὶ τις ἄλλος ἔμετρον αὐτῷ, τῆς δὲ πατρίως καὶ βελαιωτικῆς τοιούτου ὑποδείκτης νομισμάτος). But here we have no reference to the genuineness of the work, the tacit assumption of which by such a writer as Dionysius can hardly be set up as a strong argument in reply to the positive critical judgment of Artemon; especially as instances might be quoted (see Müller, loc. inf. cit.) in which Dionysius has made similar references to other works, which more ancient writers have pronounced to be spurious; and moreover there is a passage in which Dionysius himself makes a passing allusion to the doubts respecting the genuineness of certain ancient writers, in a matter which seems to imply that he did not care to enter minutely into such questions; and it is very probable, when we consider the nature of the fragments which have come down to us under the name of Xanthus, as well as the character of the historical work of Dionysius himself, that the admiration of the latter for the former was rather excited by his richness in mythical stories, than caused by any sound critical estimate of his value as a trustworthy historian. Among modern scholars, Creuzer, in his edition of the fragments of Xanthus, has maintained the genuineness of the work, while Welcker has constructed an elaborate argument against it (Seebod's Archä. 1830, pp. 70, fol.), a summary of which is given by C. Müller (loc. inf. cit.) who accepts the conclusion of Welcker. It is certain that much of the matter in the extant fragments is spurious; and the probability appears to be that the work from which they are taken is the production of an Alexandrian grammarian, founded upon the genuine work of Xanthus. C. Müller has pointed out those passages which, in his opinion, are most probably portions of the original work. They are of great value. A work on the Magian religion (μαγιαδ) XENARCHUS.

was also ascribed to Xanthus (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. p. 185; Dio. Laërt. Praef. 2); but the Life of Empedocles, which is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 63) as the work of Xanthus, should probably be referred to another writer of the same name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 159; Vossi-

XENAUS (Ξεναῦς), the architect who super-

XENAGORAS (Ξεναγόρας), a Greek historian quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 72), from whom we learn that Xenagoras related that Ulysses and Circe had three sons, Romus, Antius, and Ardea, who founded the three cities which were called by their names. Macrobius also (v. 19) refers to the third book of the history of Xenagoras. If he was the same person as the Xenagoras, the father of the historian Nymphis, he must have lived in the early part of the second century B.C. [Nymphis.] Xenagoras wrote a work entitled Πάλαιαν (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iv. 262, 264; Harpocrat, s. v. Κραναλέα) and another on is-

XENARCHUS (Ξεναρχός), an Achaean, who was sent to Rome as an ambassador by the Achaenians, for the purpose of renewing their alliance with the Romans, and of superintending the progress of the negotiations with reference to the Lacedaemonians. He was surprised into affixing his signature to the agreement drawn up on the latter subject at the suggestion of Flamininus. (Polvy, xxiv. 4.) He found means to enter into friendly relations with Perseus; and it was when he was general of the Achaenians (b.c. 174), that Perseus got his letter about the runaway slaves of the Achaenians laid before the assembly. (Liv. xli. 28.) [C. P. M.]

XENARCHUS (Ξεναρχός), literary. 1. A son of Sophron, and, like his father, a celebrated writer of minae. He flourished during the Rhegan War (b.c. 399—389), at the court of Dionysius, who is said to have employed him to ridicule the Rhedians, as cowards, in his poems. (Phot. and Suid. s. v. 'Πέρηκς.) His minae are mentioned, together with those of Sophron, by Aristoph. (Poet. 2.) They were in the Doric dialect. (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. s. a. 393; Sophron.)

2. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle

Comedy, who was contemporary with Timociides, and lived as late as the time of Alexander the Great. The following titles of his plays have been preserved, with some considerable fragments: Βουταλίων, Διθυόμενος, Πεντάθλος, Πορφύριος, Πράσων, Μυκάτη, Πραγμάτεια, Τυντιος, Χιλιάριος, Ερωτήματα, Στρατιωτικός. (Suid. s. v.; Ath. passim.) Fabricius and others have confounded him with the mimograph, who lived sixty or seventy years earlier, and wrote in a different dialect. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 505; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. Intro. p. xiv.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 434, vol. iii. pp. 614—625, Editio Minor, pp. 811—815.)

3. Of Seleucia in Cilicia, a Peripatetic philosopher and grammarian, in the time of Strabo, who heard him. Xenarchus left home early, and devoted himself to the profession of teaching, first at Alexandria, afterwards at Athens, and last at Rome, where he enjoyed the friendship of Areius, and afterwards of Augustus; and he was still living, in old age and honour, when Strabo wrote. (Strab. xiv. p. 670.) He is also mentioned by Simplicius (de Coelo, 1), and by Alexander Aphrodisianus (de Anim. p. 154; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 510, Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 534.) [P. S.]

XENARES (Ξενάρης), a Spartan, one of the ephores who came into office in b.c. 421. Being opposed to the truce which had been made with Athens for fifty years, he and his colleague Cleobulus intrigued with the Boeotians and Corinthians to reconstruct the Lacedaemonian league, and to strengthen it by the addition of Argos. If this could have been effected, Sparta would have had nothing to fear from the renewal of war with Athens: but the scheme failed in consequence of the secrecy necessary in its preliminary steps. (Thuc. v. 36—38.) Xenares, a Lacedaemonian, son of Cnidis, is mentioned as commander of the army at the Trachinian Heraclae in b.c. 420, when the colonists were assailed by the forces of several neighbouring tribes, and were defeated with great loss, Xenares himself being among the slain. He appears to have been a different person from the ephor of the preceding year. (Thuc. v. 51.)

XENIA (Ξενία), and the masculan Xenia are epithets of Athis and Zeus, describing them as presiding over the laws of hospitality, and protecting strangers. (Latt. Hospital.; Paus. iii. 11, in fin.; Hom. Od. xiv. 389; Cic. ad Q. Frat. ii. 12.) [L. S.]

XENIADES (Ξενιάδης). 1. A Greek philosopher, a native of Corinth. The age when he flourished is uncertain. The little that we know of him is derived from Sextus Empiricus, who represents him as holding the most ultra sceptical opinions, and maintaining that all notions are false, and that there is absolutely nothing true in the universe (Adv. Math. vii. 389, 399.) What Sextus knew of him seems to have been derived from Democritus (ib. vii. 53). He more than once couples him with Xenophanes (Pyrrh. Hyp. ii. 18, adv. Math. vii. 40). Perhaps his representations may be as exaggerated in the one case as in the other (comp. Xenophanes).

2. A Corinthian, who became the purchaser of Diocles the Cynic, when he was taken by pirates and sold as a slave (see Vol. i. p. 1021; Dio. Laërt. vi. 74.) [C. P. M.]

XENIAS (Ξενιάς). 1. A Parrhasian, was a commander of mercenaries in the service of Cyrus the younger, whom he accompanied, with a body of 300 men, to court, when he was summoned thither by his father, Dareius Nothus, in b.c. 405. After the return of Cyrus to western Asia, we find Xenias commanding for him the garrisons in the several Ionian states, and with the greater portion of these troops, viz. 4000 hoplites, he joined the prince in his expedition against Artaxerxes, leaving behind only a sufficient number of men to guard the citadels. At Tarsus a large body of his soldiers and of those of Pasion the Megarian quitted their standards for that of Clearchus; and, Cyrus having afterwards allowed the latter to retain them, Xenias and Pasion abandoned the army at Myriandrus, and sailed away to Greece. (Xen. Anab. i. 1 § 2, 2 §§ 1, 3, 10, 3 § 7, 4 §§ 7, 8.) [Pasion, N. 1.] 2. An Elean, of great wealth, who was a proxenus of Sparta, and was also connected by private ties with King Agis. On the expiration of his public service in 400, during the war between Sparta and Eleus, Xenias and his oligarchic partizans made an attempt to bear down their adversaries by force, and to subject their country to the Lacedaemonians. Sailing out into the streets, they murdered several of their opponents, and among them a man whom they mistook for Thrasylaeus, the leader of the democratic party. Thrasylaeus, however, who had fallen asleep under the influence of wine, soon rallied his friends, defeated the oligarchs in a battle, and drove the chief men among them into exile. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2 §§ 27, 28; Paus. iii. 8; Diod. xiv. 17) [Thrasylaeus. [E.E.] XENION (Xe'ion), a Greek historian, wrote on Crete, and on Italy, and probably on other countries. (Etym. s. e. 'Aprikos; Macrobr. Sac. i. 9; Schol. ad Lysipp. 1214; Steph. Byz. s. e. Elephas, Kaukous, et alibi; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 509, ed. Westermann.) XENOCELEIA (Xe'noleia), a Delphian priestess, who refused to give an oracular response to Heracles before he was purified of the murder of Iphitus; but she was compelled by him, for he threatened to take away her tripod. (Paus. x. 13 § 4.) [L. S.] XENOCEIDES (Xe'nokleidês). I. A Corinthian, the son of Euthycles, was sent in command of the Corinthian fleet against Corcyra (v. c. 452). For an account of his operations the reader is referred to Thucydides (i. 46, &c.). In v. c. 425 he was sent out to Ambrycia in command of 300 heavy-armed soldiers. The troops made their way with considerable difficulty by land. (Thucyd. iii. 114.) 2. A Chalcidian, who, after the expulsion of Euthymidas, assumed the direction of affairs, in conjunction with Mictio. When Chalcid was threatened by Antioclis and the Aetolians, Xenoceides and Mictio procured help from Eretria and Carystus. When the Achaians had resolved to send aid to the Chalcidians, Xenoceides succeeded in conducting the troops into the town before they were intercepted by Antioclis. However, when Antioclis arrived at Aulis, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mictio and Xenoceides, who were devoted to the Roman interest, the Chalcidians opened their gates to him. On the approach of Antioclis the partizans of the Romans retired from the city. (Liv. xxxv. 38, 50, 51.) [C. P. M.] XEU'NOCLES (Xe'noklês), a Spartan, was one of those who, under Herippidas, were sent out to supercede Lysander and his colleagues as counselors to Agesilus in his Asicite expedition, B. C. 395. He was a companion of Xenocles with other officer was appointed by the king to the command of the cavalry. When Agesilus, having been recalled to Greece, in B. C. 394, was on his march through Thessaly, he sent Xenocles and Scythes to Larissa to propose terms of peace; but the Larissaeans arrested the two envoys, who however were soon restored under a treaty. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 20; Diod. xiv. 60; Plut. Ages. 16. [E.E.] XE'NOCLES (Xe'noklês), literary. 1. 2. There were two Athenian tragic poets of this name, of the family of Carcius; the one the son of the elder Carcius, and the father of the younger Carcius; and the other the son of the younger Carcius, and therefore the grandson of the elder Xenocles. [Carcius.] Thus it appears that this family maintained some celebrity on the tragic stage of Athens. Xenocles also wrote a comic poet as long as the artistic duration of the family of Aeschylus. Apart from this claim upon our attention, the history of this family has exercised the critical skill of some of the greatest scholars of the day, on account of the interesting, but obscure allusions made to the members of it by the Athenian comic poets and other writers. Indeed, to have developed a consistent and probable account of the family of Carcius out of the few difficult passages of Aristophanes, Plato, and Pherecrates, in which they were attacked, and out of the mixture of truth and nonsense contained in the scholia on Aristophanes, in Snuda, and a few other ancient writers, may be regarded as a triumph of criticism, the merit of which is due to Meineke, to whose investigation some valuable particulars have been added by Welcker, Kayser, and Wagner. The complicated minuteness of the question forbids the attempt, an unthorough task, to discuss it fully: we can only give the general result. Carcius the elder, who was about contemporary with Aeschylus, had three sons, according to Aristophanes and some of the grammarians, or four, according to Pherecrates and others of the grammarians. (Aristoph. Vesp. 1493, 1500; Schol. ad loc.; Pherecr. op. Schol. Aristoph. i. c., as amended by Meineke; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 1263, Poc. 778, Ran. 86.) The discrepancy between two comic poets who were contemporary with the family, respecting the number of the sons of Carcius, is a curious circumstance; and we are inclined to suspect that some joke is contained in the passage of Pherecrates, who first calls them three, and then makes another person reply "No! they are not three, but four." There is also a great diversity as to the names of the sons of Carcius. (Schol. ad Aristoph. ii. c.) Besides the names of Xenocles and Xenotimus, on which all the scholiasts are agreed, they mention Xenarchus, Xenocleitus, Diotimus, which is perhaps a mere variation of Xenotimus, and Datis, which is not a Greek name at all, but appears to be a nickname applied to Xenocles, on account of certain faults in his language, the appellation being derived from the well-known story about the blunder made by Datis, the Persian general, when he attempted to speak Greek, which gave rise to the term δαίμων (Schol. ad Aristoph. Poc. 289, 290). Of these sons of Carcius two (or three) were engaged as choreutae in acting their father's dramas, in which great prominence was given to the orchestric element; and their dancing is ridiculed by Aristophanes (Poc. 773—790, Vesp. 1497, s. &c.), and Pherecrates (i. c.). Xenocles alone was a tragic poet; and in this character he is several times attacked by Aristophanes. He appears to have been of a mean personal appearance; for, in one passage, Aristophanes distinguishes him from his brothers thus (Vesp. 1500), ὁ σμικράτατος, ἐς τὴν τραγῳδίαν νος, and, in another passage, among other examples of the likeness between poets and their works, he says (Thesm. 169), "but Xenocles, who is ugly, makes ugly poetry" (ἑν κακὸς κακὰς νοεῖ). In his rapid survey of the poets who had survived Sophocles and Euripides, he dismisses Xenocles in this pithy manner (Ran. 82).

"Ο δὲ ξενοκλῆς; Δ. ἐξὸλοιτο νῆ Δία.

There is another and a very important passage, in which the allusion to Xenocles is less apparent, but which, when properly understood, contains a very refined and ingenious attack upon him and his drama entitled Lycymnus (Nub. 1259, foll.; the correct explanation is given by some of the Scholiasts, and by Meineke and others, as quoted below).

In these allusions we have sufficient materials for the date of Xenocles; for it appears, from the passage last quoted, that he had met with a signal defeat in a dramatic contest, shortly before the exhibition of the Clouds (n. c. 423 or 422), and the mention of him in the Frogs shows that he was still alive in n. c. 405. In Ol. 91, n. c. 415, he obtained a victory over Euripides (Aelian, V. II. ii. 8; the date being corrected from Diod. xii. 82, and Schol. ad Aristoph. Vesp. 1317). On this occasion each poet exhibited a tetralogy; that of Xenocles consisting of the tragedies Oedipus, Lycom, Bacchae, and the satyr play Athanas; that of Euripides, of the tragedies Alexander, Palamedes, Troades, and the satyr drama Sisyphus. The indignation of Aelian at this judgment shows the low estimate in which Xenocles was held by the ancients; but it is always difficult to judge how far such estimates are anything more than mere echoes of the opinions passed by the Athenian comic poets on their contemporaries. There are, however, other grounds for believing that the poetry of Xenocles was very indifferent; that it resembled, in fact, the worse parts of Euripides. His sophistical declarations appear to be alluded to in one passage of Aristophanes (Thesm. 440); and the scholiast on another passage (Ran. 86) tells us that his poetry was rude and allegorical. The impurity of his language has been already mentioned. In another passage of Aristophanes (Poc. 792), and in a fragment of the comic poet Plato (Sophist, ap. Schol. Aristoph. l. c.), he is designated by the appellations μηχανοθέφας and δωδεκαμήχας, which refer, without doubt, to the unnatural construction of his plots, in which complicated devices and sudden surprises (the Deus ex machina for example) were employed to produce the result which ought to have been effected by the natural development of the drama itself.

No fragments of the plays of Xenocles have come down to us, except the parody of a few words of the Lycymnus, which is supposed to be contained in the passage of the Clouds referred to above.

Respecting the younger Xenocles no particulars are recorded, except the fact of his being the son of Carcinus II, and the express distinction made between him and the elder Xenocles by a Scholiast on Aristophanes (Ran. 86).

The following genealogical table has been constructed by Meineke to exhibit the probable relations of the members of the family. The three persons in the left hand column were not literary persons, and therefore nothing has been said of them in this article.

that either Plutarch or the author of the epigram has made a mistake respecting the country of Xenocrates. For this reason we must not overlook the possibility, suggested by Jacobs (Anainde. in Auth. Graec. vol. 1. pt. 1. p. 240), that the river and bridge and mysteries referred to in the epigram may have been in Rhodes and not in Attica.

2. A maker of fictile vases, three of four works, in an antique and beautiful style, are preserved in different collections (Mus. Blauks, 24 - 26; Bulletin. Archaeol. 1840, p. 128; Ger-
Mus. in Berlin, pl. i, and Neureuterns antik.
Denkmüller, No. 1662, p. 26). There is another vase by the same maker in the Pinacothek at Munich, which is remarkable for not being painted: it has simply the artist's name inscribed upon it, a yellow band, in the following manner: —

+—ΣΕΝΟΚΡΕΣΙ—ΕΡΩΦΕΝ.

(R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schor, pp. 62, 63, 2d ed.)

XENOCRATES (Ξενοκράτης), historical. 1.
Brother of Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum. He was victor in the chariot race at the Pythian games in B.C. 494. His son Thrasylus seems to have acted as charioteer on the occasion. Pindar's sixth Pythian ode is addressed to him on the occasion.

2. A Theban Boeotarch, a contemporary of Epaminondas. Before the battle of Leuctra, at the request of Epaminondas, he sent to Lebadas for the shield of Aristomenes, which the oracle of Trophoniass had directed them to procure, and suspended it as so to be visible to the Lacedaemonians, most of whom knew it. (Paus. iv. 32, § 6, comp. ix. 13, § 6.)

[C. P. M.]

XENOCRATES (Ξενοκράτης), the philosopher, was a native of Chalcedon (Cic. Acad. i. 4; Athen. xii. p. 530, d.; Stob. Eel. Phys. i. 3; Suid. s. v.; comp. Strabo, xii. p. 566, b. He is called a Chalcedonian only through a clerical 430 &c.) According to the most probable calculation (Diog. Laërt. iv. 14; comp. Censorin. c. 15; Wynperse, p. 6, &c.) he was born OL. 26. 1 (n. c. 396), and died OL. 116. 3 (n. c. 314) at the age of 62. He is stated to have attached himself first to Aeschines the Socratic (Athen. ix. p. 507, c), and afterwards, while still a youth, to Plato.
(Diog. Laërt. iv. 6.) His close connection with Plato is indicated (to pass over insignificant or untrustworthy stories in Diog. Laërt., &c., see Wyn-perse, p. 15, &c., by the account that he accompanied him to Syracuse. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 6, &c.)
After the death of Plato he betook himself, with Aristotle, to Hermias, tyrant of Atarneus and Assus (Strab. xii. p. 619), and, after his return to Athens, was repeatedly sent on embassies to Philip of Macedonia, and at a later time to Antipater (OL. 114. 3), during the Lamian war. (Diog. Laërt.
iv. 8, 9, &c. Interpr.) The want of quick apprehension and natural grace (Diog. Laërt. iv. 6; Plut. Cony.
Procop. p. 141) he compensated by persevering and thorough-going industry (Diog. Laërt. iv. 6, 11, comp. Plut. de rege Rha. cur. p. 47, e), pure benevolence (Diog. Laërt. iv. 10; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 39), purity of morals (Diog. Laërt. iv. 7; Plut. Comp.
Cimin. c. Lucullo, c. 1; Cic. de Off. i. 30; Valer.
Max. ii. 10), unselshiness (Diog. Laërt. iv. 8, &c.; Cic. Tusc. v. 32; see Menng. on Diog. Laërt.), and a moral earnestness, which compelled esteem and trust even from the Athenians of his own age (Diog.
Laërt. iv. 7; Cic. ad Att. i. 15; Plut. de Adultat.
at. Merc. discr. p. 71, e). Yet even he experienced the fickleness of popular favour, and being too poor to pay the protection-money (metolos), is said to have been saved only by the courage of the chariot (Plut. Flamin. c. 12, X. Orat. Vitae, 7; but compare Phoecian, c. 29). Even revenue have been bought by Demetrius Phalerus, and then emancipated. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 14.) He became president of the Academy even before the death of Speusippus, who was bowed down by sickness, and occupied that post for twenty-five years. (Id.
iv. 14, comp. 3.)

If we consider that Aristotle and Theophrastus went upon the doctrines of Xenocrates (Diog.
Laërt. v. 25, 47), that men like Panaceius and Cicero entertained a high regard for him (Cic. de Fin. iv. 28, Acad. i. 4), we must not dream of being able, even in any degree, to estimate completely and accurately his mind or the philosophical direction which it took. How he strove to take himself master of the knowledge of his age, and to establish his own fundamental doctrines or those of Plato, by applying them to particular cases, we see by the titles of his treatises, bare as they have come down to us. With a more compre-prehensive work on Dialectic (της περι το διαλεγμένα πραγμάτειας βιβλία δ’) there were connected separate treatises on science, on scientificness (περι ἐπιστήμης α’, περι ἐπιστημονίας α’), on divisions (διαίρεσις) γ’, on genera and species (περι γενόν καὶ εἴδους α’), on ideas (περὶ ιδέων), on the opposite (περὶ τοῦ ἐναντίου), and others, to which the work probably went, as we have mention quoted. With a more general ethical treatise on happiness (περὶ εὐδοκίας β’, ib. 12), and on virtue (περὶ ἀρετής β’, ib.) there were connected separate books on individual virtues, on the voluntary, &c. (ibid.) His four books on royalty he had addressed to Alexander (στοιχεῖα πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον περὶ βασιλείας δ’; comp. Plut. adi. Colot. p. 1126, d.). Besides these he had written treatises on the State (περὶ πολιτείας α’, Diog. Laërt. iv. 12; πολιτικάς α’, ib. 13), on the power of law (περὶ δικαίωμας νόμον α’, ib.
12), &c., as well as on geometry, arithmetic, and astronomy (ib. 13, 14).

Xenocrates appears to have made a still more definite division between the three departments of philosophy, for the purpose of the scientific treatment of them, than Speusippus (Sext. Emp.
Math. vii. 16), but at the same time to have abandoned Plato's heuristic (εὐρηματική) method of conducting through doubts (ἀπορίας), and to have dropped in its stead a mode of bringing forward his doctrines in which they were developed dogmatically (Sext. Emp. Hypotyp. i. 2; comp.
Cic. Acad. i. 4; Diog. Laërt. iv. 11, 16). Xenocrates also seized more sharply and distinctly the sepazation and connection of the different modes of cognition and comprehension, than did Speusippus. He referred science (ἐπιστήμη) to that essence which is the object of pure thought, and is not included in the phenomenal world; sensuous perception (ἀναφθονία) to that which passes into the world of phenomena; conception (δόξα) to that essence which is at once the object of sensuous perception, and, mathematically, of pure reason—the essence of heaven or the stars; so that he conceived of δόξα in a higher sense, and endeavoured, more decidedly than Plato, to exhibit mathematics as mediating between knowledge and sensuous perception ( Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 147, &c.; comp. Both. in Aristot. de Interp. p. 297). All these phases of apprehension partake of truth; but in what manner scientific perception (πολιτική ἀναφθονία) did so, we unfortunately do not learn. Even here Xenocrates' preference for symbolic modes of. sensation and denoting the above three stages of knowledge with the three Parcae, Atropos, Lachesis, and Clotho. It is the more to be regretted that we know nothing further about the mode in which Xenocrates carried out his dialectic, as it is probable that what was peculiar to the Aristotelian logic did not remain unnoticed in it, for it can hardly be doubted that the division of the existent into the absolutely existent, and the relatively existent (τὸ καθ' αὐτὸ καὶ τὸ πρὸς τι, Simpl. in Arist. Catg. iii. f. 6, b.; Schol. in Arist. p. 47), attributed to Xenocrates, was opposed to the Aristotelian table of categories.

We know from Plutarch (de Animae procreat. e Tim. p. 1012, d. 1013, e.) that Xenocrates, if he did not explain the Platonic construction of the world-soul as Cantor after him did, yet conceived of it in a peculiar manner, so that one branch of interpretation of the Τέωνας connected itself with him; and further (Arist. de Casto, l. 10. p. 279, b., 32, Arist. de Myst. Schol. in Arist. p. 438, b. &c. 827, b.) we learn that he stood at the head of those who, regarding the universe as un-originated and imperishable, looked upon the chronic succession in the Platonic theory as a form in which to denote the relations of conceptual succession. Plutarch unfortunately presupposed, as known, that of which only a few obscure traces have been preserved, and contended himself with bringing forward the well-known assumption of the Chalcedonian, that the soul is a self-moving number (L. e.; comp. Arist. de Anima, i. 2, 4, Anal. Post. ii. 4, 6, Interp.). Probably we should connect with this the statement that Xenocrates called unity and duality (μονᾶς and δύος) deities, and characterised the former as the first male existence, ruling in heaven, as father and Zeus, as uneven number and spirit; the latter as female, as the mother of the gods, and as the soul of the universe which reigns over the mutable world under him (Arist. de Myst. Schol. in Arist. p. 438, b.), or, which is the same, he had it that he named the Zeus who ever remains like himself, governing in the sphere of the immutable, the highest; the one who rules over the mutable, sublunary world, the last, or outermost (Plut. Plat. Quaest. ix. 1; Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 604). If, like other Platonists, he designated the material principle as undefined duality (ἄδοντος δύος), the world-soul was probably described by him as the first defined duality, the conditioning or defining principle of every separate definite in the sphere of the material and changeable, but not extending beyond it. He appears to have called it in the highest sense the individual soul, in a derivative sense a self-moving number, that is, the first number endowed with motion. To this world-soul Zeus, or the world-spirit, has entrusted—in what degree and in what extent, we do not learn—dominion over that which is liable to motion and change. The divine power of the world-soul is then again represented, in the different spheres of the universe, as infusing soul into the planets, sun, and moon,—in a purer form, in the shape of Olympic gods. As a sublunary daemonic power (as Here, Poseidon, Demeter), it dwells in the elements, and these daemonic natures, midway between gods and men, are related to them as the isosceles triangle is to the equilateral and the scalene (Stob. L. c.; Plut. de Orac. defect. p. 416, c.; Cic. de Nat. Doctr. i. 13). The divine world-soul which reigns over the whole domain of sublunary changes he appears to have designated as the last Zeus, the last divine activity. It is not till we get to the sphere of the separate daemonic powers of nature that the opposition between good and evil begins (Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 62), and the daemonic power is appealed by means of a stubbornness which it finds there congenial to it; the good daemonic power makes happy those in whom it takes up its abode, the bad ruins them; for daemonic is the indwelling of a good daemon, the opposite the indwelling of a bad one (Plut. de Isid. et Os. p. 360, d., 361, a., de Orac. defect. p. 419, a.; Arist. Top. ii. 2; Stob. Serm. civ. 24). How Xenocrates endeavoured to establish and connect scientifically these assumptions, which appear to be taken chiefly from his books on the nature of the gods (Cic. L. c.), we do not learn, and can only discover the one fundamental idea at the basis of them, that all grades of existence are penetrated by divine power, and that this grows less and less energetic in proportion as it descends to the perishable and individual. Hence also he appears to have maintained that as far as consciousness extends, so far also extends an intuition of that all-ruling divine power, of which he represented even irrational animals as partaking (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 590). But neither the thick nor the thin (πυκνὸν καὶ μαλῶν), to the different combinations of which he appears to have endeavoured to refer the various grades of material existence, were regarded by him as in themselves partaking of soul (Plut. de Fac. in orbe lunae, p. 943, f.); doubtless because he referred them immediately to the divine activity, and was far from attempting to reconcile the duality of the principal, or to resolve them into an original unity. Hence too he was for proving the incorporeality of the soul by the fact that it is not nourished as the body is (Nemesius, p. 31, Ant.). But what more precise conception he formed of the material principium, the twofold infinite, or the undefined number, in what of the words of expression attributed by Aristotle to the Platonists (Metaph. N. i. p. 1087, b.—p. 1088. 15. c. 2. p. 1088, b. 28. c. 5. p. 1092. 35) belonged to him, can hardly be determined with certainty. As little can we ascertain which of the three assumptions, noticed by Aristotle, respecting the primal numbers, and their relation to the ideas and to mathematical numbers (Metaph. M. 6. p. 1080, b., 11. c. 9. p. 1086. 2. c. 8. p. 1083. 27, comp. N. 5. p. 1050, b. 31, &c.) was his. We can only assume as probable, that, after the example of Plato, he designated the divine principium as alone indivisible, and remaining like itself (σπυρὶ), the material, as the divisible, partaking of multiformity, and different (διάρρηξι), and that from the union of the two, or from the limitation of the unlimited by the absolute unity, he deduced number, and for that reason called the soul of the universe, like that of individual beings, a self-moving number, which, by virtue of its twofold root in the same and the different, shares equally in permanence and motion, and attains to consciousness by means of the reconciliation of this opposition. It is also probable that, like Speusippus, he gave up the distinction between primal numbers and ideas, and did not even separate mathematical number from primal number. Then, going back to the Pythagoreans, he appears to have made use of his elementary numbers in the first instance as exponents of relations with reference to the different grades as well of the divine activity as of material existence. In the derivation of things according to the series of the numbers he seems to have gone farther than any of his predecessors (Theophrast, Met. c. 3). He approximated to the Pythagoreans again in this, that (as is clear from his explanation of the soul) he regarded number as the conditioning principle of consciousness, and consequently of knowledge also; he thought it necessary, however, to supply what was wanting in the Pythagorean assumption by the more accurate definition, borrowed from Plato, that it is only in so far as number reconciles the opposition between the same and the different, and has raised itself to self-motion, that it is soul. We find a similar attempt at the supplementation of the Platonic doctrine in Xenocrates' assumption of indivisible lines (Aristot. de Lin. insc. Phys. Ausc. vi. 2; comp. Simpl. in Arist. Phys. f. 30). In them he thought he had discovered what, according to Plato (Tim. p. 53, c.), God alone knows, and he among men who is loved by him, namely, the elements or principia of the Platonic triangles. He seems to have described them as first, original lines, and in a similar sense to have spoken of original plain figures and bodies (Simpl. in Arist. de Caelo; Schol. in Arist. p. 510. 35), convinced that the principia of the existent should be sought not in the material, not in the divisible which attains to the condition of a phenomenon, but merely in the ideal definition of form. He may very well, in accordance with this, have regarded the point as a merely subjectively admissible presupposition, and a passage of Aristotle respecting this assumption (de Anima, i. 4, extr.) should perhaps be referred to him.

Our information with regard to the Ethic of Xenocrates is still more scanty than that respecting his Dialectic and Physic. We only see that here, also, he endeavoured to supplement the Platonic doctrine in individual points, and at the same time to give it a more direct applicability to life. He distinguished from the good and the bad a something which is neither good nor bad (Sext. Emp. adv. Math. xi. 4). In his view, as in that of the older Academy generally, the good is that which should be striven after for itself, that is, which has value in itself, while the bad is the opposite of this (Cic. de Leg. i. 13). Consequently, that which is neither good nor bad is what in itself is parasitical, and not to be required, but what derives value or the contrary according as it serves as means for what is good or bad, or rather, is used by us for that purpose.

While, however, Xenocrates (and with him Speusippus and the other philosophers of the older Academy appear to have coincided, Cic. de Fin. iv. 18, &c.) would not allow that these intermediate things, such as health, beauty, fame, the gifts of fortune, &c. were valuable in themselves, he did not allow that they were absolutely worthless or indifferent (Cic. de Leg. i. 21). According, therefore, as what belongs to the intermediate region is adapted to bring about or to hinder the good, Xenocrates appears to have designated it as good or evil, probably with the proviso, that by misuse what is good might become evil, and vice versa, that by virtue, what is evil might become good. (Cic. Tuscul. v. 10, 18.)

Still he appears to have maintained in the most decided manner that virtue alone is valuable in itself, and that the value of every thing else is conditional (Cic. ii. cc., comp. Acad. i. 6). According to this, happiness should coincide with the consciousness of virtue (Arist. Top. ii. 6, vii. 1, ib. Alex.), though its reference to the relations of human life requires the additional condition, that it is only in the enjoyment of the good things and circumstances originally designed for it by nature that it attains to completion; to these good things, however, sensuous gratification does not belong (Cic. Tuscul. v. 13, comp. ii. 11; Senec. Epist. 83). In this sense he on the one hand denoted (perfect) happiness as the possession of personal virtue, and the capabilities adapted to it, and therefore reckoned among its constituent elements, beside moral actions conditions and facilities (φυσικῶν, εὐσεβείας, καὶ διακήρυξιν), those movements (πράγματα) and inclinations without which external goods cannot be attained (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 419; comp. Cic. de Fin. iv. 7, v. 9, Acad. ii. 44, 45, Tuscul. iv. 10, 26, 31), and on the other hand did not allow that wisdom, understood as the science of first causes or intelligible essence, or as theoretical understanding, is by itself the true wisdom which should be striven after by men (Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 369; Cic. Acad. ii. 44, 45), and therefore seems to have regarded this human wisdom as at the same time exerted in investigating, defining, and applying (σπουδής καὶ διακήρυξιν, Arist. Top. vi. 3). How decidedly he insisted not only on the recognition of the unconditional nature of moral excellence, but on morality of thought, is shown by his declaration, that it comes to the same thing whether one casts longing eyes, or sets one's feet upon the property of others (Aelian, V. II. xiv. 42). His moral earnestness is also expressed in the warning that the ears of children should be guarded against the poison of immoral speeches. (Plut. de Aud. p. 38, a.)

Comp. Van de Wypersee, Diatribè de Xenocrates Chalcodonio, Lugd. Batav. 1822, with the review in the Heidelberger Jahrbücher, 1824, p. 275, &c., by the writer of this article. [Ch. A. B.]

XENOCRATES. minor literary persons.

1. At the conclusion of the life of the celebrated philosopher of Chalcodon, Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 15) mentions five other persons of the name. The first of them was a very ancient writer on Tactics (τακτοφύλακτος). Menagius (ad loc.) identifies him with the Xenocrates mentioned by Strabo (xii. p. 530) as the Philippus, who sought the aid of Milletus, and Menecrates of Elean. (See also Uekert, Untersuchungen über die Geographie des Heerseins und Daukates, Vinar. 1814, 8vo. pp. 5, foll. n. 4.) XENOCRITUS.

I. of Chalcæon, a relation of the celebrated philosopher, was himself a philosopher and the author of an oration on the death of Aristoænæ, entitled Αγών Αριστοκράτης, (Diog. l.c.)

2. Another philosopher, who wrote a very indifferent elegiac poem; which gives Diogenes occasion to remark that, when poets apply themselves to prose composition, they succeed, but when prose writers attempt poetry, they fail; since the one endowment comes from nature, the other from art. Many examples might be cited to confirm this observation; but there are some instances against it: for example, the prose of Virgil is said to have been as much inferior to his poetry, as the poetry of Cicero was to his prose. (Menag. ad loc.)

3. A statuary, who wrote on his art (see next column).

4. A writer of odes (ἀσματα), whom Diogenes mentions on the authority of Aristoxenus. Probably the name is an error for Xenocrates (Sic., l.c.)

7. Of Ephesus, an historical and geographical writer, frequently quoted by Pliny, who, in one passage, adds to his name the following remark, "qui de ipsis supræmiss ipsis scripsit" (H. N. xxxvii. 2). He thrifished, therefore, during, or immediately before, the time of Pliny. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 509, ed. Westermann.)

8. A chronographer, who is quoted in the Ellvnoiogum Magnus (s. e. Ασσιπα), but of whom we have no further information. (Sic., l.c.)

XENO'CRITUS (Σενοκρίτου), a physician of Aphrodisias in Cilicia (Galen, De Simplic. Medicin. Tempor. ac Facult. vi pref. p. xii. p.793), who must have lived about the middle of the first century after Christ, as he was probably a contemporary of Andromachus the Younger. (See Gal. De Compos. Medicin. sec. loc. iii. I, vol. xii. p.627, and De Ther. ad Hs. c. 12. vol. xiv. p.260.) Galen says that he lived in the second generation before himself (κατα τοις πατοις ημων, De Simplic. Medicin. Tempor. ac Facult. x. 1. vol. xii. p.248.) He wrote some pharmaceutical works, and is blamed by Galen (l. c.) for making use of disnagating remedies, for instance, human brains, flesh, liver, urine, excrement, &c. One of his works was entitled Περὶ τῆς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἑλλήνων Ἑρμής, "De Utilitate ex Animalibus Perejudenda" (id. ibid. x. 2. § 4, vol. xii. p.261.) He is several times quoted by Galen, and also by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. p.717); Artemidorus (Onomac. iv. 24); Pliny (H. N. xx. 82); Oribasius (Coll. Medici. ii. 58, p.225); Astius (i. 2. 94, iv. 2. 35, 3. 14, pp. 75, 706, 760), and Alexander Trallianus (i. 15, xii. 8, pp. 156, 344). Besides some short fragments of his writings there is extant a little essay by Xenocrates, Περὶ τῆς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἑλλήνων Τροφῆς, "De Alimento ex Aquilibus," preserved by Oribasius; which is an interesting record of the state of Natural History at the time in which he lived. It was first published in Greek, with a Latin version, by J. B. Rasarius, 1559, 8vo., Tigriri; and is inserted by Fabricius in the ninth volume of the old edition of his Bibliotheca Graeca, pp. 454—474. There are three later and better editions, by J. G. F. Franz, 1774, 8vo. Lips., and by Adam. Coray, 1794, 8vo. Neap., and 1814, 8vo. Paris. (See Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. ii. p.68, xiiii. p.452, ed. vet.; Haller, Bibli. Medic. Pract.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde fur die Aeltere Medicin.) [W. A. G.]

XENO'CRITUS, a statuary of the school of Lyssipus, was the pupil either of Tiscirates or of Euthycrates, both of whom he surpassed in the number of his works. He also wrote works upon the art. (Plin. H. N. 8. s. 34. § 23; Diog. Laer. iv. 15.) He must have flourished about Ol. 130, n. c. 290. In another passage of Pliny (xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 5) Xenocrates is quoted for a statement respecting Parrhasius. It does not necessarily follow that he wrote a distinct work on painting, for the observation quoted might very well have been made in connection with the general subject of artistic composition. In the Elenchos of book xxxiii, Xenocrates is mentioned, among Pliny's authorities, as a writer on the tectonic art (de toretico), and in that of book xxxv, as a writer on metal-work in general (de metallica disciplina). In the latter passage (and in the former also, according to some MSS.) he is called Xenocrates (abl.) Zenonis. Whether his father's name was Zeno, or whether Zenonis is an error for Zenone, we have not the means of deciding. It should also be mentioned, with respect to the second passage quoted above from Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 5), that Junius (de Pict. Vét. ii. 3; comp. Menag. ad Diog. iv. 15) proposes to read Hypsicrates for Xenocrates; but all the MSS. have Xenocrates, and the reasons assigned by Junius for altering it are insufficient. [P. S.]

XENOCRITUS (Σενοκρίτου), literary critic. 1. Of Locri Epizephyrii, in Lower Italy, a musician and lyric poet, who is mentioned by Plutarch (de Mus. 9. p. 1134, b.), as one of the leaders of the second school of Dorian music, which was founded by Thaletas, and as a composer of Paeans. A little further on, Plutarch says that some ascribed to him Dithyrambs on heroic subjects, and that it was disputed whether he wrote Paeans. The discrepancy between this passage and the former is easily explained. Plutarch is here following Glanucus, on whose authority he adds that Xenocritus lived later than Thaletas. [Thales.] The common text has Ξενοκρίτου twice in this paragraph; but Ξενοκρίτου is evidently the true reading: there are other examples of the same error; as in the passage of Diogenes referred to under Xenocrates, No. 5, where it is almost certain that Xenocrates is meant; as Aristoxenus, who mentioned him, wrote expressly on these early musicians. (See Plut. l.c. ii. 11.)

Xenocrates appears to have been the founder of the Locrian style of lyric poetry, which was a modification of the Aeolian; and, if the view just given of the passage of Diogenes be correct, we must ascribe to him some, and perhaps the first, of the Δοκικά ψηματα, or erotic odes, in imitation of Sappho and Erinna. He is said to have been blind from his birth. (Heracleid. Pont. Pol. Fr. xxix.)

The whole subject of the Locrian school of poetry is fully discussed by Böck (de Mtr.

3. Of Cos, a grammarian, was the first who wrote a commentary on the texts used by Hippocrates. (Fabric. Bibli. Græc. vol. ii. p. 601.) [P. S.]

XENO'CRITUS (Euvkρίτως) and EUBIUS (Εὐβίος), sculptors, made the white marble statue of Hercules Promachus, in his shrine at Thebes, of which city the artists were both natives. (Paus. ii. 11. § 4.)

XENO'DAMUS (Ευξενδάμους) of Cythera, a musician and lyric poet, who is mentioned by Plutarch (de Mus. 9, p. 1134, b.) as one of the leaders of the second school of music, which was established at Sparta by Thalatas. Some writers ascribed to him Paeans; but others, among whom was Pratinas, said that his compositions were not Paeans, but Hyporchemes, and Plutarch adds that there was still extant in his time an ode by Xenodamus, which was manifestly a hyporcheme. Athenaeus also (i. p. 15, d. e.) mentions Xenodamus and Pindar as the two chief composers of hyporchemes among the ancient lyric poets. (Fabric. Bibli. Græc. vol. ii. p. 160; Ulrici, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 212, 223, foll. 391.) [P. S.]

XENO'IDICE (Εὐξενίδικη). 1. A daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 2.)

2. A daughter of Syleus, at Aulis, was slain by Hercules, together with her father. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 3.)

3. A captive Trojan woman. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) [L. S.]

XENOETAS (Ἐξενετάς), an Achaean in the service of Antiochus the Great, was despatched by Hermeias in command of an army against Molon. (Molon, Vol. ii. p. 1111.) This unusual distinction seems greatly to have elated him. He conducted himself arrogantly towards his friends, and exhibited no small presumption and rashness in his military operations. He succeeded in crossing the Tigris, but fell into the snare laid for him by Molon, who feigned a retreat, and suddenly returning surprised Xenoeatas when the greater part of his forces were sunk in drunken sleep. Xenoeatas was killed, and his army cut to pieces. (Polyb. v. 45—48.) [C. P. M.]

XENOME'DES (Ἑξομήδης), of Chios, a Greek historian, mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus along with Hellanicus and Damastes, as writers who lived a little before the Peloponnesian war. (Dionys. de Thuc. c. 5.) The fragments of his writings, quoted by the grammarians, are of a mythological nature. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Lysistr. 447; Schol. Victor. ad II. xvi. 526; Etymol. s. v. Θηβαίος, where Εξομήδης ought probably to be read instead of Εξομήδης; comp. Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc. vol. ii. p. 43, Paris, 1848.)

XENON (Εξενόν), historical. 1. A Thewan, who was sent in command of a body of troops by the Peloponnesians to Sicily, c. 413. (Thucyd. vi. 19.)

2. An officer in the service of Antiochus the Great, who was sent, together with Theodotus, against Molon. They retired before Molon under the shelter of the towns. (Polyb. v. 42, 43.)

3. Tyrant of Hermone. He voluntarily abdicated his tyranny, and joined the Achaean league. (Polyb. ii. 44.)

4. An Achaean, a native of Patrae. He is mentioned by Polybius as one of those who counselled the maintenance of neutrality between the Romans and Perseus (xxviii. 6). After the conclusion of the war with Perseus, when the Roman commissioners, Claudius and Domitius, in a meeting of the Achaean assembly denounced as partisans of Perseus all who had been generals of the Achaeans during the war, Xenon, who had filled that office, rose to repel the charge, and offered to stand his trial before either an Achaean or a Roman tribunal. He was doubtless one of the Achaean who, upon this, were sent to Rome, professedly to take their trial, but who were detained in various Italian cities for several years. (Paus. vii. 10. § 9, &c.)

5. An Achaean, a native of Aegium, was twice despatched to Rome, in company with Telecles, on behalf of the Achaeans who were detained in Italy. (Polyb. xxxii. 7, xxxiii. 1.) It seems more likely that the same Xenon is referred to in both passages, than that Xenon of Patrae should be meant in the former. In the latter case Xenon of Patrae must of course have been a different person from the Xenon mentioned by Pausanias. (vi. 15. § 1.) [C. P. M.]

XENON (Σένων), literary. 1. Of Locri, a Pythagorean philosopher. (Fabric. Bibli. Græc. vol. i. p. 878.)

XENON, a painter, of Sicyon, disciple of Neaces, is mentioned by Pliny, in his list of those painters who were “non ignobiles quidem, in tandem verba divinerti” (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

XENOPHANES (Ἑξοφάνης), historical. 1. An Athenian, the father of Lamachus. (Thucyd. vii. 8.)

2. An Athenian, the son of Cleomachus, sent by king Philip, the son of Demetrius, as ambassador to Hannibal, for the purpose of entering into a treaty with him. (Polyb. vii. 9.) He and his companions in attempting to make their way to Capua fell into the hands of the Romans. Xenophanes, with great coolness, told the praetor, M. Valerius Laevinus, that he was on his way to Rome, charged by king Philip with a commission to form a treaty of alliance with Rome. Laevinus furnished him with an escort for his journey, when he of course took the opportunity to make his way to Hannibal. He was, however, again taken prisoner by the Roman ships. He again attempted to pass himself off as an ambassador to the Romans, but was handed over to the consuls, taken to Rome, and thrown into prison. (Liv. xxiii. 33, 36.) [C. P. M.]

XENOPHANES (Σένωφανης), of Colophon, was the son of Orthomenes, or according to others, of Dexius (Dio. Laer. ix. 18, ib. Interp.). He was mentioned in the writings of Heracleitus and Ephicharmus (ib. ix. 1. &c.; Arist. Met. iii. 5. p. 1010, 6), and had himself made mention of Thales, Epimenides, and Pythagoras (Dio. Laer. ix. 18, i. 111, viii. 36), and is placed in connection with the musician Lasus of Hermione in the time of the Athenian Hipparchus. (Plut. de vitioso pudore, p. 530.) On the other hand, his expression respecting Simonides (Schol. in Aristoph. Pae. 696; comp. S. Karsten, p. 31) is very doubtful. In a fragment of his elegies, mention is made of the Median invasion as an event that took place in his time, by which we should probably understand the expedition of Harpagus against the Greek cities in Asia (Ol. 59.), not the Persian invasion of Greece (Ol. 72 or 75; comp. Theol. Aridum, p. 40, and Cousin, Nouveaux Fragmens philosophiques, p. 12, &c.). Yet the widely different significations of these lines may have given rise to the chronological statements of Apollodoros and Timaeus, the former of whom placed his birth (undoubtedly too early), in the 40th Olympiad, and made him live to the times of Dareius and Cyrus, while the latter made him a contemporary of Hiero (Ol. 75. 3) and Epicarmus (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 361; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 257). Other statements are still more uncertain (Diog. Laërt. ix. 10, vii. 56, 29; Euseb. Chron. Ol. 60. 2. and 56. 4); but the first mentioned references are sufficient to fix the period when he flourished to between the 60th and 70th Olympiads. According to the fragments of one of his elegies (Diog. Laërt. ix. 19), he had left his native land at the age of 25, and had already lived 67 years in Hellas, when, at the age of 92, he composed that elegy. He left his native land as a fugitive or exile (ekwardn), and betook himself to the Ionian colonies in Sicily, Zancl and Catana (Diog. Laërt. ix. 18). There can be no doubt that he, the founder of the Eleatic school (Plat. Soph., p. 224, d.), lived at least for some time in Elea (Velia, founded by the Phocaeans in Ol. 61), the foundation of which he had sung (comp. Arist. Rhet. ii. 23; Diog. Laërt. ix. 10). Besides this poem, one on the building of Colophon is mentioned (ibid.), and a didactic poem, in like manner composed in the epic metre, which, as usual, was probably provided by later writers with the title "On Nature" (Stob. Ed. Phys. i. 294; Pollux, vi. 46), and was imitated by Empedocles (Diog. Laërt. vii. 50; comp. Plut. de Pyth. Omph. p. 402, a.). Of the two historical poems mostly the only parts that have been preserved; of the didactic poem some not inconsiderable fragments (in S. Karsten, i.—xvi.), but unfortunately not such as to display the compass and foundation of the doctrines peculiar to him. He stands more clearly before us as an elegiac poet, and we can have no hesitation in placing him side by side with Minnemonus and other distinguished cultivators of this species of poetry. In his elegies also we see exhibited the direction of his mind towards investigation, and his earnest view of life. He derides in them the Pythagorean doctrine of the migration of souls (fr. xviii.); makes good the claims of wisdom in opposition to the excessive admiration of the bodily strength and activity by which the victory was gained in athletic games (fr. xix.); lashes the effeminate luxury of the Ionians, which they had imitated from the Lydians (fr. xx.); recommends that all that is true, just, noble, and deserving should be sung, and that the praises of virtue should be sung, not the contests of蒂ans, giants, and other worthless stories (fr. xx.). Iambics and Silli are also attributed to Xenophanes (Diog. Laërt. I. e.; Strabo, xiv. p. 64; Schol. in Aristoph. Equit. 406); the latter probably because Timon had introduced him as a speaker in his Silli, induced probably in the first instance by the ridicule with which the Colophonian had expressed himself respecting the doctrines of his predecessors. As little can we regard Xenophanes as the author of parodies, which, according to the testimony of Aristotle (Post. 2. b. Interp.) were first composed by Hegemon, a native of Colophon. Besides, the hexameters which profess to be taken from the parodies of Xenophanes (Athen. ii. p. 54, e. fr. xvii.) do not at all bear the character of this species of poetry. Lastly, when he is called a tragic poet (πραγγοδοσιος in Euseb. Chron. l. c., unless we are to read πραγγοδοσιος with J. Scaliger, or παροδοσιος with Rossi) it can only be in the sense in which elegiac poetry generally was included under that name. We do not even feel inclined to refer the word, as S. Karsten does (p. 22, &c.), to chorus songs, the beginnings of tragedy. How much Xenophanes lived in the midst of poetry, we see from the statement that he recited his poems in the manner of rhapsodies. (Diog. Laërt. i. 18.)

Xenophanes was universally regarded by antiquity as the originator of the Eleatic doctrine of the universe. (Plat. Soph. p. 242; Arist. Met. ii. 5.) At the same time, however, it is mentioned, in some cases with the quotation of verses of the Colophonian bearing upon the point, that he maintained, in the first instance, the unity of the Deity (Arist. Met. A, 5, p. 986, b. 24; Timon. ap. Sext. Emp. Pyrrh. Hyp. i. 224, &c.), and denied that the Deity was originated or perished (Arist. Rhet. ii. 23, p. 1399, b. 5. 1400, b. 5, de Xenoph. G. et M. c. 3; Stob. Ecl. Phys. p. 416; Plut. Plac. ii. 4, &c.); that he strenuously denounced the transference to the Deity of the human form, and human sins and weaknesses (fr. vii.); and that he attributed to the Deity undivided activity (fr. ii.), and taught regarding it that without weakness it overcomes every thing by mind (φερει, fr. iii.), free from motion in space (fr. iv.). That the Deity was in his view the animating power of the universe, is expressed by Aristotle (I. c.; comp. Timon. ap. Sext. Emp. L. c.) in the words, that, directing his glanced on the whole universe, he said, "God is the One." The outlines of the demonstration of Xenophanes are to be found in the little book which has come down to us, in a corrupted form, among the writings of Aristotle, De Xenophane, Gorgia et Melissos, c. 3, &c.; for we are justified in attributing it to the Colophonian, not to Zeno, who is named in the heading of the section treating of it, or to some other philosopher unknown to us, by the testimony of Simplicius, who (in Arist. Phys. i. 6) without any important variation, refers it to him, and speaks of it as taken from Theophrastes, whether, as is likely, he had the little treatise before him, and regarded it as the work of Theophrastes, or as derived from a work of Theophrastes which has not come down to us. According to this demonstration, the Existent, which Xenophanes sets down as the same with the Deity, has originated either per se or out of like or out of unlike, whether the latter be regarded as stronger or weaker. Further, the Deity, inasmuch as his essence consists in ruling, must be one only, and neither finite nor infinite, neither moved nor unmoved. We are not induced to deny these conclusions to be those of Xenophanes, as does E. Zeller, who in part follows earlier writers (Philosophie der Griechen, i. p. 134, &c.), either by the erroneous supercription, which is corrected by the testimony of Simplicius, or by a proposition, which is set down as belonging to Zeno, in the third section of the same book (c. 5, p. 979. 22, b, 22), which in reality is different from the doctrine ascribed to Xenophanes (p. 977, b, 3, 13, &c. p. 979. 4), or by the dialectic development, with which it is pretended Xenophanes cannot be accredited, or by the apparent contradiction that the Deity is represented on the one hand as neither finite nor infinite, on the other (p. 977, b, 1; comp. Simpl. l. c.) as bounded and spherical; on the one hand, as neither moved nor unmoved, on the other (fr. iv.) as freed from motion, nor by the statement of Aristotle (Metaph. A. 5. p. 926. b, 18) that Xenophanes had not decided whether he regarded the One as limited or as unlimited. For to begin with the removal of the last difficulty,—the passage of Aristotle referred to only asserts that from the doctrine of Xenophanes it could not be concluded with certainty whether he had conceived of the Deity as ideal or as material, and to show this, he may have appealed to that antinomical attempt to exclude from the Deity the conditions of rest and motion, limitation, and infinity. To this attempt Xenophanes may have been induced by his endeavour (which exhibits itself unmistakably in the fragments of which he have been preserved) to exalt the idea of the Deity above the region of anthropomorphic definitions. That he nevertheless found himself driven, in what at least seemed contradic- tion to this, to describe the self-complete Divine Essence as shut up in itself and motionless, exhibits a wavering, not yet thoroughly formed tone of thought, for which indeed Aristotle finds fault with him, (l. c. p. 986, b, 26). We cannot admit again, that no trace of the original epic style is to be found in his conclusions and propositions. Such expressions as κρατεῖν ἀλλὰ μὴ κρατεῖσθαι (p. 977. 27, comp. 31, 38), οὕτως ἀτερμέον ὦτι κατιωθεῖ (ib. 6, 16) show the contrary.

While, however, Xenophanes identified the existent with the Deity, and conceived of it as the basis of phenomena, he could not yet, like his successor Parmenides, who proceeded in a dialectic manner, hold the manifold, in opposition to the one existence, as non-existent (comp. Arist. de Xenoeph. &c. c. 4, p. 977, b, 24); and certainly his sceptical expressions (fr. xiv. xv.), which must have heightened Timon's preference for him, are not to be understood as Sextus Empiricus (Pyrrh. Hyp. i. 225) and others understood them, as though he had attributed certainty to the conviction of the unity and eternity of the Divine essence, but probability only to the assumption respecting the plurality of gods and the world of phenomena. Of the scanty, and in part doubtful, statements respecting his mode of explaining the latter (see Brandis, Handbuch der Geschichte der Griech. Röm. Phil. vol. i. p. 373, &c.) all that deserves mention here is his endeavour to establish that the surface of the earth had gradually risen out of the sea, by appealing to the shells and petrifications of marine products found on mountains and in quarries (Orig. Philola. c. 4).

XENOPHANTUS (Ξενοφάντος), a Rhodian, sent by the Rhodians in command of a fleet to the Hellespont in b.c. 220. (Polyb. iv. 50.) [C. P. M.]

XENOPHANTUS (Ξενοφάντος), artists. 1. Of Athens, a maker of fictile vases, known by the inscription ΞΕΝΟΦΑΝΤΟΣ ΕΙΒΟΙΖΕΝ ΑΘΗΝ, round the neck of a pelike, found in a tomb at Kerche, the ancient Pancetaeum, in the Crimea, and now in the Museum at St Petersburg. The whole style of this vase is remarkable. The figures upon it are partly painted red on a black ground, and partly modelled in relief in the yellowish clay of which the vessel is made, and decorated with colours and gilding; a style characteristic of the Athenian school. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 63, 2d ed.)

2. A statuary, of Thasos, the son of Chares, lived in the reign of Hadrian, and was sent by his fellow-citizens on a mission to Athens, to dedicate a statue of that emperor; as we learn from an inscription found at Athens, and published by Spor, Chandler, Osann, and Böckh. (Corp. Inser. Graec. No. 536; Welcker, Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 83; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 428, 2d ed.) [P. S.]

XENO-PHILOS (Ξενοφίλος), a Greek officer who was in command of the citadel at Susa, and had charge of the treasure at the time that Antigonus marched against the city. He maintained his position long and bravely, but at last went over to Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 18, 48.) [C. P. M.]

XENO-PHILUS, sculptor. [STRATON.]

XENOPHON (Ξενοφόν), historical. I. A Corinthian, the son of Thessalus. He was victor at the Olympic games, both in the foot-race and in the pentathlon, in the 79th Olympiad. His family belonged to the stock of the Oligaetheidae, and was one of the ruling families of Corinth. Pindar's 13th Olympic ode celebrates his double victory. (Böck and Dissen on Pindar, l. c.; Diod. iii. 70; Pauis, iv. 24. § 5, ed. Bekker; Athen. xiii. p. 573.)

2. An Athenian, son of Euripides, was one of the generals to whom Potidæa surrendered (Thuc. ii. 70). Later in the same year (c. 429) Xenophon and two other generals led an expedition against the Chalcideans and Bottineans, but were compelled to retreat into Potidæa. (Thuc. ii. 79.)

3. A native of Aegium, the son of Meneplus, a victor in the panathlon at the Olympic games, mentioned by Pausanius (iv. 3. § 13).

4. A conjurer, who attracted great admiration by his wonderful feats of legerdemain, such as making fire burst forth spontaneously. Cratisthenes of Phlius was his disciple. (Athen. i. p. 19, e.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 59.)

5. An Achaeus, a native of Aegium. He was present, on the side of the Roman general Quinticius, at the conference with king Philip, held at Nicæa, b.c. 193; P. L. 38, vii. xxvi. 62; Polyb. xvii. 13. He was one of the ambassadors sent to Rome after the conference. (Polyb. xvii. 10.) He had a son named Alcithus. (Polyb. xxviii. 16.) [C. P. M.]

XÆNOPHON (Ξενόφων), the Athenian, was the... son of Gryllus, and a native of the demus Erecheia. The time of his birth is not known, but it is approximated to by the fact mentioned in the Life of Xenophon by Diogenes Laërtius, and in Strabo (p. 403, ed. Cas.) that Xenophon fell (iii. 13) in the flight after the battle of Delium, and was taken up by Socrates, the philosopher, on his shoulders and carried a distance of several stadia. The battle of Delium was fought b. c. 424 between the Athenians and Boeotians (Thucyd. iv. 96), and Xenophon therefore could not well have been born after b. c. 444. The time of his death also is not mentioned by any ancient writer. Lucian says (Macrob. 21) that he attained to above the age of ninety, and Xenophon himself in his Hellenica (vi. 4. § 35) mentions the assassination of Alexander of Pherne which happened in b. c. 357, according to Diodorus (xvi. 14). Between b. c. 424 and b. c. 357, there is a period of sixty-seven years, and thus we have evidence of Xenophon being alive nearly seventy years after Socrates saved his life at Delium. There has been much discussion on the age of Xenophon at the time when he joined the expedition of Cyrus' younger,& c. 401. Thucydides would make him a young man between twenty and thirty must reject the evidence as to the battle of Delium. Plutarch has a story that Socrates saved the life of Alcibiades at Potidaea, and that Alcibiades protected Socrates in the retreat after the defeat at Delium (Aesch. 7). The passage in the Anabasis (ii. 1, § 12) in which Xenophon is called rawv koros is not decisive, for in this passage of the Anabasis the best MSS. read “Theopompos” instead of “Xenophon”; and, besides this, the term rawv koros is not used in such a way as to limit it to a young man. Xenophon seemed to Seuthes (Anab. vii. 2. § 8) old enough to have a marriagable daughter. This question is discussed at some length by C. W. Kruger (De Xenophonitis Vita Qwrestiones, Halle, 1822). The most probable conclusion seems to be that Xenophon was not under forty at the time when he joined the army of Cyrus. The mode in which Xenophon introduces himself is true. Xenophon must have visited Thracia at least to the conclusion that his name ought not to occur in the first two books. (Comp. Clinton, Fast. Hell. b. c. 401.) Xenophon is said to have been a pupil of Socrates at an early age, which is consistent with the intimacy which might have arisen from Socrates saving his life. Philostratus states that he also received instruction from Prodicus of Ceos, during the time that he was a prisoner in Boeotia, but nothing is known of this captivity of Xenophon from any other authority. Photius (Biblioth. clxx.) says that Xenophon was also a pupil of Isocrates, which may be true, though Isocrates was younger than Xenophon, being born in b. c. 436. A story reported by Athenaeus (x. p. 427) of something that Xenophon said at the table of Dionysius the tyrant, may probably refer to the elder Dionysius who lived till b. c. 367; and if this story be true, Xenophon must have lived till at least 357, or 356: give via Tyre, and Syriae, Leutrohne (Bibl. Univ. art. Xenophon), endeavours to show that Xenophon wrote the Symposium and the Hiero before b. c. 401; but his conclusion can hardly be said to be even a strong probability. Xenophon was the editor of the History of Thucydides, but no time can be fixed for this; nor can we assent to Leutrohne’s conclusion that he published the work before b. c. 401. Xenophon may have been at Athens in b. c. 402, and Thucydides may have been dead then; but these two facts prove nothing as to the time when the work of Thucydides was published. (Thucyd., viii. 24. 25.) Xenophon in the Anabasis (iii. 1) mentions the circumstances under which he joined the army of Cyrus the younger, who was preparing his expedition against his brother, Artaxerxes Mnaemon, the king of Persia. Proxenus, a friend of Xenophon, was already with Cyrus, and he invited Xenophon to come to Sardis, and promised to introduce him to the Persian prince. Xenophon consulted his master Socrates, who advised him to consult the oracle of Delphi, for it was rather a hazardous matter for him to enter the service of Cyrus, who was considered to be the friend of the Lacedaemonians and the enemy of Athens. Xenophon went to Delphi, but he did not ask the god whether he should go or not: he probably had made up his mind. He merely asked to what gods he should sacrifice in order that he might be successful in his intended enterprise. Socrates was not satisfied with the pupil’s mode of considering the oracle, but as he had not given an answer, he took it for granted that Xenophon went to Sardis, which Cyrus was just about to leave. The real object of the expedition was disguised from the Greeks in the army of Cyrus, or at least they affected not to know what it was. But Clearchus knew; and the rest might suspect. Cyrus gave out that he was going to attack the Pisidians, but the direction of his march must have very soon shown that he was going elsewhere. He led his forces through Asia Minor, and over the mountains of Taurus to Tarsus in Cilicia. From thence he passed into Syria, crossed the Euphrates, and met the huge army of the Persians in the plain of Cunaxa, about forty miles from Babylon. In the affray that ensued, for it was not a battle, Cyrus lost his life, his barbarian troops were dispersed, and the Greeks were left alone on the wide plains between the Tigris and the Euphrates. It was after the treacherous massacre of the Greek commanders by the Persian satrap Tissaphernes, that Xenophon came forward. He had held no command in the army of Cyrus, nor had he in fact served as a soldier. In the commencement of the third book of the Anabasis he states how he was called to take a part in conducting the hazardous retreat. Instead of attempting to return by the road by which they advanced, where they would have found no supplies, at least till they reached the Mediterranean, the Greek leaders conducted their men along the Tigris and over the high table lands of Armenia to Tappezus, now Trebizond, a Greek colony on the south-east coast of the Black Sea. From Tappezus the troops were conducted to Chrysopolis, which is opposite to Byzantium. The Greeks were in great distress, and some of them under Xenophon entered the service of Seleucus, king of Thrace, who wanted their aid, and promised to pay for it. The Greeks performed what they agreed to do, but Seleucus was unwilling to pay, and it was with great difficulty that Xenophon got from him part of what he had promised. The description which Xenophon gives (Anab. vi. 3, &c.) of the manners of the Thraceans is very curious and amusing. As the Lacedaemonians under Thribron were now at war with Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, Xenophon and his troops were invited to join the army of Thrasyboulos of Tribon and Xenophon led them back out of Asia to join Thrasyboulos in B.C. 399. Xenophon, who was very poor, made an expedition into the plain of the Caimus with his troops before they joined Thrasyboulos, to plunder the house and property of a Persian named Asidates. The Persian, with his women, children, and all his moveables was seized; and Xenophon, by this robbery, replenished his empty pockets (Anab. vii. 8. § 23). He tells the story himself as if he were not ashamed of it.

Socrates was put to death in B.C. 399, and it seems probable that Xenophon was banished either shortly before or shortly after that event. His death during Xenophon's absence in Asia appears to be collected from the Memorabilia (iv. § 4). Xenophon was not banished at the time when he was leading the troops back to Thrasyboulos (Anab. vii. 7. § 57), but his expression rather seems to imply that his banishment must have followed soon after. It is not certain what he was doing after the troops joined Thrasyboulos. The assumption of Letronne, that he went to Athens is unsupported by evidence. As we know nothing of his movements, the conclusion ought to be that he stayed in Asia, and probably with Thrasyboulos and his successor Dercylidas.

Agisilaus, the Spartan king, was commanding the Lacedaemonian forces in Asia against the Persians in B.C. 396, and Xenophon was with him at least during part of the campaign. When Agisilaus was recalled B.C. 394, Xenophon accompanied him (Anab. v. § 8-6), and he was on the side of the Lacedaemonians in the battle which they fought at Coroneia B.C. 394 against the Athenians (Plut. Agis. 18). It seems that he went to Sparta with Agisilaus after the battle of Coroneia, and soon after he settled at Scillus in Eleia, not far from Olympia, a spot of which he has given a description in the Anabasis (v. 3, § 7, &c.). Here he was joined by his wife Philisia and his children. It has been said that Philisia was his second wife; but when he married her, or where, is unknown. His children were educated in Sparta, or at least Agisilaus advised him to educate them there. (Plut. Agis. 20.) Xenophon was now an exile, and a Lacedaemonian so far as he could become one.

His time during his long residence at Scillus was employed in hunting, writing, and entertaining his friends; and probably his historical writings, the Anabasis and the Helenica, or part of the Helenica, were composed here, as Diogenes Laërtius says. The treatise on hunting and that on the horse were probably written during this time, when amusement and exercise of that kind formed part of his occupation. Xenophon was at last expelled from his quiet retreat at Scillus by the Eleans, but the year is uncertain. It is a conjecture of Krüger's that the Eleans did not take Scillus before B.C. 371, the year in which the Lacedaemonians were defeated by the Thebans at the battle of Leuctra. Diogenes says that the Lacedaemonians did not come to the aid of Xenophon when he was attacked by the Eleans, a circumstance which may lead to the probable inference that they were too busily employed in other ways either to prevent his expulsion or to reinstate him; and this is a reason why Letronne supposes that the Eleans probably attacked Scillus in B.C. 398 during the invasion of Lacoecia by Epaminondas. Xenophon's residence at Scillus in either case was above twenty years. The sentence of banishment from Athens was repealed on the motion of Euhnus, but it is uncertain in what year. In the battle of Mantinea which was fought B.C. 362, the Spartans and the Athenians were opposed to the Thebans, and Xenophon's two sons, Gryllus and Diodorus, fought on the side of the allies. He sent them, says Diogenes, to Athens to fight on behalf of the Spartans. Gryllus fell in the same battle in which Epaminondas lost his life. From the circumstance of Xenophon's two sons being in the battle, Letronne assumes that the decree for Xenophon's banishment must have been repealed before B.C. 392, a conclusion which is far from being necessary. Krüger concludes for other reasons that it was repealed before Ol.103, that is, before the battle of Mantinea. There is no evidence that Xenophon ever returned to Athens. He is said to have retired to Corinth after his expulsion from Scillus, and as we know nothing more, we assume that he died there. (Diog. Laërt.)

The Hippiarchus is written after the repeal of the decree of banishment, and the treatise on the revenues of Athens. The events alluded to in the Epipogus to the Cyropaedia (viii. § 4) show that the Epipogus at least was written after Ol. 104. 3. (Diod. xii. 92.) Diogenes quotes Stesicles as authority for Xenophon having died in the first year of the 105th Olympiad, or in B.C. 359. The time of his death may have been a few years later. Compare Clinton, Fasti Hell., B.C. 359; Krüger, de Xenophonis, p. 26.

The titles of the works of Xenophon which Diogenes enumerates are the same as those which are now current. He says that Xenophon wrote about forty books (βιβλία), and that they were variously divided, and the list of works which he gives, show that by the word books he meant the several divisions or books of the larger works, and the smaller works which consist of a single book. The number of books of Xenophon thus estimated is thirty-seven, which is to be compared to the number mentioned by Diogenes, and shows that a division of Xenophon's works into books existed at that time. Of the historical writings of Xenophon, the Anabasis, or the History of the Expedition of the Younger Cyrus, and of the retreat of the Greeks, who formed part of his army, has immortalised his name. It is a clear and pleasing narrative, written in a simple style, free from affectation; and it gives a great deal of curious information on the country which was traversed by the retreating Greeks, and on the manners of the people. It was the first work which made the Greeks acquainted with some portions of the Persian empire, and it showed the weakness of that extensive monarchy. The skirmishes of the retreating Greeks with their enemies and the battles with some of the barbarian tribes are not such events as elevate the work to the character of a military history, nor can it as such be compared with Caesar's Commentaries. Indeed those passages in the Anabasis which relate directly to the military movements of the retreating army are not always clear, nor have we any evidence that Xenophon did possess any military talent for great operations, whatever skill he may have had as a commander of a division. The edition of Oliff, which is the best of the modern editions of the Greek text is by Krüger. The work of Major Remell "Illustrations chiefly geographical of the History of the Expedition of Cyrus, &c. London, 1807, 4to." is a useful commentary on the Anabasis, to which may be added various remarks in the London Geographical Journal. (See the Index to the first ten volumes.) The translation by Spelman is perhaps the best English version.

In a passage in the Hellenica (iii. 1. § 1), the author says, "Now how Cyrus got his army together and marched up the country with it against his brother, and how the battle was fought, and how he died, and how after this the Greeks made their retreat, the same has been written by Themistogenes of Syracuse." This passage seems sufficiently to indicate the Anabasis, though the extract says nothing of the course which the Greeks took from Trapezus to Byzantium. Plutarch (De Gloria Athen. vol. ii. ed. Wytenbach) says, that Xenophon attributed the Anabasis to Themistogenes in order that the work might have more credit, than if it appeared as the narrative of one who had to say so much about himself. We might suppose that there was a work on the expedition of Cyrus by Themistogenes, and that Xenophon wrote his Anabasis after he had written this passage in the Hellenica. But this is merely a conjecture, and not a satisfactory one. When we read the Anabasis we never doubt that Xenophon was the author of it, for he speaks of himself in many places in a way in which no other person could speak: he records, for instance, dreams and thoughts, which no one could know except from his own experience. The Anabasis, then, as we have it, was either written by Xenophon, or compiled from his notes; and the reference to the work of Themistogenes either proves that there was such a work, or that Xenophon's work passed under the name of Themistogenes, at the time when the passage in the Hellenica was written, if Xenophon wrote the passage in the Hellenica. Bornemann's proposal to translate the words in the Hellenica, θεωστογενεί το Σωρακοντω γέγραπται, "das habe ich für den Themistogenes geschrieben" is altogether inadmissible.

The Hellenica (Ἐλληνικα) of Xenophon are divided into seven books, and comprehend the space of forty-eight years, from the time when the history of Thucydides ends (Thucydiades) to the battle of Mantinea, b. c. 362. But the fact of the assassination of Alexander of Phereas is mentioned (vi. 4. 33), as to which the reference already made to Clinton's Fasti may be consulted. It is the opinion of Niebuhr and others that the Hellenica consists of two distinct parts or works written at different times. The History of Thucydides would be completed by the capture of Athens, b. c. 404, which is described in the second book (Hellen. ii. 2); the remainder of this book carries the history to the restoration of Thrasylalus and the exiles, b. c. 403. The second paragraph of the third book in which Themistogenes is mentioned, may be considered as completing the history up to b. c. 399; and a new narrative appears to begin with the third paragraph of the third book (Ἐπει μετοίκια Τιθασαφαργησι, &c.). But there seems no sufficient reason to consider the Hellenica as two works, because an expression at the end of the second book refers to the Athenian amnesty (Ἐτι καὶ ἐνώς διοικητικα, &c.) of b. c. 403, and because the death of Alexander of Phereas is recorded in the sixth. This would only prove that Xenophon had the work a long time under his hands. The division into books proves nothing, for that was posterior to Xenophon's time. (The Hellenica of Xenophon, and their division into books, by G. C. Lewis, Classical Museum, No. iv.)

The Hellenica is generally a dry narrative of events, and there is nothing in the treatment of them which gives a special interest to the work. Some events of importance are briefly treated, but a few striking incidents are presented with some particularity. There is an English translation of the Hellenica by W. Smith, the translator of Thucydides.

The Cyropaedia (Κυροπαιδία) in eight books, is a kind of political romance, the basis of which is the history of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. It shows how citizens are to be made virtuous and brave; and Cyrus is the model of a wise and good ruler. As a history it has no authority at all. Xenophon adopted the current stories as to Cyrus and the chief events of his reign, without any intention of subjecting them to a critical examination; nor have we any reason to suppose that his picture of Persian morals and Persian discipline is any thing more than a fiction, for we know that many of the usages of the Persians in the time of the first Dareius and his successors were different from the usages which Xenophon attributes to the Persians; and Xenophon himself affirms this. Besides this, Xenophon could know no more of the Persians in the time of the first Cyrus than of other Greeks; and, setting aside the improbability of his picture, we are certain that he could not know many things which he has introduced into his romance. His object was to represent what a state might be, and he placed the scene of his fiction far enough off to give it the colour of possibility. His own philosophical notions and the usages of Sparta were the real materials out of which he constructed his political system. The Cyropaedia is evidence enough that Xenophon did not like the political constitution of his own country, and that a well-ordered monarchy or kingdom appeared to him preferable to a democracy like Athens. The genuineness of the Epilogus or conclusion, in which Xenophon shows how the Persians had degenerated since the time of Cyrus, is doubted by some critics; but there seem to be no sufficient reasons. The author here says that the "Persians of his time, and the rest who were among them, were proved to be both less reverential towards the gods and less just to their kin, and more dishonest towards others, and less courageous in war now than they were before; and if any man has a contrary opinion, he will find, if he looks to their acts, that they testify to the truth of what I say." The Cyropaedia is one of the most pleasing of Xenophon's works, and it contains many good hints on the training of youth. Xenophon's remarks are practical; we do not find in his writings any thoughts that strike us as very profound or new, but we always discover careful observation of human life, good sense, and honest purpose. The dying speech of Cyrus (vii. 7) is worthy of the pupil of Socrates, and Cicero (de Senectute, 22) has transferred the substance of it to enforce his argument for the immortality of the soul. This passage may be assumed as evidence of Xenophon's belief in the existence of the soul (πνεῦμα) independent of the organised being in which it acts. "I never could be persuaded," says Cyrus, "that the soul lives so long as it is in a perishable body, and that it dies when it is released from it." The argument of Xenophon bears some resemblance to the argument of Bishop Butler, in his Analogy, where he treats of a future life (chap. i.). There is an English translation of the Cyropaedia, by Maurice Ashley Cowper. The Apologetics (Ἀξιογένεια) is a panegyric on Agesilaus II, king of Sparta, the friend of Xenophon. That Xenophon wrote such a work is proved by the list of Diogenes, and the testimony of Cicero (ad Fam. v. 12), who considers it a monument more glorious than all the statues of kings. Some modern critics do not consider the extant work as deserving of high praise, to which it may be replied, that it will be difficult to find a panegyric which is. It is a kind of composition in which failure can hardly be avoided. However true it may be, it is apt to be insipid and to appear exaggerated.

The Hipparchicus (Ἱππαρχικός) is a treatise on the duties of a commander of cavalry, and it contains many military precepts. One would be inclined to suppose that it was written at Athens, but this conclusion, like many others from internal evidence, is not satisfactory. A strain of devotion runs through the treatise; and on this the author makes the following remark near the end: "Now if any one admire that I have often used the expression 'God willing,' he must know that if he happen to be frequently in a state of danger, he will admire the less; and if he consider, that when there is war, the hostile parties form their designs against one another, but very seldom know what designs are formed against them severally. But all this may be gods know, and presignify them to whom they please by means of sacrifices, birds, voices, and dreams."

The treatise on the Horse (Ἱπποκρικός) was written after the Hipparchicus, to which treatise he refers at the end of the treatise on the Horse. "Since," says Xenophon, at the beginning of this treatise, "it happens that I have been accustomed to riding a horse for a long time, I consider that I am well acquainted with horses, and I wish to show my younger friends in what way I think that they may best meddle in the matter of a horse." The treatise is not limited to horsemanship, as regards the rider: it shows how a man is to avoid being cheated in buying a horse, how a horse is to be trained, and the like. In the beginning of the treatise Xenophon refers to a treatise on the same subject by Simon. The Ἰπποκρικός was translated into English, and printed by Henry Denham, London, 1584, 4to.

The Symposiaticus (Χυμνητικός) is a treatise on hunting, an amusement of which Xenophon was very fond; and on the dog, and the breeding and training of dogs, on the various kinds of game, and the mode of taking them. It is a treatise written by a genuine sportsman, who loved the exercise and the excitement of the chase; and it may be read with delight by any sportsman who deserves the name.

The two treatises on the Spartan and Athenian states (Ἀκροασμαίων Πολειτεία, and Ἀθηναίων Πολειτεία) were not always recognised as genuine works of Xenophon, even by the ancients. They pass under his name, and there is nothing in the internal evidence that appears to throw any doubt on the authorship. The writer clearly prefers Spartan to Athenian institutions. The "Republic of Athens" was translated into English by James Morris, 1794, 8vo.

A treatise on the Revenues of Athens (Πόροι ἤ περι Προονδων) is designed to show how the public revenue of Athens may be improved: it treats of the mode of increasing the number of resident strangers (μέτοχους), by improving their condition at Athens, which improvement would ultimately be beneficial to the revenue, and attract strangers; and it recommends such facilities to be given to strangers trading to Athens, as would induce them to come to a port where they were not compelled, as in many ports, to take merchandise, for want of a good current coin, but where they could take silver as a commodity in exchange, if they preferred it: he then proceeds to discuss the mode of improving the revenue by a better management of the Athenian silver mines, and to show that provision may thus be made for the poorer citizens and other purposes, without levying contributions on the allies and the subject states. This treatise was translated into English by Walter Moyle, 1697, 8vo., and is reprinted in his works. Bockh, in his Public Economy of Athens, translated into English by G. C. Lewis, has discussed this treatise of Xenophon, and the matter of it.

In the Memorabilia of Socrates, in four books (Ἀμνηστοέφωνα Σωκράτους) Xenophon defends the memory of his master against the charge of irreligion (i. 1) and of corrupting the Athenian youth. Socrates is represented as holding a series of conversations, in which he develops andcultivates moral doctrines in his peculiar fashion. It is entirely a practical work, such as we might expect from the practical nature of Xenophon's mind, and it professes to exhibit Socrates as he taught. It is true that it may exhibit only one side of the Socratic argumentation, and that it does not deal in those subtleties and verbal disputes which occupy so large a space in some of Plato's dialogues. Xenophon was a hearer of Socrates, an admirer of his master, and anxious to defend his memory. The charges against Socrates for which he suffered were (Mem. i. 1), that "Socrates was guilty of not believing in the gods which the state believed in, and in introducing other new daemons (δαιμόνια): he was also guilty of corrupting the youth." Xenophon (c. 1, 2) replies to these two charges specifically; and he then goes on to show (c. 3) what Socrates' mode of life was. The whole treatise is intended to be an answer to the charge for which Socrates was executed, and it is, therefore, in its nature, not intended to be a complete exhibition of Socrates. That it is a genuine picture of the man, is indisputable, and it is the most valuable memorial that we have of the practical philosophy of Socrates. The Memorabilia will always be undervalued by the lovers of the transcendental, who give to an unintelligible jargon of words the name of philosophy: it comes too near the common understanding (communis sensus) of mankind to be valued by those who would raise themselves above this common understanding, and who have yet to learn that there is not a single notion of philosophy which is not expressed or involved by implication in the common language of life. The Memorabilia and the Apology of Socrates (Ἀπολογία Σωκράτους πρὸς τοὺς δικαιάδας) have been translated into English by Sarah Fielding. The Apology of Socrates contains the reasons 403.
which induced Socrates to prefer death to life. It is not a first-rate performance; and because they do not consider it worthy of Xenophon, some critics would deny that he is the author; but this is an inconclusive reason. Lactantius states that Xenophon wrote an Apologia, and the original is as likely to have come down to us as a forgery.

In the Symposium (Συνεδρίων), or Banquet of Philosophers, Xenophon delineates the character of Socrates. The speakers are supposed to meet at the house of Callias, a rich Athenian, at the celebration of the great Panathenaeae. Socrates, Cratubulus, Antisthenes, Charmides, and others are the speakers. The accessories of the entertainment are managed with skill, and the piece is interesting as a picture of an Athenian drinking party, and of the amusement and conversation with which it was diversified. The nature of love and friendship is discussed. Some critics think that the Symposium is a juvenile performance, and that the Symposium of Plato was written after that of Xenophon; but it is an old tradition that the Symposium of Plato was written before that of Xenophon. The Symposium was translated into English by James Wellwood, 1710, reprinted 1750.

The Hiero ( Ηέρων ) Topvzwv, a dialogue between Hiero and Simonides, in which the king speaks of the dangers and difficulties incident to an exalted station, and the superior happiness of a private man. The poet, on the other hand, enumerates the advantages which the possession of power gives, and the means which it offers of obliging and doing services. Hiero speaks of the burden of power, and answers Simonides, who wonders why a man should keep that which is so troublesome, by saying that power is a thing which a man cannot safely lay down. Simonides offers some suggestions as to the best use of power, and the way of employing it for the public interest.
It is suggested by Letronne that Xenophon may have been led to write this treatise by what he saw at the court of Dionysius; and, as already stated, there is a story of his having visited Sicily in the lifetime of the tyrant of Syracuse. A translation of this piece, which is attributed to Elizabeth, queen of England, first appeared in octavo volume, London, 1743, entitled "A Miscellaneous Correspondence." It was also translated, in 1798, 8vo., by the Rev. James Graves, the translator of the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius.

The Oeconomicus (Οικονομικός) is a dialogue between Socrates and Critobulus, in which Socrates does by showing that there is an art called Oeconomics, which relates to the administration of a household and of a man's property. Socrates (c.
4), when speaking in praise of agriculture, quotes the instance of the younger Cyrus, who was fond of horticulture, and once showed to the Spartan Lysander the gardens which he had planned and the trees which he had planted with his own hands, Cicero copies this passage, in his treatise on Old Age (de Senectute, c. 17). Xenophon gives the same character of Cyrus, in this passage of the Oeconomicus, which he gives in the Amba-basis (i. 8, 9), which tends to confirm his being the author of the Ambabasis, if it needs confirmation.
In answer to the praises of agriculture, Critobulus speaks of the losses to which the husbandman is exposed from hail, frost, drought, and other causes.
The answer of Socrates is that the husbandman must trust in heaven, and worship the gods.

The seventh chapter is on the duty of a good wife,
as exemplified in the case of the wife of Ischomachus.
The wife's duty is to look after the interior of the household: the husband labours out of doors and produces that which the wife must use with frugality.
The wife's duty is to stay at home, and not to get abroad. It is an excellent chapter, abundant in good things, worthy of a woman's careful perusal, and adapted to practice. A wife who is perpetually leaving her home, is not the wife that Xenophon would have. It is a notion which one sees in some modern writers, that the attachment of husband and wife, independent of the sexual passion, and their permanent love after both have grown old, is a characteristic of modern society, and that the men of Greece and Rome were not susceptible of that affection which survives the decay of a woman's youth and beauty. The notion is too absurd to need confutation. The duties of a wife, says Ischomachus, give her great opportunities, by exercising which she will not have to fear "that as she grows older she will receive less respect in the household, but may be assured that as she advances in life, the better companion she becomes to her husband and the better guardian of her children, the more respect she will receive." This is one of the most admirable chapters of Xenophon; it has been several times translated into English. The last translation appears to be by R. Bradley, London, 1727, 8vo.

A man's character cannot be entirely derived from his writings, especially if they treat of exact science. Yet a man's writings are some index of his character, and when they are of a popular and varied kind, not a bad index. Xenophon, as we know him from his writings, was a humane man, at least for his age, a man of good understanding and strong religious feelings: we might call him superstitious, if the name superstition had a well-defined meaning. Some modern critics, who can judge of matters of antiquity with as much positive-ness as if all the evidence that exists were undoubted evidence, and as if they had all the evidence that is required, find much to object to in Xenophon's conduct as a citizen. He did not like Athenian institutions altogether; but a man is made a citizen of the commonwealth from the government under which he is born. His duty is to conform to it, or to withdraw himself. There is no evidence that Xenophon, after his banishment, acted against his native country, even at the battle of Coroneia. If we admit that his banishment was merited, and that is more than can be proved, there is no evidence that he did any thing after his banishment for which an exile can be blamed. If his preference of Spartan to Athenian institutions is matter for blame, he is blameable indeed. If we may form a conjecture of the man, he would have made an excellent citizen and a good administrator under a constitutional monarchy; but he was not fitted for the turbulence of an Athenian democracy, which, during a great part of his lifetime, was not more to the taste of a quiet man than France under the Convention. All antiquity and all modern writers agree in allowing Xenophon great merit as a writer of plain, simple, periphrastic, and unaffected style. His mind was not adapted for pure philosophical speculation: he looked to the practical in all things; and the basis of his philosophy was a strong belief in a divine mediation in the government of the world. His belief only requires a little correction and modification, to allow us to describe it as a profound conviction that God, in the constitution of things, has given a moral government to the world, as manifestly as he has given laws for the mechanical and chemical actions of matter, the organisation of plants and animals, and the vital energies of all beings which live and move.

There are numerous editions of the whole and of the separate works of Xenophon. The Hellecnics, the first of Xenophon's works that appeared in type, was printed at Venice, 1503, fol. by the elder Aldus, with the title of Paralipomena, and as a supplement to Thucydides, which was printed the year before. The first general edition is that of E. Boninus, printed by P. Giunta, and dedicated to Leo X., Florence, 1516, fol.; but this edition does not contain the Agesilus, the Apology, and the treatise on the Revenue of Athens. A part of the treatise on the Athenian Commonwealth is also wanting. This edition of Giunta is a very good specimen of early printing, and useful to an editor of Xenophon. The edition by Andrea of Asola, printed by A. and A. at Venice, 1525, fol., contains all the works of Xenophon, except the Hellenics, though the Apology was already edited by J. Runcilin, Hagenaus, 1520, 4to., with the Agesilus and Hiero. The Basel edition, printed by N. Bry-linger, 1545, fol. is the first edition of the Greek text with a Latin translation. The edition of H. Stephens, 1561, fol., contains an amended text, and the edition of 1581 has a Latin version. The edition of Weiske, Leipzig, 1798—1804, 6 vols. 8vo., did something towards the improvement of the text. The most pretended edition is that of Gall, Paris, 6 vols. 4to. 1797—1804; a seventh volume, in three parts, published afterwards, contains the various readings of three MSS., notices on the MSS., and observations, literary and critical, and an Atlas of maps and plans. This edition contains the Greek text, the Latin version, a French version and notes; the Latin version is that of Leucratius, occasionally corrected; and the French is not entirely new, for the author took the French versions already existing of various parts of Xenophon's works. Letenne, in his article on Xenophon (Bifog. Univ.), has given an account of this pompous edition, which has very little merit. J. G. Schneider revised the edition of Zeune, and the various parts of the works of Xenophon appeared between 1791 and 1815. The editions of the several works are too numerous to be mentioned.

Fabricius (Bibliotheca Graecae), Scholl (Geschichte der Griechischen Literature), Letenne (Bifog. Univ. art. Xenophon), and Hoffmann (Lexicon Bibliogra-phicum) will furnish full information about the numerous editions and translations. As to the seven Epistles attributed to Xenophon, among the one and forty so-called Socratic Epistles, the same remark applies to them as to most of the Greek and literary remains of that class; they are mere rhetorical essays. [G. L.]

XENOPHON (Ξενοφῶν), minor literary persons. 1. An Athenian, the brother of the poet Pythostratus. He wrote a biography of Epami-nondas and Pelopidas, and some other works. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 59.)

2. An historical writer, the author of an account of Hannibal (ibid.).

3. A native of Lampascus, a writer on geography, mentioned by Pliny (H. N. iv. 13, vi. 31) and Solinus (c. 22, 60). He was also in all pro-

4. A native of Antioch, the author of an ama-tory narrative, or collection of narratives, entitled Βιβλιοθήκη. (Suid. s. v.)

5. A native of Ephesus, the author of a romance, still extant, entitled Εφησιακα, or the Loves of Anthis and Abrocomas (Ἐφησιακα, τὰ κατὰ Ἀρ-θιαν καὶ Ἀβροκόμοι). The style of the work is simple, and the story is conducted without confusion, notwithstanding the number of personages introduced. The adventures are of a very improbable kind. Suidas is the only ancient writer who mentions Xenophon. The age when he lived is uncertain. Locella assigns him to the age of the Antonines. Peerlamp regards him as the oldest of the Greek romance writers, and thinks that he has discovered in other writers of this class traces of an imitation of Xenophon. He also maintains that Xenophon was not the real name of the author, and that, with the exception of Heliodorus, no Greek romance writer published his productions under that name.

Since Suidas, Angelus Politianus (in the 15th century) was the first writer who mentioned the Εφησιακα of Xenophon. But although he had quoted a passage from the work, its existence was doubted or denied by several scholars of the 17th century. Even after an Italian translation by A. M. Salvini had been published (1728), and the Greek text had been printed in 1726, Lenglet du Fresnoy, in 1734, denied the existence of the original.

There is but a single manuscript of the work known (in the monastery of the Monte Cassino). The Greek text was first published by Ant. Cocchi, with a Latin translation (London, 1726). This edition contains numerous errors. A still worse edition was published at Lucca (1701), containing, besides the Latin translation of Cocchi, the Italian version of Salvini, and the French version of Jourdan. Xenophon was still more unfortunate in his next editor, Polyzois Kontu (Vienna, 1753). A very excellent and carefully prepared edition was published by Baron de Locella (Vienna, 1796). He procured a fresh collation of the manuscript, and availed himself of the critical remarks of Hemsterhuis, D'Abrerech, and D'Orville (Miscellaneous Observations, vols. iii.—vi.), and the labours of F. J. Bast, who had made preparations for editing the work. Locella also prepared a new translation and a commentary. The Ephesiaca was reprinted by C. W. Mitscherlich, in his Scriptores Erotici Graeci. Another good edition is that of P. Hofmann Peerlamp (Harlem, 1818). The most recent edition is that of P. Passow (Leipzig, 1833, in the Corpus Scriptorum Eroticiorum Graecorum).

There are German translations by G. A. Bürger, Hüsinlin, E. C. Reisko (or rather his wife), in his collections Zur Moral (Dessau and Leipzig, 1782, and Hellas, Leipzig, 1791), and Krabinger, besides one that appeared anonymously. In French there are translations by P. Bauche (Paris, 1786), and J. B. Jourdan (Paris, 1748). A translation of the Ephesiaca also forms the seventh volume of the Bibliothèque des Romans traduits du Grec (Paris, 1797). An anonymous translation, with notes, was published at Paris in 1823. The Italian translation of Salvini has several times been republished. There is also an English translation by

6. A native of Cyprus, the author of a work of the same kind as the preceding, entitled Κομπράγιον. (Suid. s. v.)

7. For some others of this name the reader is referred to Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. p. 1, note α., p. 833; comp. Menag. de Diog. Laërt. ii. 59). [C. P. M.]

ΧΕΝΟΦΩΝ (Xenopho'tus), the name of two (or more probably three) physicians. 1. A pupil of Praxagoras (Oribas. Coll. Medic. xiv. 8, p. 12, in Mul's Class. Auct. et Vatic. Codic. Edit. Rom. 1831), who must therefore have lived in the fourth century B.C. perhaps also in the third. He is probably the native of Cos mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 6, § 59); perhaps also the physician quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. ii. 13, p. 416). It is also shown by M. Litré (Oeuvres d' Hippocr. lib. i. pp. 75, 76) that he is the person alluded to, but not named, by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. Prognost. i. 4, vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 19); and therefore he is perhaps also the physician mentioned by the same author (De Diēb. Decret. ii. 7, vol. ix. p. 872), as having written on the subject of critical days.

2. One of the followers of Erasistratus, who lived somewhat earlier than Apollonius of Memphis (Galen, Introduct. c. 10, vol. xiv. p. 700), and therefore in the third century B.C., perhaps also in the fourth. He is by some modern writers supposed to be the same person as the physician mentioned above; but it is hardly probable that the same person could have been pupil to both Praxagoras and Erasistratus. He wrote of the parts of the human body. (Galen, l. c.) It is not certain which of these two physicians is the person quoted by Oribasius (ibid. xiv. 11, p. 41), and Soranus. (De Arte Obstet. p. 257, ed. Dietz.)

3. A native of Cos, and a descendant of the family of the Asclepiadæ, who was a physician to the emperor Claudius, and who obtained from him certain privileges for his native island. He was afterwards induced by Agrippina to murder the emperor by means of a poisoned feather, which he introduced into his mouth under the pretense of making him vomit, a. d. 54. (Tac. Ann. xii. 61, 67.) [W. A. G.] ΧΕΝΟΦΟΝ, artist. 1. A sculptor, of Athens, contemporary with the elder Cephisodotus, in conjunction with whom he made the statue of Zeus, which is described under Cephisodotus, No. 1, p. 667, b. In another passage, Pausanias mentions the statue of Fortune, carrying her son Plutus, in her temple at Thebes, the face and hands of which, the Thébans said, they made by Xenophon of Athens, and the rest of the work by a native artist, named Callistionicus. (Paus. ix. 16. § 1.)

2. A sculptor, of Paros, of whom nothing is known, beyond the mention of his name by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 59). [P. S.]

XERXES I. (Ze'r(n), king of Persia B.C. 485—465. The name is said by Herodotus (vi. 98) to signify the warrior, but it is probably the same word as the Zend kṣatrā and the Sanscrit kāhatra, "a king." Xerxes was the son of Dareius and Atossa. Dareius was married twice. By his first wife, the daughter of Gobryas, he had three children before he was raised to the throne; and by his second wife, Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, he had four children after he had become king of Persia. Artabazanes, the eldest son of the former marriage, and Xerxes, the eldest son of the latter, each laid claim to the succession; but Dareius decided in favour of Xerxes, no doubt through the influence of his mother Atossa, who completely ruled Dareius.

Xerxes succeeded his father at the beginning of B.C. 485. Dareius had died in the midst of his preparations against Greece, which had been interrupted by a revolt of the Egyptians. The first care of Xerxes was to reduce the latter people to submission. He accordingly invaded Egypt at the beginning of the second year of his reign (B.C. 484), compelled the people again to submit to the Persian yoke, and then returned to Persia, leaving his brother Artaxerxes, governor of Egypt. The next four years were devoted to preparations for the invasion of Greece. It was his object to collect a mighty armament, which might not simply be sufficient to conquer Europe, but which might display the power and magnificence of the greatest monarch of the world. Troops were gathered together from all quarters of the wide-spread Persian empire, and even the most distant nations subject to his sway were required to send their contingents. Critallia in Cappadocia was the place of meeting, and there they came pouring in, nomad hordes from the steppes of central Asia, dark-coloured tribes from the rivers flowing into the Indus, and negroes from the inland parts of Africa, as well as from all the intermediate countries. Immense stores of provisions were at the same time collected from all parts of the Persian empire, and deposited at suitable stations along the line of march. The fleet was furnished by the Phoenicians, Ionians and other maritime peoples of the Euphrates. An agreement also was made with the Carthaginians, that they should attack the Greek cities in Sicily and Italy, while Xerxes invaded the mother country. Two great works were at the same time undertaken, which might bear witness to the grandeur and power of the Persian monarch. He ordered that a bridge of boats should be thrown across the Hellespont, and that a canal should be cut through the isthmus of Mount Athos, on which the fleet of Mardonius had been wrecked in B.C. 492. The bridge across the Hellespont stretched from the neighbourhood of Abydos on the Asiatic side to the coast between Sestos and Madytus on the European, where the strait is about an English mile in breadth. The work was entrusted to Phoenicians and Egyptians; but after it had been completed, it was destroyed by a violent storm. Xerxes was so enraged that he caused the heads of the chief engineers to be cut off, and commanded that the strait itself should be scourged, and a set of fetters cast into it. A new bridge was constructed, of which Herodotus has left us a minute account (viii. 36). There were in fact two bridges formed of two lines of ships; but our limits prevent us from entering into the details of their construction. The canal cut through the isthmus of Mount Athos from the Strymonic to the Toronacic gulph was about a mile and a half long, and was broad and deep enough for two triremes to sail abreast. This work is said to have occupied a multitude of workmen for a space of three years. That these works were unnecessary is no proof that they were never executed; for Xerxes' invasion of Greece must not be judged by the necessities or probabilities of any ordinary war. It was rather a lavish display of human life and human labour to gratify the caprice and magnify the power of an Eastern despot, than simply a military force collected for the conquest of a formidable enemy. The cutting of the canal through Mount Athos has been rejected as a falsehood by numerous writers both ancient and modern. Juvenal speaks of it (x. 174) as a specimen of Greek meindacity, " creditor olim

Velificatus Athos, et quidquid Graccia mendax

Audent in historin," and Niebuhr denies it most positively as a thing quite incomprehensible. (Vortrage uber alte Geschicchte, vol. i. p. 403.) But since it is evident that Herodotus went in person over the whole ground traversed by the Persian army, the mere fact that he gives a most minute description of this canal (vii. 37) ought to convince every one of its existence even without any further evidence, since he certainly never said that he saw what he did not see. There are, however, the most distinct traces of it at the present day, as is shown by Lieutenant Wolfe, who has given an account of its present condition in the article "Athos" which he wrote in the "Penny Cyclopaedia."

In the autumn of B.C. 481 Xerxes arrived at Sardis, and early in the spring of the following year commenced his march towards the Hellespont. So great was the number of the army that it was seven days and seven nights in crossing the bridges without a moment of intermission. The march was continued through the Thracian Chersonese till it reached the plain of Doriscus, which is near the sea, and is traversed by the river Hebrus. The army was here joined by the fleet, which had not entered the Hellespont, but had sailed westward round the southernmost promontory of the Thracian Chersonese. At this plain Xerxes resolved to number both his land and naval forces. The mode employed for numbering the foot soldiers was remarkable. Ten thousand men were first numbered and packed together as closely as they could stand; a line was drawn and a wall built round the place they had occupied, into which all the soldiers entered successively, till the whole army was thus measured. There were found to be a hundred and seventy of these divisions, thus making a total of 1,700,000 foot. Besides these there were 80,000 horse, and many war-chariots and camels, with about 20,000 men. Herodotus has left us a most minute and interesting catalogue of the nations comprising this mighty army with their various military equipments and different modes of fighting. The land forces contained forty-six nations. (Herod. vii. 61, foll.) The fleet consisted of 1207 triremes, and 3000 smaller vessels. Each trireme was manned by 200 rowers and 30 fighting men; and each of the accompanying vessels carried 80 men according to the calculation of Herodotus. Thus the naval force would amount to 517,610. The whole armament, both military and naval, which passed over from Asia to Doriscus, would accordingly amount to 2,817,610 men. Nor was this all. In his march from Doriscus to Thermopylae, Xerxes received a still further accession of strength. The Thracian tribes, the Macedonians, and the other nations in Europe whose territories he traversed supplied 300,000 men, and 120 triremes containing an aggregate of 24,000 men. Thus when he reached Thermopylae the land and sea forces amounted to 2,641,610 fighting men. This does not include the attendants, the slaves, the crews of the provision ships, &c., which according to the supposition of Herodotus were more in number than the fighting men; but supposing them to have been equal, the total number of male persons who accompanied Xerxes to Thermopylae reaching the astounding figure of 5,203,220! In addition to this, there were the eunuchs, concubines and female cooks, of whom no one could tell the amount, nor that of the beasts of burden, cattle and Indian dogs. (Herod. vii. 184—187.)

Such vast numbers seem incredible, and have led many writers to impeach either the veracity or the good sense of the historian. They are rejected altogether by Niebuhr in his Lectures on Ancient History, who asserts that it is impossible that the seventh book of Herodotus can be an historical relation, and considers it as founded on the epic poem of Chorælus. On the other hand, Heeren is disposed to receive the numerical totals of Herodotus without question. The view which Mr. Grote takes is more cautious and is characterized by his usual good sense and critical acumen. As the subject has occasioned so much controversy, his remarks deserve to be quoted at length. "To admit this overwhelming total, or anything near to it is extraordinarily impossible: yet the disparaging remarks which it has drawn down upon Herodotus are no way merited. He takes pains to distinguish that which informants told him, from that which he merely guessed. His description of the review at Doriscus is so detailed, that he had evidently conversed with persons who were present at it, and had learnt the separate totals promulgated by the enumerators—infantry, cavalry, and ships of war, great and small. As to the number of triremes, his statement seems beneath the truth, as we may judge from the contemporary authority of Aeschylus, who in the "Persæ" gives the exact number of 1207 Persian ships as having fought at Salamis: but between Doriscus and Salamis Herodotus has himself enumerated 647 ships as lost or destroyed, and only 129 as added. No exaggeration therefore can well be suspected in this statement, which would imply about 276,000 as the number of the crews, though there is here a confusion or omission in the narrative which we cannot clear up. But the aggregate of 3000 smaller ships, and still more that of 1,700,000 infantry, are far less trustworthy. There would be little or no motive for the enumerators to be exact, and every motive for them to exaggerate—an immense nominal total would be no less pleasing to the army than to the monarch himself—so that the military total of land-force and ships' crews which Herodotus gives as 2,641,000 on the arrival at Thermopylae, may be dismissed as unwarrantable and incredible. .... Weighing the circumstances of the case well, and considering that this army was the result of a maximum of effort throughout the vast empire—that a great numerical total was the thing chiefly demanded—and that prayers for exemption were regarded by the great king as a capital offence—and that provisions had been collected for three years before along the line of march—we may well believe that the numbers of Xerxes were greater than were ever assembled in ancient times, or perhaps at any known epoch of history. But it would be rash to pretend to guess at any positive number, in the entire absence of any ascertained data; and when we learn from Thucydides that he found it impossible to find out the exact numbers of the small armies of Greeks who fought at Mantinea, we shall not be ashamed to avow our inability to count the Asiatic multitudes at Doriscus." (Hist. of Greece, vol. v. p. 46, foll.)

After the review of Doriscus Xerxes continued his march through Thrace in three divisions, and along three different lines of road. The tribes through which he marched had to furnish a day's meal for the immense host, and for this purpose had made preparations many months beforehand. The cost of feeding such a multitude brought many of the cities of Thrace to the brink of ruin: the city of Salmas alone on account of their possessions on the main land, expended no less a sum for this purpose than 400 talents. On reaching Acanthus, near the isthmus of Athos, Xerxes left his fleet, which received orders to sail through the canal that had been dug across the isthmus, to double the two peninsulas of Sithonia and Pallene, and await his arrival at Therme, afterwards called Thessalonica (now Saloniki), a little to the east of the mouth of the river Axios. After joining his fleet at Therme, Xerxes marched through Mygdonia and Bottaeis, as far as the mouth of the Haliacmon. Hitherto his march had been through territory subject to the Persian empire, and he now entered Macedonia, the monarch of which reverently tendered his submission, and undertook to conduct him further.

The Greeks had originally intended to defend the defile of Tempe, the northernmost entrance of Greece, and they sent thither a force of 10,000 men, in order to check the urgent desires of the Thessalians. But upon arriving there the Greeks found that it would be impossible to hold the pass, as the Persians could land troops in their rear, and there was another pass across the mountains east of Tempe, by which the Persians could enter Thessaly. The Greeks therefore returned to the isthmus about the same time as Xerxes crossed the Hellespont. Their retreat was followed by the submission of the whole of Thessaly to Xerxes, who accordingly met with no opposition till he reached Thermopylae. Here the Greeks resolved to make a stand. This pass was in one important respect better adapted for defence than that of Tempe, for the mainland was here separated from the island of Euboea only by a narrow strait, so that by defending the strait with their fleet the Persians could not land troops in their rear on the mainland. Accordingly, while Leonidas, king of Sparta, conducted a land force to Thermopylae, his colleague Eurybiades returned the same day to the isthmus and joined the army of Xerxes with a considerable force to the north of Euboea, and took up his position on the northern coast, which faced Magnesia, and which was called Artemisium from the temple of Artemis belonging to the town of Histiaeas.

The remainder of the history of the invasion of Xerxes is so fully related in other articles in this work [Themistocles; Euryblades; Leonidas; Aristides; Mardonius], that it is only necessary in this place to give a very brief enumeration of the subsequent events. Xerxes arrived in safety with his land forces before Thermopylae, but his fleet was overtaken by a violent storm and hurricane off the coast of Sepias in Magnesia, by which at least four hundred ships of war were destroyed, as well as an immense number of transports. The Greeks, who had in a panic deserted Artemisium and sailed to Chaleis in Euboea, thus leaving Xerxes at full liberty to communicate with his fleet, now took courage, and sailed back to their former position at Artemisium. On their arrival they found the Persian fleet, which had recovered from the effects of the storm, drawn up on the opposite coast in the neighbourhood of Aphetamine. Meantime Xerxes had attempted to force his way through the pass of Thermopylae, but his troops were repulsed again and again by Leonidas and his gallant band. At last a Malian, of the name of Ephialtes, showed the Persians a pass over the mountains of Oeta, and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Persians. The Spartans disdained to fly, and were all slain after performing miracles of valour [Leonidas]. On the same days on which Leonidas was fighting with the land forces of Xerxes, the Greek ships at Artemisium attacked the Persian fleet. In the first battle, which was not fought till late in the day, the Greeks had the advantage, and in the following night the Persian ships suffered still more from a violent storm, which blew right upon the shore at Aphetamine. The same storm completely destroyed a squadron of the Persian fleet, which had been sent to sail round Euboea in order to cut off the retreat of the Greeks. The Persian ships at Aphabetæ had been too much damaged to renew the fight on the following day, but the day after they again sailed out and offered battle to the Greeks. The contest lasted the whole day, and both sides fought with the greatest courage. Although the Greeks at the close still maintained their position, and had destroyed a great number of the enemy's ships, yet their own loss was considerable, and half the Athenian ships was disabled. Under these circumstances the Greek commanders saw that it was impossible to remain at Artemisium any longer, and their resolution to retreat was quickened by the disastrous intelligence that Xerxes was master of the pass at Thermopylae. Upon this they forthwith abandoned Artemisium and retired to Salamin, opposite the southwestern coast of Attica.

The Peloponnesians had resolved to retire within the peninsula, and to build a wall across the isthmus. It was now too late to send an army into Boeotia, and Attica thus lay exposed to the full vengeance of the invader. The fleet had been ordered to assemble at Troizen in order to co-operate with the land forces for the protection of the Peloponnesus, and Euryblades had only remained at Salamin at the earnest entreaty of the Athenians, in order to assist them in the transport of their forces. They had already received the urgent entreaties of Athens and the Boeotians urged them at once to remove the women, children, and infirm persons to Salamin, Aegina, and Trozen, and within six days the whole population with few exceptions left the country. The greater number were conveyed to Trozen, where they were received most hospitably, and maintained at the public expense. Meantime Xerxes had entered Phocis, which he laid waste with fire and sword. At Panopeus he sent a detachment of his army to plunder Delphi, while he himself marched into Boeotia with the main body of his forces. All the people of Boeotia submitted to him with the exception of the inhabitants of Thespiae and Plateæa, which were deserted by their citizens, and were both burnt by Xerxes. Thus he reached Athens.

without encountering any resistance. But the detachment which had been sent against Delphi met with a signal defeat: according to tradition it was by no mortal hands that they were turned to flight, but the god defended his own sanctuary, and hurled down immense comas upon the invaders. That the Persians failed in their attempt upon Delphi must be received as an historical fact; for the offerings of the Lydian kings, and others of an earlier time, were still seen there by Herodotus; but the means by which they were repulsed must remain unknown. About the same time as Xerxes entered Athens, his fleet arrived in the bay of Phalerum. He now resolved upon an engagement with the Greek fleet. The history of this memorable battle, of the previous dissensions among the Greek commanders, and of the glorious victory of the Greeks at the last, is fully related elsewhere. [THEMISTOCLES.] Xerxes witnessed the battle from a lofty seat, which was erected for him on the shore of the mainland on one of the declivities of Mount Aegealos, and thus beheld with his own eyes the defeat and dispersion of his mighty armament. The Greeks expected a renewal of the battle on the following day, but Xerxes now became alarmed for his own safety, and resolved to leave Greece immediately. He was confirmed in his resolution by Mardonius, who undertook to complete the conquest with 300,000 of his troops. Xerxes accordingly ordered the fleet to sail to the Hellespont, and there to guard the bridge till his arrival; he left Mardonius the number of troops which he requested, and with the remainder set out on his march homewards. His own personal escort consisted of 60,000 men under the command of Artabazus, and he reached the Hellespont in forty-five days from the time of his departure from Attica. His troops suffered much in the retreat from the want of provisions, and many died of hunger; but the account which Aeschylus gives in the "Persae" of the dreadful calamities which overtook the retreating army is probably much exaggerated.* On arriving at the Hellespont, Xerxes found the bridge of boats destroyed by a storm, and he crossed over to Asia by ship. He entered Sardis towards the end of the year, n. c. 490, humbled and defeated, only eight months after he had left it full of arrogance and sure of victory.

In the following year, n. c. 479, the war was continued in Greece; but Mardonius was defeated at Plataea by the combined forces of the Greeks, and on the same day another victory was gained over the Persians at Mycale in Ionia. [MARDONIUS.] Next year, n. c. 478, the Persians lost their last possession in Europe by the capture of Sestos on the Hellespont. Thus the struggle was virtually brought to an end, though the war still continued for several years longer. We know little more of the personal history of Xerxes. Soon after his arrival at Sardis he fell in love with the wife of his brother Masistes, whom he solicited in vain to yield to his desires. In order to gain her, he married her daughter Artaynte to his own son Dareius; but shortly afterwards he transferred his affections from the mother to the daughter. His amour with Artaynte became known to Amestris, the wife of Xerxes, by his giving to his favourite a cloak which Amestris had woven for him with her own hands. Amestris meditated and took dire revenge. She obtained possession of the wife of Masistes, and mutilated her in a horrible manner. Masistes therefore attempted to escape to Bactria with his sons, of which country he was satrap, intending there to raise the standard of revolt; but Xerxes, who anticipated his object, sent some troops after him, who killed both him and his sons. (Herod. ix. 106—113.) In n. c. 465 Xerxes, after a reign of twenty years, was murdered by Artabazus and the eunuch Spani- tres, or Mithridates, as he is also called. Arta- banus was an Hyrcanian by birth, and one of the highest officers of his court. He had seven sons in the prime of life, and resolved to place himself upon the throne of Persia and found a new dy- nasty. For this purpose it was necessary to get rid of the sons of Xerxes. According to Ctesias and Justin, Xerxes had left only two sons, Dareius and Artaxerxes, but Diodorus mentions a third, Hystaspes, who was satrap of Bactria and absent from court at his father's death. As soon as Xerxes was slain, the conspirators informed Arta- banus that Dareius had been the murderer of his father, and persuaded the young prince to give instant orders for the execution of his brother. Ar- tabanus shortly afterwards attempted to murder Artaxerxes, but the plot was discovered, and Arta- banus and his sons were put to death. (Diod. xi. 69 ; Ctesias, Pers. c. 29; Justin, iii. 1.)

Herodotus (vii. 187) describes Xerxes as the tallest and handsomest man amidst the vast host which he led against Greece. His character appears to have been worse than most of the Per- sian monarchs; for, according to Herodotus, he was a coward as well as a cruel tyrant. The three last books of Herodotus are the great authority for the invasion of Greece by Xerxes; and among modern writers the history is best related by Mr. Grote in the fifth volume of his History of Greece, to which we have been much indebted in drawing up the preceding narrative.

XERXES I. (ςέρξης), the only legitimate son of Artaxerxes I., succeeded his father as king of Persia in n. c. 425, but was murdered after a short reign of only two months by his half-brother Sog- dianus or Secundianus, who thus became king. (Diod. xii. 71 ; Ctesias, Pers. c. 44.)

XERXES (ςέρξης), king of Arsamosata, in the western part of Armenia. Polybius relates that Antiochus was preparing to lay siege to Arsamosa- tata, but Xerxes submitted to him, and received in consequence the daughter of the Syrian king in marriage. This Antiochus was probably Antiochus III. There are coins of Xerxes extant, of which a specimen is annexed. (Polyb. viii. 25 ; Droysen, Geschichte des Helenismus, vol. ii. p. 73 ; Eckhel, vol. iii. p. 204.)

- See Grote, History of Greece, vol. v. pp. 190, 191, note, where foreible reasons are adduced to show that the loss of the army in crossing the river Strymon is probably a fable.

COIN OF XERXES, KING OF ARSAMOSATA.
XERXES (Σιθρύς), a son of Mithridates, who fell into the hands of Pompey in consequence of the insurrection of the town of Phanagoria, where he with several of his brothers had been placed for security, b. c. 64. He afterwards adorned Pompey's triumph at Rome. (Appian, Mithr. 108, 117.)

XIPHAIRES (Σφαφής), the son of Mithridates and Stratonic, was put to death by his father in consequence of the conduct of his mother, of which an account is given elsewhere. [Stratonice, No. 6.]

XIPHILINUS, GEOERGIUS (Γεώργιος ο Ειφαλως), patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 1193—1199. A few constitutions of his are mentioned, the most important of which, De Juribus Territoriorum, is published by Leunclavius in his Jurs Graeco-Romanum, vol. i. p. 203. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. xii. pp. 41, 42.)

XIPHILINUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ο Ειφαλως). 1. Patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 1066—1075, was of a noble family of Træpezus (Trebizond). He published a few constitutions on ecclesiastical matters, which are printed by Leunclavius in his Jurs Graeco-Romanum, and also an Oration on the Adoration of the Cross, which is printed in Greuter's work on the Cross, Ingolstadt, 1616. There are also some orations of this Xiphilinus published by Ch. Fr. Matthaei under the title of Τομείς, Ἐκκλησιών, et Basilii Magni aliquot Orations, Moscone, 1775; but the writer is unable to state what these orations are, as he has not seen the book. This Xiphilinus has been frequently confounded with his nephew. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1066.)

2. Of Træpezus, the nephew of the preceding, was a monk at Constantinople, and made an abridgement of Dion Cassius from the thirty-sixth to the eightieth book at the command of the emperor Michael VII. Duca, who reigned from A. D. 1071 to 1078. Xiphilinus did not preserve the original arrangement of Dion Cassius, who divided his work into three parts, but distributed it into sections (παραπαραθηκας), each of which contained the life of an emperor. He omitted the names of the consuls, which Dion Cassius always inserted, and sometimes he took the liberty to alter and amend the original. The work is executed with the usual carefulness which characterizes most epitomes, and is only of value as preserving the main facts of the original, the greater part of which is lost. As an example of the carefulness of Xiphilinus, we may mention a passage (lxii. 32) in which he refers the reader to a previous statement, which is, however, omitted in the Epitome. That he omitted many statements of considerable importance, and which certainly ought to have been preserved even in an abridgment, is evident from Zonarinos, who has preserved many passages of Dion Cassius which are omitted by Xiphilinus. [Zonarinos.] For editions and further particulars see Dion Cassius.

XUTHUS (Σωθύς), a son of Hellen by the nymph Orsis, and a brother of Dorus and Aeloenas. He was king of Peloponnesus, and the husband of Creusa, the daughter of Erechtheus, by whom he became the father of Achaeus and Ion (Eurip. Ion. 63, &c.; Apollod. i. 7. § 3). Others state that after the death of his father Hellen, Xuthus was expelled from Thessaly by his brothers, and went to Athens, where he married the daughter of Erechtheus. After the death of Erechtheus, Xuthus being chosen arbitrator, adjudged the kingdom to his eldest brother-in-law, Cercops, in consequence of which he was expelled by the other sons of Erechtheus, and settled at Aegialos in Peloponnesus. (Paus. vii. 1. § 21; comp. Herod. vii. 94.) [L. S.]

ZACHARIAS (Ζαχαρίας). 1. An ecclesiastical writer, commonly known by the name of Zacharias Rhetor. He was bishop of Melitene, and was the author of an ecclesiastical history embracing the period from A. D. 450 to A. D. 491. In the judgment of the orthodox Evagrius this work was written with a bias in favour of the Nestorians. (Evagrius, ii. 2, iii. 5, 6, 7, 16; comp. Nicipheros, xvi. 5, 6, 9. &c.) A Syriac translation, which bears no author's name, is claimed as the translation of the work of Zacharias by Asseman (Bibl. Orient. vol. ii. p. 53, &c.; comp. Le Quien, Orient. Christ. i. p. 442).

2. The preceding should no doubt be distinguished from Zacharias surnamed Scholastics. The latter studied philosophy at Alexandria, and jurisprudence at Berytus. After some time he was made bishop of Mytilene in Lesbos, and while in this office was present at the council held at Constantinople in A. D. 536, in the Acta of which he is several times mentioned. There is still extant a work by Zacharias, entitled Αμιμώνων. It professed to be a dialogue held with a disciple of Ammonius, and to contain the substance of a discussion held at Alexandria with Ammonius himself and one Gessius, a physician. The design of the work is to refute the favourite Platonic doctrine of the eternity of the universe. (Οτι ου συναξωσις του αιωνος αυτου του μεταστασιος, &c., and the occasion which led to its composition was the endeavour of a disciple of Ammonius who had come to Berytus to spread a new philosophical teaching. (Christ. Orient. vol. ii. p. 53.) The style of Zacharias is formed very much in imitation of that of Plato. This dialogue was published in Greek and Latin by J. Tarin, in connection with the Philologia of Origenes (Paris, 1619). It is also to be found in K. Barth's edition of Aeneas of Gaza (Leipzig, 1655). There is also extant a short piece by Zacharias, entitled Αντιφημις Ζαχαρίας, έπισκόπου Μετιλενμονος, των παραραγοντων του Μακραονος διελέγοντος. The Greek text has not been printed, but there is a Latin translation of it by F. Turrianius in H. Ca-nisi Thesaur. Mon. Eccles. et Hist. Antv. 1723, vol. vi. p. 428. Zacharias is also mentioned as having written commentaries on Aristotle. (Cod. Bibli. Cudini; comp. Montfaucon, p. 598.)

4. Patriarch of Alexandria, respecting whose name, which is Zachary, is not known, there is a short letter to Joannes Abbos the reader is referred to Asseman (Bibl. Orient. ii. p. 145, &c.).

5. There are several more ecclesiastics and others of this name, respecting whom the reader may consult Asseman (l. c.) and Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. x. pp. 625—638).

ZACYNTHUS (Ζακύνθος), a son of Dardanus of Paophis who is said to have led a colony to the island of Zacyntus, which derived its name from ZALEUCUS.

him. (Paus. vii. 24. § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v. Zālκυαβος.)

[L. S.]

ZAGREUS (Zαγρευς), a surname of the mystic Dionysus (Διόνυσος Χοδόνος), whom Zeus, in the form of a dragon, is said to have begotten by Persephone, previously to her being carried off by Pluto (Callim. Fragn. 171, ed. Benti.; Etym. Mag-

n. s. v. Orph. Hymn. 29; Orv. Met. vi. 114;

Nonnus, Dion. vi. 294). He was born to pieces by the Titans, though he defended himself bravely, and assumed various forms; and Athena carried his heart to Zeus. (Tzetz. ad Lycoch. 355; Lo-beck, Agliapoth. p. 547, &c.)

[L. S.]

ZALEUCUS (Zαλευκος), the celebrated lawgiver of the Epizephyrian Locrians, is said to have been originally a slave employed as a shepherd, and to have been set free and appointed lawgiver by the direction of an oracle on his enunciating some excellent laws which he represented Athenae as having communicated to him in a dream. (Suid.
Böckh). On the other hand, Diodorus (xii. 20) describes him as a man of good family and admired for his culture. But in calling him a disciple of Pythagoras (comp. Suid. l. c.; Seneca, Epist. x.; Diog. Laërt. vii. 16; Iamblichus, c. 7, 24, 27, 30), he has made a great anachronism (see Bentley, Dissertations on the Epistles of Philostratus, p. 334, &c.). The story of this connection probably arose in much the same way as in the case of Numa Pompilius. Suidas also states that the birthplace of Zaleucus was Thrull. Timaeus, with more rash-ness than judgment, denied the personal existence of Zaleucus (Cic. de Leg. ii. 6, ad Att. vi. 1; comp.
Arist. Pol. ii. 10; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 352).
The date of the legislation of Zaleucus is assigned by Eusebius (Chron. Anno 1356, Ol. 30. 1) to b.c.
660. (Comp. Bentley, L. c.; Wesseling, ad Diot.
xii. 20; Clinton, Fasti Hellenici, vol. i. anno 660.)
The code of Zaleucus is stated to have been the first collection of written laws that the Greeks possessed (Strab. vi. p. 239; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 309); nor does there seem sufficient reason for restricting this statement to the Greeks of Italy (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ii. p. 2, note 2). According to Ephorus (Ap. Strab. vi. p. 260) the laws of Zaleucus were founded on those of Crete, Sparta, and the Aeolopagus. The character of his laws generally speaking was severe (Zenobius, iv. 10; Diothenianus, iv. 94). They were, however, observed for a long period by the Locrians, who,
in consequence, had a high reputation for legal order.
(Pind. Ol. x. 17, νεκίς γάρ' ἀπέρεκτα πελαίν ἀκραυάν Ζευφιόν; comp. Plat. Tim. p. 20.)
The account preserved by the scholiast on Pindar (l. c.) from Aristotle indicates that a period of civil strife and confusion was the occasion which led to the legislation of Zaleucus. One feature of that legislation was that definite penalties were attached to the violation of the laws, which appears to have been a novelty in law-making, penalties having elsewhere and till then been determined either by ancient custom or by the tribunals before which the offender was tried (Strab. vi. p. 260). Stobaeus (Serm. iv. 20. 21; comp. Diod. xii. 20, &c.)
proffees to give the preface with which Zaleucus introduced his code (Cicero also, de Leg. ii. 6, speaks of having seen such a preface*) and various regulations. The authenticity of these is in the highest degree suspicious. In their present shape at any rate they are modern productions (Bentley, l. c.).

It is possible that one or two of the regulations may have been derived from authentic sources, but the preface itself, and the collection of laws, as a whole, are unquestionably spurious. From other authorities however we get at one or two points in the laws of Zaleucus. He first made particular enactments concerning the rights of property (Strab. vi. p. 398), and interdicted certificates of debt (Zenob. Prom. v. 4). Land could not be alienated among the Locrians without proof of absolute necessity (Arist. Pol. ii. 4, § 4). The penalty of adultery is said to have been the loss of the eyes (Aelian, V. H. xii. 24; Val. Max. v. 5, § 3).
There is a famous story told by the above-named authors of the son of Zaleucus having become liable to this penalty, and the father himself suffering the loss of one eye that his son might not be utterly blinded. The prohibition against dwelling in foreign lands (Stob. l. c.) may perhaps be genuine, as it is analogous to what we find at Sparta (Müller, Dorians, iii. 11, § 4). It is also probable that the code made provision against hasty attempts at innovation. Whether the law on this subject was that of Zobaneus (l. c.) describes may be doubted.
Diodorus (xii. 20) says that the same law to Charondas. Zaleucus also enacted various other laws.
Among these is said to have been a probhition of the use of pure wine (Aelian, V. H. ii. 37; Athen. x. p. 429). Suidas says that Zaleucus fell, fighting for his country. Eustathius (ad H. ii.
p. 62) connects with Zaleucus the story, that among his laws was one forbidding any citizen under penalty of death to enter the senate house in arms. On one occasion however, on a sudden emergency in time of war, Zaleucus transgressed his own law, which was remarked to him by one present; whereupon he fell upon his own sword, declaring that he would himself vindicate the law.
Other authors (Diod. xii. 19; Val. Max. vi. 5, § 4) tell the same story of Charondas, or of Diocles.
&c.; Heyne, Oppac. Acad. vol. ii.) (C. P. M.).
ZALMOXIS, or ZAMLXiS (Ζαλμωξης), to whom the name so called from the bear's skin (Ζαλμωξης) in which he was clothed as soon as he was born (Porph. Vit. Pyth. c. 14), according to the story current among the Greeks on the Helleespont, was a Getan, who had been a slave by Pythagoras in Samos, but was manumitted, and acquired not only great wealth, but large stores of knowledge from Pythagoras, and from the Egyptians, whom he visited in the course of his travels.
He returned among the Getae, introducing the civilisation and the religious ideas which he had gained, especially regarding the immortality of the soul. He persuaded the king to make him a sharer of his authority, and was made priest of the chief deity of the Getae, and was afterwards himself regarded as a deity. He was said to have lived in a subterraneous cave for three years, and after that to have again made his appearance among the Getae (Herod. iv. 95; Strab. vii. p. 297, &c.). Herodotus inclines to place the age of Zalmoxis a long time before Pythagoras, and expresses a doubt not only about the story itself, but as to whether Zalmoxis was a man, or an indigenous Getan deity.
The latter appears to have been the real state of the case. (Iamb. l. c. Pyth. § 173; Diog. Laërt.
ZELUS.

The Getae believed that the departed went to him. Every four years they selected a man by lot to go as a messenger to Zalmoxis, and tell him what they needed. The mode in which the man was killed is described by Herodotus (iv. 94; comp. Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 497). The Pythagorean doctrines respecting the soul spreading in various forms among the barbaric races who came in contact with the Greeks seem to have given rise to this whole fable about Zalmoxis. [C. P. M.]

ZANCLUS (Ζανκλος), a mythical king, and son of Gegenus, from whom the town of Zanclae in Sicily derived its name. (Diod. iv. 63; Steph. Byz. s. v. Zδυκλας.) [L. S.]

ZARBIENUS (Ζαρβιένος), king of Gordyene, made overtures to Appius Claudius, when the latter was staying at Antioch, wishing to shake off the yoke of Tigranes. He was informed against, however, and was assassinated with his wife and children before the Romans entered Armenia. When Lucullus arrived he celebrated his funeral rites with great pomp, setting fire to the funeral pile with his own hand, and had a summptuous monument erected to him. (Plut. Lucull. 21, 29.) [C. P. M.]

ZAREX (Ζαρέξ), a hero who is believed to have been instructed in music by Apollo, and had an heroum near Eleusis. Pausanias (i. 38, § 4) takes him to be a Laconian hero, and the founder of the town of Zarex in Laconia. The scholiast on Ly- cophorus (580) describes him as a son of Carystus or Caryx, as a grandson of Cheiron, and as the father of Anius by Rhoeo. [L. S.]

ZARIADRES (Ζαριάδρες), the younger brother of Hysanpes, was the hero of the celebrated love-story of Zariadres and Odatia. (Odes of Horace, vol. ii. p. 10.) [C. P. M.]

ZARZAS or ZARZAX (Ζαρζάς, Ζάρξας), a Libyan, commander of a portion of the mercenary troops which revolted from the Carthaginians. The rebels being pressed by famine, Zarzax, amongst others, surrendered himself to Hamilcar, and was crucified. (Polyb. i. 84, 85, 86.) [C. P. M.]

ZEGABENUS or ZIGABENUS EUTHYMIUS. [EUTHYMIUS].

ZEGABENUS, GEORGIOUS, a Byzantine writer of late date, wrote a work on the seven vowels and the twenty-four letters (πέρι τῶν ηττά φωνῆς καὶ πέρι τῶν εἰκοσισφάρων στοιχείων) in verse, which is extant in MS. in the imperial library at Vienna. In the introduction he gives a most illuminating account of his condition, and describes himself as wanting the first necessaries of life. He also wrote and translated some other works, which are mentioned by Fabricius (Diss. Græc. vol. xii. p. 47, fol. 1.) [C. P. M.]

ZEILAS (Ζείλας), son of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, and Ditizele. In consequence of the intrigues of his step-mother, Eutuzta, Zeilas was compelled to take refuge with the king of Armenia. At his death Nicomedes left his throne to his children by Eutuzata, to the exclusion of Zeilas, who immediately endeavoured to regain his rights by force. After several battles, fought with various success, he recovered the throne, probably about a. c. 250. He was succeeded by his son Prusias about a. c. 228. (Memnon, ap. Phot. Cod. 224, p. 228, ed. Bekker; Clinton, Fasti Hellen. vol. iii. p. 413.) [C. P. M.]

ZELUS (Ζήλος), the personification of zeal or strife, is described as a son of Pallas and Styx, and a brother of Nico. (Hes. Theog. 343; Apollod. i. 2, § 4.) [L. S.]

ZENAS (Ζηνᾶς), a sculptor, known by the inscriptions on two busts in the Museum of the Capitol. Müller states that one of these busts is that of the emperor Clodius Albinus, and R. Rochette says that one of them is that of the emperor Macrinus. Whether, by putting these statements together, we have the subjects of both works, or merely two different opinions respecting one of them, we have not the means of deciding. At all events, Zenas must have lived about the commencement of the third century of our era. From the occurrence of the name Zenas on an inscription of Aphrodisias (Bisch., Corp. Insr., No. 2798, vol. ii. p. 512) M. Raoul-Rochette thinks it probable that Zenas may have been a native of that place, at which the name Zenon was also common. [ZENON.] The same writer also points out the error of Sillig, who, from the true and a false reading of one of the inscriptions above referred to, as recorded by different authorities, has inserted in his Catalogue two different artists, Zenas and Liasa. (Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 205, n. 2; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 428, 429, 2nd ed.) [P. S.]

ZENEUS or ZENIS (Ζηνεύς, Ζηνίς), of Chios, wrote a work on his native country. (Athen. xiii. p. 601, f.) As he is only mentioned in this passage of Athenaeus, it has been conjectured that the name may be a mistake, and that we ought to read Xenomedes, who was also an historian of Chios. [XENOMÉDES.] (Müller, Fr Kg n. Hist. Graec. vol. ii. p. 43, Paris, 1843.)

ZENICETUS. [VATIA, No. I.]

ZENUS. [ZENUS.]

ZENO. [ZENON.]

ZENOBIÀ, the wife of Rhadamistus, king of Armenia, at the accession of Nero, of whom Tacitus relates a romantic story. (Tac. Ann. xii. 51.)

ZENOBIÀ, queen of Palmyra. After the death of her husband, Odenathus, about a. d. 266, she assumed the imperial diadem and purple, as regent for her sons, and not only maintained the pomp but discharged all the active duties of a sovereign. She appeared in martial attire at the head of the troops, she shared their toils both on horseback and on foot, she was at once liberal and prudent in the administration of the revenues, strict in dispensing justice, merciful in the exercise of power. But not content with enjoying the dignified independence gratefully conceded by Gal- lienus and tolerated by Claudius, she sought to include all Syria, Asia, and Egypt within the limits of her sway, and to make good the title which she claimed of Queen of the East. We have seen elsewhere (AURILLIUS) that by this rash ambition she lost both her kingdom and her liberty. Loaded with costly jewels, fettered hand and foot with shackles of gold, she was led by a golden chain, before the chariot of Aurelian, along the Sacred Way, while all Rome gazed, with eager curiosity, on the Arabian princess. Profiting by the Clemency of her conqueror, she passed the remainder of her life with her sons [HERENNIIANUS; TIMOLAIUS], after the manner of a Roman matron, in the vicinity of Tivoli, nigh to the gorgeous villa of Hadrian, on an estate which still bore her name when Pollio wrote her history.

One black stain is attached to the memory of Zenobia. It is recorded that, stimulated by the jealousy of a stepmother, she consented to the death of her husband, because he seemed to prefer Herodes his son by a former wife, to Herennianus and Timothus, his children by herself. This charge, not improbable in itself when we recall the vindictive passions which so often rage in the Zenana of an Eastern despot, is characterised by Gibbon as a very unjust suspicion, but he forgets that it rests upon the same authority with nearly all the particulars which he has admitted without hesitation in regard to her career, the rumours, namely, collected by the Augustan historians. The fact that speedy vengeance was inflicted on the assassin may have been dictated by remorse and prudence. (Trebell. Pollie, Trig. Tyrann.; comp. Zonar. xii. 27.) [W. R.]

COIN OF ZENOBIA.

ZENOBIUS, sometimes erroneously called Zenodotus, was a writer who lived at Rome in the time of Hadrian. He was the author of a collection of proverbs, which was an epitome of the works of Lucilius Tarneus and Didymus of Alexandria. The latter were themselves by no means the most ancient compilers of works of that kind. Zenobius, Athenaeus, and Suidas attribute works on proverbs to Aristotle, Clearchus of Soli, Theophrastus, Chrysippus, &c. In the work of Zenobius the proverbs are arranged alphabetically, and divided into hundreds. The last division is incomplete, the total number collected being 552. This collection was first published by Philo Junta (Florence, 1497). It was next published in the Aldine collection of fabulists. There is a separate edition by Vincentius Opsopoeus (Hagenau, 1575). It is also found in the collection of Andreas Schottus (Paris, 1559). Zenobius was also the author of a Greek translation of Sallust, which, so far as is known, is not extant; a work entitled Ἱστορία, addressed to the emperor Hadrian, and some other work. (Snid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. v. p. 109; Schöll, Geschichte der Griech. Lit. vol. ii. p. 546.)

There was another grammarian of this name, the author of an epigram (ap. Brunck, ii. p. 402). [C. P. M.]

ZENOBIUS, St. (Zenobius), a native of Aegae in Cilicia, born of Christian parents, and carefully brought up. He at first studied medicine, and practised with great skill and liberality, giving advice and medicines gratuitously, and also nourishment to such as were in want of it. He afterwards became bishop of Aegae, and during the persecution under Diocletian was put to death together with his sister Zenobia by Lyssias, the prefect of Cilicia about the year 304. An interesting account of his life and death is given by Simeon Metaphrastes, ap. Surius, De Probatis Sanctor. Historia, vol. v. Oct. 30. See also Menol. Graec. vol. i. Oct. 31;

Bzovius, Nomenclator Sanctor. Professions Medior. Oct. 30. 2. The physician mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. viii. 19) as having been a presbyter at Sidon, who was also put to death during the persecution under Diocletian, about the year 304, appears to have been a different person. [W. A. G.]

ZENODORUS (Zenodora), a tetrarch of Trachonitis and the surrounding country, disturbed his neighbours by his predatory incursions, and was in consequence deprived by Augustus of almost all his possessions, which were given to Herod about a. c. 24. When Augustus came to Syria in a. d. 20, Zenodorus appeared before the emperor to beg for a restitution of his dominions, but he died suddenly at Antioch in the course of the same year, and the remainder of his territories was likewise bestowed upon Herod. There are coins extant struck by Zenodorus. The specimen annexed contains on the obverse the head of Augustus, and on the reverse that of Zenodorus. (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10. §§ 1—3, B. J. i. 15. s. 20, § 4; Dion Cass. liv. 9; Strab. xvi. p. 756; Eckhel, vol. iii. p. 496.)

COIN OF ZENODORUS.

ZENODORUS, a Greek artist, whose native place is not stated; but, from the fact of his beginning his career in Gaul, Thiersch conjectures that he may have been a native of Massilia. He flourished in the reign of Nero, and was distinguished alike for the two immense colossi which he erected, and for the beauty with which he executed delicate works in silver-chasing. He made for the Arverni, in Gaul, a colossus of Mercury, which surpassed all similar works in magnitude, and which cost forty millions of sesterces (535,000L., according to the most probable reading, HS. CCC), and which occupied the artist ten years in its construction. While engaged on this great work, he also employed himself in silver-chasing, and copied the engraving on two cups by Calamis with such skill that the difference of the workmanship could scarcely be detected (ut vi se, differentia extitit artis). He was supplied with the originals by Dubinius Avitus, the governor of the province, who had obtained them from his uncle Cassius Silianus, to whom they had been presented by his pupil Germanicus. After the proof of his skill in the statue of Mercury, Zenodorus was invited to Rome by Nero to make the colossal statue of that emperor, which he set up in front of the golden house, and which was afterwards dedicated afresh by Vespasian as a statue of the Sun. It was 110 feet in height. Pliny tells us that he saw the work in the artist's studio, and was astonished at the striking likeness exhibited, not only in the clay model, but even in the earlier stage, the framework or skeleton of little sticks, which formed the groundwork of the whole work. (Mirabilamur in Zenodotus, together with his two great contemporaries, Alexander the Aetolian and Lycephoros the Chalcidian, to collect and revise all the Greek poets. Alexander, we are told, undertook the task of collecting the tragedies, Lycephoros the comedies, and Zenodotus the poems of Homer, and of the other illustrious poets (Homeric poetem at veligium ius iuris posthomen). This important statement, preserved by the Scholarist on Plautus, from the commentary of Tzetzes on the Phitus of Aristophanes, has given rise to much discussion. By "the other illustrious poets," Weleker supposed that the epic poets, and Muller that the lyric poets were intended; but as it was evidently the intention of Philodorus to make a complete collection of the Greek poets, there is no reason why we should not take the words of the Scholarist in their plain obvious meaning, and believe that Zenodotus made a collection of all the other illustrious poets both epic and lyric. It has been shown satisfactorily by more than one modern writer that Zenodotus made a collection of all the poems belonging to the epic cycle, and that his labours were not confined to the Iliad and Odyssey. It was, however, to the latter poems that he devoted his chief attention. Hence he is called the first Diophysarios of Homer, and his collection (Διαφωνος) of the Iliad and Odyssey obtained the greatest celebrity. It is frequently quoted by Eustathius, the Venetian School, and other grammarians under various titles, such as, Η Ζυνόδωτος, Η Ζυνόδωτος, Η Ζυνόδωτος διαφωνος, αι Ζυνόδωτος, αι Ζυνόδωτος διαφωνος, η Ζυνόδωτος, η Ζυνόδωτος, &c. The corrections which Zenodotus applied to the text of Homer were considerable. He expunged verses 2. He marked them as spurious, but left them in his copy, 3. He introduced new readings or transposed or altered verses. Examples of these corrections are given by Clinton. (Posti Hell. vol. iii. p. 491, fol.) The great attention which Zenodotus paid to the language of Homer caused a new epoch in the grammatical study of the Greek language. The results of his investigations respecting the meaning and the use of words were contained in two works which he published under the title of a Glossary (Γλώσσα, Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 1005; Schol. ad Theocr. v. 2) and a Dictionary of barbarous or foreign phrases (Αλεξίς ήδηκς, Galen, Gloss. Hippocr. s. v. Ψευδαί and Ψευδαί). It was probably from his glossary, as Wolf has remarked, that the grammarians took the few explanations of the passages of Homer, which they cite under the name of Zenodotus, since it is very doubtful whether they were written by this Zenodotus, or by Zenodotus the Alexandrine mentioned below. (Wolf, Prolegom. ad Hom.; Heffer, De Zenodoto ejusque studiis Homericis, Brandenburg, 1839; Dünster, De Zenodoti Studiis Homericis, Göttingen, 1848; Graeven, Geschichte der Klassischen Philologie, vol. i. pp. 579, 430, 534, 542, vol. ii. p. 32.)

2. Of Alexandria, a grammarian, lived after Aristarchus, whose recession of the Homerica poems he attacked. He is distinguished by the epithet ὁ ἐν ἄνθην: λόγοις by Suidas, who assigns the following works to him: 1. Πρὸς τὰ ἰστορίαν ήδετούμενα τοῦ ποιητοῦ. 2. Πρὸς Πλάτωνα περὶ Wolf thinks (Prolegom.

.p. ccxi.): that the two last are the same person as the Alexandrina; but he was called of Mallus from the place of his birth, the Alexandrina from the place of his residence, and the Cratonian, from his being a disciple of Crates, who was also a native of Malins. He remarks that as Crates was the great opponent of Aristarchus, his disciple would naturally be the adversary of the same great scholar. It may readily be admitted that Zenodotus of Mallus and Zenodotus the disciple of Crates are the same person; but it appears improbable that the same person should have had two such opposite surnames as διηθείου and Μαλλάς.
We are therefore disposed to adopt the views of Dintzter and other scholars that there were three grammarians of this name, 1. Zenodotus of Ephesus.
2. Zenodotus of Alexandria. 3. Zenodotus of Mallus, the disciple of Crates. It is very likely however that some of the works assigned by Suidas to the Alexandrine were written by the disciple of Crates. (Dintzter, De Zenodotis Studiis Homericis, pp. 24, 25.)

3. Of Trozen, wrote a history of Umbris, in which he spoke of the rape of the Sabine women.
(Dionys. ii. 49; Plut. Rom. 14.)

4. The Stoic, a disciple of Diogenes, wrote an Epigram on Zenon, which is quoted by Diogenes Laërius (vii. 29, 30).

5. The Epigrammatist, one of whose epigrams is preserved in the Greek Anthology (vii. 315).

6. The Athenian, mentioned by Caesar Germanicus at the commencement of his Commentary on The Phenomena of Aratus.

7. A Neo-Platonic philosopher, was a favourite of Proclus, whom he succeeded in his school.

8. The Sophist, more usually called Zenobius.

Zenon (Greek), philosophers. 1. Of Citium, a city in the island of Cyprus, founded by Phoenican settlers. He was the son of Mnasenes. Some authorities assign other names to his father, but with less probability (Diog. Laërt. vii. 1, ib. Ma-rag.). He is said to have been early won over to the pursuit of philosophy through books of the Socratics, which his father was accustomed to bring back from Athens when he went thither on trading voyages; and to have devoted himself to it entirely when (through the direction of an oracle, as is said) at the age of 22, or, according to others, 30 years, having been shipwrecked in the neighbourhood of Pelmeus, he was led to settle in Athens (ibid. 2, 4, 5, 26). Whether he lost all his property in the shipwreck (Seneca, de Tranq. Animi, c. 14; Plut. de cap. ex host. Utilitate, p. 87, 3), or, what is considerably less likely, remained in possession of a fabulous fortune of 1000 talents (Diog. Laërt. vii. 13, comp. 15, 22, 5), his moderation and contentment had become proverbial (Ζονων γνωστος ερατοτηρησος, Diog. Laërt. 27, &c., comp. 26, 13, 16; Suid. s. v.,) and an admiring recognition of his virtues shines through even the ridicule of the comic poets (Philemon, Posidippus, &c.; Diog.
Laërt. vii. 27, &c.; Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. p. 413).
Though weakness of body is said to have first determined him to live rigorously and simply (Diog.
Laërt. vii. 1; Antig. Caryst. ap. Athen. xii. 2), and harden himself (Diog. Laërt. 26, &c.), yet an inclusion for being independent of want seems already at an early period to have come in as an additional motive, and to have led him to the evnic Crates, to whom, however, he could only attach himself with a twofold reservation; for he could not adopt either the contempt for established usage which characterised their mode of life, nor their scorn of free and comprehensive knowledge.
( Ibid. 3, 17, 22). Yet he seems to have been still entirely under their influence when he wrote his Poetical (Ibid. 4; comp. Plut. de Alex. fortit. i. 6). When it was that, against the dissuasion of Crates, he betook himself to the Megaric Stilpo (Diog. Laërt. vii. 24, 2), we do not learn; and equally scanty are the accounts which we have respecting his intercourse with the two other contemporary Megarics, Diodorus Cronus and Philon (Ibid. 16, 25, 15, 16) on the one hand, and with the Academics, Xenocrates and Polemon (Ibid. 2, 33, comp. Suid. s. v.) on the other. Only from the logic of the Stoics we see that in this branch of science they approached considerably nearer to the Megarics than to the Academics. The period which Zenon thus devoted to study is extended by one unauthenticated statement to twenty years. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 4, comp. 2.) At its close, and after he had developed his peculiar philosophical system, to which he must already have gained over some disciples, he opened his school in the porch adorned with the paintings of Polygnotus (Ston Poicile), which, at an earlier time, had been a place in which poets met (Eratosthenes in Diog. Laërt. vii. 5). From it his disciples were called Stoics, a name which had before been applied to the above-mentioned poets, and by which also the grammarians who assembled there probably at a later time were known.
Previously his disciples were called Zenoniens. Among the warm admirers of Zenon was king Antigonus Gonatas of Macedonia: for although the correspondence between the two, professing to have

4 p reference to an invitation of the king, which Zenon declined (Diog. Laërt. vii. 7, &c.), is unmistakably the invention of a later rhetorician (see Aldobrandinus on the above passage), it is well established that a close intimacy subsisted between them, kept up through Persaeus and Philonides, disciples of the philosopher, and companions of the king (ibid. 9. 6, 13—15, 36; Arrian, Epist. iii. 13; Simplex, in Epictet. Excerpt. c. 51; Aelian, V. H. ix. 26). Zenon is also said to have attracted the attention of the Egyptian Ptolemaeus (Diog. Laërt. vii. 24; in Stobaeus, Serm. xxxi. however, with reference to the same story, ambassadors of Antigonus are spoken of). Much more honourable, however, is the confidence and esteem which the Athenians showed towards him, stranger as he was; for although the well-known story that they deposited the keys of the fortress with him, as the most trustworthy man (Diog. Laërt. 6), may be a later invention, there seems no reason for doubting the authenticity of the decree of the people by which a golden crown and a public burial in the Cerameicus were awarded to him, because, during his long residence in Athens, by his doctrines and his life spent in accordance with them, he had conducted the young men who attached themselves to him along the path of virtue and discretion (Diog. Laërt. 10, &c., 6, 15). The Athenian citizenship, however, he is said to have declined, that he might not become unfaithful to his native land (Plut. de Stoicor. repugn. p. 1034, a; comp. Diog. Laërt. 12), where in return he was highly esteemed (ibid. 6). For the rest, we have preserved some not very characteristic traits from his life, in part from the works of the elder Stoics, as Persaeus, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus (ibid. 1, viii., 1), from which we see that he was of an earnest, if not gloomy disposition (ibid. 16, comp. 26; Sidon. Apollinarius, Epist. ix. 9); that he loved to withdraw himself from the great crowd, and to walk about with only two or three (Diog. Laërt. 14); that he was fond of burying himself in investigations (ibid. 15), had a dislike to prolix and elaborate speeches (ibid. 18, 22; Stob. Serm. xxxiv.), and was clever and ready at short telling answers. (Diog. Laërt. 19, &c., 23, &c. ibid. Menag.)

We are not able to ascertain with certainty either the year of Zenon's birth, or that of his death, and cannot regard as accurate the statements that he came to Athens at the age of 22 or even 30 years, that he pursued his philosophical studies for 20 years, and presided over his school for 58 years (Diog. Laërt. 28), even though we should prefer the statement that he reached the age of 86 (ibid.), to that of his disciple Persaeus, according to which he was only 72 (ibid. 18). From them we see that he was of an earnest, if not gloomy disposition (ibid. 16), and this is certainly in accordance with the statements which make him a disciple of Polemon, who became president of the Academic school in Ol. 116. 2, and also with what we are told about his intercourse with Antigonus Gonatas, who came to the throne in Ol. 124, and with Arcesilaus (Cic. Acad. i. 9, 13, ii. 24). Of his writings for the most part only the titles are quoted (Diog. Laërt. 4). The enumeration that we possess can hardly be complete, yet it shows us to some extent to what objects his investigations were chiefly directed. We have mention of works upon the ethic of Crates (Κράττυρος ηθική), on the life spent according to nature (περὶ τοῦ κατὰ φύσιν βίου); on impulse, on the nature of man (περὶ Βίας ἢ περὶ ἀνθρώπου φύσεως, comp. 87); on the affections (περὶ πάθων, comp. 110); on the fitting (περὶ τοῦ καθήκοντος); on law (περὶ νόμου), besides the Politiea mentioned above; on Grecian education (περὶ Ἑλληνικῆς παιδείας); the art of love (ἔρωτική τεχνή). Of writings relating to physics we find mentioned one on the universe (περὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, comp. 142, 43, 45); on essence (περὶ οὐσίας, 154); on signs (περὶ σημείων); on the sight (περὶ θεως). The contents of the following seem to have been of a logical kind: on the idea (περὶ τοῦ λόγου, 39, 40); treatises (Συμπεραθ. 134); on verbal expression (περὶ λέξεως); Solutions (Ἀλογίας), and Refutations (Ἀλεξογίας). Besides these there are attributed to him works on Poetry (περὶ ποιητικῆς ἀκραδεσίας); Homeric Problems (προβλήματικῶν Ὀμηρικῶν πέντε, comp. Diog. Laërt. viii. 48); a work entitled καθολικά; Commentaries (Ἀτομομονεύματα); and one on the Pythagorean doctrines (Πυθαγορικά).

The writings of Chrysippus and later Stoics seem to have obscured those of Zenon, and even the warm adherents of the school seem seldom to have gone back to the books of the latter, still less the authorities yet remaining to us. They give, and often confusedly enough, sketches of the Stoic system, but it is only as special occasions present themselves that they notice what belongs to the several framers of the system, and in what they differed from each other, and from the later Stoics. Consequently we can only determine in the general, and often merely by conjecture, how far Zenon himself had conducted the doctrine, and still less how he gradually arrived at the outlines of it. At first he appears to have attached himself to the Cynics. This is confirmed not only by the above-mentioned authorities, but by the little that has been preserved out of or respecting his Politiea (Diog. Laërt. vii. 32, 121, 129; Theodoret. Gr. Affl. cur. iii. p. 780; Plutarch in the above-quoted passages); and it is not unlikely that it was there that he gave occasion to the assertion of the later Stoas, that Cynism was the near way to virtue (εἶναι τῶν Κυνιστῶν σύντομον ἐπ' ἀρέτην δόντων). Diog. Laërt. 121, ibid. Menag.). In his treatises (Συμπεραθ.) also there must still have been a good deal of Cynism. (Sex. Emp. adv. Math. xi. 191; Hypot. iii. 245, comp. 205.)

The need of a foundation and completion of ethic by means of logic and physic, led Zenon to approximate to the Academics, and in some degree also to Aristotle. The threefold division of philosophy he had explained in his treatise on the Idea, and had anticipated the succession which was afterwards to occur on the theory of Logic, and to logic was consequently to be given a place (Diog. Laërt. 39, &c.). But he is certainly not the originator of the comprehensive schematism in which we find the logic and physic of the Stoics treated (ibid. 84). In his treatment of logic, he was even behind his predecessors (Cic. de Fin. iv. 4). His short and narrow conclusions needed a more explicit foundation to be able to withstand the objections of the Academics in particular (Id. de Nat. Deor. ii. 7). To show the necessity of a scientific treatment of logic, he urged that the wise man must know how to avoid deception (Id. Acad. ii. 20). Without doubt he referred our cognitions to impressions, and these to affections of the soul (ἐπερωτώσθη τῆς ψυχῆς, Sixth Emp. adv. Math. vii. 228, 230, 236), more exact definitions of which were attempted by Cleanthes, Chrysippus, and others, who devoted the one from the other, showing clearly that none such had been established by Zenon. In line manner the division of conceptions, or representations (φασιθια) into such as were credible (πιθανοι), incredible (ἐπιθανοι), at once credible and not credible, and such as were neither credible nor incredible; and further into true and false, &c., may very likely have been made by Zenon (Ibid. 242, &c.). It lay at the base of the subdivision of true conceptions into comprehensible (καταληπτικα), i.e. demonstrable, and incomprehensible, which is referred to Zenon. (Cic. Acad. ii. 6, 24.) But here also the more exact definitions are to be ascribed to the later Stoics (Sept. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 233). On the other hand Zenon had reserved for the free-will the power of assent (αυγεκαταθεψις) in distinguishing between the impressions communicated to the senses (Cic. Acad. i. 11), and distinguished the following stages: representation, cognition, assent, knowledge, exhibiting their relation to each other by the well-known illustration of the flat-extended hand, and the gradual clenching of the fist (Cic. Acad. ii. 4, i. 11). As the ultimate criterion of truth Zenon assumed right reason (Diog. Laërt. vii. 54, ibid. Interp.), which Chrysippus and others, in turn, endeavoured to separate into its constituent parts.

Zenon seems to have had no share, or but very little, in the development of the Stoic doctrine respecting the categories, conclusions, the parts of speech and rhetoric. The last could have been regarded as his, simply supplementing a technique of argument to the comparison referred to by Cicero (Orador. 32), and could hardly have appeared to him to need a separate scientific treatment. (Cic. de Fin. iv. 3.)

It seems that at the head of his Physic stood the proposition that every thing which operates, as well as every thing operated upon, is corporeal, and consequently that the actual is limited to that (Cic. Acad. i. 11). He called the substance, that is to say the base of every thing existent, that primary matter which neither increases nor diminishes itself (Stob. Eel. Eth. p. 90; Diog. Laërt. vii. 150). This was in his view the intercommingling of matter, in itself passive and void of quality (ἐναοι ἔξα), and of operative power, that is of the deity (Diog. Laërt. vii. 134; Cic. L.c.; Senec. Epist. 65). He saw this operative power in fire (Cic. Acadot. i. 11), or aether (ibid. ii. 41), as the basis of all vital activity (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 9, iii. 14), and in this way was led to go back to the doctrine of Heraclitus. Attaching his views to that doctrine, he taught that the universe comes into being when from fire, or through it, the primary substance passing through the intermediate stage of air, becomes liquefied, and then the thick portion becomes earth, the rarer portion air, and lastly again becomes rarified into fire (Diog. Laërt. vii. 142; comp. 136; Stob. Eel. Phys. p. 320). Zenon also appropriated to himself the Heraclitean doctrine of the periodic alternation of the formation and annihilation of the universe (Stob. Eel. Phys. i. p. 414). The more exact definition of the doctrine in this instance is ascribed to his successors, as Chrysippus, Poseidonius, &c. The active or artizan-fire (γεγυνακη περι, Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 22, comp. Diog. Laërt. vii. 150) must in his view have been identical with the deity; but what Heraclitus tacitly pre-supposed, that it partakes of the world-consciousness, Zenon endeavoured to define more exactly, and to prove, substituting for the universe-ensouling power the universe itself, that is, the substance of it, or the deity, and attributing reason to it, inasmuch as on the one hand the rational (λογικόν) is better than the irrational, and on the other, that which is found in the parts must belong to the whole (Sixt. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 104, 101; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 8). In this universe-fashioning fire there must dwell not merely a concomitant consciousness, but a foreseeing one (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 22), that is, the eternal deity extended throughout the whole universe, must produce (Σημανωγετω, Diog. Laërt. vii. 134, 186) every thing. The doubt of Ariston, whether God could be a being possessed of life (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 14) seems to have been directed against Zenon's further definitions, which have not come down to us. Again, Zenon defined the deity as that law of nature which ever accomplishes what is right, and prevents the opposite (Cic. l. c.), as the energy which moves itself and operates according to the laws of impregnation (λόγοι στερματικοι, Diog. Laërt. vii. 148; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 39), and identified it, or Zeus, with spirit and predestination, or unconditioned necessity (Stob. Eel. Phys. i. 178; Diog. Laërt. vii. 88, 148, &c., 156), without detriment to the foresight and free self-determination attributed to it (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 22). He seems to have endeavoured to refer the different chief deities of the Greek mythology to the different fundamental modes of manifestation of the single divine primary power (Ibid. i. 14, comp. Diog. Laërt. vii. 147, 149). He must have regarded individual souls as being what the world-soul was; as of the nature of fire, or as warm breath (σνειων ενθονου, Cic. Tusc. i. 9, de Nat. Deor. iii. 14, comp. Plut. de ph. pl. Decret. iv. 3; Diog. Laërt. vii. 156), and therefore as perishable (Diog. Laërt. l. c.). The threefold division of the soul attributed to him (Tertullian. de Anima, c. 14) is obscure, if not dubious. But however he may have divided it, he must have referred its different activities to one and the same fundamental power (γηγαμονικ), Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 102; comp. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xv. 20).

Zenon, coinciding with the Cynics, and with equal stringency, recognised in the most decided manner the unconditional nature of moral obligations, and that only that which answers to them is valuable in itself; but departed from them partly in the deduction and definition of them, partly and chiefly in this, that by paving the way for the separation of the form and the purport or objects of our actions, he undertook, with reference to the domain of the (so-called) indifferent, to demonstrate a relative value in that which accords with natural impulses, and so to oppose the harsh contempt of the Cynics for custom, without however allowing that the gratification of mere natural wants, and the external good things which serve that end, have any value in themselves. In order to bring forward prominently the unconditional value of the moral (Stob. Eel. Eth. p. 154) he termed it, following of the identity of the qualities of the negative school, the single, sole and simple good (Cic. Acadot. ii. 16, 2) which, for that very reason, is that which alone should be striven after and praised for itself (Cic. 4 p 2) ZENON.

For of certain produced volition to 5, the good Laert. de moral (fieaoy) p. (Cic.

Perfection of life however can be and be achieved through the unrestricted dominion of right reason, that is, by our reason not only ruling unconditionally over our other energies and circumstances, but also coinciding with the universal reason — the reason which governs nature. This last is, in other words, the source of moral law, of that which forbids as well as that which commands (Stob. l.c. p. 104; comp. Plat. Stoic. Rep. p. 1037).

Since then that unvarying unanimity or consistency of soul, out of which morally good volitions and actions spring, is virtue (Stob. l.c. p. 104; Cic. Tusc. iv. 13), true good can only consist in virtue (Stob. p. 90; Diog. Laërt. vii. 102, 127), and this being self-sufficient, can need no external good circumstances (Diog. Laërt. vii. 103; Cic. de Fin. iii. 10; Sen. Epist. 9; Plat. l.c.). That, to the accomplishment or attainment of which virtue is directed, has no value in itself, but on the contrary derives value only from its being willing and accomplished morally (Stob. l.c. p. 94). And it was just at this point that Zenon felt himself constrained to deviate from the Cynics. He could not admit that things indifferent in themselves are without any value for us. On the contrary, he endeavoured to point out differences which fixed the measure of their relative value. They have this, according to him, in proportion as they correspond to the original natural instinct of self-preservation (Diog. Laërt. vii. 85; Cic. de Fin. iii. 5, 15, iv. 10, v. 9, Acad. i. 16). What corresponds to that is justly preferred (is a τρογγύλον), has a certain worth (ξεία, Stob. l.c. p. 144, &c. 156; comp. Diog. Laërt. vii. 105), and admits of being shown to be such, that is, of having a foundation for it established (Cic. Acad. i. 10, &c.; Stob. l.c. p. 158; Diog. Laërt. vii. 108). But because every thing which conduces to self-preservation, like self-preservation itself, has only a conditional (προπροποτικὸν) value, it cannot be more than an auxiliary of happiness; the latter depends merely upon moral volition and action (Cic. de Fin. iii. 13). That which is to be preferred is an appropriate thing (καθήκον), a designation which Zenon first introduced (Diog. Laërt. l.c.), and shows itself to be such by its rational foundation (εὑρογον, Diog. Laërt. and Stob. l.c. cc.). The appropriate, however, and its foundation, are perfect only when the latter is unconditional, that is, corresponds to unconditional requirements (a κατὰφρονῶς, Stob. p. 158; Cic. de Fin. iii. 7, 9, 14, 17, de Off. i. 3). So long as an action can merely be justified as fit, it is a middling (μέδον) action, and has no real moral value, even though it should perfectly coincide with a truly moral action in reference to its object or purport. (Stob. p. 158; Cic. de Fin. l.c.). It is not without reason that the germ of the distinction between legality and morality has been traced in this Stoic separation of the καθήκων and κατὰφρονῶς. Hence, just as morality, or virtue, can only subsist in conjunction with the perfect dominion of reason, so vice can consist only in the renunciation of the authority of right reason, and virtue is absolutely — without any accommodation — opposed to vice (Cic. Tusc. iv. 13, Acad. i. 10, de Fin. iii. 21. iv. 9, Parad. iii. 1; Diog. Laërt. vii. 127; Stob. p. 104, 116); nay, virtue and vice cannot subsist side by side in one and the same subject, can admit of no increase and decrease (Cic. de Fin. iii. 14, &c.), and no one moral action can be more virtuous than another (Cic. de Fin. iii. 14; Sext. Emp. ad. Math. vii. 422). All actions however are to be reckoned in, that is, all are either good or bad, since even impulses and desires rest upon free consent (Stob. p. 162, 164; Cic. Tusc. iv. 9, Acad. i. 10), and consequently even passive conditions or affections, which, because withdrawn from the dominion of reason, are immoral (Diog. Laërt. vii. 110; Stob. p. 166; Cic. Tusc. iv. 6. 14), nay, more, they are the source of immoral actions (Stob. p. 170, &c.; Cic. de Fin. iv. 83; Plut. de Virt. mor. p. 393). Zenon, therefore, had already especially concerned himself with the more exact definition of the affections, and had composed a separate treatise on them, as has been above remarked. To him belongs the fourfold division of them. He referred them to present (πρόθεσις), and therefore operative errors (false assumptions) respecting the good and the bad (Cic. Tusc. iii. 3; Stob. p. 170). They must be rooted out, and not merely set aside (Cic. Tusc. iv. 18, &c.), and their place is properly occupied by corresponding movements of the reason. As he was the originator of the fourfold division of the affections (desire and fear, pleasure and pain: ἐπιθυμία, φόβος, ξύρη, λυπή; Cic. Tusc. iv. 6; Stob. p. 166, &c.; Diog. Laërt. vii. 110), so in all probability he also distinguished the three emotions which are according to reason (βολήσις, χάρα, εἰαθέλεια) and assumed that pain, because it is merely passive, cannot be transformed into a corresponding rational emotion. In like manner to him probably, in what is essential, belong the definitions of the four virtues, as well as the assertions, subsequently repeated to satiety, respecting the perfections of the wise man. How far he carried these out, and whether, or how far he conducted the further sub-division of the four virtues, we are not able to determine.

Polemon is said already to have given utterance to the suspicion that Zenon intended to purloin (πράξας) other men's teachings and to ascribe them to himself in a new dress (Diog. Laërt. vii. 25). At a later time he was frequently charged with having been the inventor not so much of new things, as of new words (Cic. de Fin. iii. 2, iv. 2, &c., Tusc. v. 12), and already Chrysippus had endeavoured to defend him against such charges (Diog. Laërt. vii. 129). But though those charges may in part have been unjust, yet even the acuteness of Chrysippus and others was not able to develop out of the doctrines of Zenon an organically constructed system, growing out of one fundamental idea, such as we find in Plato and Aristotle. Logic and physics always continued mere supplements of ethic, connected with it rather externally than internally; and the system of the Stoa, though for centuries it banded together around it the noblest spirits, to struggle against the moral corruption of the age, had not proceeded from a full and unreserved love of wisdom, but from the impulse after a completely satisfactory mode of life. It no longer formed a member of the ever rising series of development of the philosophising spirit of the Greeks, but rather already belonged to the descending series.

2. Of Elea (Velia), son of Teleutagoras, and favourite disciple of Parmenides. He was with the latter in Athens about the 80th Olympiad, when Socrates was still very young. At this time he was 40 years old, and consequently was born about the 70th Olympiad (Diog. Laer. i. 28; Plut. Soph. p. 217, Parm. p. 127; comp. Theod. p. 183). With this chronology we can easily reconcile the statements which assign, as the period when he flourished, the 78th Olympiad (Suid. s. v.), the 79th (Diog. Laer. ix. 29), or the 80th (Euseb. Chron.). The statements that he unfolded his doctrines to men like Pericles and Callias for the price of 100 minae (Plat. Alcib. i. p. 119; Olympiod. in Alcib. p. 140, Kreuzer; Plut. Vit. Pericid. c. 4) indicate a rather long residence in Athens. Of a well-grown and graceful person (ἐκθέθη καὶ χαραῖς ἑαυτῷ), Zenon was the favourite (παράδειγμα) of Parmenides, says Plato (Parm. p. 127; comp. Diog. Laer. ix. 23), where he doubtless intends the word to be taken in the honourable sense (comp. Schol. in Plat. l. c.), not, as his traducers thought (Athen. xl. p. 558), in a significance which must have rebounded to his disgrace in the eyes of those whom he held in such high esteem. The noblest spiritual love of Zenon for his teacher is shown in the way in which he devoted his whole energy to the defence of the doctrines of Parmenides. He is also said to have taken part in the law-making (Σπευσίππος in Diog. Laer. ix. 23) or law-mending (Strabo vi. 1) of Parmenides, to the maintenance of which the citizens of Elea had pledged themselves every year by an oath (Plut. adv. Col. p. 1126; Strabo, l. c.), and his love of legitimate freedom is shown by the courage with which he exposed his life in order to deliver his native country from a tyrant. (Plut. adv. Col. p. 1126, de Stoic. Repugn. p. 105, de Garrull. p. 505; comp. Diog. Laer. ix. 26, &c.; Diodor. Exc. p. 537, Wessely.) Whether he perished in the attempt, or survived the fall of the tyrant, is a point on which the authorities vary. They also state the name of the tyrant differently.

Unfortunately also the writings of Zenon perished earlier than those of Parmenides and Melissus. Even the indefatigable Simplicius had not succeeded in possessing himself of more than one of the treatises of the Eleatic philosopher, and even this he had probably had before him only in extracts (Simpl. in Arist. Phys. f. 30, a. b.). In explaining the difficult passage of Aristotle respecting the mode in which Zenon demonstrated the inconceivableness of motion, he manifestly had not Zenon's own words before him. Alexander and Porphyry in all probability were not even acquainted with what Simplicius quotes from the treatise of Zenon (Simpl. l. c.) But whether this was the youthful essay characterised in the Parmenides of Plato, in which, in order to defend his master's doctrine of the oneness of the existent, he had developed the contradictions involved in the presupposition of a multiplicity of the existent (Plat. Parm. p. 128), we cannot determine. Simplicius like Plato characterises the treatise to which he referred as composed in prose, as οὕγγαμα, though still the dialogical form indicated by Plato, and the division of the treatise into different arguments (Ἄργους), each of which carried out different assumptions (ὑποθέσεις; comp. Plat. Parm. p. 127; Arist. Elench. Soph. c. 10; Diog. Laer. iii. 47), does not manifest itself; a mode of dealing with the subject which seems to have been the immediate occasion which led Aristotle to regard Zenon as the originator of dialectic. (Diog. Laer. ix. 25; comp. vii. 57; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 6). Of other treatises of Zenon we only learn the titles — Discussions (ἐρείδες), Against the Natural Philosophers (ἐναντίον φυσικοῦς), On Nature (φύσις φύσεως), Explanation of the poems of Empedocles (ἐξήγησις τῶν τοῦ Ἐμπεδοκλέους, Suid. s. v.), and must leave it undecided whether it was one of these, and if so, which of them is the treatise referred to by Plato in the Parmenides. In another passage (Phaedr. p. 26; comp. Parm. p. 129) Plato manifestly speaks of him, not of the rhetorician Alcidamas, as Quintilian (Inst. iii. 1) assumes, as the Eleatic Palamedes, whose art causes one and the same thing to appear both like and unlike, one and many, at rest and in motion.

The way in which Zenon undertook to show the merely relative validity of our assertions with regard to the phenomenal world, is shown partly by his expressions which Simplicius has preserved, according to which the multiplicity of phenomena must be set down as finite, because actual, and consequently determinate; and as infinite, because not made up of ultimate parts; and for that very reason as at the same time small and great; as, on the one hand, in being divided ad infinitum, it loses all magnitude, and on the other hand regains it through the infinitude of the number of the parts (the argument of the dichotomy, to which Aristotle refers, Phys. Ause. i. 3, p. 187, 1, and which Porphyry had improperly referred to Parmenides; see Simplicius, l. c.); partly by the question which he is said to have put to Protagoras, whether a measure of corn, falling down, makes a noise (φοβεῖ) in its fall, while a thousandth part of the measure, or a single grain, does not (Arist. Phys. Ause. vii. 5, p. 250, 9; Simpl. f. 255; Schol. against the Natural Philosophers (ἐναντίον φυσικοῦς), On the infinite divisibility of space and time also was founded Zenon's arguments to disprove the reality of motion (Arist. Phys. Ause. vi. 9; comp. c. 1, 2; Simpl. f. 236, b; Theonist. f. 55, b. &c.; Schol. in Arist. p. 418; comp. Diog. Laer. ix. 29). He endeavoured to show, 1. that on account of the infinite divisibility of the space to be passed through the motion cannot begin at all; 2. that for that same reason the creature which moves most slowly (the tortoise) could not be overtaken by the swiftest (Achilles); 3. that the moving body must at the same time be in motion, and also, inasmuch as it occupies space, at rest; 4. that one and the same space of time might, in different relations, be both long and short (comp. Bayle, Dict. Crit. s. v.). Consequently, Zenon manifestly concluded, we nowhere find in the phenomenal world a really existing thing, remaining like itself; and consequently we nowhere find an actual thing; it distributes itself into a multiformality which has neither subsistence nor unity; for that which neither increases when added, nor diminishes when taken away; — that is, the true, indivisible unity,—cannot become a phenomenon (Arist. Met. B. 4. p. 1001, b. 7. lib. Alex.; comp. Simpul. in Phys. f. 21.) Hence he asserted that he would explain what things are, if he had unity given to him. (Eudem in Simp. f. 21. 6.) Whether, and in what way, he nevertheless admitted the theory of Empedocles as a hypothetical explanation of phenomena, cannot be ascertained with certainty from the scanty statements of Stobaeus (Ecl. Phys. p. 60) and Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 29). The centre of gravity of his philosophy lies in the acuteness with which he unfolded the contradictions which are against the conceivableness of the fundamental ideas of experience, in so far as the world of experience is conceived as existent, t. e. as actually real; and consequently laid down for all subsequent metaphysis the problems of which it has still to seek the solution. It is easily comprehensible therefore that the sceptic Timon (Diog. Laërt. ix. 25) regarded him with special preference. (Comp. Zénon d'Elée in Nouveaux Fragmens philosophiques, by V. Cousin, Paris, 1856. p. 96—150.)

ZENON (Ζήνων), literary. 1. An historical writer, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 35) as the author of a narrative of the expedition of Pyrrhus into Italy, and a brief history of the (first) Punic war (Ἡ Πόλυμος στρατεία εἰς Ἰταλίαν καὶ Σικελίαν.—Επιτομή τῶν πεπραγμένων Ῥωμαίοις τε καὶ Καρθαγινεῖσι). Zenon probably lived shortly after the first Punic war. (Voss. de Hist. Gr. p. 141.)

2. An historical writer, a contemporary of Polybius, a native of Rhodes. He wrote a work on Rhodian history (τὴν ἑυτότου οἰστραίνοντα ἐνιαυλοῦ, Diog. Laërt. vii. 35). He is quoted by Diodorus Siculus (v. 56), Cephallon (ap. Euseb. in Chron.), and in particular by Polybius, who contests the accuracy of several of his statements, and finds great fault with him, remarking that he had belaboured far more care upon the style of his work than upon the investigation of the facts which he records (xvi. 14, &c.). Polybius wrote to him, concerning the geographical, and military state of the geography of Laconia. The letter was courteously received, though it was too late to correct the errors, on account of the copies of the work having been already published (xvi. 20).

3. A native of Sidon, the son of Musaeus, whom Suidas mentions, and states to have been a disciple of Diodorus Cronus, and an instructor of Zenon of Citium. There must be some mistake, however, in calling him a Stoic philosopher, if that were the case. Suidas states that he wrote a defence of Socrates, and a work entitled Σιδωνακδ.

4. A native of Tarsus, the son of Dioscorides, a disciple of Chrysippus, and his successor in the Stoas. (Suid. s. v.; Diog. Laërt. vii. 35, comp. 41.) He introduced an important variation into the Stoic system, for he denied the doctrine of the conflagration of the universe, as it is termed (though that is but an inadequate account of the doctrine; comp. ZENON of CITIUM). This must have involved a considerable modification of the whole physical theory of the Stoics. (Euseb. Praep. Evang. vi. 13, 18; Menag. ad Diog. Laërt. vii. 35.) Fabricius and others improperly distinguish Zenon of Tarsus from Zenon the successor of Chrysippus. Zenon of Tarsus left but few writings. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.)

5. A native of Citium, respecting whom Suidas is in doubt whether he should be classed with the philosophers or the orators. He is said to have written the following works:—Περὶ στάσεως, Περὶ σχυμάτων. "Συμφωνία εἰς Ξανθόφωνα, εἰς Δωσίαν, Περὶ ἐνδικητημάτων." This Zenon is by some (Harles, in Eub. vol. iii. p. 581) identified with the Zenon spoken of in no very flattering terms by Ulpianus (in Dem. Prolog.), and with the physician of the same name who lived in the time of Julianus.

6. A grammarian mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 35), as the author of some epigrams, as well as other compositions. Casaubon and others have identified this Zenon with Zenon of Myndus, who is mentioned by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ii. 6), Theodoretus (Serm. VIII. ad Graeceos), Stephanus (s. v. Μύδος) and others (Menag. ad Diog. Laërt. vii. 35).

7. An Epicurean philosopher, a native of Sidon. He was a contemporary of Cicero, who heard him when at Athens. He was sometimes termed Coprophæus Epiphanoreus (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 21, 33, 182, 184). He seems to have been noted for the disrespectful terms in which he spoke of other philosophers. For instance, he called Socrates the Attic buffoon. (Cic. de Nat. D. i. 34.) He was a disciple of Apollodorus (Diog. Laërt. x. 25), and is described by Diogenes Laërtius as a clear-headed thinker and perspicuous expounder of his views. Cicero bestows upon him similar commendation (distincte, graviter, ornate disputabat, de Nat. Deor. i. 21). Zenon held that happiness consisted in the enjoyment of present pleasures, accompanied by a confident expectation of enjoying them throughout the whole or the greater part of life. (Tusc. iii. 17.) Poseidonius wrote a separate treatise in confutation of his views. (Proclus ad I. Euridid. iiii.)

8. Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 16) speaks of Zenon the younger. Whom he means by that name is not quite clear. Some identify him with the son of Musaeus. But it seems difficult to account for the distinctive title given to him, if that were the case.

9. An orator, a native of Laodicea. He conferred many benefits upon his native town. Like Hybreas, he roused the Laodiceans to resist Labiens, when the latter, with Paeorus, invaded Syria and Asia Minor. (Strab. vii. p. 578, xiv. p. 660.)

10. A native of Alexandria, of Jewish extraction, mentioned by Suidas. He renounced his connection with the Jews. He is described as a worthy man in point of character, but as remarkably forgetful of what he attempted to learn, though he exhibited a perpetual anxiety to make himself acquainted with that of which he was ignorant.

11. A native of Pergamus, a contemporary of Proclus, who, like the preceding, was a somewhat slow learner. (Suid. s. c.)

[ C. P. M. ]

ZENON (Ζήνων), the name of several physicians, whom it is perhaps hardly possible to distinguish with certainty, as Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 454) enumerates six, while Kihnn reduces them to three. (A. Cornellii Celsi Editio nova exoptat. Cont. ii. p. 5, &c.)

1. One of the most eminent of the followers of Herophilus (Galen, De Diffr. Puls. iv. 8, vol. viii. p. 736), whom Galen calls "no ordinary man" (Comment. in Higgoor. "Epit. III." ii. 4, vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 600), and who is said by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 1. § 35) to have been better able to think than to write. He lived probably at the end of the the third and beginning of the second centuries B.C., as he was a contemporary of Apollonius Empiricus [Apollonius, p. 245], with whom he carried on a controversy respecting the meaning of certain marks (χαρακτήρες) that are found at the end of some of the chapters of the third book of The Epidemics of Hippocrates. (Galen, ibid. ii. 5, p. 618.) He gave particular attention to materia medica. (Cels. De Medic. p. 53, ed. Franz. ; and is perhaps the physician whose medical formulae are quoted by Galen (De Antid. ii. 10, 11, vol. xiv.
pp. 163, 171), in which case he must have been a native of Laodiciana. He is mentioned in several other passages by Galen, and also by Erotianus (Gloss. Hippocr. pp. 86, 216, ed. Franz.) ; perhaps also by Pliny (H. N. xii. 44), Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. iv. 7, p. 530), Alexander Aphro-disius (De Febr. c. 2, p. 82, ed. Ideler), and Rufus Ephesiensis (De Appell. Part. Corp. Hum. i.
36. p. 44.), but this is uncertain. (See Littré's
Dictionnaire d'Hippocr. vol. i. p. 91, and Sprengel's Gesch. der Arzneikunde, vol. i. ed. 1846.)
2. A native of Cyprus in the fourth century after Christ, the tutor of Ionicus, Magnus, and Orìbasius.
(Eunap. Vit. Philos.) He taught and practised his profession at Alexandria, whence he was expelled by the Bishop George of Cappadocia [Georgius,
p. 248], who persecuted both the heathen and the orthodox Christians with equal bitterness. He was however restored to his country and office by command of the emperor Julian, probably A.D. 361 or 362 ; and a letter from the emperor to Zenon is still extant, in which he speaks very highly not only of his medical skill but also of his general character. (Jul. Epist.)
3. A native of Athens, mentioned in the spurious work De Medicinis Expertis, ascribed to Galen ; whose exact date is unknown, but who may have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

ZENON (Ζήνων), artists. 1. Of Soli, statutory.
[Sosipater.]
2. The son of Attis, or Attine, was a native of Aphrodisias in Caria, and a sculptor evidently of considerable eminence in the period of the Roman empire. He is thought to have lived about the time of Trajan. Three works are still extant inscribed with his name. One is a sitting statue, apparently of a senator, in the Villa Ludovisi, bearing the following inscription on the margin of the robe:—

ΣΙΕΤΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ.

The second is a monument to the memory of his son, who is represented in the form of a half-clad Hermes. The work bears a metrical inscription, in nineteen lines, to the following effect:— "The country of me, Zeno, is the blessed Aphrodisias * ; but having travelled through many cities, confident in my artistic powers, and having made for my

* Here is a decisive proof, in addition to others, that Winckelmann was wrong in interpreting the word Αρφοδοιοσις in this and other inscriptions as of Aphrodisium in Cyprus. We shall have to add a remark presently on the inscriptions of Aphrodiasis in Caria.

† We cannot answer for the perfect accuracy of this translation. The original is so constructed that it is difficult to see the exact relation between the verbs, the participles, and the accusatives.

and Vorläufige Abhandlungen, §§ 194, 195, with

p. 429; Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol. iii. Nos. 5374,

In the inscriptions relating to this artist and to Aristeads and Papias (see ARISTEADS), we have evidence of the existence of a school of distinguished sculptors at Aphrodisias in the time of Trajan, the Antonines, and their successors ; to which also Zenas appears to have belonged.
[Zenas.] The prevalence of all these names of persons at Aphrodisias is attested by other extraneous inscriptions. (See Böckh, Corp. Inscr., pt. xiii. sect. iv. vol. ii. Nos. 2768, 2775, 2781, 2787.)

ZENON or ZENO, ecclesiastical. In the year 1508 a volume was published (Venet. ap. Bened.
Fontana) containing 105 sermons, divided into three books, ascribed to St. Zeno, bishop of Verona, from a MS. discovered during the fifteenth century by Guarini, in the episcopal library of that city. It was soon remarked that the Roman Martyrology placed St. Zeno in the reign of Gallienus, while these discourses evidently belonged to a later epoch, and several pieces were detected in the series which were known to be the work of other hands. Hence Sixtus Senensis (Biblioth. Sacrat. iv.) contended that the whole collection was to be regarded as a medley compiled from the writings of many different divines, and altogether excluded the name of Zeno from the catalogue of ecclesiastical authors.
This hypothesis, although frequently controverted, was never confuted until the brothers Bullerini, presbyters of the Church in Verona, undertook to vindicate the memory of an ancient bishop of their diocese, and after a laborious investigation of original documents and a careful separation of all spurious and foreign matter proved incontrotestably that 33 Sermones, 16 of considerable length, the rest comparatively brief, on various subjects of faith, morals, and discipline, were the productions of Zeno, who was ordained bishop of Verona, not under Gallienus as had been supposed, but a century later, about A.D. 363, the year in which Julian perished. They likewise inferred from internal evidence, that he was of African extraction, and died in A.D. 360 or 381. It is unnecessary to enumerate the various editions which appeared in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, since they are either mere copies of the original impression of 1508, or inferior to it from being deformed by arbitrary changes and interpolations. The only text which can be used with advantage is that of the Ballotini (fol. Veron. 1739), which is accompanied by copious notes and dissertations, and has been adopted by Galland in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. v. (fol. Venet. 1769), p. 109. There is an Italian translation of St. Zeno by the Marquis Giovanni Jacopo Dionisi, canon of Verona (fol. Veron. 1784). (Galland, Proleg. to vol. c. xii.; Schoenemann, Bibliotheca Patrum Latinarum, vol. i. § 12.)

ZENON or ZENO (Zbyrow), emperor of the East, A.D. 474—491, was descended from a noble Isaurian family. His name was originally Trascalissaeus, which he exchanged for that of Zeno when he married Ariadne, the daughter of the emperor Leo I. in 468. He probably assumed this name because another Isaurian of the name of Zeno had obtained distinction under Theodosius II., and was elevated to the consulship in 448. Of the early life of Zeno we have no particulars; but we are told that Zeno gave him his daughter in marriage in order to secure the support of the Isaurians against his ambitious minister Aspar, from which we may conclude that Zeno had great influence among his countrymen. On his marriage with Ariadne, he was raised by the emperor to the rank of patrician, was appointed commander of the imperial guards and of the armies in the East, and was elevated to the consulship along with Marcius in 469. The elevation of Zeno brought great trouble upon the church in consequence of his patronage of Peter, surnamed the Fuller, who had been expelled from the monastery of the Acco-metae both for immorality and heresy. Through the influence of Zeno Peter obtained possession of the patriarchate of Antioch in this year, but the means by which he gained his object, and his subsequent dealings by Leo are related elsewhere. (Paurtus.) Though Zeno was thus the means of giving some trouble to the emperor, he nevertheless was regarded by Leo as the main stay of his throne, and accordingly excused the jealousy of Aspar. While engaged in a campaign against the barbarians, who were ravaging Thrace, he narrowly escaped being assassinated by the friends of Aspar. On his return to court he persuaded Leo to get rid of his dangerous minister, and by his advice and contrivance Aspar was murdered in 471. Leo had no male children, and he wished to appoint his son-in-law his successor; but as soon as the emperor's intentions became known, there were great tumults at Constantinople, for the Greeks could not bear the idea of submitting to an Isaurian, and they hated Zeno personally both for the ugliness of his person and of his mind (Zenar. xiv. 2). Leo accordingly gave up his intention, and appointed as his successor his grandson Leo, the son of Zeno and Ariadne. This was in the year 473, and on the 3d of February in the following year (474) the emperor died, and was succeeded by his grandson. As the young emperor was only a child, the government devolved upon Zeno; and now that he had the real power, he soon acquired the title as well. Assisted by the dowager emperor Verina, he was declared emperor with the approbation of the senate; and his own son put the crown upon his head. His son, however, had still the precedence, and in the laws promulgated in this year in the names of the two Augusti, the name of Leo always precedes that of Zeno. By the death of Leo, which occurred towards the end of the year (474), Zeno became sole emperor. Some writers accuse him of having made away with his son to secure the undivided sovereignty for himself; and they even allege that Ariadne was privy to the crime: but as the Greek historians, who never miss an opportunity of blackening the character of Zeno, do not say a word respecting the murder of his son, we may safely reject the tale as a calumny.

The reign of Zeno was marked by great disasters, by intestine commotions, and by foreign wars. He is represented by the Greek historians as a voluptuary, a miser, and a tyrant. His contemptible character and his oppressive government occasioned frequent revolts among his subjects. The barbarians ravaged the fairest provinces of his empire; and the Goths, after encamping under the very walls of Constantinople, founded a new kingdom. In Italy under the sway of Theodoric the Great, Zeno had not been many months upon the throne before he was driven out of Constantinople by a formidable rebellion excited by Verina and her brother Basiliscus, A.D. 475. Zeno took refuge in Isauria along with his wife Ariadne, and Basiliscus was proclaimed emperor. Basiliscus sent Illus and his brother Trocundus, who were also Isaurians, with a powerful army against the fugitive emperor, whom they defeated in July, A.D. 476. But Basiliscus was still more unpopular at Constantinople than Zeno. His adherents were discontented and divided; and Zeno accordingly found no difficulty in persuading Illus to desert his new master, and espouse his cause. Zeno and Illus now marched upon Constantinople, and they appear to have received support from Theodoric, who had succeeded his father Theodemir as king of the Ostrogoths. Near Nicaea they were met by the troops of Basiliscus under the command of his nephew Harmatius or Harmanus, but the latter was also gained over, and Zeno entered Constantinople without opposition in the month of July, A.D. 477, twenty months after his expulsion. Basiliscus was deposed and sent to Phrygia, where he perished in the winter of the same year [Basiliscus]. The treachery of Harmatius had been purchased by great promises, which Zeno was now obliged to fulfill. He was made commander-in-chief of the army, and his son was raised to the rank of Caesar; but these high dignities only caused his ruin. Illus, who was jealous of any rival in power, easily persuaded the weak and timid emperor that Harmatius was aiming at the sovereignty, and accordingly before the end of the year Harmatius was murdered, and his son, the Caesar, was made reader in the church of Blachernae, in the neighbourhood of Constantinople. Zeno now devoted the cares of government upon Illus, while he gave himself up to the enjoyment of his pleasures. In A.D. 478 Illus was sole consul. In this year Theodoric, son of Triarius, a Gothic chief, who had been one of the supporters of the emperor Basiliscus, and who had retired into Callira. doric to the usurper revolt conferring delivered revolt, most the emperor, Triarius, son who, now feared to have the whole force of the Gothic nation turned against him, hastened to make peace with the son of Triarius, which he was only able to obtain by the most humiliating concessions.

In the following year, 479, a new and dangerous revolt broke out. At the head of it was Marcinian, the grandson of the emperor of that name, and the son of Anthemius, the emperor of the West [Marcianus; AnthemiuS]. Marcinian had married Leontin, the daughter of the late emperor Leo, and the sister of Ariadne, the wife of Zeno. He raised the standard of revolt in Constantinople itself, was joined by a powerful party, and defeated the forces of Zeno, whom he besieged in his palace. In the course of the night, however, Illus found means to corrupt his troops, and Marcinian was obliged to take refuge in a church. He was dragged out, ordained forthwith as a presbyter, and banished to a monastery in Cappadocia. As soon as Theodoric, the son of Triarius, heard of this revolt, he marched upon Constantinople under the pretext of coming to the assistance of his ally, but in reality in hopes of obtaining possession of the city without a struggle. He was, however, induced by large sums of money to retire. Meantime war had been continued against Theodoric, the son of Theodemir, who, enraged at the treachery of the emperor in the preceding year, had been turned from an ally into a foe. The war was ably conducted by Sabinianus, Zeno’s general, who gained some advantages over Theodoric.

In a.d. 481, war broke out again with Theodoric, the son of Triarius. He marched against Constantinople at the head of a more formidable army than he had ever collected previously, but was accidentally killed by his own javelin, while riding one day upon a new horse. Unexpectedly delivered from this formidable enemy, Zeno purchased peace with the other Theodoric in 483, by conferring upon him the most extraordinary honours. [Vol. III. p. 1044, a.] In the following year, 484, Theodoric was consul. This year was signalised by the commencement of a new rebellion, which lasted longer than any of the preceding ones, and brought Zeno to the brink of ruin. It was headed by Illus, the powerful minister of Zeno, who had now become an object of suspicion to his master, and of hatred both to Verina and Ariadne. The history of this rebellion is related at length elsewhere [ILLUS]. It was not finally suppressed till a.d. 488, when Illus and Leontius, whom the former had proclaimed emperor, were both taken prisoners and put to death. During the revolt of Illus, misunderstandings occurred between Theodoric and Zeno. In 487 the Gothic king again took up arms and threatened Constantinople. To save himself and his capital, Zeno gave Theodoric permission to invade Italy, and expel the usurper Odacer from the country. The terms were gladly accepted by Theodoric, and Zeno lived to see the foundation of a powerful Gothic kingdom in Italy [Theodoricus the Great]. Zeno died in the month of April a. n. 491, after a reign of seventeen years. He left no children, and was succeeded by Anastasius, an officer of the imperial life-guard of the Silentarii, who married Ariadne, the widow of Zeno. [Anastasius.]

In a.d. 482, Zeno published the famous Henoticon (foroipov), which was signed by all the bishops of the East under his reign, and that of Anastasius. It is preserved by Evagrius (iii. 19). The various modern writers who comment upon it are given by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 723; comp. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. xlv.). (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. vi. and Clinton, Fasti Romani, in which works all the authorities are collected.)

ZENO’NIA, the wife of the emperor Basiliusus. [Basiliusus.]

ZENO’PHANES (Zepofanov), a Greek writer mentioned twice at Athenaeus (x. p. 424, c. xiii. p. 576, d.), from whom it appears that he wrote a work on relationships (to ovgwevki). Modern critics propose to change the name into Xenophanes, but unnecessarily. Zenophanes is also found as a proper name in Strabo (xiv. p. 672) and in inscriptions.

ZEPHYRITIS (Zepyuris), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the promontory of Zephyrion in Egypt. (Athen. viii. p. 318; Callim. Epig. 31; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

ZEYPHYRUS (Zeipuros), the personification of the west wind, is described by Hesiod (Theog. 579) as a son of Astraeus and Eos. Zephyrus and Boreas are frequently mentioned together by Homer, and both dwelt together in a palace in Thrace. (II. ix. 5, Od. v. 295.) By the Harpy Podarge, Zephyrus became the father of the horses Xanthus and Balio, which belonged to Achilles (Hom. I. xvi. 150, &c.); but he was married to Chloris, whom he had carried off by force, and by whom he had a son Carpus. (Od. Fast. v. 157; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. v. 48.) On the sacred road from Athens to Eleusis, there was an altar of Zephyrus. (Iata. i. 37. § 1.) [L. S.]

ZERYNTHIA (Zernobh), a surname of Aphrodite, from the town of Zerinthus in Thrace, where she had a sanctuary said to have been built by Phadra. (Tzet. ad Icycoph 449, 958; Steph. Byz. and Etym. Magn. s. v.)

Zetes (Zhiriws), a son of Boreas and Oreithya, and a brother of Calais. Zetes and Calais, called the Boreades, are mentioned among the Argonauts (Apollod. i. 9. § 16), and are generally described as winged beings (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 324), though some say that they had wings at their heads and feet (Iygin. Fab. 14), and others that they had them only at their feet (Apollon. Rhod. i. 219), or at their shoulders (Pind. Pyth. iv. 325). Their sister Cleopatra, who was married to Phineus, the eschat-sayer and king in Salmydessus, was found by them when, during their Argonautic expedition, they arrived at Salmydessus. She had been thrown with her sons into prison by Phineus at the instigation of his second wife; but Zetes and Calais liberated them by force, gave the kingdom to their cousins, and sent the second wife of Phineus to her own country, Scythia (Diod. iv. 41). Others relate that the Boreades delivered Phineus from the Harpies; for it had been foretold that the Harpies might be killed by sons of Boreas, but that the sons of Boreas must die, if they should not be able to overtake the Harpies (Apollod. i. 9. § 21). Others again state that the Boreades perished in their pursuit of the Harpies (Apollod. iii. 15. § 2), or that Heracles killed them with his arrows near the island of Tenos (Hygin. Fab. 14; Senec. Med. 634). Different stories were related to account for the anger of Heracles against the Boreades (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1304; comp. Hygin. Fab. 273). Their tombs were said to be in Tenos, adorned with sepulchral stelae, one of which was moved whenever the wind blew from the north (Hygin. Fab. 14; Schol. ad Apollon. i. c.). Calais is also mentioned as the founder of the Campanian town of Cales. (Sil. Ital. viii. 515.) [L. S.]

ZEUTHUS (Ζευθος), a son of Zeus and Antiope, at Thebes, and a brother of Amphion. According to some (Hom. Od. xix. 523) he was married to Aedon, and according to others (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6) to Thebe. (Comp. Amphiion.) [L. S.]

ZEUS (Zeos), the greatest of the Olympian gods, and the father of gods and men, was a son of Cronos and Rhea, a brother of Poseidon, Hades (Pluto), Hestia, Demeter, Hera, and at the same time married to his sister Hera. When Zeus and his brothers distributed among themselves the government of the world by lot, Poseidon obtained the sea, Hades the lower world, and Zeus the heavens and the upper regions, but the earth became common to all (Hom. ii. xv. 187, &c., i. 528, ii. 111; Virg. Aen. iv. 372). Later mythologists enumerate three Zeus in their genealogies two Arcadian ones and one Cretan; and the first is said to be a son of Aether, the second of Coelus, and the third of Saturnus (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 21). This accounts for the fact that some writers use the name of the king of heaven who sends rain, snow, thunder, and lightning for heaven itself in its physical sense. (Horat. Carm. i. 1. 25; Virg. Georg. ii. 419.)

According to the Homeriac account Zeus, like the other Olympian gods, dwelt on Mount Olympus in Thessaly, which was believed to penetrate with its lofty summit into heaven itself (II. i. 221, &c., 334, 609, xiii. 433). He is called the father of gods and men (i. 514, v. 39; comp. Aeschyl. Sept. 512), the most high and powerful among the immortals, whom all others obey (II. xix. 258, viii. 10, &c.). He is the highest ruler, who with his council manages every thing (i. 175, viii. 22), the founder of kingly power, of law and of order, whence Dice, Themis and Nemesis are his assistants (i. 238, ii. 205, ix. 99, xvi. 397; comp. Hes. Op. et D. 36; Callim. Hymn. in Iov. 79). For the same reason he protects the assembly of the people (ἀγοραῖος), and the meetings of the council (βουλαίος), and as he presides over the whole state, so also over every house and family (ἐπιχώνιος, Od. xxiii. 335; comp. Or. I. 253). He also watched over the sanctity of the oath (ἐπικός), the law of hospitality (ἐχίνος), and protected suppliants (ἰδρήσοι, Od. ix. 270; comp. Paus. v. 24. § 2). He avenged those who were wronged, and punished those who had committed a crime, for which he watched the doings and sufferings of all men (ἐπισκόπως, Od. xiii. 213; comp. Apollon. Rhod. i. 1123). He was further the original source of all prophetic power, from whom all prophetic signs and sounds proceeded (παραγωγοῖ, II. viii. 250; comp. Aeschy. Eum. 19; Callim. Hymn. in Iov. 69). Every thing good as well as bad comes from Zeus, and according to his own choice he assigns their good or evil lot to mortals (Od. iv. 237, vi. 188, ix. 552, II. x. 71, xvi. 632, &c.), and fate itself was subordinate to him. He is armed with thunder and lightning, and the shaking of his aegis produces storm and tempest (II. xvii. 593): a number of epithets of Zeus in the Homeric poems describe him as the thunderer, the gatherer of clouds, and the ruler of the earth, by whom he had two sons, Ares and Hephaestus, and one daughter, Hebe (II. i. 585, v. 396, Od. xi. 604). Hermes sometimes acts as an independent divinity, she is ambitious and rebels against her lord, but she is nevertheless inferior to him, and is punished for her opposition (II. xv. 17, &c., xix. 93, &c.); his amours with other goddesses or mortal women are not concealed from her, though they generally rouse her jealousy and revenge (II. xiv. 317). During the Trojan war, Zeus, at the request of Thetis, favoured the Trojans, until Agamemnon made good the wrong he had done to Achilles. Zeus, no doubt, was originally a god of a portion of nature, whence the oak with its eatable fruit and the fertile doves were sacred to him at Dodona and in Arcadia (hence also rain, storms, and the seasons were regarded as his work, and hence the Cretan stories of milk, honey, and cornucopia); but in the Homeric poems, this primitive character of a personification of certain powers of nature is already effaced to some extent, and the god appears as a political and national divinity, as the king and father of men, as the founder and protector of all institutions hallowed by law, custom, or religion.

Hesiod (Theog. 116, &c.) also calls Zeus the son of Cronos and Rhea*, and the brother of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon. Cronos swallowed his children immediately after their birth, but when Rhea was near giving birth to Zeus, she applied to Uranus and Ge for advice as to how the child might be saved. Before the hour of birth came, Uranus and Ge sent Rhea to Lyctos in Crete, requesting her to bring up her child there. Rhea accordingly concealed her infant in a cave of Mount Aegaon, and gave to Cronos a stone wrapped up in cloth, which he swallowed in the belief that it was his son. Other traditions state that Zeus was born and brought up on Mount Dictie or Ida (also the Trojan Ida), Ithome in Messenia, Thebes in Boeotia, Argion in Achaea, or Olenos in Aetolia. According to the common account, however, Zeus grew up in Crete. In the meantime Cronos by a cunning device of Ge or Metis was made to bring up the children he had swallowed, and first of all the stone, which was afterwards set up by Zeus at Delphi. The young god now delivered the Cyclopes from the bonds with which they had been fettered by Cronos, and they in their gratitude provided him with thunder and lightning. On the advice of Ge, Zeus also liberated the hundred-armed Gigantes, Briseos, Cottus, and Gyes, that they might assist him in his fight against the Titans. (Apollod. i. 2.

* As Rhea is sometimes identified with Ge, Zeus is also called a son of Ge. (Aeschy. Suppl. 901.)
§ 1; Hes. Theog. 617, &c.) The Titans were conquered and shut up in Tartarus (Theog. 717), where they were henceforth guarded by the Hecatonchires. Thereupon Tartarus and Ge begot Typhoeus, who began a fearful struggle with Zeus, but was conquered. (Theog. 820, &c.) Zeus now obtained the dominion of the world, and chose Metis for his wife. (Theog. 881, &c.) When she was pregnant with Athena, he took the child out of her body and concealed it in his own, on the advice of Uranus and Ge, who told him that thereby he would retain the supremacy of the world. For if Metis had given birth to a son, this son (so fate had ordained it) would have acquired the sovereignty. After this Zeus, by his second wife Themis, became the father of the Horae and Moerae; of the Charites by Eurynome, of Persephone by Demeter, of the Muses by Mnemosyne, of Apollo and Artemis by Leto, and of Hebe, Ares, and Eileithyia by Hera. Athena was born out of the head of Zeus; while Hera, on the other hand, gave birth to Hephaestus without the co-operation of Zeus. (Theog. 836, &c.) The family of the Cronides accordingly embraces the twelve great gods of Olympus, Zeus (the head of them all), Poseidon, Apollo, Ares, Hermes, Hephaestus, Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Athena, Aphrodite, and Artemis. These twelve Olympian gods, who in some places were worshipped as a body, as at Athens (Thucyd. vi. 54), were recognised not only by the Greeks, but were adopted also by the Romans, who, in particular, identified their Jupiter with the Greek Zeus.

In surveying the different local traditions about Zeus, it would seem that originally there were several, at least three, divinities which in their respective countries were supreme, but which in the course of time became united in the minds of the people into one great national divinity. We may accordingly speak of an Arcadian, Dodonaean, Cretan, and a national Helenic Zeus.

1. The Arcadian Zeus (Zeus Δυνατός) was born, according to the legends of the country, in Arcadia, on Mount Parnassus (Callim. Hymn. in Iov. 7, 10), or in a district of Mount Lycaeon, which was called Cretea. (Paus. viii. 33. § 1; Callim. l. c. 14.) He was brought up there by the nymphs Theison, Neda, and Hagno; the first of these gave her name to an Arcadian town, the second to a river, and the third to a well. (Paus. viii. 33. § 2, &c., 47. § 2; comp. Callim. L. c. 33.) Lycaeon, a son of Pelasgus, who built the first and most ancient town of Lycurgus, called Zeus Lyceaeus, and erected a temple and instituted the festival of the Lycæa in honour of him; he further offered to him bloody sacrifices, and among others his own son, in consequence of which he was metamorphosed into a wolf (Nôkos; Paus. viii. 2. § 1, 38. § 1; Callim. l. c. 4; Od. Met. i. 213.) No one was allowed to enter the sanctuary of Zeus Lyceaeus on Mount Lycaeon, and there was a belief that, if any one entered it, he died within twelve months after, and that in it neither human beings nor animals cast a shadow. (Paus. viii. 38. § 5; comp. Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Iov. 13.) Those who entered it intentionally were stoned to death, unless they escaped by flight; and those who had got in by accident were sent to Eleutherus. (Plut. Qvest. Gr. 39.) On the highest summit of Lycaeon, there was an altar of Zeus, in front of which, towards the east, there were two pillars bearing golden eagles. The sacrifices offered there were kept secret. (Paus. viii. 38. § 5; Callim. l. c. 68.)

2. The Dodonaean Zeus (Zeus Δωδώναιος or Πηλαγικός) possessed the most ancient oracle in Greece, at Dodona in Epeirus, near mount Tomaros (Tomarus or Tomurus), from which he derived his name. (Hom. H. ii. 750, xvi. 233; Herod. ii. 52; Paus. i. 17. § 5; Strab. v. p. 338, vi. p. 504; Virg. Eclog. viii. 44.) At Dodona Zeus was mainly a prophetic god, and the oaktree was sacred to him; but there too he was said to have been reared by the Dodonaean nymphs (Hyades; Schol. ad Hom. H. xviii. 488; Hygin. F. B. 182; Od. Fast. vii. 711, Met. iii. 31). Respecting the Dodonaean oracle see chap. iv. Dict. Ant. vii. 91 (24).

3. The Cretan Zeus (Zeus Δυνατός or Κρητικός). We have already given the account of him which is contained in the Theogony of Hesiod. He is the god, to whom Rhea, concealed from Cronos, gave birth in a cave of mount Dictæ, and whom she entrusted to the Curetes and the nymphs Adrasteia and Ida, the daughters of Melisseus. They fed him with milk of the goat Amaethia, and the bees of the mountain provided him with honey. (Apollod. i. 1. § 6; Callim. l. c.; Dio. v. 70; comp. Athen. xi. 70; Od. Fast. v. 115.) Crete is called the island or nurse of the great Zeus, and his worship there appears to have been very ancient. (Virg. Aen. iii. 104; Dionys. Perieg. 501.) Among the places in the island which were particularly sacred to the god, we must mention the district about mount Ida, especially Diaus, which was said to have been built by the Curetes, and where Minos had ruled and conversed with Zeus (Hom. Od. xix. 172; Plat. de Leg. i. 1; Dio. v. 70; Strab. x. p. 730; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 21); Gortyn, where the god, in the form of a bull, landed when he had carried off Europa from Phoenicia, and where he was worshipped under the surname of Hecontombeus (Heaysh. s. v.); further the towns about mount Dictæ, as Lyctos (Hes. Theog. 477), Praeos, Hierapityna, Biennos, Eleutherœnas and Oaxus. (Comp. Hioec, Creta, i. p. 169, &c., 339, &c.)

4. The national Hellenic Zeus, near whose temple at Olympia in Elis, the great national panegyric was celebrated every fifth year. There too Zeus was regarded as the father and king of gods and men, and as the supreme god of the Hellenic nation. His statue there was executed by Phidias, a few years before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the majestic and sublime idea for this statue having been suggested to the artist by the words of Homer, Il. i. 537. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. 223.) According to the traditions of Elis, Cronos was the first ruler of the country, and in the golden age there was a temple dedicated to him at Olympia. Rhea, it is further said, entrusted the infant Zeus to the Idaean Dactyls, who were also called Curetes, and had come from mount Ida in Crete to Elis. Hercules, one of them, contended with his brother Dactyls in a footrace, and adorned the victor with a wreath of olive. In this manner he is said to have founded the Olympic games, and Zeus to have contended with Cronos for the kingdom of Elis. (Paus. v. 7. § 4.) The Latin poets give to Zeus an immense number of epithets and surnames, which are derived partly from the places where he was worshipped, and partly from his powers and functions. He was worshipped throughout Greece and her colonies, so that it would be useless and almost impossible to enumerate all the places. The eagle, the oak, and the summits of mountains were sacred to him, and his sacrifices generally consisted of goats, bulls and cows. (Horn. II. ii. 403; Aristot. Ethic. v. 10, ix. 2; Virg. Aen. iii. 21, iv. 627.) His usual attributes are, the sceptre, eagle, thunderbolt, and a figure of Victory in his hand, and sometimes also a cornucopia. The Olympic Zeus sometimes wears a wreath of olive, and the Dodonaean Zeus a wreath of oak leaves. In works of art Zeus is generally represented as the omnipotent father and king of gods and men, according to the idea which he had been embodied in the statue of the Olympic Zeus by Pheidias. (Müller, Ant. Art and its Rem. §§ 349—351.)

ZEUXIADES (Zeuxidnes), artists. I. A stautury of the school of Lyaius. (Silanion, p. 818, b.) An interesting confirmation of the truth of the reading of Pliny, adopted in the article referred to, is furnished by an extant inscription on the base of a statue of the creator Hyperides, which was published by Spon (Miscell. p. 137) in the form TETΣIAIAS EHIOLEI (whence Sillig makes an artist: Tassiodes, Catal. Artif. s. v.) but the true reading, ZEUXIADHΣ, has been established by Visconti (Icon. Grecq. vol. i. p. 272), and adopted by Welcker (Kunstblatt, 1827, No. 82, pp. 326—327) and Raoul-Rochette (Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 413, 2nd ed.). The date of Hyperides (n. c. 386—322) agrees with that which must be assigned to Zeuxidnes on the testimony of Pliny. (See Stelanon.)

2. A vase painter, whose name appears on the bottom of a vase in the Caiusio collection. The letters however are so indistinct as to make the reading doubtful. Raoul-Rochette reads it ZETΣIADEΣ, Amati ZEVXIADEΣ; both of which forms are equivalent to Zeuxidnes; but Ottfried Müller could not read the name at all in a facsimile of the original work. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, pp. 63, 64.)

[13.5]

ZEUXIDANUS (Zeuxidanos). 1. A friend of Sparta, and tenth of the Euryptiadeis. He was grandson of Theopompus, and father of Anaxidamus, who succeeded him. (Paus. iii. 7.)

2. A son of Leuctchides, king of Sparta. He was also named Cyniscus. He died before his father, leaving a son. Archidamus II. (Herod. vi. 71; Thuc. ii. 47; Paus. iii. 7.)

[13.5]

ZEUXIPPE (Zeuxippe). 1. A sister of Patitha or Praxitha, was a Naiaid and married to Pandion, by whom she became the mother of Proene, Philomela, Erechtheus and Butes. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 8; comp. Butes.)

2. A daughter of Lamedon, and the wife of Sicyon, by whom she was the mother of Chthonophyle. (Paus. ii. 6. § 2.)

[14.5]

ZEUXIPPUS (Zeuxippos), a son of Apollo, by the nymph Syllis, was king of Sicyon. (Paus. ii. 6. § 3.)

[14.5]

ZEUXIPPUS (Zeuxippos), a Boeotian, one of the partisans of the Romans. When Brachyllas was made Boeotarch he and some others betook themselves to T. Quinctius at Elateia, and gained his sanction for the assassination of Brachyllas, which they accomplished with the aid of Alexamenus, the general of the Aetolians, who provided them with the instruments for effecting their nefarious project. (Liv. xxxiii. 27, 28; Polyb. xviii. 29.) Zeuxippus at first put a bold face upon the matter, taking part in the investigation that ensued that he might divert suspicion from himself. Some who were put to the torture, falling in with the suspicion entertained by many, charged Zeuxippus and Psistrasitus with the crime. Zeuxippus fled by night to Tanagra, and alarmed lest information should be given by one of his slaves, who was privy to the whole affair, removed from Tanagra to Anthedon, thinking the latter a safer place. During his exile he did the Romans some good service in their wars with Antiochus and Philip. The Roman senate, in return, complied with a request which he made to them, and wrote to the Boeotians requesting his recall. With this request, however, the Boeotians did not comply, fearing lest it should occasion a breach between themselves and Macedonia, and they sent an embassy to Rome intimating their intention. Zeuxippus himself came to Rome at the same time, and the Romans charged the Aetolians and Achaenans with the duty of carrying their wishes into execution. The Achaenans did not dare to make war for that object, but sent an embassy to the Boeotians, who promised to yield to their desire, but did not do so. This procedure led to some hostile inroads into Boeotia, and a regular war would have broken out if the senate had persisted in their demand; but they suffered the matter to drop. (Liv. i.e.; Polyb. xxii. 2.)

[15.6]

ZEUXIPPUS (Zeuxippos), artists. 1. A painter, of Heraclea, who is mentioned by Socrates in the Protagoras of Plato (p. 318, b. c.) as "this young man, who has recently come to the city" (τούτου τού νεανικού τον την χρονια ἐπιδημιοῦντος). Now since the celebrated Zeus was a native of Heraclea, since his age would just suit the date of this allusion [Zeus], and since he is expressly mentioned by Socrates elsewhere (Xen. Mem. i. 4. § 6, Oecon. x. 1), it is difficult to believe that this Zeuxippus was a different person. There is no occasion, however, to suspect the reading in the passage of the Protagoras. The true explanation is perhaps to be found in the common tendency of Greek names to assume abbreviated forms; and thus perhaps Zeuxippus is no other than the old genuine form of the name Zeuxis. There is another passage in which Socrates is made to refer to: "the Heraclean stranger," without mentioning his name (Xen. Symp. iv. 63.).

2. Sculptor of Argos. (Phil. [r. P. S.])

ZEUXIS (Zeuxis), a general in the service of Antiochus the Great. He was engaged in the war with Molo, whom he prevented from crossing the Tigris. Being placed under the command of Xenoetas, he was left by the latter in charge of the camp, when he made his ill-fated attempt to over-power Molo. But he retired on the approach of Molo, and suffered the latter to cross the river without opposition. When Antiochus himself marched against Molo, Zeuxis persuaded him to cross the river, and was in command of the left wing of the army. He distinguished himself in the prominent part in the siege of Seleucia. (Polyb. v. 45—60.) It is perhaps this same Zeus whom we find satrap of Lydia under Antiochus the Great. (Polyb. xxi. 13.) To him Philippus, when at war with Attalus, applied for a supply of corn, which he obtained. (Polyb. xvi. 1, 24.) In the decisive battle with the Romans, Zeuxis was one of the commanders of the front line (Appian, Syr. 33), and after the defeat of Antiochus was one of the ambassadors sent to the Scipios to treat for peace, on which mission he proceeded to Rome. (Polib. xxi. 13, 14, xxii. 7; Liv. xxxvii. 41, 45.) [C. P. M.]

ZEUXIS, a philosopher of the sceptical school, the disciple of Anesidemos. Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 106) mentions a work by him — περὶ διττῶν λόγων. [C. P. M.]

ZEUXIS (Zeügis), the name of two physicians who are sometimes confounded together:

1. A contemporary of Strabo, probably about the middle or end of the first century B.C. He was at the head of a celebrated Hippocratic school of medicine established at Men-Carus in Phrygia, between Laodice and Carrara, and was succeeded in this post by Alexander Philalethes. (Strabo, xii. 8. p. 77, ed. Taucn.)

[ W. A. G.]

ZEUXIS (Zeügis), artists. 1. The celebrated painter, who excelled all his contemporaries except Parrhasius, and whose name is one of the most renowned in the history of ancient art, was a native of Heracleia; but which of the cities of that name had the honour of his birth we are not informed. Most modern writers follow the opinion of Hardouin, who fixed upon Heracleia in Lucania, for no better reason than that Zeuxis executed a celebrated picture for the neighbouring city of Croton; and on a precisely similar ground others decide in favour of Heracleia Lyncestis, in Macedonia, because Zeuxis enjoyed the patronage of Archelaus. It is evident how these two opinions show how completely each of them and of other; both rest on facts which are better accounted for by the celebrity of the artist, which was doubtless co-extensive with the Grecian name; and, as for the former, it is most probable, as will be seen presently, that Zeuxis was born some time before the foundation of the Italian Heracleia, which was not built till after the destruction of Siris, in b.c. 433. It is rather singular that none of the commentators (so far as we know) have thought of that city which was the most celebrated of any of its name for the great men whom it sent forth, namely, Heracleia on the Pontus Euxinus. The question deserves investigation whether, when Heracleia is mentioned without any distinctive addition by an Athenian writer of the time of Xenophon and Plato, we are not justified in assuming that the reference is to Heracleia on the Euxine. The probability of this city having been the birth-place of Zeuxis is confirmed by the well-known fact, that the artist belonged to the Asiatic school of painting; a fact which is also indicated in the tradition which made him a native of Ephesus (Tzetz. Chii. viii. 196), the head-quarters of the Asiatic school. In the same way Apelles and other eminent artists of the Asiatic school are called natives of Ephesus, though known to have been born at other places.*

The date of Zeuxis has likewise been a matter of dispute, which has arisen from the confused account of it given by Pliny, who is our chief authority for the artist’s life. (II. N. xxxv. 9. s. 36 § 2.) He says that “The doors of the art, thrown open by Apollodorus of Athens, were entered by Zeuxis of Heracleia in the fourth year of the 85th Olympiad (b.c. 400—399) ... who is by some place erroneously in the 79th Olympiad (or 89th, for the best MSS. vary; b.c. 464—469 or 424—420), when Demophilus of Hiermon and Nessen of Thasos must of necessity have flourished, since it is doubted of which of them he was the disciple.” Now, passing over what is said of Demophilus and Nessen—which cannot help us, as it is doubtful who the former artist was, and we have no other mention of the latter,—it appears to us that this passage, when cleared of a mistake into which Pliny was led in a way which can be explained, contains the true period of Zeuxis, namely, from about Ol. 89 to Ol. 96, b.c. 424—400; the mistake referred to, as made by Pliny, being the assumption of the period at which Zeuxis had attained to the height of his reputation, as that at which he began to flourish. And here we have the reply to the argument of Silius in favour of reading lxxxix. rather than lxxxxix.; for the latter, he contends, is the true date for the beginning of the artist’s career, and is not inconsistent with his having flourished at Ol. 95. 4; whereas the former, involving as it does an interval of sixty-seven years, is inconsistent with the last date. The premises are sound; but the true conclusion in each branch of the argument appears to us to be the direct opposite of that drawn by Silius. The date of Ol. 89 is certainly quite consistent with the fact that Zeuxis was still flourishing in Ol. 95. 4; but it is altogether inconsistent with his having begun to flourish at the latter date, which is the view expressly stated by Pliny, who therefore very consistently rejects the former date;*

* A modern writer on art, who, on the strength of the statement referred to, and of a chronological mistake of Lucian’s, makes a second painter Apelles, of Ephesus, should consistently have invented a second Zeuxis, of Ephesus; and so in several other instances, in which two places are mentioned in connection with an artist’s name—the one being that of his birth, the other that of the school to which he belonged.
ZEUXIS.

and, on the other hand, the date of Ol. 79 is not only opposed to Pliny's view (for which indeed it makes no difference whether the imagined error was 28 years or 68, since both would be absolutely wrong), but it is so utterly inconsistent with all we learn from other quarters of the age of Zeuxis, that we cannot believe it to have been assigned by any of the Greek writers whom Pliny followed, and therefore we cannot believe that he had any occasion to refer to it. This date of Ol. 79 would, in fact, make Zeuxis a contemporary of Polygnotus. The important result which remains to us is the positive testimony of some of the Greek writers on art, that Zeuxis flourished in Ol. 89, n. c. 424.

Pliny's reason for rejecting this statement, and for fixing on the 95th Olympiad as the commencement of the career of Zeuxis, is, we suspect, to be found in his notion of the relation of Zeuxis to Apollodorus, whom he places at Ol. 93. Pliny evidently believed Zeuxis to have been largely indebted to Apollodorus; and thus far, as we shall presently see, he was doubtless in the right. But if he drew from this relation the inference that Zeuxis must have begun to flourish some eight or twelve years, or even at all, after the time at which Apollodorus flourished, at the height of his reputation, he adopted a conclusion which by no means necessarily follows. We are nowhere expressly told that Zeuxis was a pupil of Apollodorus; but this does not matter. In schools of art the disciple is often very little younger, sometimes even older, than his master; and this is especially the case where an artist, who has already made some progress in his studies or even in the practice of his art, enters the school of a master who is celebrated in some one point of the art, for the sake of acquiring the knowledge of that point. Numerous examples might be cited from the history both of ancient and modern art of this sort of relation between contemporary artists, and also of the errors made by adopting some fixed average period as that by which it may be assumed that the disciple was later than his master. For these reasons we draw a conclusion in favour of the date we have assigned to Zeuxis, even from the manner in which Pliny draws his correctness.

This date is abundantly confirmed by other evidence. Quintilian (xii. 10) tells us that he lived about the time of the Peloponnesian War. The allusions to him, which are put into the mouth of Socrates by Xenophon and Plato, even after making all allowance for the anachronisms which the latter is often content to commit for the sake of dramatic effect, point to the date above fixed, and place him, at all events, earlier than the date assigned by Pliny (Plat. Gorg. p. 453, c. d.; Xen. Mem. i. 4. § 6, Oecoc. x. 1; and probably also Sympos. iv. 63, and Plat. Protag. p. 318, b. c.; see Zeuxippus). Besides the general indications of his date, furnished by these passages, the one last quoted (if Zeuxippus there be Zeuxis) gives a specific date perfectly in accordance with the one assumed, for the second visit of Protagoras to Athens, on occasion of which the dialogue is supposed to be held, took place in n. c. 428. Similar incidental evidence may be derived from Aristophanes, who, in the Acharnians (991, 992), having mentioned Eros, adds:—

Δρογνο μανσίθοτον εχων ατοφανον ανθρώπον.

Now, from the general character of the allusions in the comic poets, we may safely infer that the picture alluded to was only recently painted; and therefore we are quite prepared to accept the express statement of the Scholast, that the picture referred to was one painted by Zeuxis, and dedicated in the temple of Aphrodite at Athens, representing Eros in the fairest youthful beauty, and as crowned with roses (comp. Suid. s. v. Ἄεις

The date of the Acharnians was n. c. 425; and this agrees wonderfully well with the passage in the Protagoras, where it is clearly implied that the painter had already achieved a very high reputation. It is hardly necessary to remark, that there is no difficulty in explaining the word νεώσις as referring to a period three or four years back, especially when we are dealing with a chronological allusion in Plato. It is true that each portion of the incidental evidence now adduced has a certain degree of indefiniteness; but some of the soundest results of critical inquiries are based upon the cumulative force and mutual confirmation of a body of incidental evidence, no one portion of which, by itself, would justify the conclusion.

The above arguments apply to the beginning of the career of Zeuxis: they are abundantly confirmed by evidence referring to a later period, namely, from what we are told of his connection with beauty, and the painting of Portraits, his king of Macedonia, whose reign began in n. c. 413, and ended in n. c. 399, the very year in which, according to Pliny, Zeuxis began to flourish. But for this king he executed an important and extensive work, which would not have been entrusted to any but an artist of established reputation, the decoration of the royal palace at Pella with paintings, for which Zeuxis received four hundred minae (Aelian, V. H. xiv. 17). Aelian relates this fact in connection with a remark of Socrates upon it, which is worth repeating, both for its own sake, and as showing that the work must have been executed some time before n. c. 399 (when So- crates himself was put to death), and yet after the fame of Zeuxis had been spread far and wide—"Archelaius," said the philosopher, "had spent 400 minae on his house, hiring Zeuxis of Hermicia to paint it, but nothing on himself (that is, on his own house nor on his own person), Archelaius being a distance, eager to see the house, but none visited Macedonia for the sake of Archelaius himself." We are also told by Pliny, that Zeuxis, after acquiring a great fortune by the exercise of his art, adopted the custom of giving away his pictures, because no adequate price could be set upon them; and one of the paintings so given away was a picture of Pan, which he presented to Archelaius: another proof that he had reached the summit of his reputation before that king's death in n. c. 399. Another indication of his date is found in the story related by Pintarch (Per. 13), which represents him as partly contemporary with Agatharcus, who painted scenes for Aeschylus or Sophocles [Agatharcus].

On these grounds we may say, with almost absolute certainty, that Zeuxis flourished chiefly during the last quarter of the fifth century, n. c.; and, as it has been shown to be probable that he was already exercising his art at Athens with great success at the beginning of that period, we may assume that he was then not less than thirty years old (and this falls within the meaning of νεώσις in the Protagoras); and therefore that he war born about B.C. 455, and that he came to Athens about or soon after the beginning of the Peloponnesian War. He must have been in Macedonia, at the court of Archelaus, soon after B.C. 413. He must have spent some time in Magna Graecia, as we learn from the story respecting the picture of Helen, which he painted for the city of Croton; and it is also probable that he visited Sicily, as we are told that one of those inestimable pictures, which he gave away, was presented to the Agrigentines. His travels through Greece itself were no doubt extensive. We find him at Olympia, where he made an ostentatious display, before the eyes of all Greece, of the wealth which his art had brought him, by appearing in a robe embroidered with his own name in letters of gold: another example of that vanity, into which the consciousness of merit often betrays the artist, and which was still more strongly exhibited by his contemporary Parrhasius. The time of his death is unknown, for the inference which has been drawn from the elogium upon him in the oration of Isocrates πεθανόν ἔρριζον merely confirms the fact, which is evident from the arguments already adduced as to his age, that he died before the delivery of that oration in B.C. 353 (comp. Harpocrt. s.n.). The story told of the manner of his death, namely, that he choked with laughing at a picture of an old woman which he had just painted ("Festus, s. v. Pictor"), furnishes another instance of those fictions which the ancient grammarians were so fond of inventing, in order to make the deaths of great men correspond with the character of their lives. In the case of Zeuxis, we would understand the fable to refer to that marvellous power of imitation, which was one of the most conspicuous and most admired qualities of his style. The few other facts which are known respecting his personal history will be best stated in the account we have to give of his works.

In attempting to trace the artistic life of Zeuxis, we meet with a difficulty in the outset. It was a disputed question, Pliny tells us, whether he was the disciple of Demophilus of Himera, or of Neseas of Thassos. Now we cannot but think that the former of these opinions is connected with the belief that the birthplace of Zeuxis was Heraclea in Lucania; for, if Demophilus of Himera be the same person as the artist of whom a brief account is given under Démophilus, he must have been known through Southern and Central Italy, as well as in his native Sicily, as one of the most celebrated painters of the age preceding that of Zeuxis. On the other hand, from the tradition respecting Neseas of Thassos (of whom, unfortunately, we have no other mention), we are inclined to derive, not only a confirmation of our opinion, that Zeuxis was a native of the Pontic Heraclea, but also an indication of the school in which he received his early training. For the island of Thassos was the home and head of the Ionic school of painting, in both its branches, the Asiatic and the Attic. In it lived the family of artists to which belonged Polygnotus, who established at Athens the new school of painting, which, after some rivalry with the older Attic school, with which Micon and Panæus were connected, became united with the latter, and acquired the position which is marked by the inventions and fame of the Athenian Aigionadorus; while the Asiatic (or, as it is usually called simply the Ionian) school, received a new character from Dionysius of Colophon, the imitator of Polygnotus. The head-quarters of the Ionian school must soon have been fixed at Ephesus, where we find its home in the time of Parrhasius and his successors, and where, from the tradition which makes Zeuxis an Ephesian, it is probable that he also studied. At all events, he clearly became acquainted with the school of painting, the leading characteristics of which were accuracy of imitation, the exhibition of sensual charms, and the gratification of sensual taste. The perfection to which Zeuxis carried these qualities, which we suppose to have been learned in the Asiatic school, will presently appear in the description of his paintings. But there was another element in his style, which he acquired at Athens, whether he went at the very period when the wondrous works of Phidias in sculpture were just completed, and when Apollodorus was beginning to develop those marvellous powers of his own art which reside in the contrast of light and shade, and which appear to have remained a secret even to Polygnotus. [APOLODORUS] How great was the influence of Apollodorus upon Zeuxis, may be seen in the manner in which Pliny introduces the name of Zeuxis ("Apollod. artis foris opertus Zeuxis intravit") as one of his striking examples of the claim which Apollodorus embodied in verse, that Zeuxis had robbed him of his art and carried it away, that is, had surpassed him in what constituted his peculiar excellence. (Plin. l. c. In eum Apollodorus supra scriptus versum fecit, artem ipsi ablatam Zeuxin foro secat.) Quintilian (xii. 10) has robbed Apollodorus still further, by ascribing the invention of the treatment of light and shade to Zeuxis (Luminum umbrarumque incensione rationem Zeuxis traditur). And as to the influence of Phidias upon Zeuxis, we need no direct testimony to assure us how deeply the genius of the young painter must have been affected by those glorious productions, then in all their freshness, the very fragments of which have caused a new birth in modern art; but we are not without some positive evidence on the subject, in the statement that Zeuxis, like Phidias, took Homer's descriptions as the model for his own representations of heroic persons, whom, even in his female figures, he painted in such a manner as to give large proportions to the limbs in the ordinary human body. (Quintil. l. c. : plius membri corporis dedit, ut amplus atque augustus ratus, atque, ut existimant, Homerum sectus, cui validissima quaese forma etiam in feminis placit.) Some of the ancient writers charged him with carrying this enlargement of the heads and limbs of his figures even to a fault (Plin. l. c. : Deprehenditur tamen eum grandior in capitis artificisque).

In one respect, however, the art of Zeuxis had already degenerated from that of Phidias and Polygnotus. His idealism was that of form, not of character. What Aristotle calls ἰδῆς, the exhibition of character in such a manner as to elevate the feelings and moral sentiments of the spectator, was entirely wanting, the philosopher tells us, in the works of Zeuxis, while it was conspicuous in those of Polygnotus; and Zeuxis was rather the Euripides of painting than its Homer. (Arist. Poi. vi. 5; for a fuller explanation of the passage, see POLYGNOTUS, p. 464.) When Pliny says of the Penelope of Zeuxis, evidently as a sort of answer to the judgment of Aristotle, "in qua pinxisse mores videtur," we can only say that, knowing nothing of the picture in question, and knowing too much of Pliny's judgment in such matters, we cannot give the Roman compiler credit for understanding what the Greek philosopher meant by ἤδος.

His marvellous power in expressing the ideal standard of human beauty, and of exactly imitating those natural objects, which are incapable of an ideal representation, are celebrated by several ancient writers. In the passage, more than once referred to in this work, in which Cicero expresses the general character of several of the chief artists of Greece (Brut. 10), as illustrative of the gradual progress of art, he says of Zeuxis, Polygnotus, and Timanthes, "they prize the forms and outlines (formes et lineamenta); but in Echion, Nicomachus, Protagenes, and Apelles every thing is already perfected." Elsewhere (de Invent. ii. 1; comp. Victorin. Expós. ad loc.) he relates, more fully than any other ancient author, the well-known story of his choice of the five most beautiful virgins of Croton, as models for his picture of Helen, to be dedicated in the temple of Juno in that city; which is one of the best illustrations of the sort of ideal character which was expressed in the paintings of Zeuxis, and which shows us that his idealism consisted in the formation of a high average of merely human beauty, by the actual imitation, in one figure, of the most beautiful models of each separate part which he could find. This picture, Cicero tells us, was esteemed the finest work of the painter, in that application of his art in which he most excelled, namely the delineation of the female form; and Zeuxis himself is said to have indicated his own opinion that this was not only his masterpiece, "but that its excellence could not be surpassed, by adding to it the following lines of Homer (Il. i. 156—158):—

Οὐ νεοσίς Τρώας καὶ ἐκνημήδας Ἀχιλλὸς τοπικὴ ἄμφος πολὺν χρόνον ἀλέγα πάντειαν καὶ ἀναμηνύσθη δεῖς εἰς ἀνα λουκεν.

(Val. Max. iii. 7, ext. i.) This judgment was confirmed by that of the great painter Nicomachus (see Nicomachus, p. 1196, a.), but, when he saw a goddess in the Helen of Zeuxis, we must remember that, in his age, even more than in that of Zeuxis himself, the highest idea of a divine form was satisfied by the perfection of merely human beauty. This picture and its history were celebrated, Cicero further tells us, by many poets, who preserved the names of the five virgins upon whom the choice of Zeuxis fell; and it has more than once been alluded to by modern poets. (See especially the Venetian poet, Antonio Maironi, who says of one of his poems: "It is not only a masterpiece, but that its excellence could not be surpassed, by adding to it the following lines of Homer (Il. i. 156—158):—"

almost to perfection. The well-known story of the trial of skill in that species of painting between these two artists, if not literally true, indicates the opinion which was held in ancient times of their powers of imitation. In this contest the picture of Zeuxis represented a bunch of grapes, so naturally painted that the birds flew at the picture to eat the fruit; upon which the artist, confident in this proof of his success, called upon his rival no longer to delay but to draw aside the curtain and show his picture: but the picture of Parrhasius was the curtain itself, which Zeuxis had mistaken for real drapery. On discovering his error, Zeuxis hour by hour yielded the plant to Parrhasius, saying that he himself had deceived birds, but Parrhasius is an artist. (Plin. l. c. § 3) Such a tale, perhaps, hardly falls within the province of criticism; otherwise an exception might be taken to the decision of Zeuxis, on more grounds than one. As a pendant to this story, Pliny (l. c. § 4) relates another, less known, but more interesting, if true; namely, that Zeuxis afterwards painted a boy carrying grapes, at which a bird again flew; but this time the artist was disappossed at his success, and said:—'I have painted the grapes better than the boy; for had I made him perfectly like life, the bird would have been frightened away.'

Besides this accuracy of imitation, many of the works of Zeuxis displayed great dramatic power. This appears to have been especially the case with his Infant Hercules strangling the Serpent, where the chief force of the composition consisted in the terror of Alcmena and Amphitryon, as they witnessed the struggle. (Plin. l. c. § 2: Hercules Invent. et Amphitryona.) This picture was one of those which Zeuxis painted after he had reached the summit of his fame, and which he freely gave away as above all price; for there can be no doubt that it was the same work as the Alcmena, which, as Pliny states a little before, he presented to the people of Agrigentum. Another picture, in which he showed the same dramatic power, applied to a very different subject, was his Female Hippocentaer, of which a most charming description is given by Lucian (Zeuxis, 3, foll.), who saw a copy of the work at Athens, the original having been lost in a shipwreck off Cape Malea, on its way to Rome, whither it has been sent by Sulla. It represented a peaceful, happy, cheerful group of Centaurs, in which the repose of the mother suckling her young was beautifully contrasted with the sportive roughness of the father, who was partly visible on an elevation in the background, holding up a lion's head in his hand. The idea of the Centaurs gave the artist a splendid opportunity to show his power of delineating form, and that in several varieties; the male was fierce and shaggy, and his face, though smiling, was wild and savage; the Centaress combined the beauties of a perfect female form, in the upper part, with those of a mare of the purest Thessalian breed, so skilfully united that it was impossible to detect the point of transition from the human form to the animal; and the young ones, though new born, showed the fierce wildness of their nature, mingled with infantine timidity and curiosity at the sight of the lion's whelp, and while they looked at it, they clung closer to their mother. The figure of a female Centaur, suckling her young one, copied doubtless from the painting of Zeuxis, is seen in a gem in the Florentine Museum (Gori, vol. i. p. 95, No. 5; Müller, Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. i. p. xiiii. No. 203). Lucian himself (Zeux. 3) mentions this work in illustration of a statement which he makes concerning Zeuxis’s choice of subjects, namely, that “he did not paint those popular and common subjects (or at least very few of them), such as heroes, or gods, or battles, but he always aimed at novelty, and if any thing unusual or strange occurred to him, upon it he displayed the perfection of his art.” A glance, however, at the subjects of the painter’s works will show that this statement is to be accepted with a considerable deduction.

Of the diligence, with which Zeuxis elaborated his paintings, we have a proof in the reply which he made to Agatharcus, who, as was natural for a so-called painter, was boasting of the rapidity with which he executed his works, when Zeuxis quietly observed: — “But I take a long time about mine.” (’Εγώ δὲ παλλείχα χρόνον: Plut. Per. 13.) The tale is told with a slight variation by Plutarch, in another passage (De Amic. Mult. 5, p. 94, f.), that Zeuxis, being blamed for the slowness with which he worked, replied, “I confess that I take a long time to paint; for I paint works to last a long time (Ομολογώ ἐν παλλήχα χρόνῳ γράφειν, καὶ γὰρ εἰς πολὺν ἥκοντα τὸ πίνακον, Pliny in aedilitia). There are other anecdotes told of Zeuxis in common with other great painters. Thus the celebrated verse, ascribed to Apollo, is said by Pliny to have been written by Zeuxis upon his picture of an athlete: — “A man will find it easier to blame than to imitate” (Invenitur altercum faicit, quum imitaturum; or, in the original, Μυκῆσαι τις μάλαν ἢ μύκησαι.

The reproof addressed by Apelles to Megabyzus, or, as others say, to Alexander, is ascribed by Aelian (V. H. ii. 2) to Zeuxis. (See Apelles, p. 221, a.)

It is unnecessary to multiply references to passages of the ancient writers in praise of Zeuxis. The remarkable fact that his name is not mentioned by Pausanius, is explained by the supposition, which is almost undoubtedly true, that his pictures were mostly upon panels, according to the general practice of the Greek painters, and therefore that they had either been destroyed or plundered before the time of Pausanius. The latter process would of course be carried on by the Roman conquerors of Greece with an eagerness proportioned to the celebrity of the artists, and accordingly we find several of his best works in the list of Pliny. Cicero also expressly tells us, with reference to the pictures which he painted for the temple of Juno at Croton, that not even the sanctity of the same had availed for the preservation of any of them, except the Helen. He does not, however, say distinctly whether that great work was still at Croton in his time. Pliny mentions a Helen by Zeuxis as being at Rome, in the portico of Philip; but he does not identify it with the picture painted for the Crotonians, the subject of which indeed he does not mention; it is not improbable however that they were the same. The picture of Helen at Athens, in the portico called "Ἀκρίβειας Στράδης" was of course not the same; but it may have been a copy of it. (Eustath. ad II. xi. 629, p 836, 37.) How the Athenians were robbed by Sulla of his Centaur, and how that picture perished, has been already mentioned; and his picture of the Muses was carried off to Rome, from Ambracia, by Fulvius Nobilius. In addition to the works which have been already mentioned, we possess notices of the following pictures by Zeuxis. His Jupiter enthroned, with the gods standing by, is mentioned by Pliny with the epithet magnificus, and its subject confirms the opinion that it was one of the artist’s finest works. Pliny also mentions his Marsyas Bound (Marsyae religatus), in the temple of Concord. A minute description of a painting on this subject is given by Philostratus, who, however, does not mention Zeuxis as its painter (Elilon. 2); and the subject frequently occurs on vases, sarcophagi, candelabra, and other remains of ancient art, as well as in the painting found at Herculanenum, and one or two others, which may be presumed to be more or less copied from the work of Zeuxis. (For an account of these works, see Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 362, n. 4; for a sketch of the picture at Herculanenum, Müller, Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. i. pl. xiii. No. 204; and for copies of other works, which represent the story of Apollo and Marsyas, see the Denkmäler, vol. ii. pl. xiv. Nos. 149—154). The Menelaus of Zeuxis is mentioned by Tzetzes (Chl. viii. 196—198); and his Boreas or Triton by Lucian (Timon, 54). Pliny tells us that he painted monochromes in shades of gray (monochromata ex albo); and also that there were some vases painted by him (fama opera) at Ambrosia, where they were left untouched by Fulvius Nobilius, when he took away the picture of the Muses. The statement of Cicero (Brutus, 10), that Zeuxis used only four colours, is explained in the Dictionary of Antiquities, s. v. Colors, p. 320, b, 2d ed.

2. An artist in gold (aurifer) in the household of Augustus, whose freedman he was, as we learn from an inscription on the columbarium of Livia. (Gori, Nos. 114—122; Bianchini, No. 43; Welcker, Kunsthblatt, 1827, No. 84; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 430.)

Respecting a supposed statuary Zeuxis, whose name arises from a false reading of Pliny, see SILANION and ZEUXTIDES.

[ZIBODETES or ZIPODETES (Σιβώδης or Ζί-πω-δης). 1. King of Bithynia, the son of Bas. He reigned for forty-eight years (b. c. 326—278). He carried on successful wars with Lysimachus and Antiochus, the son of Seleucus. (Memnon, ap. Phot. Cod. 224, p. 226, ed. Bekker.) In b. c. 315 he carried on the war against Antigonus and Chalcedon. (Diod. xix. 60.) He founded a city which was called Zipoetium after him at the foot of Mount Lyperus. He lived to the age of seventy-six, and left behind him four children, the eldest of whom, Nicomedes, succeeded him. (Memnon, L. c.)

2. Son of the preceding, who established himself in a part of Bithynia, and against whom Nicomedes carried on war in b. c. 277. It was for the purpose of overpowering him that Nicomedes called in the aid of the Gauls. (Liv. xxxviii. 16; comp. Clinton, Fasti Hellen. vol. iii. p. 411.)

The name Tiboetes [TIBOETES] is by some corrected to Ziboetes. [C. P. M.]

ZIGABEUS, EUTHYMIUS. [EUTHY- MUVIUS, ZMILUS. [SMLIS.]

ZOE (Ζώη), the name of several empresses of Constantinople, of whom the following were the most important: — ZOILUS.

1. Surnamed Carbonopsina, the wife of Leo VI. the philosopher, who reigned A. D. 886–911. She survived her husband, and her effigy appears on the coins of her son Constantius VII. Porphyrogenitus (Zechel, vol. viii. pp. 246–248.) [Lio VI.; Constantius VII.]

2. The daughter of Constantius IX. was married first to Romanus III. Argyros, who succeeded her father on the throne, and reigned A. D. 1028–1034. Towards the end of her husband’s reign, though she was then about 50 years of age, she carried on a criminal intrigue with the general Michael, surnamed the Papalagonian; and that she might be able to gratify her pleasures without restraint she caused her husband to be murdered, and raised Michael to the throne, whom she then married. Michael IV. the Papalagonian, reigned from A. D. 1034–1041; and on his death, she was persuaded by the people to reign in her own name. A few days made Zoë repent her ambition, and she placed the crown on the head of Michael V. Calapates, whom her second husband had adopted in his life-time. The new emperor showed the most profound benevolence, and commenced his reign by banishing Zoë. This and other imprudent acts caused an insurrection at Constantinople. Michael was deposed at the end of a year’s reign, and Zoë and her sister Theodora were proclaimed co-empresses on the 21st of April, 1042. The two sisters reigned together for about two months; but as they feared for their position, Zoë, who was then about 60, married a third husband, whom she raised to the throne, and who is known by the name of Constantius X. Monomachus. She died in 1050 while her third husband was still alive. [Constantius IX.; Romanus III.; Michael IV. and V.; Constantius X.]

ZOEUSUS (Zoxes). 1. A person of this name is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 2) as the author of a Psychological treatise.

2. A Romanian, who, according to the greater number of authorities, was a native of Amphipolis. By others (Schol. ad Iliad. v. 4; Eustath. p. 337) he is called an Ephesian. The age in which he lived has been the subject of some discussion, as the authorities are irreconcilably at variance. The great majority of them (Suid. s. v.; Aelian. V. H. xi. 10; Dionys. de Isopo, p. 627, de Vi Demosth. p. 974; Suid. s. v. Διονυσίδεν) make him contemporary with the disciples of Isocrates. On the other hand, there is a passage in Vitruvius, which assigns him to the age of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus (Prosfit. ad lib. VII.). He is said by Vitruvius to have come to Alexandria in the hope of securing the patronage of the king, who, however, was indignant at the manner in which he treated the poems of Homer, and paid no regard to him. Various accounts were given of his having met with a violent death (Iliac). But though it is within the limits of probability that Zoilus lived to see the accession of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, this, as Clinton says (Fasti Helen. iii. p. 381), does not satisfy the details of the account of Vitruvius, which, when closely examined, proves to be inconsistent with itself. The safest course, therefore, is to reject it altogether. “Zoilus began to be eminent before the rise of Demothenes, and continued to write after the death of Philip.” (Clinton, L. c. p. 483.)

ZOILUS. According to Heracleides Ponticus (Alleg. Hom. p. 427), he was originally a Thracian slave. Aelian speaks of him as having been a pupil of Polycrates, who wrote an accusation of Socrates.

Zoilus was celebrated for theenuity with which he assailed Homer, from which he derived the epithet of Ὠμοφοράτας. (Suid. s. v.; Schol. ad Iliad. v. 7, 20, i. 129, x. 274, xviii. 32, xxii. 209, xxii. 100; Eustath. ad Od. p. 1614; Schol. in Plut. Hipparch. p. 240.) He found fault with him principally for introducing fabulous and incredible stories in his poems. From the list that we have of his writings, it also appears that he attacked Plato and Isocrates. His name became proverbial for a captious and malignant critic. (Ingenium magnum livor detrectat Homer. Quisquis es, ex illo, Zoile, nomen habes, Ovid. Rem. Ann. 366.) He was also styled Κὼν βητηρίκος (Aelian. V. H. xi. 10). It is worthy of note, however, that Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Ep. ad Pomp. c. 1) speaks of him with considerable respect, and does not hesitate to class him among critics of the highest rank. The following works of Zoilus are mentioned by Aelian:—P. a. Εтьсяν βιοτόν (Suid. L. c.). 2. Ἡστηρα ἐκ Θεογονίας ὑπὸ τῆς Φιλίππου τετελευτῆτα (ibid.). 3. Ἡ λαὸς της Ἡλεούσας ποιήσεως Λόγου ἐνεύτη. 4. Ψέφος Ὀμυρέων. Unless this is only another name for the preceding (ibid. Ael. l. c.; Dionys. l. c.; Plut. Synop. v. p. 677; Schol. ad Hom. II. ii. 66.) 6. Κατά Πάτατων (Aelian. l. c.; Dionys. ad Pomp. p. 752). 7. Τενεβίων εὐγκομίων (Strab. vi. p. 271). 8. A work on the figures of speech, from which Quintilian quotes, with disapprobation, a definition of χημα (Quint. ix. 1. 14, comp. Phoebomon de Fig. p. 583, ed. Ald.). None of these have come down to us. The story told by Suidas of his having been thrown headlong down the Scironian rocks, is probably as fabulous as the other accounts of a similar kind given by Vitruvius. (Fabric. Bibli. Gr. vol. i. p. 559, &c.; Voss. de Hist. Gr. p. 130, &c.)

3. A grammarian of the name of Zoilus is introduced by Athenaeus (l. 1) among the Deipnosophistae.

4. A native of Perga, from whom Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 37) quotes some statements respecting Diogenes the Cynic.

5. A native of Cyprus, an artificer, mentioned by Plutarch (Demetr. 21).

7. Others of this name, not worth mentioning here, are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 561, &c.).

ZOILUS (Zoi/os), a physician, who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Andromachus the younger (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicom. sec. Loc. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 632). He appears to have given particular attention to diseases of the eye, as he is called ὁ ἐφαρμακικός. Several of his medical formulas are preserved by Galen (ibid. iv. 8, pp. 759, 763, 771; De Antid. ii. 12, vol. xiv. p. 178). Alexander Trallianus (ii. 5, p. 173), Aetius (ii. 3. 111, 133, pp. 304, 360, 361), and Nicolaus Myrepsus (xxiv. 25, p. 638). See C. G. Kühn, Index Medicus. Ocularius. inter Graecos Romanos. Fascic. xi. [W. A. G.]

ZOILUS (Zoi/os), artists. 1. A medalist, whose name occurs on the coins of Perseus, king of Macedonia, in such a manner as to make it oc-taint, in the opinion of Raoul-Rochette, that the name is that of the engraver of the medals. (Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 98, 2d ed.)

2. A sculptor of Corinthian vases, in the household of Agrippa, according to Raoul-Rochette's interpretation of the inscription, ZOILLI CORINTHIAC. AGRIPP. The matter is, however, doubtful. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 430, 2d ed.)

ZONARAS, JOANNES (Ταυδυριος η Ζωναρας), a celebrated Byzantine historian and theologian, lived in the twelfth century under the emperors Alexis I. Comnenus and Constantine XI. During the reign of Alexis he held the high offices of Great Drungarius, or commander of the emperor's body-guards, and of Protaoscecretis (Πρωτοσεκρετης), or first private secretary of the emperor; but he quitted the world during the reign of Constantine XI., and retired to the monastery on Mount Athos, where he spent the remainder of his life in the composition of the various works mentioned below. He is frequently quoted by subsequent Byzantine writers, who all speak of his learning and abilities in terms of the highest praise. He is said to have died at the age of 88 years, and to have been buried in the monastery of St. Elias. The following is a list of his works which have been printed:

1. Χρονικοι, or Annales, in 18 books, from the creation of the world to the death of Alexis in A.D. 1118. It is compiled from various Greek authors, whose works Zonaras frequently retains. The earlier part is chiefly taken from Josephus; and in the portion which relates to Rome he history he has for the most part followed Dion Cassius. In consequence of the latter circumstance the Annals of Zonaras are of great importance in studying the early history of Rome. Of the first twenty books of Dion Cassius we have nothing but the abstract of Zonaras; and even of the later books, of which Xiphilinus has made a more full epitome, Zonaras has preserved many statements of Dion which are entirely omitted by Xiphilinus. (XIPHILINUS). In the latter part of his work Zonaras wrote as an eyewitness of the events he describes, but with a brevity which is surprising, considering the many interesting and important occurrences of his time. His deficiencies, however, in this respect are amply supplied by Anna Comnena, the daughter of the emperor Alexis. (Comnena.) The history of Zonaras was continued by Nicetas Acominiatus, whose work commences at the death of Alexis. (Nicetas.) The first edition of the Annals of Zonaras was printed under the superintendence of H. Wolf, Basel, 1557, 3 vols. fol. The next edition, which was much improved, formed part of the Paris collection of Byzantine writers, and was edited by Du Fresne Du Cange, Paris, 1666, 2 vols. fol.: it was reprinted in the Venice edition of the Byzantine writers. The last and best edition is by Pinder, Bonn, 1841, 8vo., which is not yet complete; it forms part of the Bonn collection of Byzantine writers.

2. Συναγε'ρι τε'χνων συλλεγετα εκ διαφορων βιβλιων, παλαιων τη φυμα γραμματι και την νεων κα ανωτερον ων τη διαμερισμα. This Lexicon was published for the first time by J. A. H. Tittmann, Lips., 1808, 2 vols. 4to. Titman thinks that it is the same work as Suidas quotes under the title of Ετυμολογικον άλλο ο δευτερων, in which case it could not have been compiled by Zonaras, as Suidas probably lived in the tenth century.

3. Εξηγησες των ιερων καλ δειων κακων, &c., an Exposition of the Canons of the Apostles, Councils, and Fathers. The Exposition of the Apostolical Canons was printed, with a Latin translation, by J. Quintinus, Paris, 1558; and the Exposition of the Canons of the Councils and Fathers was printed by Antonius Salmatian, Milan, 1613. Both parts of the work were published in Greek and Latin by Beveridge (Beverigus), in his Pandectarum Canoni, Oxford, 1672, fol.

4. Λαγιο προ των τηρο της φυσικης της γονης ερευνης μελαιας ηρωμενως, printed in Bonifacius, Tus Orientale, 1573, 8vo., and in Leunclavius, Ias Graeco-Romanum, vol. i. p. 351.

5. Εκ προαστων των αρχερεωρ περι του μη δευτερου βιου εξελεξειτων την αυνην αναγενεθε περ τα' γονην, to show that two nephews ought not to marry the same woman, printed in Cotelierius, Monument. Eccles. Graecae, vol. ii. p. 483, fol., Paris, 1681, 4to.

There are several other works of Zonaras in manuscript, the titles of which are given by Fabricius. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 229, fol., vol. vii. p. 463, fol.; Schöl, Geschichte der Griechischen Literatur, vol. iii. pp. 193, 247, 467.)

ZONAS. [Diodorus Zonas, Vol. I. p. 1017.]

ZOPYRINUS (Ζοπυρίνος), the author of a work on cookery (Οφαστρινα, Athen. xiv. p. 662, d.).

ZOPYRION (Ζοπυριον), 1. An historical writer, mentioned by Josephus (c. Apion. i. 23).

2. A grammarian, the author of the first part of the Λειμονιους ηλευζων (from A to E), of the remainder of which Pamphilus was the author. (Pamphilus.)

ZOPYRUS (Ζοπυρος), historical. 1. A distinguished Persian, son of Megabyzus, one of the seven chiefs who killed the false Smerdis, served under Dareius against Babylon, which had revolted at the commencement of his reign. After Dareius had besieged the city for twenty months in vain, Zopyrus resolved to gain the place for his master by the most extraordinary self-sacrifice. Accordingly, one day he appeared before Dareius, with his body mutilated in the most horrible manner; both his ears and nose were cut off, and his person otherwise disfigured. After explaining to Dareius his intentions and concerting measures with him, he fled to Babylon as a victim of the cruelty of the Persian king. The Babylonians, seeing one of the most distinguished Persians in such a horrible condition, readily gave him their confidence, and placed him at the head of their troops. He soon found means to betray the city to Dareius, who severely punished the inhabitants for their revolt. Dareius appointed Zopyrus satrap of Babylon for life, with the enjoyment of its entire revenues, and also bestowed upon him many other marks of his confidence and esteem. He was accustomed to say that he would rather have Zopyrus without wounds than possess twenty Babylonians. (Herod. iii. 153—160.)

Ctesias places the revolt of Babylon in the reign of Xerxes. He relates that the Babylonians slew their satrap Zopyrus, and that Megabyzus, the son of Zopyrus, betrayed the city to Xerxes by means of the same stratagem which Herodotus ascribes to Zopyrus. (Megabyzus, No. 2.) But the account of Herodotus is preferable on many accounts. (See Grote, Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 310, note.)

2. The son of Megabyzus, and the grandson of the preceding, revolted from the Persians, and fled to Athens. (Herod. iii. 150.)
3. The Thracian, a slave of Pericles, was appointed by the latter the Paedagogus of Alcibiades. (Plut. Alcib. i. p. 122.)
4. The Physiognomist, attributed many vices to Socrates in an assembly of his disciples, who laughed at him and at his art in consequence; but Socrates admitted the truth of his remarks, and said that such were his natural propensities, but that they had been overcome by philosophy. (Cic. Tusq. iv. 37, de Fato, 5; Alex. Aphrod. de Fato, c. 6, p. 48, ed. Orelli.)

ZOPYRUS (Ζόπυρος), literary. 1. Of Tar- rentum, a Pythagorean philosopher. (Iambl. Vit. Pyth. extr.)
2. Of Clezomeneae, a rhetorician, was a contemporary of Timon. (Quintil. iii. 6; § 3; Laert. ix. 114.)
3. Of Byzantium, an historian (Plut. Parall. Min. c. 36), was probably the author of Μαθηταί κτερίσματος, a work of book of which is cited by the Scholiast on Homer (II. x. 274). He is perhaps the same person as the Zopyrus mentioned by Marcellinus (Vit. Thuc. § 32). Stobaeus quotes two verses from Zopyrus (Floril. xiii. 8), and likewise makes an extract from a work entitled Θεωρίας, also by Zopyrus, but it is impossible to determine whether this Zopyrus was the same as the Byzantine, or whether Stobaeus quotes from the same or from two different persons. There are some other quotations of the name. (See Vossius, de Hist. Gracc, p. 511, ed. Westermann.)

ZOPYRUS (Ζόπυρος). 1. A surgeon at Alexandria, the tutor of Apollonius Citensis and Posidonius (Apoll. Cit. ap. Dictz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. p. 2) about the beginning of the first century B.C. He invented an antidote, which he recommended to Mithridates, king of Pontus, and wrote a letter to that king, begging to be allowed to test its efficacy on the person of a criminal (Galen, De Antit. ii. 8, vol. xiv. p. 130). Another somewhat similar concoction he prepared for one of the Ptolemies. (Cels. v. 23, § 2, p. 94.) Some of his medical formulae are quoted and mentioned by various ancient authors, viz. Caecilius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. i. ii. 14, v. 10, pp. 425, 592), Oribasius (Coll. Med. xiv. 45, 50, 52, 56, 58, 61, 64, pp. 478, 481, 492, 493, 493, 487), Aéticus (ii. 4. 57, iii. 1. 31, iv. 2. 74, pp. 417, 476, 732), Paulus Aegineta (vii. 11, p. 660), Marcellus Empiricus (De Medecin. c. 22, p. 312), and Nicolaus Myrpes (i. 291, p. 429) and Pliny (H. N. xxiv. 87), and Dioscorides (iii. 99. vol. i. p. 446) mention that a certain plant was called zopyron, perhaps after his name. Nicarchus satirizes in one of his epigrams (Anthol. Gr. xi. 124), a physician named Zopyrus, who appears to have lived in Egypt, and who may possibly be the person mentioned by Apollonius Citensis and Celsus: in which case Nicarchus must have lived earlier than is commonly supposed. [Nicarch.] 32. An acquaintance of Scribonius Largus in the first century after Christ (Scrib. Larg. De Compox. Medecin. c. 171, p. 222), a native either of Gordium in Phrygia (Gordesiia) or of Gortyna in Crete (Gortynensis), may perhaps have been the same physician who is introduced by Plutarch as one of the speakers in his Symposicaxis (iii. 6) and said to have belonged to the Epicurean school of philosophy.

ZOROSTER.

ZOROSTER, is mentioned by Pliny as one of the eminent silver chasers who flourished in the time of Pompey the Great. Two cups of his, representing the trial of Orestes by the Areopagus, were valued at twelve thousand sesterces. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55: Zopyrus, qui Areopagitis et judicium Orestis in duobus scaphis [caelavit] H. S. XII. aestimatis.)

ZOROSTER or ZOROASTRES (Zoroaster), the Zarathustra of the Zendavesta, and the Zendusht of the Persians, was the founder of the Magian religion. The most opposite opinions have been held both by ancient and modern writers respecting the time in which he lived. In the Zendavesta itself, as well as in the writings of the Parsees, Zoroaster is said to have lived in the reign of Vitasaces (as he is called in the Zendavesta), or in the reign of Gushtasp (as the Persians name him), whom most modern writers identify with Dareius Hystaspis. According to this view the system of Zoroaster was not promulgated till the time of the third Persian monarch, and he must therefore be looked upon as the reformer and not the founder of the Magian religion, which was of much higher antiquity. This opinion was maintained by Hyde and Prideaux, who also attempted to prove that Zoroaster was a pupil of Daniel, and learnt from the prophet all those parts of his system which resemble the tenets of the Sacred Writings. But although this opinion has been adopted by Anquetil du Perron, Kleuker, Malcolm, and many other modern writers, it will be found to possess no other evidence in its favour but the identification of Gushtasp with Dareius Hystaspis; for the testimony of the later Greek and Roman writers, who place Zoroaster at this period, is of no value in such an inquiry, and is more likely to have been based on statements of other classical writers who assign to him a much earlier date. Moreover, while this supposition has such a slender amount of evidence in its favour, it is open to the most serious objections. First, Zoroaster is universally represented as the founder of the Magian religion both by the Oriental and the Greeks, and it is unnecessary to prove that this religion was of greater antiquity than the commencement of the Persian empire, and that it had been previously the national religion of the Medes. The first Greek writer who mentions Zoroaster is Plato, who says that the Persian youths were taught the Mageia of Zoroaster, the son of Horomazes, which he interprets to mean the worship of the gods (δι᾽ ἄνω καὶ μεγάλων διάθηκης τοῦ Ζωροασθροῦ τοῦ Πρωτάραον—εὐτίς ἄνω γνώσεως, Plat. Alcib. i. p. 122, a). Secondly, if Zoroaster had been the reformer of the Persian religion in the reign of Dareius Hystaspis, he would certainly have been mentioned by Herodotus. The silence of the historian is a conclusive argument to us against Zoroaster being a contemporary of Dareius. Thirdly, the king Gushtasp, under whom Zoroaster lived, is said in the Zendavesta to be the son of Auravatapta, the Lohnap of the modern Persians, while Hystaspes, the father of Dareius, was never king, and was the son of Askama or Arsames. It would therefore seem that the Gushtasp, the contemporary of Zoroaster, was an entirely different person from Darius Hystaspis.

Other dates have likewise been assigned to Zoroaster by modern scholars; but sound criticism compel us to come to the conclusion that it is quite impossible to determine the time at which he lived. All we learn from the Zendavesta is that he was the subject of a king named Guatasp, who belonged to the dynasty of the Kâvâ, or as they are called in the modern Persian, the Kayanians. The history of the dynasty has come down to us in a mutilated form; but it would appear that the Kings of this race reigned in eastern Iran, and more particularly Bactria, at a period anterior to that of the Median and Persian kings. The Bactrian origin of Zoroaster is alluded to by several of the Greek and Roman writers, who obtained their information from Oriental sources. Thus Ammianus Marcellinus (xiii. 6, § 82) calls Zoroaster a Bactrian, and his testimony is of considerable importance because he must have received the information from the Persians themselves, when he attended the emperor Julian in his campaign against the Parthians. Ctesias likewise, who resided long at the court of Artaxerxes Mnemon, calls Zoroaster a king of Bactria (Ctesias, pp. 79, 91, ed. Lion, copied by Justin, i. 1); and the same statement occurs in Moses of Chorene (i. 6). The tradition which presents Zoroaster of Media, origin sprang up at a later time, when the chief seat of his religion was in Media, and no longer in the further East. We may therefore conclude that the religion of Zoroaster first appeared in Bactria, and from thence spread eastward; but further than this we cannot venture to go. As the founder of the Magian religion he must be placed in remote antiquity, and it may even be questioned whether such a person ever existed. Niebuhr regards him as a purely mythical personage (Kleine Schriften, vol. i. p. 200); but it is worthy of remark that we find no trace in the Zendavesta of the various wonders and miracles which are connected with his name in the Persian and Greek and Roman writers. It is unnecessary to repeat these stories, but we may mention as a specimen two tales related by Pliny. It is said that he laughed on the day of his birth, and that his brain palpitated so violently as to heave up the hand that was raised upon his forehead; and that he lived in the desert for twenty years on cheese, in consequence of which he was preserved from feeling old age. (Plin. H. N. vii. 16, s. 15, xi. 42, s. 97.) It would be idle to attempt to make even an approximation to the date of Zoroaster from the statements of the Greek and Roman writers; for the most learned among them could not come to any agreement as to the time at which he lived, and many supposed that there were several persons of this name, who lived at widely different times and in very different countries. Thus we find him called not only a Bactrian, but a Median (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 399), a Chaldaean (Porphyry, Vit. Pythag. 12), a Persmedian (Suidas, Zoroaster), a Persian (Diog. Laërt. Proef.), an Armenian (Arnob. i. 12), a Phrygian (Arnob. l. c.), and even a native of Proconnesus. (Plin. H. N. xxx. 1. s. 2.) Many of these various statements probably arose from the circumstance that the Magian religion was introduced into these countries and places; and it is only in this way that we can explain the strange account in Pliny that he was a native of Proconnesus. We find equal discrepancy in the Greek and Roman writers respecting the time at which he was said to have lived. Thus Aristotle and Eudoxus stated that he lived 6000 years before the death of Plato (Plin. H. N. xxxi. 1. s. 2), and Hermippus that he lived 5000 years before the Trojan war (Plin. l. c.; Diog. Laërt. i. 2); while others assign to him a much later date, making him a contemporary of Cyrus (Arnob. i. 52) or Pythagoras (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 357; Appuleius, Florid. ii. p. 251). We only quote these statements as instances of the discrepancies in the Greek and Roman writers respecting the age and country of Zoroaster, and of showing the hopelessness of attempting to construct any theory from such contradictory accounts.

There were extant in the later Greek literature several works bearing the name of Zoroaster, and which are quoted under the titles of Λόγια, ιερόν λόγιον, ἀποκαλύψεις, βιβλία ἀποκρύπτων Ζωρο- στράτου, περὶ φωτῶν, περὶ Μίθων τιμίων, ἀστερο- σκοπικά, ἀποτελεσματικά, &c. Some of these works were in existence as early as the time of Pliny, who relates that Hermippus wrote commentaries on two million lines of Zoroaster. (Plin. l. c.; Suidas, s. v. Ζωρ.) These writings however must not be regarded as translations from the Zendavesta, to which they bore no resemblance, as is evident from the extracts preserved from them by Clemens Alexanderinus, Eusebius, and others. (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 14, p. 710; Euseb. Ev. Ec. i. 10; Dion Chrysost. Or. 36.) They were, on the contrary, forgeries of a later age, and belong to the same class of writings as the works of Hermes Trismegistus, Orpheus, &c. There is still extant a collection of oracles ascribed to Zoroaster, which were published for the first time with the commentaries of Gemistus Plethon (Gemistus), under the title of Μυσικά λόγια τῶν ἀπὸ τοῦ Ζωροστράτου Μάνων, by Tiletanus, Paris, 1538, 4to. They have also been edited by Patricius in his Nova de Universa Philosophia, &c., Ferraria, 1591, and Vener. 1593, foh.; by Morell, Paris, 1595, 4to., and also in Latin; by Obsaques, Paris, 1507, 8vo., and by others. It would be ridiculous in the present day to enter into any argument to prove the spuriousness of these oracles. Every thing known respecting the reputed works of Zoroaster is collected by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 304, foll.).

An account of the religious system of Zoroaster does not fall within the scope of the present work; but the reader will find abundant information on the subject in the works quoted below. Mr. Milman has given an excellent summary of the leading tenets of the Zoroastrian system. (Hyde, Vedūnum Persarum et Magorum Religionis Historia, Oxford, 1700 and 1760; Pridexau, Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament, Part i. vol. i. p. 299, foll.; Anquetil du Perron, Zendavesta; Kleuker, Zendavesta; Rhode, Die Heilige Sacre des Zendvaks; Heeren, Historical Researches, &c.; Asiatic Nations, vol. i. p. 367, foll.; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, vol. i. c. 8; Milman, History of Christianity, vol. i. p. 603, foll.; Georgii, in Real-Encyclopädie des classischen Alterthumswissenschaf, s. v. ZÖRZINES, king of the Siraci, a people in the neighbourhood of the Caucasus, in the reign of the emperor Claudius. (Tac. Ann. xii. 15, 17, 19.)

ZOSIMUS (Ζώσιμος). 1. A learned freedman of the younger Pliny, remarkable for his talents as a comedian and musician, as well as for his excellence as a reader. (Plin. Epist. v. 19.)

2. Prefect of Epirus under Valentinian and Valens. He is mentioned in connection with some laws promulgated in A.D. 373. (Cod. Theod. 6. tit. 31. 12. tit. 10.)

3. A Greek historian, who lived in the time of the younger Theodosius (Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 41). He is described by Photius (Cod. 93, p. 84, ed. Bekker) as καθε ἐποχής καὶ ἐνσάφειαν ὑγείας (como et exaequoribus facti). He may possibly have been the son of Zosimus, the prefect of Epirus, who is mentioned in the Theodosian Code. Zosimus was the author of a history of the Roman empire in six books, which is still extant. This work must have been written after the year 425, as an event is mentioned in it (v. 27) which took place in that year. How long after cannot be determined with certainty; but his description of the condition of the Greek empire at the time he wrote accords with the state of things in the latter part of the fifth century. Further biographical particulars have not come down to us.

As Polybius had narrated the events by which the Roman empire had reached its greatness, so Zosimus undertook the task of developing the events and causes which led to its decline (Zosim. i. 57). As the commencement of this decline, he goes back to the change in the constitution of Rome introduced by Augustus. The first book comprises a sketch of the history of the early emperors of the imperial period, from the fall of the reign of Diocletian (A.D. 305). The second, third, and fourth books are devoted to the history of the fourth century, which is treated much less concisely. The fifth and sixth books embrace the period from A.D. 395 to A.D. 410, when Attalus was deposed. Though the decline of the Roman empire was the main subject which Zosimus selected, it was perhaps his ambition to imitate Polybius, which led him to introduce various matters connected with Persian, Grecian, and Macedonian history, which are not very intimately connected with his main design. It is clear that Photius and Evagrius had not more of the work than we have. Yet it seems likely on some accounts, either that a part of the work has been lost, or, what is more likely, that Zosimus did not live to finish it; for as we now have it, it does not embrace all that Zosimus himself tells us he intended to take up (iv. 59. § 4. 5. i. 58. § 5, iv. 28. § 3). There does not exist much probability in the conjecture that the monks and other ecclesiastics succeeded in suppressing that portion of the work in which the evil influences of their body were to be more especially touched upon (v. 23. § 8; Harles. ad Fabr. vol. vii. p. 65 ; comp. Voss. de Hist. Gr. p. 312). If the work was thus left incomplete, that circumstance would account for some carelessness of style which is here and there apparent. There may appear some difficulty at first sight, however, in the statement of Photius, that the work, in the form in which he saw it, appeared to him to be a second edition (vēas ἐκδόσεως). But it would seem that Photius was under some misapprehension. It is called in the MSS. ἱστορία νέα (in what sense is not quite clear). This may perhaps have misled Photius. He himself remarks that he had not seen the first edition.

The work of Zosimus is mainly (though not altogether) an abridgment or compilation of the works of previous historians. As far as the 41st chapter of the first book he follows Herennius Dexippus. From that point to the 11th chapter of the fifth book Eunapius is his guide, though he nowhere makes mention of him. Photius remarks in general terms of the work that it was not so much a history as a compilation from Eunapius. After Eunapius he follows Olympiodorus, sometimes copying from him whole chapters. The style of Zosimus is fairly described by Photius as ofttimes clear, partaking of an unprejudiced. His chief fault as an historical writer is that he neglects to notice the chronology.

Zosimus was a pagan, and is by no means sparing of the faults and crimes of the Christian emperors. In consequence of this his credibility has been fiercely assailed by several Christian writers, and has been sometimes defended merely because his history tended to the discredit of many leading persons in the Christian party. Photius thus expresses his opinion: ἐστι τὴν δρασκελαν ἀθέτησι καὶ πολύκαι πολέμων ἡμῶν κατὰ τῶν εὐερεῖων (l. c.). Evagrius (iii. 40. 41) and Nicephorus (xvi. 41, &c.) also speak in the most unfavourable terms. The question does not, as has sometimes been supposed, turn upon the credibility of the historians whom Zosimus followed, for he did not adhere in all cases to their judgment with respect to events and characters. For instance he完全不同, from Eunapius in his account of the events of the reign of Constantine, as well as the period after the death of the emperor. Baroniust, Locilis, Bisciola, C. v. Barth, J. D. Ritter, R. Bentley, and St. Croix, have taken the derogatory side. Bentley in particular (Remarks upon a late Discourse of Freethinking, Part. ii. p. 21) speaks of Zosimus with great contempt. On the other hand, his historical authority has been maintained by Leunclavius, G. B. von Schirach, J. Matth. Schröck, and Reitmeier. There are no doubt numerous errors of judgment to be found in the work, and sometimes (especially in the case of Constantine) an intense expression of opinion, which somewhat exaggerates, if it does not distort the truth. But he does not seem fairly chargeable with deliberate invention, or wilful misrepresentation. One passage in his history in particular has been fastened upon as evident proof of his untrustworthiness, where (ii. 29) he gives his account of the conversion of Constantine, placing it after the murder of his son (A.D. 326), whereas Constantine had declared himself a Christian much earlier. (Sainte-Croix, Mém. de l'Académie des Insér. vol. xlii. p. 466). But on the other hand, the common story of the conversion of Constantine does not rest on any authority that is worth much; and though it is pretty clear that Zosimus has committed an anachronism, it is so gross as has been sometimes supposed; and there is thus much to be said in excuse for Zosimus, that it was not till the latter part of his life that Constantine received the rite of baptism; and it appears from Sozomen (i. 3) that a story similar to that told by Zosimus was current some time previously, so that the latter is not at any rate responsible for the origination of the tale. It is not to be wondered at that one who held to the old faith should attribute the downfall of the empire in great part to the religious innovations attendant upon the spread of Christianity.

The history of Zosimus was first printed in the Latin translation of Leunclavius (Lowenklau), accompanied by a defence of the historian (Basel, 1576, fol.). The first two books, in Greek, with the translation of Leunclavius, were printed by H. Stephanus, in his edition of Herodian (Paris, 1581). The first complete edition of the Greek text of Zosimus was that by F. Sylburg (Scriptores Hist. Rom. Min. vol. iii.). Later editions are those published at Oxford (1679), at Zeitz and Jena, edited by Cellarius, with annotations of his own and others (1679, 1713, 1729). The next edition is that by Reitemeier, who, though he consulted no fresh manuscripts, made good use of the critical remarks of Heyne and other scholars (Leipzig, 1784). The last and best edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1837. There is a German translation by Seybold and Heyler, and also an English and a French translation. (Schüll, Gesch. d. Griech. Lit. vol. iii. p. 232; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. viii. p. 62.)

4. A native of Aesalon, or, according to other accounts, of Gaza. He lived in the time of the emperor Anastasius. According to Suidas (s. v.) he was the author of a λεξις ἀρχηγοικη κατά στοιχείων (of which Suidas himself made considerable use), and commentaries on Demosthenes and Lysias, some of which are still extant in MS. A life of Demosthenes by him is prefixed to most of the editions of Demosthenes.

6. An abbot, whose διαλογισμοι were edited by P. Posinus, in his Thesaurus Asoonicus, p. 279. The editor thinks that he flourished in Palestine about A. d. 430. Several others of this name, not worth inserting here, are enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 71, &c.).

ZOSimus. The short pontificate of this Roman bishop, which lasted from the 18th of March, A. d. 417, until his death on the 26th of December in the following year, was rendered more remarkable by the rash activity with which he plunged into delicate and irritating controversies than by any display of sound judgment or high principle. His attention was first occupied by the representations of Caelestius and Pelagius, who, having appealed to his predecessor Innocentius against what they termed the harsh and prejudiced sentence of the Carthaginian synod, now earnestly demanded a full investigation of the charges preferred against their orthodoxy. Zosimus not only pronounced the complete acquittal of the accused, but inveighed in the strongest terms against the conduct of the African clergy, and published a letter testifying his entire satisfaction with the explanations of Pelagius. But scarcely had he given expression to these feelings when a total change was wrought in his sentiments by the edict of Honorius, issued at Ravenna on the last day of April, A. d. 418. Not satisfied with retracting the praise lavished on the two friends, he hastened to denounce them both as incorrigible heretics, and despatched a circular epistle (Tractoria) to convey a formal announcement of this condemnation to all the ecclesiastical authorities in the Christian world.

His next encounter was with Proclus of Marseille, whom, along with Hilarius of Narbonne, and Simplicius of Vienne, he desired to make subordinate to the see of Arles, at that time occupied by a certain Patroclus, a priest of very doubtful reputation. The bishops of Narbonne and Vienne gave way to a certain extent, or at least did not peremptorily refuse obedience, but Proclus, warmly supported by his clergy and people, bade open defiance to his commands and excommunications.

Nothing discouraged by this repulse, Zosimus, within a very short period of his death, boldly asserted his absolute jurisdiction over the African church by reinstating a certain Apriarius, a presbyter of Sicea, who had been regularly deposed for various grave offences by his own diocesan, thus exciting a storm among the fiery Numidians, which must have produced a violent convulsion had the author of the decree lived to follow up this stretch of power by ulterior measures.

Fourteen Epistolae et Decreta of this pope addressed to various bishops and religious communities, chiefly in regard to the events detailed above, have been preserved, together with a few short fragments of the Tractoria, and of some other pieces, all of which will be found under their best form in the Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum edited by Constant, fol. Paris, 1721, vol. i. pp. 934—1006, in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, fol. Venet. 1773, vol. iv. pp. 1—20, and also in the Conciliorum cumpissimae Collectio of Mansi, fol. Florent. 1760, vol. iv. pp. 349—572.

(See the Prolegomena of Mansi and Galland; Schönenmann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 12; Bühler, Geschichte der Röm. Literat. Suppl. Band 2te Abtheil. § 141.)

ZOSIMUS, M. CANULEIUS, a gold and silver chaser, whose skill and probity are praised in an extant inscription. (Gruter, p. dxxix.; Sillig, Catal. Artif. App. s. v.) The name is also found on some ancient coins; and Raoul-Rochette, assuming the identity of the artist, takes this as a new proof that the art of engraving on metals and on precious stones was often practised by the same persons. (Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 158, 2d ed.)

ZOSTERIA (Λαστωρία), a surname of Athena among the Epicenidian Locrians. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Λαστωρία; comp. Herod. viii. 107.) The masculine form Zosterius occurs as a surname of Apollo in Attica, on the slip of land stretching into the sea between Phaleron and Sunium. (Steph. Byz. l. c.)

ZOTICUS, Aurelius, surnamed The Cook, from the profession of his father, was a native of Smyrna, remarkable for his personal attractions. Having been summoned to Rome by Flagabalus, who had conceived for him a violent affection, he entered the city escorted by a magnificent procession, was received in the palace by the emperor with marks of the most exagerrated respect, and was immediately appointed chamberlain. He speedily, however, fell into disgrace through the arts, it is said, of the rival favourite Hierocles, and was banished. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 16.)

ZYGIA and ZYGUS (Ζυγια και Ζυγος) are surnames of Hera and Zeus, describing them as presiding over marriage. (Hesych. s. v.; comp. Hera.)

|      | Leone 4: Majorian 4. — Majorian marches into Spain, intending to pass over into Africa; but his fleet is completely destroyed by the Vandals at Carthageana. Majorian concludes a treaty with Genseric; he returns to Gaul and winters there. |

| 461  | Coss. Severinus.        |
|      | Dagalaniphus.           |
|      | Leone 5: Majorian 5. — Majorian returns to Italy where he is deposed and put to death by order of Ricimer, who raises Libius Severus to the empire. |
|      | SEVERUS, emperor of the West. |
| 462  | Coss. Imp. Fl. Leo (1.) Aug. II. |
|      | Leone 6: Severus II. — Genseric renewes the war and ravages Italy. Theodoric II. renewes the war in Gaul, and obtains possession of Narba. |
|      | Vivianius.              |
|      | Leone 7: Severus 3. — Theodoric II. attempts to obtain possession of the whole of the Roman dominion in Gaul, but is defeated by Aegidius. Theodoric rules over the greater part of Spain. |
| 464  | Coss. Rusticus.         |
|      | Fl. Anicius Olybrius.   |
|      | Herminianus s. Arminianus. |
|      | Leone 9. — Death of Severus. No emperor of the West is appointed for this and the following year; Ricimer keeps the power in his own hands. |
| 466  | Coss. Imp. Fl. Leo (1.) Aug. III. |
|      | (Tatianus)              |
|      | Leone 10. — Theodoric II. is slain by his brother Euric, who succeeds him. |
| 467  | Coss. Pusaeeus.         |
|      | Joannes.                |
|      | Leone 11: Anthemii 1. — Ricimer applies to Leo to appoint an emperor of the West: Leo appoints Procopius Anthemius. |
|      | ANTHEMIUS, emperor of the West. He gives his daughter in marriage to Ricimer. Sidonius Apollinaris comes to Rome. |
|      | Leone 12: Anthemii 2. — War with Genseric. The Roman forces land in Africa, but the expedition fails through the misconduct of Basiliscus. Sidonius Apollinaris writes his Panegyricus Antemii bis Consulti. |
| 469  | Coss. Fl. Marcianius.   |
|      | Fl. Zeno (qui postea Imp. Caes. Aug. app. est.) |
|      | Leone 13: Anthemii 3. — Zeno, the Isaurian, afterwards the emperor, marries Ariadne, the daughter of Leo. This excites the jealousy of the powerful minister Aspar. |
|      | Severus.                |
|      | Leone 14: Anthemii 4. — Euric, king of the Visigoths, takes Arelate and Massilia, and defeats the Britons, who had come to the assistance of the provincials. |
| 471  | Coss. Imp. Fl. Leo (1.) Aug. IV. |
|      | Anicius Probianus.      |
|      | Leone 15: Anthemii 5. — Aspar is slain by order of Leo. |
The preceding Chronological Tables have been drawn up chiefly from the Fasti Hellenici and Fasti Romani of Mr. Clinton; from the Griechische und Römische Zeittafeln by Fischer and Soetbeer, and from the Annales Veterum Regnorum et Populorum by Zumpt.

'I have been for some time in the habit of using the Dictionaries of Antiquity and Ancient Biography, as well as the Dictionary of Ancient Geography, and I have no hesitation in saying, from my knowledge of them, that they are far superior to any other publications of the same sort in our language.
They are works which every student of ancient literature ought to consult habitually, and which are indispensable to every person engaged in original researches into any department of antiquity.'

Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, Bart.

'The Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography, edited by Dr. William Smith, is a work of so much utility to the study of ancient history, and of such general importance to classical education and the progress of knowledge, that its extensive circulation, wherever the English language is spoken or read, may confidently be anticipated.'

William Martin Leake, Esq., F.R.S.

'I have much pleasure in expressing my sense of the invaluable services rendered to the cause of Greek and Latin literature, and of classical education generally, by the great and laborious works of Dr.
William Smith which are extensively used, and with great profit, at Harrow, as in all the public schools of England.'

The old Classical Dictionaries having become obsolete, from the vastly increased information which the researches of modern scholars have attained on historical subjects, this Dictionary is presented to the student as embodying the accurate particulars which recent discoveries have arrived at, respecting the manners, customs, history, and literature of antiquity.

The work contains articles on the most important names—Biographical, Mythological, and Geographical—occurring in the Greek and Roman classics.

In the Mythological articles, care has been taken to exclude all indelicate allusions; and the Greek and Roman Mythology are kept distinct, by treating separately of the Greek divinities under their Greek names, and the Roman under their Roman names—a method adopted by modern authorities, both here and on the Continent, and calculated to remove and prevent many errors and misconceptions.

In the Geographical portion have been embodied all the latest discoveries of travellers relating to the identification of modern localities with ancient sites.

This work is designed for junior students, and contains so much of the subjects of the larger Classical Dictionary as is necessary for understanding the Greek and Roman Classics generally read in schools. It is more adapted, in size as well as in price, to younger pupils; and, for their benefit, not only has the quantity of the syllables of each name been carefully marked, but the genitive cases have been inserted.

A new and pleasing feature is introduced into this volume, viz. the illustration of the Mythological articles by drawings from ancient works of art. These will give the young beginner a more vivid and adequate conception of the symbols and figures typical of the deities and heroes than he could possibly obtain in any other manner; and will thus enlist his interest in the objects of ancient Greek and Roman worship.

This work, intended to illustrate the classical authors usually read in schools, exhibits the results of the labours of modern scholars in the various subjects included under the general term of Greek and Roman antiquities. Such information, contained in the larger Dictionary of Antiquities, as is not suited to junior students, is here omitted; and whatever articles are susceptible of it have been illustrated by woodcuts from ancient works of art.

The book, however, is designed not only for school use, but for the general English reader who, although unacquainted with the ancient classics in the original, frequently needs information on points connected with Greek and Roman antiquities.

The woodcuts are calculated to give a correct idea of the numerous objects described, of which but a vague notion could be conceived from the most minute verbal description; and these cuts have the advantage of authenticity, being taken exclusively from ancient inscriptions, paintings on vases, gems, coins, and pictures found at Pompeii, as well as from actual relics of antiquity still existing. The pupil thus acquires a knowledge of the forms of the various kinds of ancient armour and weapons, instruments of music, apparatus for cooking and banqueting, articles of dress, plans of houses, &c.

The Appendix consists of extensive tables of Greek and Roman coins, weights, and measures; the years corresponding to the Olympiads, the calendar, &c.
